Defender of the Faith.

May it pleaſe your Moſt Excellent Majeſty,

THIS Tranſlation out of Spaniſh, having the Name of Royal Commentaries, ſeems juſtly to claim a Title to Your MAJESTY'S gratious Favour and Protection: And likewiſe Your MAJESTY'S Dominions being adjacent and almoſt contiguous to the Countries which are the ſubject of this Hiſtory, make Your MAJESTY a Party concerned in the Affairs of the New World, and ſo ſupreme an Arbitrator in the Government thereof, that to ſuppreſs the Robberies and Inſolence of certain Pirates who infeſt thoſe Coaſts, Your MAJESTY'S Royal Arms are called for, as the moſt proper Means and Power to reduce them. Great alſo is Your MAJESTY'S Fame in the Eaſt as well as in the Weſt-Indies: And may all the World court Your Friendſhip and Alliance, and doe honour to Your Royal Standard.

May Your MAJESTY be still happy with Increase of Glory and Honour both at home and abroad, untill such time as that you exchange this mortal Crown for one everlasting in the World to come. Which is the fervent Prayer of,

Dread Sovereign,

Your MAJESTY'S

THE TRANSLATOR TO THE READER.

THE Authour of this Hiſtory was one of thoſe whom the Spaniards called Meztizo's, that is, one born of a Spaniſh Father and an Indian Mother. And though he was a Native of Peru, and by the Mother's ſide inclined to the ſimple Temperament, which is natural to that Countrey; yet it ſeems the Spaniſh humour was moſt prevalent in him, ſo that he delighted much to tell us, as in divers places, that he was the Son of Garçilaſſo de la Vega, one of the firſt Conquerours of the new World, who was by the direct Line deſcended from that brave Cavalier Garciperez de Vargas, from whom came the valiant Gomez Suarez de Figueroa, the firſt Count of Feria, his Great-grandfather, and Ynigo Lopez de Mendoça, from whom the Duke of Infantado was deſcended; who was Brother to his Great-grandmother and to Alonſo de Vargas, Lord of the Black-mountain, his Grand-father, from whom came Alonſo de Hineſtroſa de Vargas, Lord of Valde Sevilla, who was Father to Garçilaſſo de la Vega, of whom came our Authour. Nor leſs illuſtrious doth he tell you, that he was by the Mother's ſide, who was the Daughter of Inca Huallpa Topac, one of the Sons of Topac Inca Yupanqui and of Palla Mama Occlo, his lawfull Wife, from whom came Huayna Capac Inca, the laſt King of Peru. Wherefore this Authour in all his Writings ſtyles himſelf Garçilaſſo Inca, becauſe he derived his Pedigree from the Kings of Peru, who were called Inca's, a name it ſeems given to none but the Royal Family.

This Hiſtory is divided into two Parts. The firſt treats of their Government before the time of the Inca's, which was by the Head of their Tribes and Families called Curacas; and then it proceeds unto the Original of the Inca's, and of their Government, and in what manner that ſalvage People was civilized and inſtructed in the Laws of Humane Nature, and to live in a Political Society by Manco Capac their firſt King; How alſo the Men were taught by him to plow and cultivate their Lands, and exerciſe ſome ſort of Husbandry: and how the Women, by his Wife Coya Mama, (who by their Law was to be his Siſter) were taught to ſpin, and weave, and make their own Garments.

It is probable that a great part of this Hiſtory, as far as concerns the Original of the Inca's and the foundation of their Laws, is fabulous: howſo- ever, being, as our Authour says, delivered by Tradition, and commonly believed amongst their People of the better degree, it may contain divers Truths mixed with abundance of Fictions and foolish Inventions. But this is no more than what hath happened to Nations of more refined understanding; for what account can we our selves give of Great Britain before the Romans entred into it? Nay, What can France or Spain say of the Ancient Inhabitants of their own Countries, or of the manner, how they came first to be Christians? Unless it be that which ignorant men have devised, and what the Learned men are now ashamed to believe or say after them? And then, what wonder is it that such poor Salvages, born in a part of the World undiscovered to us, untill the year 1484; and of whose Original we have no certain knowledge; nor have any light besides fancy and conjecture, from whence the Continent of America hath been peopled: How then, I say, can it be expected that these illiterate Creatures should be able to give an account of their Extraction, or of Matters which passed in those Ages; of which the Learned parts of the World acknowledge their ignorance, and confess themselves to be in the dark even as to those Matters which concern their own Histories?

But because it is in the nature of Mankind to use reflect Acts on their own being, and retreat with their Thoughts back to some beginning: so these poor Souls derive the Original of their first being from divers Creatures, of which they had the greatest opinion and admiration: some living near a great Lake which supplied them with store of Fish, called that their Parent, from whence they emerged: and others esteemed the Mighty Mountains of Antis to have been their Parent, and to have issued out of those Caverns, as from the Womb of a Mother; others fansied themselves to be descended from that great Fowl called Cuntur, which spreads a very large Wing, which pleased some Nations of the Indians, that they would look no farther for a Parent than to that Fowl, and in token thereof, upon days of solemnity and festival, carried the Wings thereof fastned to their Armes. But then, as to their Inca's or Kings, whose Original was to be derived from something higher than sublunary Creatures, being of better composition than their poor and mean Vassals, the Sun was esteemed a fit Parent for those who were come from Divine race: so that when they adored the Sun, whom they acknowledged for their God, they gave honour to their Kings who were descended from him. Various have been the opinions amongst Historians concerning the Original of this People; of which the most probable, as I conceive, is, that they proceeded from the Race of the Northern Tartar, whom they resemble in the shape and air of their features, and in their barbarous way of living; but then we must fansie, as some Geographers do, that the West side of America is Continent with Tartary, or at least disjoyned from thence by some narrow strait; of which I am well persuaded we have no certain Knowledge.

But to let these Matters pass, and consider the Condition in which the Spaniards found the Inhabitants of Peru, when they first came amongst them, they were, I say, a naked People, simple and credulous, believing every thing that the Spaniards told and promised them: To which they were induced out of an opinion that the Spaniards were Viracocha's or the Offspring of the Sun, whom they adored for God, and in whom they believed, according to the Light of Nature, that there could be no falsity or shadow of untruth. Wherefore they were strangely surprized, whilst in a peace- able manner they were treating with the good men, and whilst Friar Valverde, with a Croſs in his hand, was preaching to Atahualpa their King; that then, without any Cauſe given, they ſhould be killed with Swords and Lances, and five thouſand of them maſſacred before the face of their Prince; And yet they would not foregoe this fooliſh imagination; though afterwards, contrary to the faith given, they ſaw their King impriſoned, and his liberty promiſed upon a vaſt ranſome of Gold and Silver; which when paid and fully complied with, he was notwithſtanding ſtrangled in priſon, and no other liberty given him than that freedom which Death beſtows upon all mankind. And yet this ſilly People could not but entertain a high eſteem of the Spaniards, as of thoſe who were come to teach them a better Law, and ſtill called them Viracocha's, or People deſcended from their Father the Sun, imagining that this new ſort of People in Beards and Ruffs had received Commiſſion from that glorious Light, which they adored, for puniſhment of their Offences, to ſwear and lye, and violate all the Bands of humane kind. And yet that which farther ſhews the ſimplicity and good nature of this People is, that in deſpight of all the ill uſage received from the Spaniards, they would prove ſtill faithfull to them, upon a principle they had received, that to whomſoever they had yielded themſelves in War, they were to be faithfull, with ſuch uncorrupted Loyalty and Truth, that no conſideration either of King, Wife, Father, Family or Countrey could abſolve them from the Obligation and Duty they owed to their Countrey (vid. p. 487.) And hence it was that ſo many Indians fought againſt their Countrey-men in union with the Spaniards, and ſerved them for Spyes, to give them intelligence of whatſoever was deſigned in the Camp of the Indians.

The Indians have no Beards.

But this flexible and good nature of this People did not ſoften the haughty mind of the Spaniards towards them, who eſteeming the reſt of the World Slaves to them, oppreſſed the Indians with ſuch ſervitude and ſlavery as the nature of man was not able to ſuſtain. Of which that wiſe and good Emperour, Charles the Fifth, taking notice, he diſpatched new Orders to Peru, for eaſe of the Natives, and to exempt them from that inhumane Tyranny which one man ought not to exerciſe towards another: But this gratious Indulgence of the Prince ſerved to raiſe greater Diſturbances amongſt the Conquerours, who refuſing to quit their Commands and exempt their Indians from their Vaſſalage and Services, openly oppoſed the Governours and Officers which were ſent to put the new Ordinances in execution: which afterwards proceeded to an open War and Rebellion, which with various ſucceſſes continued for many years: till at length the King of Spain was forced to moderate the rigour of his new regulations, and condeſcend to his Subjects, by conſerving to them that tyrannical Power which they pretended unto by right of Conqueſt over the Indians: in which they were ſo unmercifull, that had not King Philip the Second contrived a ſupply of Negro's out of Africa to work in the Mountain of Potoſi and other Mines, the whole Indian Nation had before this been utterly extinguiſhed.

But God, who is juſt and compaſſionate of the Creatures which he hath made, would not ſuffer theſe Cruelties to paſs unpuniſh'd, but cauſed the Spaniards themſelves to be inſtruments of his vengeance on each other. So Franciſco Piçarro and Diego Almagro, after having conquered the Countrey, fell at variance about ſharing the Government and dividing the Spoil, which was decided by the Sword: Then Gonçalo Piçarro pretended to the Government of Peru for his Life, by virtue of the Patent which the Emperour perour had given to his Brother the Marquis Piçarro, and in defence thereof, and in oppoſition to the new Laws before mentioned, he raiſed Wars againſt the Juſtices and the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez, whom, after ſeveral Fights and Skirmiſhes he killed in Battel. And though this Piçarro was afterwards ſubdued by the wiſe conduct of the Preſident Pedro de la Gaſca, yet things did not continue long quiet before they broke out again into new diſturbances. So Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla made a Rebellion and headed the Male-contents, who being diſappointed of the reward they expected for the ſervices they had done againſt Gonçalo Piçarro, endeavoured to right themſelves by their own Power, and killed the General Don Pedro de Hinojoſa. Then Vaſco de Godinez killed Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, and ſet up for himſelf, but was ſoon ſubdued, and put to death by Alonſo de Alvarado. Then Egas de Guzman, a bold and bloudy Villain pretended to be the Head of a Party, but he and his Complices were ſoon diſperſed for want of Aſſociates to abet their Cauſe. And laſtly, Franciſco Hernandez Giron, with about twelve or thirteen more began a Rebellion in Cozco, and with that ſmall number killed moſt of the Magiſtrates of the City, and put moſt of the Inhabitants to flight; with whom afterwards many diſcontented Souldiers joining, they carryed on a War againſt the Government for ſeveral years with much bloud, and cruelties acted upon each other; for now the common Souldiers were become ſo mutinous, for want of employment, that they were ready to join with any perſon that pretended to a reſentment: And indeed there was not an ordinary Fellow but who had ſo great a value for himſelf on the honour of being a Spaniard and a Souldier, that he ſwallowed in his vain thoughts all the Riches of the Indies, and fanſied that the whole Government and Wealth of Peru was not a ſufficient Reward for a perſon of his high Merit and Extraction. In this manner was Peru conquered, and with this ſort of People hath it been ſince that time planted, which we have reaſon to believe have buried themſelves in ſloth and luxury. How well they have improved that Countrey and uſed thoſe Riches which God hath given them, and how humanely they have treated the poor Natives; I leave to the Hiſtorians of our modern times: and for the Valour and Bravery which of late years they have uſed in defence of that Countrey; I refer my ſelf to the Relation of the Bucaniers. And ſo proceed on with this Hiſtory.

CHAP. I.

How the New World was Discovered.

ABOUT the Year 1484, a certain Pilot, Native of Helva in the County of Niebla, called Alonso Sanchez, usually Traded in a small Vessel from Spain to the Canaries; and there Lading the Commodities of that Countrey, sailed to the Maderas, and thence freighted with Sugar and Conserves, returned home into Spain; this was his constant course and trafick, when in one of these Voyages meeting with a most violent Tempest, and not able to bear sail, he was forced to put before the Wind for the space of 28 or 29 days, not knowing where or whither he went, for in all that time he was not able to take an observation of the height of the Sun; and so grievous was the storm, that the Mariners could with no convenience either eat or sleep: At length, after so many long and teadious days, the Wind abating, they found themselves near an Island, which it was, is not certainly known, but it is believed to have been St. Domingo, because that lyes just West from the Canaries, whence a storm at East had driven the Ship, which is the more strange, because the Easterly Winds seldom blow hard in those Seas, and rather make fair weather, than tempestuous. But God, who is all-sufficient, intending to bestow his mercies, can make causes produce effects contrary to their nature; as when he drew water from the Rock, and cured the blind with Clay; in like manner his immense goodness and compassion designing to transmit the light of the true Gospel into the new World, made use of these unusual means to convert them from the Idolatry of Gentilism, and from their foolish and dark superstitions, as shall be related in the sequel of this History.

The Master landing on the shore, observed the height of the Sun, and so noted particularly in writing what he had seen, and what had happened in this Voyage out, and home: and having supplied himself with fresh water and wood, he put to Sea again; but having not well observed his course thither, his way to return was the more difficult, and made his Voyage so long, that he began to want both water and provisions, which being added to their former sufferings, the people fell sick, and died in that manner, that of 17 persons which came out of Spain, there remained but five onely alive, when they arrived at the Terceras, of which the Master was one. These came all to lodge at the House of that famous Genoese, called Christopher * Colon, because they knew him to be a great Seaman and Cosmographer, and one who made Sea-carts to sail by; and for this reason he received them with much kindness, and treated them with all things necessary, that so he might learn from them the particulars which occurred, and the discoveries they had made in this laborious Voyage: but in regard they brought a languishing distemper with them, caused by their Sufferings at Sea, and of which they could not be recovered by the kind usage of Colon, they all happened to dye in his house, leaving their labours for his inheritance; the which he improved with such readiness of mind, that he underwent more, and greater, than they, in regard that they lasted longer; and at length he so well succeeded in his enterprize, that he bestowed the New World, with all its riches, upon Spain, and therefore deservedly obtained this Motto to be inscribed on his Armes:

To Castile, and to Leon,
The New World was given by Colon.

In this manner the New World was first discovered, for which greatness Spain is beholding to that little Village of Helva, which produced such a Son, as gave Colon information of things not seen, or known before; the which secrets, like a prudent person, he concealed, till under assurances of silence he first disclosed them to such persons of authority about the Catholick Kings, as were to be assistant and usefull to him in his design, which could never have been laid, or chalked out by the art of Cosmography, or the imagination of man, had not Alonso de Sanchez given the first light and conjecture to this discovery; which Colon so readily improved, that in 78 days he made his Voyage to the Isle of Guanatianico, though he was detained some days at Gomera to take in Provisions.

CHAP. II.

The derivation of the word Peru, and how the Countrey came to be so called.

SInce we are to treat of the Countrey of Peru, it will be requisite to enquire, how it came to be so called, in regard the Indians have no such word in their language: to which end we must know, That a certain Gentleman, Native of Xerez, called Barco Nunnez, having in the year 1513, been the first Spaniard, who discovered the Sea of Zur, or the Pacifick Sea; in reward thereof the Kings of Spain honoured him with the title of Admiral of those Seas, and with the government of those Kingdoms and Countries which he should farther discover and conquer. During those few years he lived after these Honours (for his Son-in-law Pedro Arias de Avila being Governour, in recompence of all his services, cut off his head) his great care was to discover, and know what that Countrey was called, which from Panama runs all along the coast of the Sea of Zur; to which purpose he built three or four Vessels, and employed them in several quarters to make their discoveries; every one of which did afterwards return with relations of great tracts of land running along that coast: one of which Vessels stretching farther than the others to the very Equinoctial line, and sailing by the shore, they espied an Indian, as he was fishing at the mouth of a River, of which there are many, which in that Countrey fall into the Sea; so soon as the Spaniards saw him, they landed four of their men with all privacy imaginable, such as could run and swim well, that so he might not be able to escape them either by land or water. Having so done, they passed with their Ship, as near as was possible before the Indian, that whilst he amused himself with the strangeness of the object, he might more easily be taken by the ambush which was laid for him: the Indian beholding so unusual a sight as a Ship swimming with all her Sails on the Sea, which he had never before seen or heard of, his eyes were so fixed, and his imagination so taken up with looking, and considering what thing that was, which offered it self to his sight, that he was not sensible of the snare laid for him, untill he found himself taken in the Armes of the Spaniards, who with great joy and sport brought him to their Vessel; the poor man was so amazed with the surprizal, and to see the Spaniards with Beards, and in a different habit to his, and to find himself in a Ship, and under Sails, that it is no wonder if he laboured under the greatest consternation imaginable; but the Spaniards using all kind means to treat and caress him, he, in a short time, recovered himself from the distraction of his fear: and then they asked him by signs and words, what Countrey that was, and how it was called? The Indian by their motion and gestures knew that they asked him some question, but could not understand what they demanded, but answering readily, readily, leſt they ſhould doe him ſome hurt, ſaid Beru, which was his own proper name, and then added Pelu; which was as much as to ſay, if you ask me my name, I am called Beru; but if you ask me of the place, where I was, it is Pelu; for that ſignifies a River in the Indian language: from which time, which was in the year 1515, the Spaniards have ever called this great and rich Countrey by the name of Peru; other Hiſtorians corrupting the letters, call it Piru, inſtead of Peru: and this place, where this Indian was ſurprized, we may certainly denote as the utmoſt border of that Dominion which was under the Juriſdiction and Conqueſt of thoſe Kings, which were called Incas; and which was ever after named Peru from that very place which is over-againſt Quita to Charcas, and is the principal Dominion of the Incas, containing 700 Leagues in length; although their Empire did reach as far as Chile, which contains 500 Leagues more, and is another moſt rich and fertile Kingdom.

CHAP. III.

The Deſcription of Peru, with the Story of Peter Serrano.

THE four limits and borders of that Empire which the Incas poſſeſſed before the Spaniards invaded them, were theſe. To the North it was bounded with the River Ancarmaya, which runs between the Confines of Quita and Paſſau, and ſignifies in the common language of Peru, the Azure River, being ſituated almoſt perpendicularly under the Equinoctial line: to the South its limits are confined by the River Mauli, which runs Eaſt and Weſt through the Kingdom of Chili, before it comes to the Araucos, which is 40 degrees of South latitude from the Equinoctial. The diſtance between theſe two Rivers they account little leſs than 1300 Leagues by Land. That which is properly called Peru, contains 750 Leagues in length, reaching from the River Ancarmaya to the Chichas, which is the farthermoſt Province of the Charcas, and lyes North and South, as alſo doth that which is called the Kingdom of Chilo, which contains about 550 Leagues in length, reckoning from the fartheſt part of the Province Chichas to the River Mauli. To the Eaſt it is bordered by that Mountain which is inacceſſible for men, beaſts or fowls, called the Cordillera, becauſe it is always covered with Snow, and runs from St. Marta to the Straits of Magellan, which the Indians call Ritirgu, and is as much as the Countrey of Snow. To the Weſt it hath the Sea of Zur for its Confines, running all along the coaſt to the Cape Paſſau, which is under the Equinoctial, and extends to the Mauli, which alſo falls into the Sea of Zur; from the Eaſt to the Weſt the Kingdom is eſteemed but narrow, the broadeſt place of it being from the Province Mugupapa to the City Trugillo, which is ſituated on the Sea-coaſt, and contains 120 Leagues in breadth, being in the narroweſt place, which is from the Port Arica, to the Province called Laricoſſa, about the ſpace of 70 Leagues. Theſe are the four bounds of that Dominion which the Incas poſſeſſed, the Hiſtory of which we intend, by divine aſſiſtence, for to write. But before we proceed forward, it will be requiſite to recount the Story of Peter Serrano, for which we have place ſufficient in this ſhort Chapter.

Peter Serrano eſcaped from ſhipwreck by ſwimming to that deſert Iſland, which from him received its name, being, as he reported, about two Leagues in compaſs, and for ſo much it is laid down, in the Waggoner, which pricks three little Iſlands in the Cart, with divers ſhallow places about them; ſo that all Ships keep at a diſtance from them avoiding them with all poſſible care and circumſpection.

It was Peter Serrano's misfortune to be loſt upon theſe places, and to ſave his life on this diſconſolate Iſland, where was neither water, nor wood, nor graſs, nor any thing for ſupport of humane life, at leaſt not for maintenance of him for ſo long a time, as untill ſome Ship paſſing by might redeem him from periſhing by hunger and thirſt, which languiſhing manner of death is much more miſerable, than by a ſpeedy ſuffocation in the waters. With the ſad thoughts hereof he paſſed the firſt night, lamenting his affliction with as many melancholy reflexions, as we may imagine, capable to enter into the mind of a wretch in like extremities; ſo ſoon as it grew day, he began to traverſe his Iſland, and found on the ſhore ſome Cockles, Shrimps, and other creatures of like nature, which the Sea had thrown up, and which he was forced to eat raw, becauſe he wanted fire wherewith to roaſt them: And with this ſmall entertainment he paſſed his time, till obſerving ſome * Turtles not far from the ſhore, he watch'd a convenience untill they came within his reach, and then throwing them on their backs, (which is the manner of taking that ſort of fiſh) he cut the throat, drinking the bloud inſtead of water; and ſlicing out the fleſh with a knife which was faſtned to his girdle, he laid the pieces to be dried, and roaſted by the Sun; the ſhell he made uſe of to rake up rain-water, which lay in little puddles, for that is a Countrey often ſubject to great and ſudden rains. In this manner he paſſed the firſt of his days by killing all the Turtles that he was able, ſome of which were ſo large, that their ſhells were as big as Targets or Bucklers; others were ſo great, that he was not able to turn them, nor to ſtop them in their way to the Sea, ſo that in a ſhort time experience taught him, which ſort he was able to deal with, and which were too unwieldy for his force: with his leſſer ſhells he poured water into the greater, ſome of which contained 12 Gallons; ſo that having made ſufficient proviſions both of meat and drink, he began to contrive ſome way to ſtrike fire, that ſo he might not onely dreſs his meat with it, but alſo make a ſmoak to give a ſign to any Ship, which was paſſing in thoſe Seas; conſidering of this invention, (for Seamen are much more ingenious in all times of extremity, than men bred at Land) he ſearched every-where to find out a couple of hard pebles inſtead of flints, his knife ſerving in the place of a ſteel; but the Iſland being all covered with a Dead Sand, and no ſtone appearing, he ſwam into the Sea, and diving often to the bottom, he at length found a couple of ſtones fit for his purpoſe, which he rubbed together, untill he got them to an edge, with which being able to ſtrike fire, he drew ſome threads out of his ſhirt, which he worked ſo ſmall, that it was like cotton, and ſerved for tinder; ſo that having contrived a means to kindle fire, he then gathered a great quantity of Sea-weeds, thrown up by the waves, which with the ſhells of Fiſh, and planks of Ships, which had been wrecked on thoſe ſholes, afforded nouriſhment for his fuel: and leſt ſudden ſhowres ſhould extinguiſh his fire, he made a little covering, like a ſmall Hut, with the ſhells of the largeſt Turtles or Tortoiſes that he had killed, taking great care that his fire ſhould not go out. In the ſpace of two months, and ſooner, he was as unprovided of all things, as he was at firſt, for with the great rains, heat and moiſture of that climate, his proviſions were corrupted; and the great heat of the Sun was ſo violent on him, having neither cloths to cover him, nor ſhadow for a ſhelter, that when he was, as it were, broiled in the Sun, he had no remedy but to run into the Sea. In this miſery and care he paſſed three years, during which time he ſaw ſeveral Ships at Sea, and as often made his ſmoak; but none turned out of their way to ſee what it meant, for fear of thoſe Shelves and Sands, which wary Pilots avoid with all imaginable circumſpection; ſo that the poor wretch deſpairing of all manner of relief, eſteemed it a mercy for him to dye, and arrive at that period which could onely put an end to his miſeries; and being expoſed in this manner to all weathers, the hair of his body grew in that manner, that he was covered all over with briſtles, the hair of his head and beard reaching to his waſte, that he appeared like ſome wild and ſavage creature. At the end of three years Serrano was ſtrangely ſurprized with the appearance of a Man in his Iſland, whoſe Ship had, the night before, been caſt away upon thoſe Sands, and had ſaved himſelf on a plank of the Veſſel: ſo ſoon as it was day, he eſpied the ſmoak, and imagining whence it was, he made towards it. So ſoon, as they ſaw each the other, it is hard to ſay, which was the moſt amazed; Serrano imagined, that it was the Devil who came in the ſhape of a Man to tempt him to deſpair: the New-comer believes Serrano to be the Devil in his own proper ſhape and figure, being covered over with hair and beard: in fine, they were both afraid, flying one from the other. Peter Serrano cried out, as he ran, Jeſus, Jeſus, deliver me from the Devil: the other hearing this, took courage, and returning again to him, called out, Brother, Brother, don't fly from me, for I am a Chriſtian, as thou art: and becauſe he ſaw that Serrano ſtill ran from him, he repeated the Credo, or Apoſtle's Creed, in words aloud; which when Serrano heard, he knew it was no

* A ſort of Fiſh.

Devil

Devil, that would recite thoſe words, and thereupon gave a ſtop to his flight, and returning to him with great kindneſs, they embraced each other, with ſighs and tears lamenting their ſad Eſtate, without any hopes of deliverance: Serrano ſuppoſing that his Gueſt wanted refreſhment, entertained him with ſuch proviſions, as his miſerable life afforded; and having a little comforted each other, they began to recount the manner and occaſion of their ſad diſaſters. Then for the better government in their way of living, they deſigned their hours of day and night to certain ſervices; ſuch a time was appointed to kill Fiſh for eating, ſuch hours for gathering weeds, Fiſh bones, and other matters, which the Sea threw up to maintain their conſtant fire; and eſpecial care they had to obſerve their watches, and relieve each other at certain hours, that ſo they might be ſure their fire went not out. In this manner they lived amicably together for certain days, for many did not paſs before a quarrel aroſe between them, ſo high, that they were ready to fight; the occaſion proceeded from ſome words that one gave the other, that he took not that care and labour as the extremity of their condition required; and this difference ſo encreaſed, (for to ſuch miſery do our paſſions often betray us) that at length they ſeparated, and lived apart one from the other: howſoever in a ſhort time having experienced the want of that comfort which mutual ſociety procures, their choler was appeaſed, and ſo they returned to enjoy converſe, and the aſſiſtence which Friendſhip and Company afforded, in which condition they paſſed four Years; during all which time they ſaw many Ships ſail near them, yet none would be ſo charitable or curious, as to be invited by their Smoak and Flame; ſo that being now almoſt deſperate, they expected no other remedy beſides Death, to put an end to their Miſeries.

Howſoever at length a Ship adventuring to paſs nearer than ordinary, eſpied the Smoak, and rightly judging, that it muſt be made by ſome Shipwrecked Perſons eſcaped to thoſe Sands, hoiſted out their Boat to take them in. Serrano and his Companion readily ran to the place where they ſaw the Boat coming; but ſo ſoon as the Mariners were approached ſo near, as to diſtinguiſh the ſtrange Figure and Looks of theſe two Men, they were ſo affrighted, that they began to row back; but the poor men cryed out, and that they might believe them too not to be Devils, or evil Spirits, they rehearſed the Creed, and called aloud upon the Name of Jeſus; with which words the Mariners returned, took them into the Boat, and carried them to the Ship, to the great wonder of all there preſent, who with admiration beheld their hairy ſhapes, not like Men, but Beaſts, and with ſingular pleaſure heard them relate the ſtory of their paſt misfortunes. The Companion dyed in his Voyage to Spain, but Serrano lived to come thither, from whence he travelled into Germany, where the Emperour then reſided: all which time he nouriſhed his Hair and Beard, to ſerve as an Evidence and Proof of his paſt Life: whereſoever he came the People preſſed, as a Sight, to ſee him for Money; Perſons of Quality having alſo the ſame curioſity, gave him ſufficient to defray his charges, and his Imperial Majeſty having ſeen, and heard his Diſcourſes, beſtowed a Rent upon him of Four thouſand Pieces of Eight a Year, which make 4800 Ducats in Peru; and going to the Poſſeſſion of this Income, he dyed at Panama, without farther Enjoyment. All this Story was related to me by a Gentleman called Garci Sanchez de Figueroa, one who was acquainted with Serrano, and heard it from his own Mouth; and that after he had ſeen the Emperour he then cut his Hair and his Beard to ſome convenient length, becauſe that it was ſo long before, that when he turned himſelf on his Bed, he often lay upon it, which incommoded him ſo much as to diſturb his ſleep.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Idolatry and Gods which the Ancient Incas adored, and Manner of their Sacrifices.

FOR better understanding of the Life, Customs and Idolatry of the Indians of Peru, it will be necessary to distinguish the times before the Incas, from those wherein their Rule and Empire began, their Gods and Sacrifices and Customs being much different, according to the Ages; for the Men themselves, in the first times, were at best but as tamed Beasts, and others were worse than the fiercest Creatures. To begin with their Gods, we must know, that they were agreeable to the quality of their own corrupt and abominable manners, and every Nation, Province, Tribe and House had its particular God; for their Opinion was, that one God would have business sufficient to take care of one Province, or Family, and that their Power was so confined, that it could have no virtue or extent within the Jurisdiction of another: and because their Fancies were not so sublimated, as to frame abstracted Notions of Deities, such as Hope, Victory, Peace, and the like, as the Romans did in the time of Gentilism; they adored whatsoever they saw, such as Flowers, Plants, Herbs, Trees, especially, Pines and Elmes; Caves, Stones, Rivers; and particularly in that Province, which is called the Old Port, they had a high Veneration for the Esmerald, because it is the Pretious Stone of that Countrey, and the Diamond and Ruby are in no esteem, because they are not known to them; they also worshipped the Lion, Tyger and Bear, for their fierceness, and with that submission and humility, that they would not fly from them, but offer themselves to be devoured by them. In fine they adored any thing wherein they observed an Excellency; as the Fox and Monky for Craft, the Hart for his Swiftness, the Falcon for his Agility and Courage, and the Eagle for the Acuteness of his Sight: such was the vanity aud folly in the imagination of this savage People, who had no Scriptures to teach and enlighten them, nor Prince to govern and protect them.

Howsoever there were other Nations more considerate in choice of their Deities, adoring none but such as afforded them benefit and advantage; as Fountains, and cool Springs which yielded them Drink, Rivers that watered their Pastures; the Earth they called their Mother, and worshipped, because it yielded them Food, the Air, because they breathed in it, and was their Life, the Fire, because it warmed them, and dressed their Meat; some also made choice of Sheep, and Corn, and Cattel, and every thing that abounded most in their Countrey, and served for nourishment, to be a God, and worthy of Divine Honour. The Inhabitants near the Cordillera worshipped that Mountain for its height, those of the Coast made the Sea their God, which in their language they call Mamachoca, and is as much as to say, the Mother Sea: the Whale for its prodigious bigness was in no less Veneration than the rest, and every sort of Fish which abounded amongst them was deified, because they believe that the first Fish in the World above them, takes always care to provide them with a number of the like sort or species sufficient to maintain and nourish them. Besides these there are two Nations which are Chirihuanas, and others living about the Cape of Passau, (which are the North and South Borders of Peru,) that have no thoughts or inclinations to Religion, and worship nothing either above or below; but giving themselves over to stupidity and sloth, neither having fear nor love, live with the same sensuality that Beasts do, because they have not as yet had the happiness to receive the instructions, doctrine and government of the Incas, who are the Indian Kings. The Sacrifices which they made to these Gods were as cruel and barbarous as the Gods were stupid and senseless, to whom they offered them; for besides Beasts, and Fruits, and Corn, they sacrificed Men and Women of all ages, which they had taken in the War: And some Nations of these exceeded so far in their inhumanity, that they offered not onely their Enemies, but on some occasions their very

Children

Children to these Idols. The manner of these Sacrifices were to rip open their breasts whilst they were alive, and so tear out their Heart and Lungs, with the Bloud of which, whilst warm, they sprinkled their Idols: then they inspected the Lungs and Heart, to take an omen of good or bad, and know whether the Sacrifice had been acceptable to the Idol; then they burnt the Entrails, and ate the Flesh themselves with great joy and festivity, though it were of their own Child, or other Relation of the same bloud.

Blas Valera a certain Authour who in loose Papers wrote of the Indies, describes those Nations by distinguishing the former from the latter ages, and saith. That those who live in Antis eat Mens Flesh, and are more brutish than the Beasts themselves, for they know neither God, nor Law, nor Vertue, nor have they Idols, or any Worship; unless sometimes when the Devil presents himself to them in the form of a Serpent, or other Animal, they then adore and worship him. When they take any in the War, if he be an ordinary Fellow, they quarter him, and divide him to be eaten by their Wives, Children and Servants, or perhaps sell him to the Shambles; but if he be of Quality, or Noble, they call their Wives and Children together, and like Officers of the Devil, they strip him of his garments, and tye him to a stake, and then alive as he is, they cut him with Knives, and sharp Stones, paring off slices from the more fleshy parts, as from the Buttocks, Calves of the Legs, and the brawny places of the Arme; then with the Bloud they sprinkle the principal Men and Women, and the remainder they drink, and eat the Flesh as fast as they can, before it is half broiled, lest the miserable Wretch should dye before he hath seen his flesh devoured, and intombed in their bowels: The Women, more cruel and inhumane than the Men, wet the nipples of their Breasts with the bloud, that so the Infants which suck them may take a share of the Sacrifice. All this is performed by way of a religious Offering with mirth and triumph, till the Man expires; and then they complete the Feast in devouring all the remainder of his Flesh and Bowels, eating it with silence and reverence, as sacred, and partaking of a Deity. If in execution of all this torment the Patient was observed to sigh and groan, or make any distorted faces, then they broak his Bones, and with contempt threw them into the fields and waters; but if he appeared stout, and enduring the anguish and pains without shrinking at them, then his Bones and Sinews were dryed in the Sun, and lodged on the tops of the highest Hills, where they were deified, and Sacrifices offered to them. Such are the Idols and manner of living of these Brutes, because the Government of the Incas was never received into their Countrey, nor hath it any Power there at this day. This Generation of Men came out from the parts about Mexico, and spread themselves from Panama and Darien, over all those great mountains which run as far as the new Kingdom of Granada, and on the other side as far as the Cape of St. Martha. All which particulars we have received from Father Blas Valera, who in the Narrative he gives of their Lives and Manners much more aggravates their diabolical Practices, than by any thing we have here related.

But other Indians less cruel, and of a more mild Nature, though they mingled humane Bloud with their Sacrifices, yet they did it not with the death of any; but drew it from Veins of the Arme or Leg, or from the Nostrils, in case of pains in the Head, and from other parts, as the nature or solemnity of the Sacrifice required. Others offered Sheep, and Lambs, Conies, Partridges, and all sorts of Fowl, Herbs, and the Cocar-Nut, so much in esteem amongst them; with their Mayz, which is a sort of Wheat, as also Pulse, Anise and Cummin, and sweet Woods, which rendred a perfume; the which were severally sacrificed according to the nature of the Deity they adored. And thus much shall be sufficient to have been delivered concerning their Sacrifices, and Gods of the Ancient Gentilism.

CHAP. V.

Of the Government, Diet and Cloathing of the Ancient Indians.

THeſe People were as barbarous in their manner of living in their Houſes and Habitations, as they were in the Worſhip of their Gods, and Sacrifices; ſuch of them as obſerved any thing of a Political Government, lived in a kind of Society, having houſes near together, placed without order of Streets or Paſſages, appearing rather like Pens or Sheepfolds, than humane Habitations: Others, by reaſon of the Wars and Variances amongſt themſelves, lived on Rocks and Mountains, and places inacceſſible for their Enemies; others dwelt in little Cottages, ſcattered over the fields and vallies; and every one ſeated himſelf as well as he thought convenient for commodiouſneſs of Victuals and Water, whether it were in Caves under ground, or in the hollow of Trees, the neceſſities, rather than the conveniences of living being provided for; and of this ſort of People there are ſome yet remaining about the Cape of Paſſau, as the Chirihuanas and other Nations, whom the Incas have conquered, and who ſtill continue their ancient barbarity, and ſavage manners: and theſe are the moſt difficult of any to be reduced to the ſubjection of the Spaniards, or the Chriſtian Religion; for having never had Learning, or ſcarce Language ſufficient to underſtand each other, they live like Beaſts, without Communication, Friendſhip or Commerce.

Thoſe amongſt them who had moſt of Underſtanding, or of a Spirit moſt daring, took the privilege to Rule, and govern the others, whom he treated as his Slaves, with ſuch Tyranny and Cruelty, that he made uſe of their Wives and Daughters at his pleaſure, all things being confounded with War and Ruine. In ſome Provinces, they flead the Captives taken in War, and with their Skins covered their Drums, thinking with the ſound of them to affright their Enemies; for their opinion was, that when their Kindred heard the rumbling noiſe of thoſe Drums, they would be immediately ſeized with fear, and put to flight. For the moſt part they lived by Robberies, and the Spoils each of other; the ſtronger preying upon the weaker was the cauſe of ſeveral petty Kings; ſome of which perhaps being of a more gentle nature than others, and who treated their Subjects with leſs rigour and cruelty, were for that reaſon adored by them for Gods, framing to themſelves ſome repreſentation of Divinity in the good actions of ſuch men, who had ſome allays in their cruel and tyrannical Government. In other parts, they lived without Lords, or order of a Common-wealth; but like ſo many Sheep paſſed together in all ſimplicity; not that Vertue moderated their malice, but their ſtupidity and ignorance made them ſenſeleſs and uncapable of good or evil.

Their manner of Cloathing, or covering their Bodies, were in ſome Countries as immodeſt as they were ridiculous; their Diet alſo was ſo foul and barbarous, that we, who know better, may wonder at the beaſtiality. In the hot Countries, which were moſt fruitfull, they ſowed little or nothing, but contented themſelves with Herbs, and Roots, and wild Fruits, and with that which the Earth produced of it ſelf, for they, requiring no more than natural ſuſtenance, lived with little, and created no accidental neceſſities for ſupport of Life. In ſome Countries they were ſuch great lovers of Man's Fleſh, that when they were killing an Indian, they would ſuck his bloud at the Wound they had given him; and when they quartered his body, they would lick their fingers, that not one drop of bloud ſhould be waſted: in their Shambles they commonly ſold Mens Bodies, making Sauſages of their Guts, ſtuffing them with fleſh, that nothing might be loſt. Peter of Cieca in the 26th Chapter of his Book, declares ſo much, and affirms, that he ſaw it with his own Eyes; and that ſo far their gluttony provoked them in this kind, that they did not ſpare thoſe very Children, which they begot begot upon those Women whom they had taken Captives in the War, but breeding them with such care and diet as might make them fat; so soon as they came to be twelve years of age, and that they were plump and tender, they dressed them for their Table, and devoured them with their Mothers, unless they were with Child; for then they reserved them till they were delivered, and had nursed up their brood. Moreover to those Men whom they took in the War they gave Women, and their breed they nourished and fatned, with intent to eat them, as we do Lambs, and Calves, and the young ones of our heards and flocks, without regard to Bloud or Parentage, which even in brute beasts hath some effect of love and tenderness. But what was most abominable above all, was a custome amongst some Indians to eat the Flesh of their Parents, so soon as they were dead; accounting it a part of their respect and duty to bury and intomb them within their own Entrails, which they boiled, or roasted, according to the quantity; if the body was lean, and extenuated, they boiled the flesh to make it the more tender, and if it were gross and fleshy, then it was roasted; and for the bones, they buried them with some Ceremony, either in the holes of Rocks, or the hollow Trees: but this sort of People know no Gods, nor adore any thing, and inhabit for the most part in the hotter, and not in colder Regions of this Continent. In the more cold and barren Countries, where the earth is not so fruitfull, necessity compells them to sow Mayz, which is their Indian Wheat, and other sorts of pulse or grain, but they distinguish neither times, nor seasons for it; and in their fishing and fowling, and in all other things the like barbarity of manners predominates.

As to their manner of Cloathing, the modesty of an Historian obligeth me rather to pass it by, than to describe it, lest I should seem offensive to chast and modest Ears: but to express it with as much decency as I am able; we are to know, that the Indians in the first ages wore no other covering than the Skins which Nature gave them. Some perhaps of them for curiosity, or affectation, girt themselves about the Waste with a clout of course thread, which they esteemed a Cloathing sufficient for them. I remember, that in the Year 1570. when I came into New Spain, that I met in the streets of Cartagena with five Indians, all naked, walking one after the other, like so many Cranes, so little had the conversation and society of the Spaniards in so long a time prevailed to the alteration of their Humours, Manners or Barbarity.

The Women wear no other garments than the Men; onely the married Wives girt a string about them to which they fasten a clout of Cotton, a yard square, like an Apron, and where they cannot or will not learn to weave, they cover their nakedness with the rine or broad leaves of trees. The Maidens also wear something girt about them, to which they add some other mark, as a sign of their Virginity. Modesty forbids us to enlarge farther on this Subject, it being sufficient what we have declared, that in hot Countries they went naked, without other covering, or ornament, than that which Nature furnishes to brute Beasts; whence we may imagine how barbarous those Indians were before the times in which the Incas gained a Sovereignty over them.

In colder Countries they used Garments, not for modesty, or decency, but for necessity to defend them from the cold: their cloathing was commonly with the Skins of beasts, and with a sort of Matt, which they wove with straw or rushes. Other Nations of them, who had more ingenuity, wore a sort of Mantles, ill made, and spun with a course thread, and worse woven with wool, or wild hemp, which they call Chahuar; and some ornament about their necks, and a covering about their wastes, was all the cloathing which their customs and manners required; and in this habit the Spaniards found those Indians, over whom the Incas had not extended their Dominion; and which even to this day continues amongst them: for they have such an aversion to garments, that even those who live familiarly with the Spaniards, and are their domestick Servants, are rather forced by importunity to use them, than that they chuse them out of inclination, or any consideration of decency or modesty; the like humour is also common to the Women; so that the Spaniards use in jest to tell them that they were bad Spinsters, and to ask them whether they would not cloath themselves because they would not spin, or would not spin, because they would not be cloathed.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of the different ways of Marriages, and diverſity of Languages amongſt them. And of the Poiſons and Witchcrafts that they uſed.

SUch as theſe Indians were in their eating and cloathing, ſuch were they in their Marriages, in which they were as beſtial, as in their other manners, exerciſing coition in the ſame way as Beaſts; for having not Wives in property, they uſed their Women as Nature incited, or as accidentally they occurred; without regard to Mothers, Daughters, or Siſters, or the neareſt proximity of bloud. In ſome Countries, where a certain ſort of Marriage was uſual, thoſe Women that were free of their Bodies, were moſt eſteemed, and obtained the beſt Husbands, becauſe they were accounted active, and buſie in their calling, when others of a more chaſt and cold Nature, were rejected as drones, dull and unfit for love. In other Countries they obſerved a different cuſtome; for the Mothers preſerved their Daughters with great reſpect and care, till the time of their Marriage, when bringing them into publick, they ſhewed the Tokens of their Virginity. In other parts the Father, or near of kindred, claimed a title to the Maidenhead of the Bride by conditions of the Marriage, before ſhe was given to the Husband. Peter de Cieca in the 24th Chapter of his Book affirms the ſame; and that Sodomy was uſed amongſt them, but yet in ſecret, and as a crime: though the Devil perſuaded them to it in their Temples, as a pleaſure which their Gods delighted in, that ſo under the guiſe of Religion he might take off that veil of Modeſty, which covered humane nature.

There were ſome, both men and Women, that practiſed the art of Poiſoning, ſo that they could kill with it immediately, or in a certain time, or could make mad, or fools, disfigure the countenance, make the body leprous, and the Limbs to wither and pine away.

Every Province, and every Nation had a different Tongue, or Dialect; thoſe who ſpake the ſame Language they eſteemed Friends and Kindred, and with them they kept peace and confederacy, all others were accounted Enemies and Strangers, with whom they maintained a perpetual War, eating thoſe whom they took, as if they had been Animals of another ſpecies.

Witchcraft was more commonly uſed by the Women, than by the Men, who, to gain a reputation to themſelves of Wiſedom, of Prophecies and Predictions of things to come, like Pythoneſſes, or Sibyls, treated familiarly with the Devil. Theſe Women, out of malice or Envy practiſed this Art moſt commonly on the Men, and which operated the ſame effect as their Poiſons; ſuch was the conſtitution of theſe Indians in the firſt age, and in the time of their Gentiliſm, when they had no other guide but the Devil and their own Natures; and hereof we ſhall more particularly treat in the ſequel of this Hiſtory, when coming to diſcourſe of the Nations apart, we ſhall have occaſion to mention the barbariſms and beſtialities which are reſpectively appropriated unto the ſeveral People.

CHAP. VII.

The Original of the Incas, who were Kings of Peru.

THeſe People living and dying in that manner, as we have before declared, it pleaſed God at laſt that ſome little light ſhould dawn from the morning, and through the dark clouds of Ignorance and Stupidity dart a ſmall ray of the Law of Nature into their hearts, that learning ſomething of that reſpect which one man ought to bear unto another, they might by degrees improve in morality, and from Beaſts be converted into Men, and made capable of Reaſon and Underſtanding; that ſo, when the ſame God, who is the Sun of Juſtice, ſhould think fit to iſſue out the light of his Divine Rays on thoſe poor Idolaters, they might be found more docible, and eaſily diſpoſed to receive the principles of the Chriſtian faith; the which will plainly appear in the progreſs of this Hiſtory; and that thoſe, whom the Incas had ſubjected, and reduced to ſome terms of Humanity and Political Government, were much better and eaſier to receive the Evangelical Doctrine preached unto them, than thoſe ignorant wretches who lived in their natural ſtupidity, and who to this day, after the ſpace of 71 Years, that the Spaniards have been Maſters of Peru, have made no ſtep or improvement towards the Doctrine of Morality, or a rational Life. And now that we may proceed forward, to relate theſe obſcure matters, I muſt acquaint the Reader, that having conſidered with my ſelf of the ways and methods whereby I might moſt clearly make known the beginning and original of the Incas, who were the Natural Kings of Peru, I have determined with my ſelf, that there is no more expedite courſe, nor means hereunto, than to repeat thoſe ſtories which in my youth I received from the relation of my Mother, and my Uncles, her Brothers, and others of my Kindred, touching this ſubject, which certainly will be more authentick and ſatisfactory than any account we can receive from other Authours, and therefore ſhall proceed in this manner.

My Mother, reſiding at Cozco, which was her own Countrey, thoſe few Kindred and Relations of hers which ſurvived, and eſcaped from the cruelties and Tyrannies of Atanhualpa, (as ſhall be related in the Hiſtory of his life) came almoſt every week to make her a viſit; at which their ordinary diſcourſe was concerning the Original of their Kings, the Majeſty, and greatneſs of their Empire, their Conqueſts, and Policies in Government, both for War and Peace, together with the Laws they inſtituted for the good and benefit of their ſubjects: in ſhort, there was nothing great or proſperous amongſt them, which they omitted in the Series of their Diſcourſe.

From their paſt Happineſs they deſcended to their preſent condition, and bewailed the death of their Kings, by whoſe deſtruction the government fell, and the Empire was transferred. Theſe, and ſuch like diſcourſes, the Incas, and the Ladies of quality, which we call Pallas, entertained us with at their viſits, which they always concluded with tears and ſighs in remembrance of their loſt happineſs, ſaying, that from Governours they were now become Slaves, &c. During theſe Diſcourſes, I, that was a Boy, often ran in and out, pleaſing my ſelf with ſome pieces of the ſtory, as Children do with the tales of Nurſes. In this manner days, and months, and years paſſing, till I was come to ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age, being one day preſent with my Kindred, who were diſcourſing of their Kings and Anceſtours, it came into my mind to ask the moſt elderly Perſon amongſt them, and interrupt his Diſcourſe in this manner. Inca, ſaid I, and my Uncle, how is it poſſible, ſince you have no Writings, that you have been able to conſerve the memory of things paſt, and of the Original of our Kings? I obſerve that the Spaniards, and their neighbouring Nations, have their Divine and Humane Hiſtories, whereby they learn the time that their own Kings, and the Princes of other Countries began their Reigns, when and how Empires were altered and transferred; nay, ſo far they proceed, as to tell us how many thouſand years are paſt, ſince God created Heaven and Earth: all which, and much more, they have learned from their books; but as for your parts, in what manner can you retain the memory of your Anceſtors, or be informed of the Original of your Incas? as who was the firſt of them, or what was his name? of what lineage, or in what manner he began to reign? what Nations he conquered, and when he gave a being to this great Empire, and with what Exploits our Anceſtors atchieved their greatneſs?

The Inca was much pleaſed to hear me make theſe enquiries, becauſe he took a delight to recount thoſe matters, and turning himſelf to me, Couſin, ſaid he, I moſt willingly comply with your requeſt; for it concerns you to hear them, and keep them in your heart, (which is a phraſe that they uſe, when they mean that it ſhould be committed to Memory.) You muſt know therefore, that in ages paſt all this Region and Countrey you ſee round us, was nothing but mountains, and wild foreſt, and the People in thoſe times were like ſo many brute Beaſts, without Religion or Government; they neither ſowed, nor ploughed, nor cloathed themſelves, becauſe they knew not the art of weaving with Cotton or Wool: They dwelt by two and two, or three and three together, as they happened to meet in Caves, or holes in the Rocks and Mountains; their food was Herbs, or Graſs, Roots of Trees, and wild Fruits, and Man's Fleſh; all the coverings they had were Leaves or Barks of Trees, and Skins of Beaſts: In ſhort, they were altogether ſavage, making uſe of their Women as they accidentally met, underſtanding no property, or ſingle enjoyment of them.

And now I pray obſerve me with due attention, for I would not be troubled to make repetition of what I have ſaid. Our Father the Sun, (for this is the language of the Incas, which is a title of Reverence and Reſpect, which they always adjoin, ſo often as they name the Sun; for they avail themſelves much of the Honour of being deſcended from him; and his Name is ſo pretious, that it is blaſphemy for any, and by Law he is to be ſtoned, who dares to take this Name into his mouth, who is not an Inca, or deſcended from that Lineage.) Our Father the Sun (ſaid the Inca) beholding Men ſuch as before related, took compaſſion of them, and ſent a Son and a Daughter of his own from Heaven to Earth, to inſtruct our people in the knowledge of Our Father the Sun, that ſo they might worſhip and adore him, and eſteem him for their God: giving them Laws and Precepts, whereunto they might conform their Lives, like Men of Reaſon and Civility; that they might live in Houſes and Society, learn to ſow the Land, cultivate Trees, and Plants, feed their Flocks, and enjoy them; and other Fruits of the Earth, as rational Men, and not as brute Beaſts. With theſe Orders and Inſtructions Our Father the Sun placed his two Children in the Lake Titicaca, which is about eighty Leagues from hence, giving them liberty to go, and travell which way they pleaſed, and that in what place ſoever they ſtaid to eat, or ſleep, they ſhould ſtrike a little wedge of Gold into the ground, (which he had given them,) being about half a yard long, and two fingers thick, and where with one ſtroke this wedge ſhould ſink into the Earth, there ſhould be the place of their Habitation, and the Court unto which all People ſhould reſort. Laſtly, he ordered them, that when they ſhould have reduced People to theſe Rules and Obedience, that then they ſhould conſerve and maintain them with Reaſon, Juſtice, Piety, Clemency and Gentleneſs, performing all the good Offices of a pious Father towards thoſe Children which he loves with tenderneſs; and that in imitation of him, and by his example, who doeth good to all the World, affording them light to perform their buſineſs, and the actions of Life, warming them when they are cold, making their paſtures, and their ſeeds to grow, their trees to fructifie, and their flocks to increaſe, watering their Lands with dew from above, and in its ſeaſon beſtowing chearfull and favourable weather: and to manifeſt his care of all things, ſaid, I every day take a turn round the World, to ſee and diſcover the neceſſities and wants of all things, that ſo as the true Fomenter and Parent of them, I may apply my ſelf to their ſuccour and redreſs. Thus after my example, and as my Children, ſent upon the Earth, I would have you to imitate me, and to inſtill ſuch Doctrine into this People, as may convert them from Beaſts unto Men: and from henceforth I conſtitute and ordain you Lords and Princes over this People, that by your Inſtructions, Reaſon and Government, they may be conſerved. Thus Our Father the Sun, having declared his pleaſure to theſe his two Children, he diſpatched them from him; and they taking their journey from Titicaca Northward, at every place where they came to repoſe, they tryed with their wedge to ſtrike it in the ground, but it took no place, nor would it enter; at length they came to a poor Inn, or place to reſt in, about ſeven or eight Leagues Southward from this City, which to this day is called Pacarec Tampu, which is as much as to ſay, the Shining or Enlightned Dormitory. This is one of thoſe Colonies which this Prince planted, the Inhabitants whereof boaſt of this Name and Title which our Inca beſtowed upon it; from whence he and his Queen deſcended to the Valley of Cozco, which was then onely a wild and barren Mountain.

The Foundation of the Imperial City of Cozco.

THE first stop (proceeded the Inca) which they made in this Valley; was in the Desart called Huanacauti, which is to the southward of this City, and there they again struck their wedge of Gold into the Earth, which received it with great facility, and which sucked it in with so much ease, that they saw it no more. Then said the Inca to his Sister, and Wife, in this Valley Our Father the Sun hath commanded that we should stay, and make our abode, and in so doing we shall perform his Pleasure; in pursuance whereof it is necessary that we now separate each from the other, and take different ways, that so we may assemble and draw the People to us, in such manner as we may be able to preach and propagate the doctrine amongst them, which he hath committed to us. Accordingly our first Governours proceeded by divers ways from the Desart of Huanacauti to convocate the People, which being the first place, of which we had knowledge, that they had hallowed by their Feet, and from whence they went to doe good unto Men, we have deservedly (as is manifest) erected a Temple, wherein to adore and worship our Father the Sun, and remember this good and benefit he hath done unto the World. Our Inca the Prince took his way northward, and the Princess to the Southward, and to all the Men and Women which they met in the wild thickets, and uncultivated places, they declared to them, that their Father the Sun had sent them to be Teachers and Benefactours to those Inhabitants, and to draw them from that rude and savage Life, and to another method of living, more agreeable to Reason and Humane Society; and in farther pursuance of the Commands of their Father the Sun, they came to gather them from those Mountains, and rude places, to more convenient Habitations, where they might live in Humane Society, and to assign them such food, as was appropriated to Men, and not to Beasts. These, and such like matters, these Princes declared to those savages, whom they found in Desarts and Mountains, who beholding these two persons cloathed, and adorned with such Habit as Our Father the Sun had vested them in, and observing that their Ears were bored through, for wearing Jewels, and more large and open than usual, that they might hear and receive the Complaints of the oppressed; (in which we also are like them, who are of their Offspring and Family,) and that by the gentleness of their words, and grace of their Countenance, they manifested themselves to be Children of the Sun, and such as were employed to assemble People into societies, and political ways of living, and to administer such sorts of food as were wholsome and appropriated to Humane Sustenance, they were struck with such admiration of their figure and Persons, and allured with the promises they made them, that they gave entire credence to their words, adored them as Children of the Sun, and obeyed them as their Princes: And these poor wretches relating these matters one to the other, the fame thereof so encreased, that great numbers, both of Men and Women, flocked together, being willing to follow to what place soever they should guide them.

Thus great multitudes of People being assembled together, the Princes gave order that Provision should be made of such fruits, as the Earth produced for their sustenance, lest being scattered abroad to gain their food, the main body should be divided, and the numbers diminished: others in the mean time were employed in building houses, of which the Prince gave them a model and form. In this manner our Imperial City began to be peopled, being divided into two parts, one of which was called Hanan Cozco, which is as much as the Upper Cozco, and the other Hurin Cozco, which is the Lower Cozco; those which were assembled under the King were of the Upper Town, and those under the Queen were of the Lower: Not that this difference was made out of any respect to Superiority, for that they were to be Brothers, and Children of the same Father and Mother, and in the same equality of Fortune; but onely it served to distinguish the followers of the King from those of the Queen; and to remain for an everlasting Memorial of their first Beginning and Original, with this difference onely, that the Upper Cozco should be as the Elder, and the Lower as the younger Children. And this is the reason that in all our Empire this diversity of lineage hath remained, being ever since distinguished into Hanan Ayllu, and Hurin Ayllu, which is the upper and the lower Lineage, and Hanan Suyu, and Hurin Suyu, which is the upper and the lower Tribe.

The City being thus Peopled; Our Inca taught his Subjects those Labours which appertained unto the Men, as to plough and sow the Land with divers sorts of Seeds, which were usefull, and for food; to which end he instructed them how to make Ploughs and Harrows, and other Instruments, fit and necessary for that purpose; he shewed them also the way of cutting chanels for the Water, which now runs through this Valley of Cozco, and to make Shoes for their Feet. On the other side the Queen instructed the Women in good Huswifery, as how to spin and weave Cotton and wool, and to make garments for their Husbands, their Children, and themselves, with other Offices appertaining to the House. In sum, nothing was omitted conducing to humane Wellfare, which the King did not teach his Men, and the Queen her Women, making them both their Scholars and their Subjects.

CHAP. IX.

The Actions of the first Indian King, called Manco Capac.

These Indians being in this manner reduced, looked on themselves much bettered in condition; and with singular acknowledgments of the benefits received, and with great joy and satisfaction travelled through the Rocks and Thickets to communicate the happy news of those Children of the Sun, who for the common good of all appeared on the Earth, recounting the great good and benefits they had received from them; and to gain belief amongst them they shewed them their new Habit, and Cloathing, and Diet, and that they lived in Houses and in political Society. This relation induced this wild People to see those wonders, of which being fully satisfied by their own Eyes, they ranged themselves amongst the rest to learn, and obey; and thus one calling and inviting the other, the fame spread far and near, and the people increased in such manner, that in the first six or seven years the Inca had composed an Army fit for War; and having taught them how to make Bows and Arrows, and Lances, and such Weapons as we use to this day, they were not onely capable to defend, but also to offend an Enemy, and to compell those by force whose bestial nature detained from Humane Association.

And that I may not be tedious in the relation of what this Our first Inca acted, you must know, that he reduced all Eastward, as far as the River called Paucartampu, and eighty Leagues Westward, to the great River called Apurimac, and to the Southward nine Leagues to Quequesana. To these several quarters Our Inca sent out particular Colonies, to the largest a hundred Families, and to the lesser according to their capacity. These are the beginnings of this our City, and of this our rich and famous Empire, which your Father, and his Adherents have despoiled us of. These were our first Incas, and Kings in the first ages of the World, from whom the succeeding Princes, and we our selves are descended: but how many years it may be since our Father the Sun sent his Offspring amongst us, I am not able precisely to declare, because my Memory may fail me in it, but I imagine, they may be about 400 Years. This our Inca was named Manco Capac, and his Queen Coya Mama of Huaco, who were, as I have said, Brethren of the Sun and Moon. And thus having at large satisfied the request you made to me, in relation of which, that I might not incline you to sadness, I abstained from venting tears at my Eyes, which notwithstanding drop with bloud on my Heart, caused by that inward grief I feel, to see our Incas, and their Empire ruined and destroyed.

This large Relation of the Original of our Kings, I received from that Inca which was my Mothers Brother, from whom I requested it; and which I have caused faithfully to be translated out of the Indian into the Spanish Tongue; which though it be not written with such Majesty of words as the Inca spake it, nor with that significancy of termes as that Language bears, nor so large and particular (to avoid tediousness) as it was delivered to me, howsoever it may serve to give sufficient ſufficient light to the nature and knowledge of this our Hiſtory. Many other things of like ſort, though of no great moment, this Inca often recounted in his Viſits and Diſcourſes he made me, the which I ſhall declare in their due places, being now troubled that I made no farther enquiries into other matters, for which I have room here to place them with good authority.

CHAP. X.

Wherein the Authour alledges the Authority he hath for the Truth of his Hiſtory.

HAving thus laid the firſt Foundation whereon to build our Hiſtory, though as to the Original of our Kings of Peru, it may ſeem ſomething fabulous; it now follows, that we proceed forward to relate in what manner the Indians were reduced and conquered, enlarging the particulars which the Inca gave me, with divers other additions concerning the Natural Indians, and their Kings, which the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, reduced under his Government, with whom I was educated, and converſed untill I arrived to the age of twenty years; during which time I became informed of all the particulars concerning which I write, for in my youth they related theſe ſtories to me, as Nurſes doe tales, or fables to their Children. Afterwards, in my riper years, I took a more particular notice of their Laws and Policies, comparing this new Government of the Spaniards, with that of the Incas, namely, what were eſteemed faults and treſpaſſes, and what ſeverities and puniſhments were proportioned to the ſame: they informed me alſo of the Methods which their Kings uſed in War and Peace, how they treated their Vaſſals, and what ſervices they required from them. They inſtructed me alſo in their Idolatries, Ceremonies and Sacrifices, teaching me to diſtinguiſh between their more ſolemn feſtivals, and the ordinary holy-days, and how they were to be obſerved and celebrated; they told me alſo what was eſteemed ſuperſtitious, and of abuſe in their Religion, what Omens there were of good and bad luck; in ſhort, there was nothing either relating to their Government or Manners, of which they gave me not a diſtinct Account, ſo that ſhould I deſcribe every matter received from them, the particulars would be too large to be contained within the volume of this Hiſtory. Beſides what I have heard, I have been an Eye-witneſs for the moſt part of their Idolatrous Worſhip, Feaſts, and other ſuperſtitious Cuſtoms, which untill the twelvth or thirteenth year of my age were not wholly aboliſhed amongſt them. For in regard I was born eight years after the Spaniards became Maſters of my Countrey, and that, as I ſaid, I was educated amongſt the Indians till I was twenty years old, I had opportunity in all that time to obſerve, and be well acquainted with their Cuſtoms; beſides all which, ſo ſoon as I took a reſolution to write this Hiſtory, I acquainted my Schoolfellows, ſuch as were taught the art of Grammar, of this my intention, deſiring them to ſearch into the Archives and Regiſters of their Countries, and to ſend me the various ſucceſſes of them; the which purpoſe of mine they ſo well approved, that every one moſt readily contributed to this work, ſending me the Hiſtory of the Exploits and Actions of their reſpective Incas, and is the ſame which the Spaniſh Hiſtorians relate on this Subject, though not ſo particularly, and largely as we have done. And in regard the Beginning and Foundation of this Hiſtory conſiſts of the actions of this firſt Inca, it will be very pertinent to this matter to particulariſe them diſtinctly, that ſo we may not be obliged to repeat them in the Lives of his Succeſſours, who having a great value for his Perſon and Vertues, made it their chief aim and intention to imitate the Humour, Actions and Cuſtoms of this their firſt Prince Manco Capac; ſo that we ſhall endeavour to repreſent the moſt important matters, which he acted, omitting things leſs pertinent and material. And though many things herein contained may ſeem fabulous, yet becauſe they are ſuch as the Indians make the Foundation of their Hiſtory, and of thoſe greatneſſes which the Spaniards do now in reality enjoy, I cannot paſs them by, without injury and prejudice to the Beginning, Progreſs and Period of this Monarchy: Howſoever having ſucked in a ſincerity with my Milk, I ſhall give a true Account of all that I heard, and received from my Parents, promiſing, that neither favour nor affection to my People and Bloud ſhall encline me either to conceal the bad, or beyond Reaſon applaud the good or natural Vertues of them; for though Gentiliſm be ſuch a Sea of Errours, that every thing may be believed of it, which is new and prodigious; yet I ſhall deliver nothing but what the Spaniſh Hiſtorians have before intimated of thoſe Kings and Countries; and that I may not ſeem to obtrude any thing out of partiality to my Kindred, I ſhall confine my ſelf within the bounds of the Spaniſh Writers, intending that theſe Papers ſhall ſerve for a Comment to theirs, and to rectifie the Errours they have made, as to Times, Perſons and Countries: which indeed is no wonder, if conſidering the little knowledge they have in the language, they have been guilty of many miſtakes relating to that People.

In fine, whatſoever I ſhall relate of theſe People, who were deſtroyed, before they were known; either in reference to their ancient Idolatry, Government, Laws and Cuſtoms, it ſhall be clearly laid down, without comparing it with divine or humane Hiſtories, or the Governments of our time; becauſe all compariſons are odious; but rather leave thoſe reflexions to the Reader, who finding ſomething of ſimilitude herein to the ſtories of Holy Writ, and to the Fables of Ancient Gentiliſm, may apply them according to his own fancy and humour. For my part, I having been a natural Indian born, and educated in Arms, have little or no abilities or ſtrength of my own, and therefore have need of the favour and aſſiſtence of the Candid Reader.

CHAP. XI.

Of thoſe People which the firſt Inca ſent to inhabit divers Countries.

BUT to return now to the Inca, Manco Capac: After he had founded the City of Cozco, and divided it into two parts, (as we have already declared) he planted many other Colonies. To the Eaſtward of this City he placed thoſe People, which now extend themſelves over that tract of Land which runs to the River called Paucar tampu; and thirteen ſeveral other Nations he ſeated on both ſides of the Royal way, called Antiſuyu, which for brevity ſake we omit particularly to nominate, being all or the moſt part of the Lineage, or Tribe called Poques. To the Weſtward in the ſpace of eight Leagues in breadth, and about nine or ten in length, he planted thirty ſeveral Villages, which ſpread themſelves on one hand, and the other as far as the Royal way of Cuntiſuyu. Theſe People formed three different Nations, namely Maſca, Chillqui, Paperi. To the North of this City were ſeated twenty Villages, which were diſtinguiſhed by four names, viz. Mayu, Cancu, Chinchapucyu, Rimac tampu; the remainder of the People ſeated themſelves in the pleaſant valley of Sacſahuanna, where the famous Battel was fought, wherein Gonçalo Piçarro was taken Priſoner. To the Southward of the City thirty eight or forty other Villages were planted, eighteen of which were of the Nation of Ayarmarca, and extended themſelves on one ſide and the other of the Royal high way of Collaſuyu, for the ſpace of thirty Leagues in length, beginning from thoſe parts which are overagainſt the Salinas, and reach within within a little League of the City, where that fatal Battel was fought of Don Diego of Almagro the Elder, and Hernando Piçarro; all the other Nations have five or six different denominations, which are Queſpicancha, Muyna, Urcos, Quehuar, Huaruc, Cavinna. This Nation of Cavinna boaſt themſelves much of being deſcended from Parents, who proceeded from a certain Lake, where they report that the Souls of ſuch who dye do enter, and thence return again to animate other Bodies. Theſe People adored an Idol of a prodigious figure, and offered a ſtrange ſort of Sacrifice to it; but the Inca, Manco Capac, deſtroyed the Idol, and aboliſhed their rites, and compelled them as he did all his other ſubjects to adore the Sun.

Theſe People, who were not much above a hundred in number, were but ſmall in the beginning, the greateſt not exceeding a hundred families, and the leſſer conſiſting of about twenty five or thirty, which afterwards by the privileges and encouragements, which the Inca, Manco Capac, beſtowed upon them, (as we ſhall hereafter declare) they increaſed exceedingly, many of them extending themſelves into a thouſand Families, and the leſſer to three or four hundred at leaſt; the which immunities and favours being confirmed, and augmented by Manco Capac and his Succeſſours, the people increaſed and flouriſhed, till all was deſtroyed by the barbarous Tyranny of Atauhualpa. Now in theſe our times, and about twenty years paſt thoſe Colonies which Manco Capac planted on this ſide, and almoſt all the People of Peru do not now poſſeſs their ancient dwellings; becauſe a Vice-Roy, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place, joined them afterwards, uniting five or ſix into one, and ſometimes ſeven or eight, as was moſt agreeable to his purpoſe, from whence many inconveniences accrued to that People, which we omit, becauſe they are grievous and ungratefull to repeat.

CHAP. XII.

In what manner the Inca taught and inſtructed his Subjects.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, as he planted his Colonies, ſo every where he taught them to plow, and cultivate the Land, how to make Aqueducts and Conſervatories for their Water, and all other matters tending to the more commodious well-being of humane Life; he gave them alſo ſome rules of Civility neceſſary in ſociety for maintenance of Friendſhip and Brotherhood, as the Laws of Nature and Reaſon dictated; that laying aſide all animoſities and paſſions one againſt the other, they ſhould doe as they would be done by, maintaining without partiality the ſame Law for others which they allow for themſelves: but above all he recommended to them a reſpect which they ought to bear towards the Bodies of their Wives and Daughters, for in that vice they were the moſt blameable and barbarous; and in order hereunto he made Adultery, Murther and Robbery mortal crimes, and puniſhable with death. He ordered that no man ſhould have more than one Wife at a time, and that in their Marriages they ſhould confine themſelves to their Tribes, that they might not make a confuſion in the Lineage, and that from twenty years and upwards they might marry, becauſe before that time their prudence was not ripe enough to manage their Affairs, nor govern their Families. He employed others to gather the more gentle ſort of Cattle into flocks, which ran diſperſed and wild through the Woods and Fields, cauſing them to make garments of their Wool, according to the Art which the Queen Mama Ocllo Huaco had taught them for ſpinning and weaving; he ſhewed them alſo how to make that ſort of Shoes which they now wear, and which they call Uſuta. Over every one of theſe Colonies he ordained a Chief, which they called

Curaca

Curaca, and is the ſame which Cacique ſignifies in the Language of Cuba, and Sancto Domingo, which is as much as a Ruler over Subjects: and theſe were choſen for their merits; for when any one was more gentle, affable, pious, ingenious and more zealous for the publick good than others, he was preſently advanced to Government, and to be an Inſtructor of the ignorant Indians, who obeyed him with as much reverence, as Children do their Parents; and till theſe things could be put into execution, and till the Earth could produce theſe fruits, which by labour and art of Cultivation might be expected, a general ſtore of Proviſions were collected into a common place, to be diſtributed agreeable to the neceſſities and largeneſs of Families. And that they might not live without Religion, he preſcribed the Rites and Ceremonies for their Idolatry: he appointed out the place and deſign where and how to erect a Temple to the Sun, that they might ſacrifice to him; for in regard they eſteemed him the great God of all, by whoſe heat and light they lived, the Fields produced their Fruits, and their Cattle multiplied, and that they received a thouſand favours and benefits from him; it was but natural reaſon for them to acknowledge theſe benefits, and eſpecially they eſteemed themſelves obliged to render ſervice and adoration to the Sun and Moon, for having ſent their own Children to them, who had reduced them from a Life of Beaſts, to the preſent condition and ſtate of humane Reaſon. It was likewiſe ordained, that a Houſe ſhould be built for Virgins dedicated to the Sun, and that the ſame ſhould be poſſeſſed by none, but ſuch as were of the Royal Bloud and Family, and ſupplied from thence, ſo ſoon as the number of the Royal Race was ſufficiently increaſed. All which he ordained and appointed to his People, that they ſhould inviolably obſerve in gratefull acknowledgment of the benefits received; promiſing on the other ſide, that in reward thereof they might expect perpetual additions of good to them from the bleſſings of the Sun who had revealed theſe ſecrets, and ſent his Meſſengers to the Indians to inſtruct and guide them in the ways of Wiſedom: all which matters, and much more, the poor Indians believed, and by tradition have conſerved to theſe our days; it being the main point of their belief, that the Inca was a Child of the Sun; of which and of ſuch like fables they greatly boaſt, and that none but ſuch as was of Divine progeny was able to have directed or preſcribed things of ſuch ſublime and elevated an underſtanding, as theſe.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Titles, and Dignities which the Inca for diſtinction ſake, and to procure greater Honour and Reverence beſtowed on his own Family.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, having employed himſelf for many years in the matters before related, for the good and benefit of his Subjects, and perceiving that thereby he had produced in their minds a real ſenſe of gratitude towards him, and a readineſs to yield to him and his, who were Children of the Sun, all due Honour and Reverence; he judged it requiſite for the more effectual impreſſion of this Awe and Reſpect, to dignifie himſelf, and thoſe deſcended from him, with noble Titles, and Habits different from others. Wherefore firſt he ordered, that after his Example all his Poſterity ſhould go with their Heads ſhorn, wearing onely one lock of Hair; but this ſhearing was performed with great difficulty, for they had not yet arrived to the invention of Sciſſors, but with a ſharp flint cut the Hair, as well as they were able; whence it was, that a certain young Inca ſaid to one of my Schoolfellows, with whom he was taught to write and reade, that that Had the Spaniards introduced no other invention amongſt us than the uſe of Sciſſors, Looking-Glaſſes and Combs, they had deſerved all that Gold and Silver which our Countrey produces.

The other Mark of Diſtinction, was to have their Ears boared through, which the Women commonly did, with a ſharp bramble, and by ſome art made the hole ſo wide, (as we ſhall hereafter deſcribe) that it is wonderfull to conceive how it is poſſible for ſo ſmall a piece of fleſh, as the Velvet of the Ear, to be extended ſo far, as to receive an Ear-ring as big as the frame of a pulley, for it was made in the form of thoſe with which we draw up Pitchers from a Well; and of that compaſs, that in caſe it were beaten ſtreight, it would be a quarter of a Yard long, and a finger in thickneſs; and becauſe the Indians wear them thus big, the Spaniards call them Orejones, or flap-eared Luggs.

For the Dreſs of their Heads, the Incas wear a Wreath of divers Colours, which they call Llautu, and is the breadth of a finger, but not quite ſo thick, which they bind about their Heads four or five times, in form of a Tulbant. Theſe three particulars of cutting the Hair, boaring the Ears, and binding the Head with this Llautu, were the diſtinctions which Manco Capac appropriated to his family; for though the Subject might wear this Wreath, or Llautu, about their Heads, yet it was to be of black onely, and not of divers colours, which appertained onely to the Royal Bloud. This having been the Faſhion for ſome time, the Inca indulging farther favours to his People, permitted them alſo to cut their Hair, but in a different manner to thoſe of his Family, and of one from the other; that ſo the divers Lineages and Nations might be diſtinguiſhed by their Heads. And that the Faſhion of the Inca might not be very different to that of his Subjects, he ordered that their Hair ſhould be rounded, and clipped cloſe on the top of their Heads, as far as their Temples, and that their Locks ſhould hang on each ſide to the bottom of their Ears; others he ordered to clip their Hair as far as might reach to the middle of their Ears, and others ſhorter, but none was to wear it in faſhion of the Inca. And thus theſe Indians kept themſelves conſtant to their faſhion, not to appear fantaſtical or varying, leſt they ſhould either ſeem to diſapprove the Precepts of their Inca, or contemn the Cuſtoms of their own Lineage, which they ever had in great Eſteem and Honour.

In proceſs of time the Inca, willing to enlarge the privileges of his People, gave them permiſſion to boar their Ears, though not ſo wide as the Inca, and that the Pendents to them ſhould vary according to the diverſity of their Lineages and Countries. To the Nation called Mayu, and Cancu, he gave leave to wear a Twiſt of Straw, about the thickneſs of the little finger. To the Nation Poques he ordained a Lock of white Wool to hang as big as the top of the Thumb. To the Nations Muyna, Huaruc and Chillqui, he appointed Ear-rings of the common Junk or Reed, which the Indians call Tutura. To the Nation Rimactampu he appropriated an Ear-ring of a certain ſoft wood, which in the Iſles of Barlovento they call Maguey, and in the general Tongue of Peru, Chuchau, which, when the Bark is pilled off, is gentle, and eaſily bended. To the People called Urcos, Yucay, Tampu, and others inhabiting on the Banks of the River Yucay, he gave the privilege, as a peculiar mark and note of his Favour, to wear their Ear-rings of a larger ſize than other Nations, but leſt they ſhould exceed herein beyond their due proportion, he gave them a meaſure and compaſs which they were not to paſs; the matter of them was to be the reed called Tutura; theſe were called Ear-twiſts rather than Pendants, becauſe they did not hang from the Ear, but were twined about it, as a rope is about the mouth of the Pitcher.

Beſides theſe diſtinctions, the Inca appropriated other marks to every Nation, that ſo they might not be confounded one with the other; thoſe Names and Titles which moſt nearly related to thoſe which the King himſelf had aſſumed, being reputed moſt honourable and of greateſt renown: not that the Inca was partial to any, or favoured any beyond Reaſon or Juſtice; but as ſome were of a nature more docible and tractable than others, and laboured to inſtruct and teach the rude People in the ways of Humanity; to thoſe he granted a higher teſtimony of his Favours, and ſignal marks of honour; all which being confirmed by Revelation from the Sun his Father, the poor Indians without envy or emulation each to other, ſubmitted unto, having already by good experience taſted the benefit of their obedience to their Inca.

In

In proceſs of time the Inca finding himſelf aged, and burthened with years, ſummoned a general Aſſembly of the chiefeſt of his Subjects, at the City of Cozco, and in a ſolemn Oration gave them to underſtand, that he intended ſhortly to return to Heaven, and take his Repoſe with his Father the Sun, (which words the Kings deſcended from him did always after uſe before their death) and being now to leave them, the ultimate teſtimony of all his favours which he had to bequeath to them, was the Appellation of his own Royal Name, that ſo they and their Poſterity might be honoured and renowned through all the world: and as a farther evidence of this affection, he did not onely bequeath this Honour to themſelves onely, but to deſcend to their Poſterity, and that without difference or diſtinction they might all aſſume the honourable Title of Incas; for having been his firſt Subjects, and ſuch as had ſubmitted to his Will and Pleaſure, he loved them as Children, and therefore rejoyced to beſtow upon them his Royal Name and Dignities, in hopes and expectation that they would ever after be obedient to their preſent King and his Succeſſours, aſſiſting them to reduce under their Dominion ſuch other Indians as had not as yet ſubmitted to their Empire; all which he deſired them to lay up in their Hearts and memory, as loyal Subjects; yet notwithſtanding he would not have it be underſtood that he intended to beſtow the Name of Pallas on their Women, which was a Title ſtill to be appropriated to their Royal Bloud and Family; for that Women not being capable to bear Arms, and ſerve in the War againſt their Enemies, were not worthy of a Title ſo truly magnificent.

Thoſe Indians which obtained this favour, were properly thoſe who inhabit Peru, and were called Incas, and the Spaniards, and other Nations, out of courteſie, call their Women Pallas, and Coyas: For there are very few of the true Royal Bloud of thoſe Kings remaining; and ſuch as do, are by reaſon of their poverty and neceſſity unknown and obſcure, unleſs it be here and there one; for the tyranny and cruelty of Atahualpa had deſtroyed them wholly, and thoſe few which did eſcape, at leaſt the principal and moſt famous amongſt them, periſhed by other diſtreſſes and calamities, as we ſhall hereafter make appear in its due place. All the diſtinction which the Inca, Manco Capac, reſerved to himſelf and his Succeſſours, was a coloured border on his Wreath, in nature of a Fringe, which bound his Head from one Temple to the other; the which was common to none, but the Inca and the Prince his Heir, who wore it narrower than his Father, and of a ſallow colour. What Ceremonies were uſed at the Inſtalment of the Prince, and when he was ſworn, we ſhall declare in its due place, when we come to ſpeak of the Horſemen which the Incas armed out againſt their Enemies.

Theſe Privileges and Favours proceeding immediately from the gratiouſneſs of their Prince, the Indians received with great Thankfulneſs and Applauſe, becauſe the Inca made them to believe that it was by the appointment and order of the Sun, who obſerving their Compliance, docility, and other merits, had conferred theſe marks of his good acceptance on them. And when they farther conſidered the greatneſs of his laſt Favour, which was the Title of Inca, and which was not onely allotted to themſelves, but was to deſcend alſo to their Poſterity, they were wholly raviſhed with the Bounty and Liberality of his Royal Mind, not knowing how to receive it with other ſenſe than Tranſport of Admiration; ſo that it became the common ſubject of their Diſcourſe, how that their Inca had not onely transformed them from Beaſts into Men, and inſtructed them in all things neceſſary to humane Life, and taught them thoſe natural Laws which conduce to Morality, and the knowledge of their God the Sun, which was ſufficient for ever to have obliged them to remain his Vaſſals and Slaves, and might juſtly have impoſed on them Taxes and Tributes, but that inſtead thereof he had conferred on them the Majeſty of his own Name, which being ſo Sacred and Divine, that none durſt take it formerly in his mouth, without great Veneration, was now made ſo common, that every one might pronounce it with an audible voice; by which privilege being become his adopted Sons, they did for ever after dedicate themſelves for Slaves and Vaſſals to him who was the undoubted Progeny and Child of the Sun. The Indians being aſtoniſhed with the conſideration of theſe great favours and affection, their Inca had beſtowed upon them, they returned him all the bleſſings and praiſes imaginable, ſtudying what Names and Titles they might confer on him, agreeable to the greatneſs of his Mind, and his Heroick Vertues; and on this conſideration they invented theſe two Names, one of which was Capac, which signifies rich, not that they meant him to be rich in Goods, or Wealth of Fortune; but of Mind, such as Gentleness, Piety, Clemency, Liberality, Justice and Magnanimity, with a desire and inclination to communicate his Benefits to all his Subjects; and for that Reason they deservedly gave him the Title of Capac, which signifies rich and powerfull in Arms: The other Name they gave him was Huac chacuyac, which is as much as to say, a great Friend and Benefactour to the poor; for as the first denomination intimated the greatness of his Mind, so the other spoke the benefits which he had conferred; so that for ever after he was called the Prince Manco Capac, having been named no otherwise before, than Manco the Inca; for Manco is but the proper Name of a Person, and in the common Language of Peru hath no signification; though in a particular Dialect which some of them have, (which, as some write me from Peru, is entirely lost,) it signifies something, as all the other Names and Titles did, which they gave to their Kings, as we shall in the sequel of this Story have an occasion to interpret: The word Inca signifies as much as Lord, or King, or Emperour, though in its strict sense, it is one of the Royal bloud; and therefore the Curacas though they were great Lords, yet they were not called Incas: Palla signifies a Lady of the Royal Bloud; and so for distinction of the King from other Incas, he was called Capa Inca, which is as much as rich, sole and supreme Lord. Hereafter, for the sake of the curious, we shall declare and interpret all the Royal Names of the Men and Women. Moreover the Indians gave to this first King, and his Posterity the Name of Intip Churin, which is as much as Child of the Sun; but this we may esteem rather a denomination, proceeding from their false belief, than a true and proper addition to his Titles.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the last Will and Testament and Death of the first Inca, Manco Capac.

Manco Capac reigned many Years, but how many it is not certain, some say, thirty, others forty, employing his whole time in the business and actions which we have before mentioned; and now finding the time of his death nearly approaching, he called his Sons together, as well those which he had by his Queen Mama Oello Huaco, as those which he had by his Concubines, which made up a great number; for as he told them, it was fit that the Children or Offspring of the Sun should be many. He also assembled the Chief of his Subjects, and in manner of a Testament he made this long Discourse to them. He recommended to the Prince his Heir, a true Love and Affection towards his Subjects, and to the Subjects, Loyalty and Service to their King, and Obedience to the Laws, avouching again, that this was one of those Ordinances which the Sun his Father had in a most particular manner enjoined unto him. With this Lesson he dismissed his Subjects; afterwards in private Discourse which he made to his Children, he encharged them, that they should ever remember that they descended from the Sun, and that therefore they ought for ever to adore him for their God and Father, and that according to his example they should observe his Laws and precepts, that so their Subjects in imitation of them might the more easily be induced to awe and reverence this Deity: that they being gentle and pious, might allure the Indians by Love, and by the force of Benefits, for that those can never be good Subjects, who obey onely out of fear; in short, he told them that they should manifest themselves by their Vertues to be Children of the Sun, approving their words by their actions; for those shall never be believed, who say one thing and perform another. In fine, he said, that being called by the Sun, he was now going to reſt with him, that they ſhould live in Peace and Unity together, and that he beholding their actions from Heaven, would take care to favour and ſuccour them in their extremities and diſtreſs. Having uttered theſe, and other ſayings of like nature, Manco Capac dyed, leaving the Prince Sinchi Roca, his eldeſt Son, which he had by Coya Mama Oello Huaco, his Wife and Siſter, to be his Heir and Succeſſour. Thoſe Sons and Daughters which remained, beſides the Prince, married one with the other; for they took great care to preſerve that bloud which they fabulouſly believed to proceed from the Sun, clear and unmixed, becauſe they eſteemed it Divine, and was not to be defiled with any other humane mixture, though it were with thoſe chief and principal Lords, whom they termed Curacas.

The Inca, Sinchi Roca, married with Mama Oello, or Mama Cora (as ſome will have it) his eldeſt Siſter, after the Example of his Father, and his Grandfather the Sun, who, according to their Heatheniſh Doctrine, married with his Siſter the Moon. This Marriage was concluded not onely for conſervation of the Bloud in its pure Chanel, but likewiſe that the Inheritance, which came as well by the Mother as the Father, might equally deſcend to both Sexes. This Marriage in ſuch proximity of Bloud, they report, was a Command of the Sun, but that no Brother could marry with the Siſter, except onely the Prince and Heir; for in all others this nearneſs was forbidden, the which was a rule always obſerved, as we ſhall find in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

The death of the Inca, Manco Capac, was greatly lamented by his Subjects; his funeral rites were obſerved, and celebrated for ſeveral Months; his Body was embalmed, that they might conſerve it by them, and not looſe the ſight and preſence of it; for they adored him for a God, and Child of the Sun, ſo that they ſacrificed Sheep and Lambs, tame Conies, Birds and Corn to him, confeſſing him to be Lord and Authour of all thoſe good things which they enjoyed. What the Original of this Manco Capac might be, as far as I can gueſs by the nature and temper of this People, he muſt have been ſome Indian, of a more elevated Underſtanding and Prudence than ordinary, and one who had inſtructed them in the way of living, and carrying a ſubtile manner of deportment towards them had perſuaded them that he proceeded from the Sun, and was come from Heaven; and that his Father had ſent him to inſtruct and beſtow benefits upon them. And to gain a greater belief, and credit amongſt them, he habited himſelf in a different faſhion to them, lugging his Ears to ſuch a length, as is incredible to any but thoſe, who have ſeen them, as I have done. Nor is it ſtrange, that this ignorant and brutiſh People ſhould be induced to believe his Genealogy to have been derived from the Sun, ſince we have the examples in Hiſtory of a more refined People, who taught the Doctrine of Demons, believing Men of Wit, and Art, and Magnanimity, to have been the Sons of Jupiter, and other Gods; and having received good and benefits from them, and obſerving their Actions to correſpond with their Words, have readily after their death beſtowed a place on them in Heaven, and without much difficulty have been perſuaded ever after to adore them for Deities, giving them a ſhare of Worſhip with their Gods.

CHAP. I.

Of the Idolatry of the Second Age, and the Original of it.

THAT which we call the ſecond Age, and the Idolatry, which was uſed in it at that time, received its firſt beginning from the Inca, Manco Capac, who was the firſt that raiſed the Monarchy of the Incas, who were the Kings of Peru, and who in a direct Line reigned for the ſpace of four hundred Years, though Father Blas Valera will have it, that their Government continued between five and ſix hundred. We have already declared the actions of Manco Capac, how, and in what manner he reduced the Indians to live in a political way of Society, teaching them to ſow and plant, to build houſes, and provide all things conducing to Humane Life: and how Mama Oello, his Wife, inſtructed the Indian Women in the art of ſpinning and weaving, and all other ways of good Huſwifery: We have declared alſo that it was this Manco Capac who taught them to adore the Sun, by repreſenting to them the many benefits that he had conferred on them, ſaying that this Pacha Chamac (which ſignifies as much as the ſuſtainer of all things) had in vain exalted them above the Stars, whom he had made their Servants, if they did not advance his Worſhip above all other Creatures, and had ill conferred his benefits on them, in caſe they ſhould ſtoop to the mean Idolatry of low and baſe things, ſuch as Toads and Frogs and Lizards, forſaking the ſervice of that true Deity, whoſe Glory and Brightneſs ſtruck awe and reverence into all Creatures.

The Indians, convinced by theſe arguments, and more by the ſenſible benefits received, acknowledged the Sun for their God, without aſſuming a Father, or a Brother into ſociety with him. Their Kings they ever ſtyled to be children of the Sun, and deſcended from Heaven, and adored them with as much Veneration as the ancient Gentiles, ſuch as the Greeks and Romans, did their Jupiter, Mars, Venus, &c. Thus the Idolatrous Worſhip of the Sun, and of the Incas, as they believed, deſcended from him, prevailed; and even to this day they never name their Kings (the Incas) but with wonderfull reverence and adoration; ſo that if they be asked, why they worſhip thoſe for Gods whom they know to be but Men, they will preſently reply; that it is true, they are now undeceived, and can conſider them no otherwiſe in reality than as Men; yet having received ſo much good and benefit from them, they cannot eſteem them leſs than of Divine Race; and did others appear in theſe days equal or comparable to them, they would readily perform the ſame Honours and Adorations towards them.

This was the ſole and principal Idolatry which the Incas taught their Subjects; and though they believed the Moon to be Wife and Siſter to the Sun, yet they did not worſhip her for a Goddeſs, nor offer Sacrifices, or build Temples to her as they did to the Sun; howſoever they eſteemed her with great Reverence for the Univerſal Mother, but proceeded no farther, nor gave her other Attributes of Divine Honour.

Howſoever their Superſtitions were many, giving heed to Fables, and Dreams, and inſpection into the Entrails of Beaſts. Thunder, and Lightenings, and Thunder-bolts they judged to be Servants of the Sun, as we ſhall underſtand hereafter, when we have occaſion to name that Chamber which was built in that Temple at Cozco, which was dedicated to the Sun; but they never held them for Gods, as ſome of the Spaniſh Writers would have it; but rather fear and dread the Houſe or Place where a Thunder-bolt chances to fall; for they have ſtopt up the door of that Chamber with Stones and dirt, that ſo none might ever enter in there again: and in that place or field where a Thunder-bolt happens to fall, they ſay that their Father the Sun hath marked out that place as unfortunate, and accurſed to common uſe, and for that Reaſon they cover it with heaps of Stones, that none may tread or trample on it; the which I have ſeen and obſerved in the Palace of Huaynacapac at Cozco, in that quarter which was aſſigned to Antonio Altamirano, when that City was divided amongſt the Conquerors; for in the time of Huaynacapac, a Thunder-bolt had pierced through a part of that Palace, the which was aſſigned to my ſelf when the Spaniards had rebuilt it; three years after which another Thunder-bolt fell in the ſame place, and burnt it wholly, the which accident confirmed the Indians in their opinion, that places in ſuch manner ſtrucken with Thunder, were accurſed; and therefore the Spaniards were in an Errour when they rebuilt thoſe places, for they ought to have remained void and neglected. And whereas the Hiſtorians ſay, that they eſteemed Thunder and Lightning for Gods, it is a miſtake; for they did indeed account thoſe places for ſacred, ſaying that their Gods had by Thunder, and Thunder-bolts, and Lightning marked out thoſe places for their Worſhip, and therefore not being to be prophaned by common uſe, they built their moſt famous Temples thereupon. To theſe three they gave the common Name of Yllapa, and for the ſimilitude hereunto they called all Fire-arms by the ſame word. And as to thoſe Names which they give to Thunder, and to the Sun in *Trinity, they are framed by the Spaniards themſelves as they have in other things; for no ſuch words are compounded in the general language of Peru, nor have they any ſuch ſignification as the Spaniards fanſie, or would impoſe upon them.

* Thunder, Lightning, Thunderbolt.

CHAP. II.

By what means the Incas came to the knowledge of the True God.

BEſides the Sun, whom they worſhipped for the viſible God, to whom they offered Sacrifice, and kept Feſtivals, (as we ſhall hereafter declare,) the Incas, who were Kings, and the Amautas, who were Philoſophers, proceeded by the mere light of Nature, to the knowledge of the True Almighty God our Lord, Maker of Heaven and Earth, as we ſhall hereafter prove by their own words and teſtimonies, which ſome of them gave of the Divine Majeſty, which they called by the Name of Pachacamac, and is a word compounded of Pacha, which is the Univerſe, and Camac, which is the Soul; and is as much as he that animates the World. Pedro de Cieça, in his 62. Chapter, ſays, that they called the Devil by

by this Name; but I, who am an Indian born, and therefore better acquainted with the Language than he, know that they never took this name into their Mouths, but ſeldom, and when they did, it was with great Veneration, bowing their Heads and Bodies, caſting up their Eyes to Heaven, and then down to the Earth, lifting their hands open as high as their Shoulders, and kiſſing the Air, which were the common manifeſtations of Reverence and Adorations, which were in uſe amongſt the Incas and his People; theſe, and ſuch like demonſtrations of Honour they uſed when they were forced to pronounce the word Pachacamac; but the Name of the Sun they took in their mouths more frequently, as they did alſo of their Incas, and with leſs ceremony, and of their Curacas, who were their Lords, with a more indifferent reſpect: And being asked, who this Pachacamac was, they anſwered, that it was he who gave Life to the Univerſe, ſuſtained and nouriſhed all things; but becauſe they did not ſee him, they could not know him; and for that reaſon they erected not Temples to him, nor offered Sacrifice, howſoever they worſhipped in their Hearts, and eſteemed him for the unknown God.

Auguſtin de Carate, in his ſecond Book and fifth Chapter, reports, that Father Vicente de Valverde telling the King Atahualpa, that it was Chriſt our Lord who created the World; he anſwered, that he knew nothing of that, but he was ſure that there was no other Nouriſher but the Sun, whom they eſteemed to be a God, and the Earth their Mother; and that Pachacamac had created all things, &c. whence it is evident, that the Indians held our inviſible God to be the Creatour of all things.

This Truth which the Indians had by the light of Nature diſcovered, the Devil himſelf, though the Father of Lyes, had much againſt his Will confeſſed and confirmed; for when he ſaw that our Holy Goſpel was preached, and that many Indians were baptized; he told ſome of his Familiars in that Vale, which is now called the Valley of Pachacamac, (ſo named from that famous Temple which is there dedicated to the Unknown God,) that the God which the Spaniards preached and he were the ſame, as Pedro de Cieca, and Geronimo Roman in their Writings of the Weſt-Indies report: Howſoever they are miſtaken where they ſay that the Indians gave the name of Pachacamac to the Devil, for whom they have another Word, which is Cupay, which when they utter, they ſpit, with other ſigns of Deteſtation. Notwithſtanding this Enemy ſo far inſinuated himſelf amongſt theſe Infidels, that he cauſed himſelf to be worſhipped by them by entering into all thoſe things, which they called ſacred, or Holy; for he ſpake to them in their Oracles, their Temples, and the Corners of their Houſes, calling himſelf by the Name of Pachacamac; and by this ſubtilty the Indians worſhipped every thing through which the Devil ſpoke, believing it to be a Deity; but had they believed that it was the Cupay, or Devil, whom they heard, they would certainly have burnt the things through which he ſpoke, as they now by God's Mercy do, who hath gratiouſly revealed and made himſelf known to them.

CHAP. III.

Of the Croſs which the Incas preſerved in a Conſecrated place.

IN the City of Cozco the Incas had a certain Croſs of white Marble, which they called a Cryſtalline Jaſpar; but from what time it had been kept there, is not certain. In the year 1560 I left it in the Veſtry of the Cathedral Church of that City; I remember it was hanged upon a Nail with a Liſt of black Velvet; which when it was in the power of the Indians, it was hanged by a Chain of Gold or Silver, but afterwards changed by thoſe who removed it. This Croſs was * ſquare, being as broad as it was long, and about three fingers wide. It formerly remained in one of thoſe Royal Apartments, which they call Huaca, which ſignifies a Conſecrated place; and though the Indians did not adore it, yet they held it in great veneration, either for the Beauty of it, or ſome other reaſon, which they knew not to aſſign: and ſo was obſerved amongſt them, untill the Marqueſs Don Franciſco Picarro entred into the Valley of Tumpiz, when by reaſon of ſome accidents which befell Pedro de Candia, they conceived a greater eſteem and veneration for it, as we ſhall declare in its due place.

The Spaniards, after they had taken the Imperial City, they erected a Church in it to the Almighty God, and hanged this Croſs in the Veſtry (as we have ſaid) of that Church, without other ornament or ceremony, whenas they ought to have placed a Relique of that nature upon the High Altar, adorning it with Gold and pretious Stones which abounded in that Countrey: by which reſpect to a thing which the Indians eſteemed Sacred, and by aſſimilating the Ordinances of our Holy Religion, as near as was poſſible, with thoſe which the Law of Nature had taught to this People, preaching and recommending the Works of Mercy in ſuch ſtyle, as the Doctrine of theſe Gentiles did teach and allow; the leſſons of Chriſtianity would thereby have become more eaſie and familiar, and not ſeemed ſo far eſtranged from the Principles of their own Gentiliſm.

And becauſe we have here mentioned the Croſs, on which it is uſual for us to ſwear in our Courts of Judicatory; we ſhall take this occaſion to ſay, that neither the Incas themſelves, nor yet any of the Nations under their Dominions did ever know the meaning of an Oath, for Swearing was not a cuſtome, nor in uſe amongſt them. For though the Names of Pachacamac and the Sun were taken ſometimes into their mouths, yet it was always with reverence and adoration: For when they examined Witneſſes in the moſt important caſes whatſoever, the Judge, inſtead of an Oath, did onely ask the Witneſs, If he promiſed to ſpeak the Truth to the Inca? And then his Anſwer was, That he did promiſe: Then proceeded the Judge, See that thou declare the Truth without any diſguiſe of falſhood, not concealing any thing that paſſed, or that which thou knoweſt. This was all the formality they uſed in giving teſtimony; the which they ſo religiouſly obſerved, that with ſcruple and tenderneſs they uttered Truth in its nakedneſs and ſimplicity: And in caſe any perſon did give a falſe teſtimony in matter of importance, his crime was puniſhable with Death; not onely in conſideration of the damage he had done to the injured perſon, but of his falſhood to the Inca, who had made it one of the Royal Commands, That he ſhould not lye; and it was a common and known principle, that what a perſon declared to the Judge, he witneſſed to the Inca himſelf, who being reverenced by them as a God, they believed it impoſſible to conceal any thing from his ſcrutiny and knowledge.

After the Spaniards had conquered this Empire, there happened a remarkable caſe of this kind upon an enquiry about Murther in the Province of Quechuas. The Chief Juſtice of Cozco ſent an Officer to take the teſtimony of a certain Curaca, (which is as much as a Lord over many Subjects;) and in performance hereof the Officer reached to him the top of his Staff, on which was a Croſs, saying, Thou sweareſt to God and to this Croſs, to ſpeak the Truth: To which the Indian replied, That he was not as yet Baptized, and therefore ought not to ſwear after the manner of the Chriſtians: Then, ſaid the Officer, thou mayſt ſwear by thy own Gods, by the Sun, and Moon, and the Incas: No, ſaid the Curaca, we never ſwear by theſe, for it is not lawfull, we onely take their Names in our mouths with Adoration, and in a Religious Worſhip: It is ſufficient, that ſince you come to doe Juſtice in the Name of your King, that I promiſe to ſpeak the Truth with as much ſincerity, as if he were perſonally preſent, whom you repreſent, and no other manner of Oath do our Incas require from us: And for your farther ſatisfaction, I wiſh that the Earth may ſwallow me up alive, as I ſtand, in caſe I ſpeak not the Truth. The Officer hereupon urged no farther, but accepted his teſtimony in this form, examining him by certain Interrogatories which were moſt pertinent in reference to the Murther; which when he had done, he would have proceeded no farther: but the Indian could not ſatisfie his own conſcience with the Anſwers he had made to the demands, without enlarging himſelf by a particular Narrative of the whole Story; For to ſpeak the Truth (ſaid he) in ſome things, and to be ſilent in others, was the ſame as if he had lied in all. After which the Officer returned to Cozco, where this Dialogue between him and the Curaca gave ſubject of much diſcourſe.

CHAP. IV.

Of the things ſacrificed to the Sun; and that the Prieſts, Rites, Ceremonies and Laws were all taught and delivered by the firſt Inca.

THE things offered to the Sun were of divers ſorts: the chief and principal Sacrifice was that of Lambs; but beſides, they offered all ſorts of cattel, as Sheep and barren Ewes, tame Conies, all ſorts of Birds which were eatable, the fat of Beaſts, Pulſe, all ſorts of Grane, the Herb Cuca, even cloths of the beſt and fineſt ſorts; all which they burnt in the place of Incenſe, rendring thanks and acknowledgments to the Sun, for having ſuſtained and nouriſhed all thoſe things for the uſe and ſupport of Mankind. They uſed alſo Drink-offerings, which were made of Water and Mayz, which is their ſort of Wheat; and at the end of their uſual meals, when drink was brought; (for they did never uſe to drink between their eatings) at their firſt draught they dipped the tip of their finger in the middle of the cup, and looking up to Heaven with great reverence, with a fillip they ſpirted off the drop of water which wetted their finger, which was by way of acknowledgment for it to the Sun, rendring him thanks for the water they drank; and giving two or three empty kiſſes to the Air, which (as we have ſaid) was a ſign of Adoration amongſt the Indians; they then drank up their liquour without farther ceremony.

This laſt Ceremony I have obſerved the Indians, in my time, who were not baptized to uſe, for there were many old men not then baptized; and for neceſſity, and want of a better, I have often my ſelf performed that function. In this manner we may ſee that the Incas in their forms of Sacrifice differed very little from thoſe of the firſt Age, onely they abſtained from the Offerings of humane fleſh and bloud; which Inhumanity they not onely deteſted, but made Laws againſt it: And whereas ſome Hiſtorians charge them with this unnatural and prodigious Religion, for their errour was cauſed by not making a due diſtinction between the firſt Age, and the times of the Incas.

I my ſelf can atteſt, that I have heard my Father, and others of his time, in their diſcourſes about the Cuſtoms and Government of Mexico and Peru to commend mend and praiſe the Incas of Peru for diſallowing the Sacrifices of humane bloud; and on the contrary, to blame and abhor thoſe of Mexico for ſuffering and making lawfull ſuch Diabolical Worſhips, and Sacrifices, both within and without their City, as the Hiſtory of the Conqueſt of that Countrey doth truly aver; which being wrote by the Pen of the General who made the Conqueſts, was moſt certainly authentick and true, and did deſerve to have been owned by him, that ſo they might have carried as great authority with them, as the Commentaries did of Julius Cæſar, for having his Name affixed to them.

At the entrance into their Temples, or at the time of their being there, the Chief amongſt them clapped his hands to his eye-brows, pulling ſome of the hairs from thence, which he blew towards the Idol in token of reverence: And this ſort of Adoration they never uſed towards their Incas, but onely to Idols, or Trees, or other things into which the Devil entred and ſpoke to them; the ſame was practiſed by their Prieſts and Sorcerers, before they entred into corners and ſecret places to diſcourſe with the Devil, imagining that by ſuch ſubmiſſion and reſignation of their Perſons, they obliged their Familiar to hear and anſwer them. And of this Idolatry I can give teſtimony, becauſe I have ſeen it with my own eyes.

All the Prieſts of the Sun, in the City of Cozco, were of the Bloud-Royal; though for the inferiour Officers of it, ſuch others were aſſigned, as had gained the privilege of being called Incas. Their High Prieſt was either to be Brother or Uncle to their King, or ſome other of neareſt Bloud; their Prieſts uſed no Veſtments different from others. In other Provinces, thoſe which were Natives, or related to the Principal men, were made Prieſts, though the Chief Prieſt amongſt them was an Inca, that matters might bear ſome conformity with the Imperial City; which rule was alſo obſerved in all Offices relating to War and Peace, that ſo the Natives might have their ſhare in the Government, and not ſeem to be ſlighted or neglected. They had alſo ſome Houſes for Virgins, which profeſſed a perpetual Virginity, where they ever remained Recluſes: of which, and of the King's Concubines, we ſhall have occaſion hereafter to treat more at large.

All theſe Laws in Government, and Rites in Religion, they pretend for the greater authority of them to have received from their firſt Inca, Manco Capac; and that where Matters were imperfect, it was left to his Succeſſours to eſtabliſh and complete: For as they affirm that theſe Laws, both in Religion and Government, were derived from the Sun, and inſpired by him into his Children the Incas; ſo it is hard to affirm, to whom in particular ſuch and ſuch Laws were to be attributed.

CHAP. V.

The Diviſion of the Empire into four Parts, and of the Regiſters kept by the Decurions, and what their Office was.

THE Incas divided their Empire into four Parts, which they called Tavantinſuyu, and ſignifies the four Quarters of the Heavens, viz. Eaſt, Weſt, North and South. The City of Cozco they eſteemed the Point and Centre of all, and in the Indian Language is as much as the Navel of the Earth; for the Countrey of Peru being long and narrow, in faſhion of a Man's body, and that City in the middle, it may aptly be termed the Navel of that Empire. To the Eaſtward they called the Countrey Antiſuyu, from the Province Anti, which extends all along that great Mountain, which runs through the ſnowy deſert Eaſtward. To the Weſtward they called the Countrey Cuntiſuyu, from that ſmall Province which is called Cunti; to the Northward lies the Province Chincha, and to the South-

Southward the Countrey Colla, which extends it self to the Zur. In these four Provinces are comprehended many great Countries, and amongst the rest the Kingdom of Chile, which contains about 600 Leagues in length towards the Zur, and is within the Province of Colla; and the Kingdom of Quita, which is within the Division of Colla, runs 400 Leagues to the Northward: So that to name those Quarters, is as much as to say, East and West, &c. according to which, the principal ways leading to the City were so called.

The Incas laid one method and rule in their Government, as the best means to prevent all mischiefs and disorders; which was this, That of all the people in every place, whether more or less, a Register should be kept, and a Division made of ten and ten; over which one of the ten, whom they called the Decurion, was made Superiour over the other nine; then every five Divisions of this nature had a Decurion over them, to whom was committed the charge and care of fifty; then over the two Divisions of fifty a Superiour Decurion was constituted to supervise a hundred; so five Divisions of a hundred had their Captain which commanded five hundred; and lastly, ten Divisions had their General over a thousand; for no Decurion had a greater number to govern or account for; the charge of one thousand being esteemed a sufficient care for any that by his Under-Officers would undertake to account for his people, and rule them well.

The Decurions of ten had a double duty incumbent on them; one was with diligence and care to succour, and sustain those which were under their Division; giving an account to his Superiour Officer, in case any of them should be in want or necessity of any thing; as of Corn to sow or eat, or Wool to cloath them, or Materials to re-build their houses, destroyed by fire, or any other accident, or should fall into any extremity whatsoever. His other duty was to be Censor Morum, or Monitor of their actions, taking notice, and giving information of the faults and irregularities of those under him, which he was to report to his Superiour Officer; who, according to the nature of the Misdemeanour, had the power of punishment; howsoever, the lower Officers had power to chastise the lesser defaults; that so for every petty Misdemeanour, they needed not to have recourse to the Superiour, or General of them all; whereby delays in Law-suits were avoided, and long processes, which tire and consume the people, were speedily ended; and litigious Causes and vexatious Actions determined without Appeals from one Judge to another; and in case of publick differences between two Provinces, they were always decided by the definitive sentence of one Justice, which the Inca constituted by a special Commission.

What Officer soever, either of higher or lower degree, that was negligent or remiss in his duty incurred a penalty agreeable to the nature of his default. If he administred not the assistence required, or neglected to Indict an Offender, though it were but the omission of one day without a lawfull excuse; he was not onely liable to answer for his own default, but to receive the punishment due to the crime of the Offendour. And in regard every one of these Decurions had a Superiour over him, who eyed and watched his actions, they were all diligent in their duties, and impartial in their justice; no vagabonds or idle persons durst appear, or trespasses were committed; for the Accusation was readily brought in, and the punishment was rigorous, which in many small cases was even capital; not so much for the sin it self, as for the aggravation thereof, being committed against the Word and Command of the Inca, whom they respected as a God; and though the Plaintiff or the injured person were willing to let fall his Suit, and remit the penalty to the Offendour; yet the course of the Law will still proceed, imposing a punishment agreeable to the quality of the crime, either death, or stripes, or banishment, or the like.

In Families strict severity was observed to keep their Children within the rules of modesty and decent behaviour: for there were Laws even against the ill manners of Children; for whose miscarriages the Decurion, as well as the Father, was responsible: So that the Children of the Indians, who are naturally of a gentle and complying temper, are educated in great awe, and made modest by the correction and example of their Parents.

In times of War the Generals and Captains assumed the same power over their Souldiery, and took the same care of them, as the Decurions did in the time of Peace, whose Offices (besides the matters before mentioned) obliged them to take an account of the Births and Burials of all thoſe that were born, or died that year, under their juriſdiction, and of thoſe who went to the War. Thoſe people whom they conquered, though ſubdued by force of Arms, yet they did never plunder or take away their goods.

This word Decurion, which is compoſed from the Latin Decem, which is ten, and cura care; that is, a care over ten; anſwers directly to the Indian word Chunca camayu, chunca ſignifying ten, and camayu care; and by information of theſe the Incas came to a knowledge of the number of their Subjects in every Province, that ſo according thereunto they might proportion the Taxes and Impoſitions for publick Works, ſuch as the building of Bridges, making and repairing Highways, erecting Forts and Royal Palaces, with what number of Souldiers they ought to ſerve the Inca in his Wars. By theſe computations alſo the Inca was better enabled to ſend Proviſions into thoſe Provinces, which by reaſon of the ſterility of the year occaſioned by Flouds, or unſeaſonable weather, were become wanting of Corn, or Cottons, or Wool; all which were adminiſtred, and ſent with ſuch readineſs and expedition, that as Blas Valera often ſays, the Incas took ſuch care of their Subjects, providing for them in all their neceſſities, that they might rather be ſtyled Fathers of their Countrey, and Guardians of their Pupils, than Kings over Subjects; and to expreſs this care in one word, the Indians gave them the title of Lovers of the Poor.

And leſt the Superiour Governours ſhould be remiſs, or negligent, in the execution of their Offices; there was a Monitor or Remembrancer appointed, called Tucuy-ricoc, which is as much as a Surveyor or Informer; and his duty it was to put the Officers in mind of the matters relating to their Government; ſo that in caſe any of theſe ſhould be found remiſs in his charge, or guilty of any crime, his puniſhment was always proportioned to his quality, rather than his fault; it being an opinion amongſt them, that the leaſt evil was not to be tolerated in a Miniſter of Juſtice, who was choſen by the Sun and the Inca to eradicate Evils; and therefore was obliged to be more upright and obſervant of the Laws, than the other Subjects.

CHAP. VI.

Of certain Laws Ordained by the Incas, and of the Opinion, That the Incas, and thoſe of the Royal Bloud, can doe no wrong, or offend contrary to Law.

PEcuniary Mulcts, or Confiſcation of Goods, were never impoſed by the Incas in way of puniſhment for any offence, they eſteeming nothing ſatisfactory to Law but that which required the extirpation of the Evils, rather than the Life of the Offendour; for that all other remedies give but onely encouragement and liberty to tranſgreſs. If a Curaca, or Lord, rebelled, which was always puniſhed with moſt ſeverity by the Inca; and that thereby he forfeited his life; the Eſtate notwithſtanding deſcended to his Son, or to his Heir, but with due admonition, that by ſuch example he ſhould beware of the Treaſon and Rebellion of his Father; ſo likewiſe if any Cacique, or Officer was deprived of his place, or his Seigniory for faults committed, the next Heir ſucceeded in it, whether he were a Son or a Brother: the ſame rule alſo was obſerved amongſt the Souldiery, whoſe Commanders were Natives of the Countrey, and their Generals, or chief Commanders, were Princes of the Bloud, under whom the Captains and Superiour Officers eſteemed it for a particular honour and favour to ſerve. No Judge had power to moderate the Sentence of Law by any Rule of Equity, but rather to exact exact the severity of it, for being ordained by the Wisedom of the Incas, and the concurrence of Wise men, it ought neither to be controlled, or rendred more equitable by the sense and practice of particular Judges, who are capable of being corrupted, or overcome by favour or affection to a party.

And though it may seem very barbarous and unreasonable that every offence should be punished with Death, and that there should be no difference between the crimes of a higher, and the faults of a lesser nature; yet considering the benefit which the Publick received thereby, and that the Evils, rather than the Persons, were taken away; such a constitution ought not to be esteemed unjust or irrational: For in regard that men naturally love life, and fear and abhor death, they studiously fled from the appearance of any thing which might bring them within the danger of it; so that in all this great Empire, which reaches 1300 Leagues in length, consisting of divers Nations and Languages, we scarce have heard in the space of a whole year, so much as of the punishment of a single person: and to this obedience and submission to Law, the opinion of the Sanctity of it did much avail; and the belief, that it was delivered by the Sun, who was their God, and by revelation inspired into the minds of the Incas his children; so encreased the veneration and honour they had for it, that none could be esteemed a breaker of the Law, but who also therewith was guilty of sacrilege or violation of the holy and divine Sanction. Hence it was, that many finding a remorse of conscience within themselves, in sense of some secret faults they had committed, have often, without accusation, presented themselves before the Tribunals of Justice, confessing publickly their offences; by reason of which, diseases, deaths and distresses had befallen their People and Nation; and therefore desired that their lives might be offered to their God, as an expiation, and an attonement for their sin. This sort of confession was the ground of the mistake of certain Spanish Historians, who report that Auricular confession was practised amongst the Indians; whereas I am certain, that amongst those of Peru, (for I treat of no other) it was never accustomary to make other Confessions, than such as were publick. No Appeals (as we have said) were allowable in any case whatsoever, for every people having its proper Judge, no Process was to continue longer than five days before it was finally determined: onely in obscure and difficult cases the matter was brought before the Superiour Governour, who resided in the capital City, rather than before the common Judge of the Province. The Inferiour Judges rendred every month an account to their Superiours of all the Law-suits which were brought before them, and of the Sentences they gave in the determination thereof; to the end, that they might see and judge whether true Sentence were given, and the Laws rightly administred. This information from one to another came at length to the Inca; and in regard they were not as yet arrived to the knowledge of Letters, they gave these Informations to the Incas and his supreme Council by way of Knots of divers colours tied in a silken twist, the colours being as so many cyphers, denoting the crimes they had punished, and the bigness of them, and manner of making them up signified that Law which was executed (as we shall hereafter more particularly declare) and in this manner by way of Knots, they kept all their accounts so exactly, and summed them up with such readiness, that to the great admiration of the Spaniards, their best Arithmeticians could not exceed them.

It is an opinion, and held for a certain truth amongst them, that there never was Inca of the Royal Bloud that was punished, or that any of them did ever commit a crime, which incurred the penalty of the Law: For that the principles they received from their Parents, the example of their Ancestours, and the common belief of the World, that they were the Progeny of the Sun, born to instruct others, to doe good, and to refrain the people from Vice, were considerations that made such impressions in them, that they were rather the ornament than the scandal of Government, disdaining to stoop to such base and mean actions, as were transgressions of their Law: The truth is, they wanted the temptations which others had to offend; for neither the desire of women, or richness, or revenge could be motives to them: For in case any one of them entertained a passion for the Beauty of a Woman, it was but to send for her; and she could not be denied, nay rather her Parents would receive the proposal with humble acknowledgments, that the Inca would vouchsafe to cast his eye on his handmaid that was his Slave. The like may be said as to the desire of Wealth, they had no neceſſities but what were readily ſatisfied; for being Children of the Sun, all the Wealth and Riches of their Countrey was eſteemed their inheritance, and their occaſions were ſatisfied by the Mandates ſent to the Juſtices, and the Governours of Provinces for a ſupply. Nor were they liable to the unworthy paſſion of Revenge, for none could provoke them to anger by injuries, who ſought all ways and means to pleaſe and oblige them, for being adored as Gods, it was eſteemed blaſphemy and ſacrilege to diſgrace them by Words, or injure them in their Eſtates; and therefore it may be ſaid, that never was Indian puniſhed for diſreſpect, or a malitious action againſt the Perſon of an Inca. Hence it is that the Spaniſh Hiſtorians have reported, that an Inca was not capable of being puniſhed for any Offence whatever; which is a miſtake, and is as much as to ſay, that the Incas were Libertines, that they might be arbitrary, and by Law act againſt it; or that there were one Law for them, and another for their People: whenas an Inca was rather expoſed to the greater ſeverities, than any other; for he forfeited his Privileges, was degraded of the Honours due to the Royal Bloud, and eſteemed for Añca, which is as much as a Traytor and a Tyrant. Thus when the Spaniards commended and applauded the juſt and generous actions of the Incas, the Indians would make anſwer, that it was not ſtrange, in regard they were Incas; and if they diſapproved at any time their proceedings, as in the caſe of Atahualpa, who by Treaſon and Rebellion diſpoſſeſſed Huaſcar, his elder Brother, and true Heir to the Monarchy, (as we ſhall relate in its due place,) their Reply was, that no Inca could be guilty of ſuch Enormities, and if he were, he was no true born Inca, but ſome Baſtard or Impoſtour of that Family.

In every Province, according to the four Diviſions, the Inca conſtituted his different Councils of War, of Juſtice, and of his Treaſury; every one of which maintained their ſubordinate Officers, one under the other, even to the Decurions of Ten, all which in their reſpective places rendred an account to their immediate Officers, till the Report came to the ſupreme Council. The chief Governour of every Diviſion had the Title of a Vice-King, and were always Incas of the true Bloud, and Men approved for Prudence and good Conduct, both in the time of War and Peace. And ſo much ſhall ſuffice to have ſpoken concerning their Laws and Cuſtoms: We ſhall now proceed to the Hiſtory of their Lives and Actions, relating thoſe matters which are moſt famous and obſervable.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Life and Reign of Sinchi Roca, ſecond King of the Incas.

Sinchi Roca ſucceeded his Father, Manco Capac; this name Roca is pronounced with ſome aſpiration at the top of the Mouth, and as Blas Valera ſays, ſignifies a prudent and experienced Prince; Sinchi ſignifies valiant; for though he had no Wars with any, yet becauſe he was active in wreſtling, running, vaulting, throwing the ſtone and lance, and excelled all others of that age in thoſe Exerciſes, he was ſurnamed the Valiant and Magnanimous.

This Prince having performed thoſe Obſequies which were due to the ſolemnity of his Father's Interment, took upon himſelf the Crown of his Kingdom, which was no other than the coloured Wreath, bound about his Temples; determining in the firſt place to inlarge the Borders of his Dominions, he aſſembled the principal Curacas and Counſellours which his Father had aſſigned him, and in a grave and ſerious Oration, amongſt other things, he told them, that in performance of the Will of his Father, (which he declared to him at the time he was about to return to Heaven) he reſolved to go in Perſon, and ſummon the neighbouring Nations

tions, to come in, and be converted to the knowledge and adoration of the Sun; and in regard they had the same Title of Incas, as well as their King, he conceived that the same Obligation lay upon them, to serve the Sun, who was the common Parent of them all, and therefore required them to join with him in the same work and design; that so they might reduce those People from their brutish and bestial course of living to a Life more regular and rational; for that they seeing the improvements which the instructions of his Father, the Inca, had made in his own Subjects, might be more easily allured to forsake their old barbarous Customs, and embrace those which are more beneficial and refined.

Hereunto the Curacas gave this ready and chearfull Answer, that they were not onely willing to obey his Commands in this particular, but even to enter into the fire for his sake; and so ending their Discourse, they prefixed a day to begin their Journey: and accordingly the Inca departed with a great Retinue of his Subjects, taking his Journey by the way of Collasuyu, which lies to the Southward from the City Cozco; and as they travelled, they persuaded the Indians with fair words to follow their Example, and to become Subjects to the Inca, and Devotaries to the Sun, uniting with them in Religion towards their God, and Allegiance to their Prince. Those Indians which are of the Nations called Puchina and Canchi, and are the next borderers, being a People very simple and credulous, (as indeed all the Indians are,) seeing the effects which the Inca had operated on his own Subjects, which was the best argument to convince them, they immediately submitted to his Government; and thus by degrees, during the whole course of this Inca's Reign, without violence or force of arms, in a gentle and peaceable manner he reduced all the People, as far as Chuncara, which is about twenty Leagues in length, with the Inhabitants of the parts adjacent to his Subjection, over all which he prevailed so far, as to plow and cultivate their Lands, to lead a moral Life according to the Rules of the light of nature, and that forsaking their Idols, and evil customs which they practised, they should worship the Sun, and observe those Laws and Precepts which by Revelation his Father, Manco Capac, had delivered to them; all which the Indians readily accepted and embraced, being highly satisfied with that benefit and improvement which the Dominion and Rule of Sinchi Roca had brought unto them, who after the example of his Father, studied all ways and means to endear that People to himself.

Some Authours report that this King proceeded much beyond the Countrey of Chuncara, and extended his Dominions over the Nations of Cancalla, Ruruchachi, Assillu, Asancatu, Huancani, and others; all which he gained with such gentle treatment, that he needed not Wars, or other Arms, than persuasions to invite them; using these new plantations, as good Gardiners doe their Orchards, pruning and digging about their Trees, in hopes of plenty and abundance of Fruit.

Sinchi Roca having thus lived in peace and quietness for the space of many years, and, as some will have it, for about thirty, finding himself at length decaying and aged, he declared that now after the labours and cares he had taken to reduce men to the knowledge of his Father the Sun, he was now going to take his rest and repose with him. His lawfull Son, by his legitimate Wife and Sister, Mama Cora, (or as others will have it, Mama Ocllo,) called Lloque Yupanqui, he left to succeed him, as Heir to all his Dominions: Besides this Prince he had other Sons by his Wife, and more Children by his Kinswomen, who were his Concubines, all which we may call legitimate. Moreover he had many Bastard Children by Women of other Families, all which was allowable according to the rule, and saying, that it was fit and requisite that the Generation and Family of the Sun should be many and numerous.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Third King Lloque Yupanqui, and the ſignification of his Name.

Loque Yupanqui was the third King of Peru, called Lloque, becauſe he was left-handed, and Yupanqui ſerves to denote his Vertues and generous Actions. The word Yupanqui ſignifies as much as an account, or reckoning, as we ſay a Man of Account, which is a Cypher, or Hieroglyphick, in that language, for a ſum of Vertues, as Clemency, Piety, Gentleneſs, &c. all which were qualities inherent in that Perſon, and is as comprehenſive as the word Capac, which contains the Riches of Fortune, and the Wealth of Vertues, inherent in the mind, which Apellations, or rather Titles, they gave to none of their chiefeſt Lords, but to the King onely; it being eſteemed a kind of Sacrilege to attribute ſuch ſacred Titles to any other: for as the Romans gave the name of Auguſtus to their Emperours, in a particular diſtinction to all others; ſo it would have been a diminution to their Majeſty to have made this peculiar Name common to their Subjects.

Lloque Yupanqui having taken a ſurvey of his Dominions, reſolved to extend his Juriſdiction farther than the Poſſeſſions of his Fathers, and being now the Lord of an Empire which had been eſtabliſhed and radicated for the ſpace of ſeventy years, he thought it a more expedite way by force of Arms to reduce that People, than by the ſlow inſinuations which arguments and perſuaſions made upon them. To this end having raiſed an Army of about ſix or ſeven thouſand men, under the conduct of his two Uncles, and of his other Kindred, whom he made Captains, and Commanders over them, he took his march towards the Countrey of Orcoſuyu, leaving that of Llmaſuyu, which his Father had already conquered, (the ſeveral ways to which divide in the Province of Chuncara) he paſſed through the diviſion of Collaſuyu, which contains the great Lake of Titicaca.

The Inca having paſſed the frontiers of his own Dominions, entered the Countrey called Cana; and immediately diſpatched Meſſengers to the natural Inhabitants thereof, requiring them to leave their beſtial Sacrifices and ſuperſtitious manners, and with all readineſs to ſubmit unto the Obedience and Service of him who was deſcended from the Offspring of the Sun: The People of Cana deſired time to inform themſelves of all the particulars which the Inca commanded them, as what were his Laws, and what were the Gods which he enjoined them to worſhip; in all which when they had been well inſtructed, they readily confeſſed that their Religion and Laws were better, and more rational than their own, and therefore with a general conſent they yielded and ſubmitted to them, and ſo went forth to receive their King with Joy, and acknowledge themſelves his obedient Subjects. The Inca leaving Perſons with them to inſtruct them in his Idolatry, and to teach them the way of manuring and cultivating their Land; he proceeded forward to that Nation which is called Ayviri: but theſe being a ſturdy and ſtubborn ſort of People, were not to be wrought upon by perſuaſions, and promiſes, or by the example of others; but obſtinately perſiſted in a reſolution to dye in the defence of their Liberties; which was a new difficulty and oppoſition that the Incas had never as yet encountred. Thus both ſides preparing for War, they came to an ingagement, which laſted long, there being many killed both on one ſide and the other; and being at length as it were a drawn Battel, and the Victory doubtfull, both Armies retreated into faſt places, which they had fortified after their own manner, ſallying out every day to Skirmiſhes and ſingle Combats. The People of the Inca avoided fighting what they were able, deſiring rather to overcome them with reaſons and perſuaſions, than by force of Arms; but the Ayviri interpreting this backwardneſs of the Inca to be an effect of Cowardiſe, became more obſtinate, and encouraged to preſs harder upon him, ſo as almoſt to enter his his Royal Tents; but their force was repelled with force, and were always repulsed with loss and disadvantage. The Inca considering well the shame and dishonour it would be to him to be foiled by this People; for that others by their Example might take courage to rebell and resist him; he dispatched immediate Orders for new recruits to be sent him; but these he designed rather for terrour and ostentation, than necessity, and in the mean time he straitned the Enemy so, that there being a great scarcity of all Provisions amongst them, they were compelled at length to make their way by force of Arms; the Battel was very hot and bloudy, many being killed and wounded on both sides, till at length the Ayaviri being worsted, never durst shew their Faces any more in Battel. The Incas not being willing to take this advantage to destroy them utterly endeavoured rather by Famine to reduce them to his Obedience. During which Siege the recruits which the Inca had sent for, arrived in his Camp, the Report of which so dismayed the Enemy, that they immediately surrendred and submitted to the Mercy of the Inca; who first having severely reproved them with bitter termes, for having resisted the Offspring of the Sun, he pardoned their Contumacy and Rebellion; and leaving Officers and Instructours to teach them in the ways of Religion and humane Living, and to require from them that riches which they had forfeited to the Sun and the Inca, he proceeded against that People which they call Pucara. In this Countrey he built a Fortress, for better defence of his Frontiers and conservation of his Conquests; and the rather, becaufe the situation of the place being by nature strong, was by Art and Industry rendred impregnable, and served to reduce the People of Pucara, which were by no other means to be subdued, but by a War; which having done, and furnished his Fortress with a strong Garrison, he returned with great Joy and Triumph unto Cozco.

CHAP. IX.

The Conquest of Hatun Colla, and the Fables which those of Colla report concerning their Original.

MAny Years had not passed before Lloque Yupanqui returned again to the frontiers of his Conquests, that he might make a farther progress in reducing the Indians, and enlarging his Dominions. The Report which the Incas had spread from their beginning, of being sent from the Sun to instruct and reduce Mankind from a bestial way of living to Rules of Morality and Political Society, had made preparation in all places for reception of their Doctrine, and became most plausible and prevalent in the minds of those People, who knew not how to discover that ambition of the Incas, which they had concealed under the specious principle of the Sun's Commands: with this pretence the Inca sent to raise eight or nine thousand men well armed; and having set Officers over them, and chosen Counsellours for himself, he passed the Countrey of Collasuyu, and at length arrived at his Fortress called Pucara, where afterwards that great overthrow was given to Francisco Hernandez Giron; which is since called the Battel of Pucara: from thence he sent Ambassadours to Paucar colla, and Hatun colla, (which are Countries of a large extent, containing divers Nations) requiring them to yield ready Submission and Obedience to him; and that being admonished by the example of the Ayaviri, they should fear to oppose the Progeny of the Sun, lest the like punishments of Famine and Slaughter should be the rewards of their Rebellion. The People of Colla gave ear to this admonition, and assembling their Chiefs or most principal Men amongst them in Hatun Colla, which is Colla the great; they generally concluded, that all those Plagues and Mischiefs which had befallen the Ayaviri, and those of Pucara, was sent from Heaven, as a judgment for having resisted the Children of the Sun; and therefore with unanimous consent they declared themselves Vassals of the Inca, that they would adore the Sun, and observe and keep all those Laws and Ordinances which he should impose upon them; and with this intention they went out to meet the Inca, and received him with Acclamations, and with new Songs, and Musick, which they had framed and composed for this occasion.

The Inca received their Curacas with many kind and obliging Expressions; and to evidence the esteem he had of them, he bestowed on every one of them garments which belonged to his own Person, with other Presents, very acceptable; and in process of time afterwards these two People, and their Posterity, were ever highly favoured by the Incas, especially those of Hatun Colla, both for the readiness with which they embraced the Worship of the Sun, and for their docible and gentle Nature, which encouraged the Incas to build magnificent Temples in their Countrey, and found Monasteries for Virgins, which were matters of high admiration amongst the Indians.

The Collas consist of many and divers Nations, and report that their first Parents issued from the great Lake Titicaca, which they esteemed to be their Mother; and before the times of the Incas, amongst other Gods, they offered Sacrifices to this Lake upon the Banks of it. Some of them report that their Parent proceeded from a great Fountain, others that their Ancestours issued from Caves, and the hollow of Rocks, and accordingly at certain seasons they offered their Sacrifices to them; others that they originally issued from a certain River, and therefore held that the Fish of it were sacred, and that it was a sin to eat them. In this manner some adored one Deity, and some another, howsoever because that that People abounded much in flocks of Sheep, they had one God common to them all, which was a white Ram, saying, that there was a great sheep in the higher World, for so they call Heaven, which had a particular care of them, giving them a greater increase and number of Sheep, than to any other of the neighbouring People of Peru; and for that reason they offered up Lambs, and the fat of Mutton to this Sheep-faced Deity. But this God, and all others, the Inca took from them, allowing them no other but the Sun, whom he encharged and commanded them without any other Rival to adore and worship; besides which he altered that infamous Custome of Dissoluteness and Incontinence amongst single Women, to whom it was lawfull, and a laudible quality to be common Whores before their Marriage, though afterwards they were obliged to be true and faithfull to one Husband. But as to those Fables which relate the Original of these People, the Incas took no pains or care to confute them; for as they were obliged to believe the descendence of the Incas from the Sun; so the Incas in like manner would not seem to disapprove the Fables and Reports they made of their own Original.

Having laid these foundations of Government and Religion the Inca returned again to Cozco, giving a stop for the present to his Conquests and Proceeding; for it seemed to be the most reasonable Policy to give time and space for these new Subjects to taste the sweetness and lenity of the Inca, and by their own experience to make report of it, and publish it to the neighbouring Nations, that so they might be more easily induced to embrace the like advantage: rather than overpowering all by cruel and hasty conquests, their Government should appear tyrannical, and partaking of an ambitious and covetous Spirit.

CHAP. X.

The great Province of Chucuytu ſurrenders on terms and conditions of Peace, and after the example thereof many other Provinces ſubmit.

THE Inca was received at Cozco with all the demonſtrations of joy and triumph imaginable; where having reſided for the ſpace of ſome years, which he employed towards the advancement of the common good and benefit of his people; he re-aſſumed his intentions of viſiting again the Confines of his Dominions, that ſo he might afford his people the contentment of ſeeing his Perſon, and rectifying the corruption and negligence of his Miniſters by his own perſonal appearance. With this occaſion he raiſed an Army of ten thouſand Men, and with them marched to Hatun Colla, and the Confines of Chucuytu, which is ſo famous a Province, and ſo abounding with people, that when the Spaniards divided that Countrey, they preſented that parcel of ground to the Emperour. So ſoon as the Inca was entred into Chucuytu, he ſent Meſſengers to the Inhabitants, that leaving their ancient cuſtoms, they ſhould receive the Laws and Commandments of the Sun, and ſhould worſhip and adore him for their God: And they, in due compliance hereunto, anſwered, That they were ready and willing with all affection and cordiality to receive his Injunctions; for that he being deſcended from the Sun, they were well aſſured of his gentleneſs and vertues, and therefore with all joy they received him for their Sovereign, under whoſe ſhadow and protection they promiſed to themſelves all happineſs and ſecurity.

The Inca, according to accuſtomed goodneſs, received them gratiouſly, preſenting them with ſuch gifts as were in eſteem amongſt thoſe Indians: And finding the ſucceſs of theſe meſſages to anſwer his expectations, he was encouraged to ſend the like Summons to all the Neighbouring Nations, as far as that place, where the Lake Titicaca empties it ſelf; all which, after the example of Hatun Colla and Chucuytu ſubmitted themſelves; the moſt principal of them were Hillavi, Chulli, Pumata and Cipita; all which ſurrendred on the ſame terms, and with the ſame formalities that the others did; ſo that there is no need to make repetition of the queſtions formerly demanded, nor the anſwers thereunto.

Having in this peaceable manner ſubjected theſe people, he disbanded his Army, giving them leave to return unto their reſpective homes; onely he retained ſo many Souldiers as ſerved for a guard to his Perſon, and as many as became the dignity and honour of his State; together with ſuch as were fit to teach and inſtruct them in the Religion and Laws they were to obſerve; and that he might yield more vigour and encouragement to this work, he was pleaſed to attend and aſſiſt herein with his own preſence; which being accounted a particular demonſtration of his favour to thoſe principal Provinces, proved afterwards of great uſe and benefit, as we ſhall hereafter make appear in the ſequel of this Hiſtory. And what did farther oblige the Curacas and others to the Inca, was his perſonal reſidence amongſt them for the whole Winter-ſeaſon, during which time his employment was to ſettle and eſtabliſh himſelf in the affection and good will of his people; having now by his own experience learned, that the beſt expedient to invite and allure ſtrangers to his ſubjection was Love and Beneficence to his own people: For by theſe means the Indians did every-where extoll the Excellencies of their Prince, and proclaim him to be a true child and off-ſpring of the Sun. And now whilſt the Inca reſided in Collao, and that the Spring was returned, he again raiſed an Army of ten thouſand Men, over which he conſtituted four Colonels, and appointed his Brother to be their General, (whoſe name is not certainly known) to all five of which, he gave ſpecial order not to uſe violence, or break peace with the people, unleſs in caſe of abſolute neceſſity; deſiring rather, according to former examples, to reduce them by gentle and moderate terms, than by war and ſeverity, ſhewing themſelves rather compaſſionate Parents, than Martial Captains. Accordingly this General and Officers proceeded in their deſign Weſtward, as far as that Province which is called Hurin Pacaſſa, and with proſperous ſucceſs reduced all thoſe they met for the ſpace of 26 Leagues, as far as to the foot of the Mountain Cordillera, and the ſnowy deſart. In reducing theſe Indians, there was little or no difficulty, becauſe they were a people which lived at large, without Political Society or Government, the weaker giving way to the pride and power of him that was ſtrongeſt; and being by nature ſimple and credulous, ſo ſoon as the fame was ſpread of the Miracles which were performed by this Child of the Sun, they all flocked in to be received for Vaſſals to this great and wonderfull Monarch: Howſoever, three years were ſpent in the reducing of theſe people, for they were of ſo dull and ſtupid a genius, that, like beaſts, they were not capable to comprehend or learn thoſe eaſie rudiments and principles which were inſtilled into them. Having completed this conqueſt, Officers were placed for their better government, with Inſtructors to teach them, and ſuch Commanders and Souldiers as might ſerve to protect and defend them; and ſo the General and four Captains returned to render an account to the Inca of their Acts and Negotiations, who all that time was employed in viſiting ſeveral Countries of his Dominions, where he encouraged their induſtry, improved them in their Arts, and in cultivating Lands; raiſing publick Edifices, and making Aqueducts, Bridges and High-ways for the better communication of one Nation with another. After which he returned with his Captains, whom he gratiouſly received unto his Imperial Court, with intention to fix a term and limit to his proceedings, for having enlarged his Dominions 40 Leagues to the Northward, and more than 20 towards the Eaſt, he judged this addition a ſufficient encreaſe for his Reign.

His reception into Cozco was with wonderfull joy, for his liberality and gentle nature was generally obliging; the remainder of his life he paſſed in quietneſs and repoſe, performing actions of Juſtice and Beneficence towards his Subjects; during which time, he ſent Mayta Capac his eldeſt Son and Heir twice to viſit his Dominions, accompanied with Wiſe and Aged men, that ſo he might know and be known to his people, and might have ſome trial and practice in affairs before he came to handle the Government. And now the Inca finding himſelf weak, and near his end, he called his eldeſt Son, with his other Brethren, and in manner of his laſt Will and Teſtament, he earneſtly recommended to them the obſervation of thoſe Laws and Ordinances which their Anceſtours had preſcribed; that they ſhould take care of their Subjects, and in every thing behave themſelves like thoſe that are worthy of ſo pure and bright a Family, as that of the Sun: And laſtly, he encharged the Incas, who were Captains, and the Curacas, who were Lords of the people, that they ſhould be mindfull of the Poor, and obedient to their Prince; and eſpecially that they ſhould live in peace and unity, for that now he was to leave them, being called by his Father the Sun to aſcend unto him, that he might reſt and deſiſt from his former labours and travels. Having ended theſe ſayings, Lloque Yupanqui leaving many Sons and Daughters of his Concubines, though but one who was his true Heir and Succeſſour, and two Daughters by Mama Cova his lawfull Wife, died. The Death of this Inca was greatly lamented through his whole Dominions, for his gentle temper had gained him the affection of all, and his Vertues procured him the eſteem of a God, and rank with the other Children of the Sun, whom they Adored for Deities. And now for diverſion of the Reader, we ſhall deſiſt a while from proſecuting the Wars and Conqueſts, which were almoſt all atchieved after the like manner with the former, and ſhall relate ſomething of the Cuſtoms they practiſed, and the Sciences they attained.

CHAP.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Learning and Sciences to which the Incas attained, and first of their Aſtrology.

THE improvement which the Incas had made either in Aſtrology or Philoſophy, was as yet for want of Letters very imperfect, howſoever there were ſome certain men amongſt them of good wit and underſtanding, which they called Amautas; who were ſubtile in their Argumentations, and laid down certain Phænomena of natural things; but in regard they were unacquainted with Letters, they could leave none of thoſe conceptions they had formed unto poſterity, unleſs ſome few principles diſcovered by the Light of Nature, which they denoted by Glyphicks, or ſome uncouth and rude figures; yet in Moral Philoſophy they attained to a greater degree, for their Laws, Cuſtoms and Practices were their daily leſſons, and the doctrine of good manners being the work of the Magiſtrate, an eaſie and conſtant improvement was made therein.

Of Natural Philoſophy indeed they had ſtudied little; they knew not how to ſearch into the ſecrets of nature, or lay down the firſt principles of it; they knew not what the qualities of the Elements were, or could ſay that the Earth was cold and dry, and the fire hot and dry; they onely obſerved the effects of things, that fire would warm and burn them: Howſoever, they learned ſomething of Medicines, and of the Vertues of certain Herbs and Plants which experience and neceſſity had taught them.

In Aſtrology they had proceeded yet farther, for the apparent objects of the Sun, and Moon, and Stars yielded them more ſenſible matter for ſpeculation: they had obſerved the various motions of the Planet Venus, the increaſe, full and decreaſe of the Moon; and when it was upon the change and conjunction with the Sun, they called it the Death of the Moon. The Sun eſpecially afforded them the moſt profound matter of ſpeculation; they obſerved that by his motion the ſeaſons of the year were diſtinguiſhed, the hours of the day counted, and the days and nights meaſured; in all which they attained not to a farther ſearch or conſideration than what was viſible, and materially preſented it ſelf before their eyes: they admired the effects, but laboured not to penetrate into the cauſe, or know the reaſon of the various changes of the Moon, or motions of the Planets. They called the Sun Ynti, the Moon Quilla, the bright Star of Venus, Chaſca, which ſignifies radiant; other Stars alſo of greater Magnitude they obſerved, but did not diſtinguiſh them by their particular names, but onely under that general denomination of Coyllur, which ſignifies a Star. And yet for all this ſottiſh ſtupidity, the Incas had obſerved that the Sun accompliſhed his courſe in the ſpace of a year; which they called Huata, though the Commonalty divided it onely by its ſeaſons, and reckoned their year to end, or be finiſhed with their Harveſt. The terms of Summer and Winter Solſtices, they denoted by the large characters of eight Towers, which they had erected to the Eaſt, and as many to the Weſt of the City Cozco; being ranked four and four in ſeveral Poſitions, thoſe two in the middle being higher than the other two at each end, and were built much in the form of the Watch-towers in Spain: When the Sun came to riſe exactly oppoſite to four of theſe Towers, which were to the Eaſt of the City, and to ſet juſt againſt thoſe in the Weſt, it was then the Summer Solſtice; and in like manner, when it came to riſe, and ſet juſt with the other four Towers on each ſide of the City, it was then the Winter Solſtice. Pedro de Cieca and Acoſta, make mention of theſe Towers, which ſerved for their Almanacks, and were the beſt cyphers they had to diſtinguiſh their times and ſeaſons, for they had not attained as yet to other meaſures by Days and Months, though they kept an account by Moons, as we ſhall hereafter declare; by which and by their Solſtices they divided one year from another: theſe Solſtitial Towers I left remaining in the year 1560, and may ſtill be ſeen, unleſs the Wars and Alterations have demoliſhed thoſe durable reliques.

They had likewiſe obſerved the Equinoctials; for in the Month of March, when they reaped their Mayz, or Indian Wheat, they celebrated their Harveſt with joy and feaſting, which at Cozco they kept in the Walk of Colcan, otherwiſe called the Garden of the Sun. At the Equinoctial of September, they obſerved one of their four principal Feaſts, which were dedicated to the Sun, which they called Citua Raymir; and then to denote the preciſe day of the Equinoctial, they had erected Pillars of the fineſt Marble, in the open Area, or place before the Temple of the Sun; which when the Sun came near the Line, the Prieſts daily watched and attended to obſerve what ſhadow the Pillars caſt; and to make it the more exact, they fixed on them a Gnomon, like the Pin of a Dial; ſo that ſo ſoon as the Sun at its riſing came to dart a direct ſhadow by it, and that at its height or mid-day the Pillar made no ſhade, but was enlightned on all ſides; they then concluded that the Sun was entred the Equinoctial Line, at which time they adorned theſe Pillars with Garlands and odoriferous Herbs, and with the Saddle they had dedicated to the Sun; ſaying, That on that day he appeared in this moſt glittering Throne and Majeſty, and therefore made their Offerings of Gold and pretious Stones to him, with all the ſolemnities of oſtentation and joy, which are uſual at ſuch feſtivals. Thus the Incas, who were their Kings; and the Amautas, who were their Philoſophers; having obſerved, that when the Sun came to the Equinoctial, theſe Pillars made little ſhadow at noon-day, and that thoſe in the City of Quitu, and thoſe of the ſame degree to the Sea-coaſt made none at all, becauſe the Sun is then perpendicularly over them; they concluded that the Poſition of thoſe Countries was more agreeable and pleaſing to the Sun, than thoſe on which in an oblique manner onely he darted the brightneſs of his rays; for which reaſon the Pillars of Quitu were had in ſo great veneration and eſteem amongſt them, that they worſhipped and adored them; and therefore Sebaſtian de Belalcacar, in abhorrence of the Idolatry which the Indians performed towards them, demoliſhed them and broke them in pieces, as did the other Spaniſh Captains, in thoſe places of the ſame ſolary degree, where this ſuperſtition prevailed.

The Months (as we have ſaid) they counted by Moons, and therefore called the Months Quillas; the Weeks they called the Quarters of the Moon, having no names for the Days. They took great notice of the Eclipſes both of the Sun and of the Moon, but knew them onely by their Effects, and not by their Cauſes; wherefore they were greatly affrighted when they obſerved the Sun to hide his face from them, believing that for their ſins he obſcured his countenance, and was angry, framing the like Prognoſtications of Famine, Peſtilence and Wars, as our Aſtrologers predict from the influences of Eclipſes.

When they obſerved the Moon begin to grow dark in her Eclipſe, they ſaid, ſhe was ſick; and when ſhe was totally obſcured, that ſhe was dead; and then they feared, leſt ſhe ſhould fall from Heaven, and overwhelm, and kill them, and that the World ſhould be entirely diſſolved. With theſe apprehenſions, ſo ſoon as the Moon entred into Eclipſe, they ſounded their Trumpets and Cornets, beat their Kettles, Symbals, and all the Inſtruments which could make noiſe and ſound; they tied their Dogs in Strings, and beat them till they cried and howled; ſaying, That with their Voices they called upon the Moon; who having received certain Services from them, was very inclinable to hearken to their call; and that all theſe varieties of Sounds together ſerved to rowſe and awaken her, being fallen into a drowzineſs and ſlumber, which her ſickneſs had cauſed; and then they made their Children cry and call Mama Quilla, or Mother-Moon, Do not dye, leſt we all periſh.

Concerning the Spots in the Moon, they conceived another Fable more ridiculous than the former, and may be compared with that, which the more refined Ancients framed of Diana, and that the Moon was a Huntreſs, though this ſeems more beſtial and abſurd; for they feigned that a certain Fox ſeeing the Moon ſo beautifull, fell enamoured of her; and that his Love gave him wings, with which he aſcended Heaven; and being ready to embrace the Moon, ſhe cloſed and clung ſo cloſe to the Fox, that ever ſince that time the Spots have appeared in the brightneſs of her Body. Of all which particulars, concerning the Moon, I my ſelf have been an eye-witneſs; The Day they called Punchau, the Night Tuta, the Break of day, or the Dawning, Pacari, beſides other proper words to denote Noon, Midnight, and other Hours.

Lightning, Thunder and Thunder-bolts (as we have ſaid) they gave onely one denomination of Yllapa; and that though they did not acknowledge them for Gods, yet they honoured them as Servants of the Sun; as they alſo did the Rainbow, and becauſe they obſerved that the beautifull variety of its Colours was an effect of the Sun-beams reflecting on a Cloud, they placed it in their Banners, and made it the Arms of their Incas. That which we call the Milky-way, they fanſied to be an Ewe giving ſuck to a Lamb; and have often ſhewed me, pointing to it, Seeſt thou not there the Head of the Sheep? and there the Head and Legs of the Lamb? But my imagination was never ſo ſtrong as to fanſie a creature there of that figure.

The force of their Aſtrology did never reach ſo far as to make Predictions from the Sun, or Moon, or Comets, or Conjunctions of Stars, unleſs it were of ſomething of great and notorious importance, ſuch as the Death of their Kings, or the Deſtruction of Kingdoms; but rather deduced their Prognoſtications from their Dreams, or the entrails of the Beaſts, which they offered in Sacrifice: But the ſuperſtition they had of their Dreams was ſo idle and vain, that we ſhall omit to mention them; the like they imagined of the Star Venus, which becauſe it appears at the beginning of the night, and again riſes with the morning, they fanſied, that being ſo bright and beautifull beyond the other Stars, the Sun was pleaſed to give it a double courſe, making it in the Evening to follow him, and in the Morning to precede, and be the meſſenger to adviſe his approach.

When they ſaw the Sun ſet within the Sea, (as they may every night obſerve to the Weſtward from the Coaſt of Peru) they fanſied that the Waters were parted by the force of his fire and heat; and that being a good ſwimmer, he plunged himſelf into the Waves, and dived quite through the Sea to appear next morning in the Eaſt. And ſo much ſhall ſuffice to have ſpoken of their Aſtrology; let us now proceed, and ſee what knowledge they had attained in Phyſick and Medicines, which they adminiſtred to their ſick in their ſeveral diſeaſes.

CHAP. XII.

Of their Phyſick and Medicines, and how they applied them.

THey had gained ſo much knowledge in Phyſick, as to know, that Bleeding and Purging were two neceſſary evacuations: the Bloud they drew from the Legs, Armes or Forehead; and becauſe they were not acquainted with the Anatomy of the Veins, they opened that which was neareſt to the pain: Their Lancet was made of a ſharp-pointed Flint, ſet at the end of a ſmall Cane; which being laid on the Vein, with a gentle fillip cuts it with leſs pain than our ordinary Lancets do: And as they are ignorant how the Veins branch themſelves through the whole body, ſo likewiſe are they unacquainted with the particular humours, ſuch as Flegm, Choler and Melancholy, and conſequently have not the judgment to apply the moſt ſpecifick Medicines to purge them: They moſt commonly purged, when they found a Plethory of humours, rather than when the diſeaſe had prevailed upon them: the Ingredient which they uſed in their Purges, was a ſort of white root, in faſhion of a ſmall Turnip; of which, they ſay, there is Male and Female; of both which they mix an equal proportion to the quantity of about two ounces, which they beat to a Powder, and take it in water or their ordinary drink, without other Herbs or Drugs; and then the Patient ſets himſelf in the Sun, that his heat and bleſſing may contribute to its operation. In an hours hours time it begins to work with ſuch ſqueamiſhneſs in the Stomach, and ſuch giddineſs in the Head, that they feel the ſame indiſpoſition, as thoſe who labour of Sea-ſickneſs, and purges them both upwards and downwards with ſuch violence, that it brings away worms, and all kind of indigeſted matter, notwithſtanding which, having finiſhed its operation, it leaves the body ſtrong and without decay of Spirits, and with a ſharp and hungry appetite: All which I can boldly atteſt, having my ſelf proved it, and taken it twice for a pain in my Stomach.

Theſe Cures by purging and bleeding were commonly performed by old Women, or by ſome certain Botaniſts, who in the times of the Incas were famous for the knowledge they profeſſed in the virtue of Herbs; and theſe by Tradition transferred the ſecrets of their learning to their Sons, who did not profeſs to be Phyſicians common to all, but to apply their Art onely for medicining their Kings, and Curacas, and ſuch as were lineally deſcended from them; but the ordinary People cured one the other, by ſuch Medicines as were of common Report. When ſucking Infants were ſick of any diſeaſe, eſpecially if it were a Fever, or Calenture, they waſhed them every morning in Urine, and then wrapped them up, giving them ſome of their own Water to drink. At the Birth of their Children, when the Midwife cut the ſtring of the Navel, they left it at leaſt a finger in length; which when it fell off from the Child of it ſelf, they conſerved it carefully, and on any occaſion of indiſpoſition, of which a whiteneſs in the Mouth of the Child was their uſual ſymptome, they gave it to ſuck of this ſtring, which commonly proved an aſſured remedy.

What Reaſons they had for theſe Secrets of Nature I know not, nor did I ever ask: I am ſure they made no conjectures by the throbs of the Pulſe, much leſs by Urine, having no other Symptoms of a Calenture, than what appeared by the exceſſive heat and burnings of the Body. Their Purges and bleedings were more commonly uſed when the Patient was but a little indiſpoſed, and was able to walk, but not after he had yielded to the Diſeaſe, for then they committed him onely to the ſtrength of Nature, and a regular Diet, they never arrived to the knowledge of Clyſters, or to Unguents or Plaſters; the cold and ſhaking fit of a Quartan they called Chucchu, the hot fit Rupar, which is burning, the which Indiſpoſitions they greatly feared by reaſon of the uneaſineſs they felt both by cold and heat.

CHAP. XIII.

Of their Medicinal Herbs, and Phyſical Plants.

THey have a certain Tree which they call Mulli, and the Spaniards Molle, which ſweats forth a kind of raſomy juice, which hath a moſt ſovereign quality for the cure of green Wounds; the herb or ſhrub, called Chillca, being heated in an earthen pan, hath done wonderfull effects on thoſe who have been troubled with a pain in the joints and bones, taken by cold; they have a certain root, like the root or Fibres of Graſs, but ſomething groſſer, and fuller of knots, the name of it I do not well remember, which they make uſe of to ſtrengthen the Teeth, and fortify the Gums; and in the preparing of it they roaſt it in the hot embers, and when it is very hot they apply it to the Gums on each ſide of the mouth, keeping it untill it is cold, which is of great torment to the Patient, for it ſcalds the mouth exceedingly. This Remedy they apply in the Evening, and next morning doe the like, ſo that their Gums and Mouth look like roaſted fleſh, and for two or three days are not able to chew, or receive other nouriſhment than by a ſpoon; afterwards the white fleſh of the Gums, which hath been cauterized in this manner, begins to fall off, and a new and well coloured ſort of Gum, ſtrong ſtrong and hard returns, which fortified the Teeth cloſer and better than before. I have ſeveral times ſeen this proved, and being willing, though without neceſſity, to try it on my ſelf, I was ſo ſcalded at firſt, that I had not the reſolution afterwards to perfect the Experiment.

The herb, or plant, which the Spaniards call Tobacco, and the Indians Sayri, is of admirable uſe in many Diſeaſes amongſt them, particularly being taken at the Noſtrils in ſnuff, ſerves to purge the Head, and the other qualities and vertues of it, are well known and eſteemed in Spain, ſo that they give it the name of Yerva ſancta, or the holy Herb. They had alſo the knowledge of another Herb, of an excellent quality for the Eyes, called Matecclu, it hath but one ſtalk, and that is covered with a ſingle Leaf, and no more, and is like that which they call in Spain Abbats Ears, and grows in winter upon * the roofs of houſes; the Indians eat it raw, having a pleaſant reliſh; when it is bruiſed they ſpirt ſome of the juice into the Eyes, and at night, when they go to bed, they lay of the herb, being bruiſed, on the Eye-lids, binding it on, leſt it ſhould fall off, and in one nights ſpace it diſcuſſes all matter, and diſperſes thoſe miſts which obſcure the Eyes, and offend the ſight.

* Perhaps it may be a ſort of Houſleek.

I my ſelf have laid it on the Eye of a Youth, which was ſo ſwelled and inflamed, that it was ſtarted out of his Head; the firſt night I applied it the Eye returned again to its place, and the ſecond time it was perfectly cured; and the Youth hath ſince told me, that he ſees better with that Eye than the other; and a Spaniard confidently aſſured me, that he knew one, who being abſolutely blinded by a film or skin which covered his Eyes, had by the mere application of this herb for two nights onely, recovered his ſight. Thoſe who had received this benefit by it, did afterwards kiſs the herb with great affection, rendring thanks to Almighty God, that he was pleaſed to beſtow ſuch a ſovereign and bleſſed virtue on this herb, for the good and uſe of Mankind. The Indians, who were my Relations, uſed divers other herbs, but the names and qualities of them I cannot remember.

The Indian Kings did never attain to the knowledge of compounded, but onely of ſimple Medicines, and ſeeing that in ſo neceſſary a ſtudy, as that which conduces to the conſervation of health, they made ſo little a progreſs; how can it be expected in matters leſs important and uſefull, ſuch as Natural Philoſophy and Aſtrology, they ſhould make any conſiderable improvement? much leſs can we ſuppoſe them skilfull in Divinity, who being wholly guided by ſenſible objects, were never able to raiſe their Intellects to inviſible and immaterial Beings, more than what their Incas had taught them, and included in that word of Pachacamac, which ſignifies the Maker of this Univerſe. Since which time the Spaniards have improved their Phyſical Science to a higher degree, having diſcovered the ſecret virtues of many herbs growing in that hot Climate, of which the Indians were ignorant; and particularly that the Mayz, which is Indian Wheat, and of a ſubſtantial nutriment, hath moreover a peculiar quality againſt the Collick, and is an excellent Remedy for the Stone, either in the Kidneys or the Bladder, and clears all obſtructions of Urine; the knowledge hereof the Spaniards collected from the conſtitution and temperament of the body of the Indians; for having obſerved, that they were never ſubject to theſe diſtempers, they concluded that the drink which they commonly uſed, made of Mayz, was the cauſe; whereof the Spaniards making now divers Preparations, have with good ſucceſs experienced moſt admirable effects of it; and the Indians have alſo of themſelves made many Plaſters and Balſams of it, which they applied for Aches and other Pains.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Geometry, Geography, Arithmetick and Muſick known to the Indians.

THey had attained ſo much Geometry as ſerved them for to meaſure out their Lands, and make out limits and bounds to their ſeveral partitions; but this was not done in an artificial manner, but by their lines, and ſmall ſtones, which they uſed in all their Accounts.

As to their Geography, they knew how to decypher in colours the Model of every Nation, with the diſtinct Provinces, and how they were bounded. I have ſeen an exact Map of Cozco, with the parts adjacent, and the four principal ways to it, perfectly deſcribed in a ſort of Mortar, compounded with ſmall ſtones and ſtraw, which delineated all the places, both great and ſmall, with the broad Streets, and narrow Lanes, and Houſes which were ancient and decayed, and with the three ſtreams running through it, all which were deſcribed with great curioſity.

Moreover in this Draught the Hills and Valleys, the turnings and windings of the Rivers were made to appear ſo plain, that the beſt Coſmographer in the World could not have exceeded it. The uſe of this Model was to inform the Viſitors, which they called Damian, of the extent and diviſion of the Countries, whenſoever they went by the King's Commiſſion to ſurvey the Province, and number the people within the precincts of Cozco, and other places; this Model which I mention, was made in Muyna, which the Spaniards call now Mohina, and is diſtant about five Leagues from the City of Cozco towards the Zur; the which I had opportunity to obſerve, being then preſent with the Viſitors, who went to number the Indians that inhabited the Diviſion of Garçilaſſo de Vega, My Lord and Maſter.

In Arithmetick they knew much, and were skilled in a peculiar manner and nature in that Science; for by certain knots of divers colours they ſummed up all the accounts of Tribute, and Contributions, belonging to the revenue of the Inca; and thereby knew how to account, and diſcount, to ſubtract, and to multiply; but to proportion the reſpective Taxes on every Nation by way of diviſion, they performed it in another manner by granes of Mayz, or Pebbles, which ſerved in the place of Counters. And becauſe it was neceſſary that Accounts ſhould be kept of all charges relating to War and Peace, that the People, and the Flocks and Herds of Cattle ſhould be numbred, that the payment of Tributes, and the like, ſhould be regiſtred and noted, there were certain Perſons appointed for that work, who made it their ſtudy and buſineſs to be ready and skilfull in Accounts; and becauſe perhaps one Perſon was appointed to keep the reckonings of three or four diſtinct things, as Accountant General, which ſeems difficult to be performed by the way of their threads and knots, we ſhall diſcourſe it hereafter more at large, in what manner they diſtinguiſhed their Accounts of divers buſineſſes.

Of their Muſick.

In Muſick they arrived to a certain Harmony, in which the Indians of Colla did more particularly excell, having been the Inventors of a certain Pipe made of Canes glued together, every one of which having a different Note of higher and lower, in the manner of Organs, made a pleaſing Muſick by the diſſonancy of ſounds, the Treble, Tenor and Baſſe, exactly correſponding and anſwering each to other; with theſe Pipes they often plaid in conſort, and made tolerable Muſick, though they wanted the Quavers, Semiquavers, Aires, and many Voices which perfect perfect the Harmony amongſt us. They had alſo other Pipes, which were Flutes with four or five ſtops, like the Pipes of Shepherds; with theſe they played not in conſort, but ſingly, and tuned them to Sonnets, which they compoſed in meetre, the Subject of which was love, and the Paſſions which ariſe from the Favours or Diſpleaſures of a Miſtreſs. Theſe Muſicians were Indians trained up in that art for divertiſement of the Incas, and the Curacas, who were his Nobles, which, as ruſtical and barbarous as it was, it was not common, but acquired with great Induſtry and Study.

Every Song was ſet to its proper Tune; for two Songs of different Subjects could not correſpond with the ſame Aire, by reaſon that the Muſick which the Gallant made on his Flute, was deſigned to expreſs the ſatisfaction or diſcontent of his Mind, which were not ſo intelligible perhaps by the words as by the melancholy or chearfulneſs of the Tune which he plaid. A certain Spaniard one night late encountered an Indian Woman in the Streets of Cozco, and would have brought her back to his Lodgings; but ſhe cryed out, For God's ſake, Sir, let me go, for that Pipe which you hear in yonder Tower calls me with great Paſſion, and I cannot refuſe the ſummons, for Love conſtrains me to go, that I may be his Wife and he my Huſband.

The Songs which they compoſed of their Wars, and grand Atchievements, were never ſet to the Aires of their Flute, being too grave and ſerious to be intermixed with the pleaſures and ſoftneſſes of Love; for thoſe were onely ſung at their principal Feſtivals when they commemorated their Victories and Triumphs. When I came from Peru which was in the Year 1560. there were then five Indians reſiding at Cozco, who were great Maſters on the Flute, and could play readily by book any Tune that was laid before them; they belonged to one Juan Rodriguez, who lived at a Village called Labos, not far from the City: and now at this time, being the Year 1602. 'tis reported, That the Indians are ſo well improved in Muſick, that it was a common thing for a Man to ſound divers kinds of Inſtruments; but Vocal Muſick was not ſo uſual in my time, perhaps becauſe they did not much practiſe their Voices, though the Mongrils, or ſuch as came of a mixture of Spaniſh and Indian bloud, had the faculty to ſing with a tunable and a ſweet Voice.

CHAP. XV.

The Poetry of the Inca's Amautas, who were Philoſophers; and of the Haravec, who were Poets.

THe Amautas, who were Men of the beſt ingenuity amongſt them, invented Comedies and Tragedies, which on their ſolemn Feſtivals they repreſented before their King, and the Lords of his Court. The Actors were not Men of the common ſort, but Curacas, or ſome of the young Nobility, and Officers of the Souldiery, becauſe every one acted his own proper part; the plot or argument of their Tragedies was to repreſent their military Exploits, and the Triumphs, Victories and Heroick Actions of their renowned Men; and the ſubject or deſign of their Comedies was to demonſtrate the manner of good Husbandry in cultivating and manuring their Fields, and to ſhew the management of domeſtick Affairs, with other familiar matters. So ſoon as the Comedy was ended, the Actors took their places according to their degrees and qualities. Theſe Plays were not made up with interludes of obſcene and diſhoneſt farſes, but ſuch as were of ſerious entertainment, compoſed of grave and acute ſentences, fitted to the place and auditory, by whom the Actors were commonly rewarded with Jewels and other Preſents, according to their merit.

Their poetical Verſes were compoſed in long and ſhort Meetre, fitted to amorous Subjects, and the Tunes to which they were ſet; their Kings, and the Exploits and great Actions performed in their reſpective Reigns, were alſo matter for their Poetry, which they recorded in verſe, and ſerved in the place of Hiſtory; their Sonnets were not long, but ſhort and compendious, ſo as they might more eaſily be committed to Memory; they uſed not rhimes, but looſe verſe, like our Heroick Poems. I remember four Verſes of an amorous Song, which for curioſity ſake, and to ſhew their ſhort but compendious ſenſe, I ſhall repeat here; being thereby beſt accommodated to the Aire of their Flute: the Tune alſo I would gladly ſet down, but that the impertinence thereof may eaſily excuſe me. The Sonnet in four verſes is this:

Caylla Llapi	In Engliſh thus,	To thy Song
Pununqui		I will ſleep
Chaupituta		At midnight
Samuſac.		I ſhall come.

Many other ſorts of Verſes the Incas, who were Poets, compoſed, who had the Name of Haravec, which properly ſignifies an Inventour. Blas Valera in his Writings mentions certain Verſes, which he calls Spondels, conſiſting of four ſyllables; the Indian words he hath tranſlated into Latin, the Subject of them is philoſophical, and treats of thoſe ſecond cauſes which God hath placed in the Air, ſuch as Thunder, and Lightning, Rain and Snow, all which are deſcribed in verſe, and are agreeable to the fancy of their Fables, one of which is this: That the Maker of all things hath placed in Heaven a Virgin, the Daughter of a King, holding a Bucket of Water in her hand, for refreſhment of the Earth, when occaſion requires; and that ſometimes her Brother knocking upon this Bucket, cauſes Thunder and Lightning to proceed from it; theſe noiſes, they ſay, are effects of the violent nature of Man, but Hail, and Rain, and Snow, falling with leſs noiſe and impetuoſity, are more agreeable to the gentle nature of a Woman. They ſay, that an Inca, who was a Poet and an Aſtrologer compoſed many Verſes in praiſe of the Vertues and Excellencies of this Virgin Lady, which God had beſtowed upon her for the good and benefit of his Creatures. This Fable and Verſes Blas Valera reports to have found expreſſed in the knots and accounts of their ancient Annals, repreſented in the threads of divers Colours, and preſerved by thoſe to whom the care of the hiſtorical Knots and Accounts were committed; and he ſo much wondred at the ingenuity of the Amautas, that he thought thoſe Verſes worthy to be committed to Memory and Paper. I remember in my Infancy to have heard this Fable, with many others, recounted by my Parents, but being then but a Child, I was not very inquiſitive to underſtand the ſignification. Blas Valera hath tranſlated this Song out of the Indian Language into Latin, and which runs in this manner:

Cumac Nuſta	Pulchra Nympha,	Fair Nymph,
Torallayquim	Frater tuus	Thy Brother
Puynuy quita	Urnam tuam	Strikes now
Paquir cayan	Nunc infringit	Thine Urne,

* A Name of one of their Gods.

With ſuch trifles as theſe I have enriched my poor Hiſtory; for whatſoever I have collected from Blas Valera, are all pearls and pretious curioſities, and ſuch ornaments as my Countrey doth not deſerve; which now, as they report, in theſe days improves in Poetry; for that the Mongrils, or thoſe of Spaniſh and Indian bloud have taken a good ſtrain in Verſe, whoſe ſubject is Divine or Moral, God give them his grace that they may ſerve him in all things.

In this imperfect and groſs manner had the Indians of Peru the knowledge of Sciences, which is not to be attributed to their want of natural parts and abilities of mind; for had they been inſtructed in letters, their capacities are ſuch as might have improved every little beginning: And as the firſt Philoſophers and Aſtrologers delivered the principles of their Sciences to their poſterity, who erected on thoſe foundations the more lofty buildings of reaſon; ſo theſe people were endued with the like capacities, ſufficient to advance ſuch learning as deſcended from their Parents, eſpecially we find that they were well diſpoſed to the learning of that Morality which contained the Cuſtoms and Laws of their Countrey; and which did not onely extend to thoſe rules relating to juſtice and decent comportment of one Subject to another, but as it had reference to that obedience which Subjects and Vaſſals owe to their Sovereign, and thoſe Miniſters which act under their command; for theſe being a people who were inclined to live according to thoſe Laws which the light of nature dictated, and rather to doe no evil, than know well, were more eaſily made capable of that Science which was directed by material and exteriour objects, than of that which was converſant about more abſtruſe and immaterial notions. Pedro de Cieca in the 38*th* Chapter of his Book, ſpeaking of the Incas and their Government, ſays, That they acted ſo well, and that their Government was ſo good and political, as might be compared to the Wiſedom of the beſt frame and Model of Common-wealths in this World. And Father Maeſtro Acoſta, in the firſt Chapter of his 6*th* Book, makes a diſcourſe in favour of the Incas, and the people of Mexico, in theſe words;

" Having in the preceding diſcourſe laid down the Particulars of that Religion " which the Indians profeſs; I deſign in the following Treatiſe to declare their " Cuſtoms and Political Government, for two ends: Firſt, that I may undeceive " the World of that falſe opinion which they have framed concerning this peo- " ple, as being ſo brutiſh, and of ſo little underſtanding, as deſerve not the name " of rational creatures: From which erroneous conception, many grievous cala- " mities have been impoſed on them without pity or compaſſion; and being e- " ſteemed no other than beaſts, all that reſpect which is due to humane nature, " or the perſon of Mankind hath been loſt towards them. But this falſe notion, " which none but the vain-glorious and confident of themſelves (who are the " common fools of the World) have entertained, hath been ſufficiently confu- " ted by more ſolid and conſidering men, who have made it their buſineſs to tra- " vel and converſe amongſt them, and to diſcover the ſecrets of their Cuſtoms " and Government. To remove which prejudicial cenſure from them, the moſt " expedite means will be to declare the Juſtice and Cuſtoms which were in uſe " amongſt them, at that time, when they lived by their own Laws; with which, " though there was a great mixture of Barbariſm, and many things without foun- " dation; yet their Government contained many excellent things, and worthy of " admiration, and ſuch as may be compared with the beſt Model of our Com- " mon-wealths, and may afford us ſufficient evidence of the genius of that people, " and of that natural readineſs of mind capable to be improved to greater and " higher matters. Nor ought it to ſeem ſtrange, if ſome erroneous fancies have " intermixed with their Cuſtoms; for even Plato and Lycurgus, and other excel- " lent Legiſlatours have been guilty of ſome follies, and interwoven ſuperſtitions, " and vain rites, with their more ſubſtantial Laws. And indeed in thoſe wiſe " Common-wealths of Rome and Athens, many ridiculous Cuſtoms have been introduced; which to conſidering men would appear as idle as any of thoſe practices which have been in uſe amongſt the Mexican or the Peruvian Commonwealths. But we who entred by the Sword, and afforded not time to theſe miſerable Indians to give us proofs of their rationality, but hunted them as wild Beaſts through the Mountains, and drew them as brutiſh creatures to bear the burthens of our ſlaviſh ſervitude, could not entertain any great opinion of their Wiſedom: Howſoever, ſome obſerving men, who have been ſo curious, as to penetrate into the ſecrets of their ancient Government, and into the methods of their proceedings, have found that the Order and Rules they followed, were worthy of admiration. Thus far are the words of Joſeph Acoſta, who alſo adds, that they had certain compendious Syſtems of Morality, digeſted into Verſe by way of Poetry; in which alſo many of their Laws, and the great Actions of their Kings were rehearſed, and kept in a kind of tradition for better inſtruction of their poſterity; which ſavouring rather of Truth, than Romance, the Spaniards eſteem them to be true and particular paſſages of their Hiſtory: But many other things afford them matter of laughter, being ill-compoſed Fables, ſuperſtitious and vain, and ſuch alſo as are contrary to common honeſty.

CHAP. XVI.

Of thoſe few Inſtruments which the Indians attained to, and made uſe of in all their Works and Handicraft-Trades.

HAving already declared how far they were proceeded in their Moral and Natural Philoſophy, and in their Poetry; it follows now that we ſhould declare ſomething of their Mechanicks, and how much they failed in the Art of making thoſe Inſtruments, which are neceſſary for ſhaping and framing thoſe Utenſils which are required for convenient living and well-being. And firſt to begin with their Silverſmiths; of which, though there were great numbers, and conſtantly laboured at their Trade, yet they were not ſo skilfull as to make an Anvil of Iron, or any other Metal; cauſed, perhaps, for want of knowledge in what manner to dig their Iron, and ſeparate it from its Ore; of which they had ſeveral Mines, and called it Quillay; and therefore inſtead thereof they made uſe of a certain hard Stone, of a yellowiſh colour; which being planed, and made ſmooth, was rare, and of great value amongſt them: They knew not the invention of putting a handle of Wood to their Hammers, but worked with certain Inſtruments they had made of Copper, mixed with a ſort of fine Braſs. Neither did they know how to make Files or Graving-tools, or Bellows for Melting down Metals; but inſtead thereof uſed Pipes made of Copper, of about a Yard long, the end of which was narrow, that the Breath might paſs more forcibly by means of the contraction: And as the Fire was to be more or leſs, ſo accordingly they uſed eight, ten or twelve of theſe Pipes at once, as the quantity of Metal did require: And ſtill they continue this way, though our Invention of Bellows is much more eaſie, and forcible to raiſe the Fire. Nor had they the uſe of Tongs to take their heated Metal out of the Fire, but rather drew it thence by a piece of Wood, or ſome Bar of Copper; with which they caſt it into a heap of wet Earth, which they kept purpoſely by them to cool their Metal, untill ſuch time as they could take it into their hands: Notwithſtanding this want of divers Inſtruments, they made many things with great curioſity, eſpecially in Boaring Metals, as we ſhall hereafter diſcourſe more at large. And notwithſtanding their ſimplicity, experience had taught them, that the Steam and Effluviums from Metals, Metals, is dangerous and prejudicial to Man's health; and for that reaſon, they founded all their Metals in the open Air, and not under Coverts. But above all, their Carpenters ſeemed to be worſt provided with Tools; for though ours uſe many Inſtruments made of Iron, thoſe of Peru had no other than a Hatchet, and a Pick-axe made of Copper; they neither had Saw, nor Augre, nor Planer, nor any other Tool for the Carpenter's work, ſo that they could not make Arches or Portals for doors; onely they hewed and cut their Timber, and whitened it, and then it was prepared for their Building: And for making their Hatchets and Pick-axes, and ſome few Rakes, they made uſe of the Silverſmiths, for as yet they had not attained to the Art of Working in Iron. Nor did they know how to make Nails, or uſe them, but tied all their Timber with Cords of Hemp. Nor were their Hewers of Stone more artificial, for in cutting and ſhaping their Stones, they had no other Tool, than one made with ſome ſharp Flints and Pebbles, which they called Hihuana, with which they rather wore out the Stone by continual rubbing, than cutting. For lifting or carrying up their Stones, they had no Engines, but did all by the ſtrength and force of their Armes; and notwithſtanding all this defect, they raiſed ſuch mighty and ſtately Edifices, as is incredible, which appears by the Writings of the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, and by the Ruines of them, which ſtill remain. They knew not how to make Sciſſars, nor Needles of Metal, but in place thereof they uſed a certain long Thorn, which grows in thoſe parts; for which reaſon they ſowed very little, but rather patched or cobled, as we ſhall hereafter declare. With this ſort of Thorns they made alſo their Combs for the head, which they fixed within a Cane, which ſerved for the back of the Comb, and the Thorns on each ſide for the Teeth. The Looking-glaſſes which the Ladies of Quality uſed, were made of Burniſhed Copper; but the Men never uſed any, for that being eſteemed a part of effeminacy, was alſo a diſgrace, if not ignominy, to them. In this manner they paſſed, as well as they could, in providing thoſe matters which were onely neceſſary for humane life; and though theſe people were endued with no great capacity of invention, yet, when the Spaniards taught them, they learned with great facility, and imitated ſo well the patterns given them, that in time they excelled their Maſters in their Artificial workmanſhip and contrivances. This ingenuity and aptneſs to attain Sciences, was evidenced by a genius they had in Perſonating and Acting Comedies, which the Jeſuits and ſome Friars, and other Religious had compoſed for them. I remember the argument of one to have been the Myſtery of Man's redemption, and repreſented by the Indians with gracefull and proper action; nor were they altogether ſtrangers to this divertiſement, becauſe in the times of the Incas they uſually repreſented their own Stories in Dialogues, and therefore more eaſily improved in that Art to which they were formerly inclined by a natural aptitude. It is obſervable how well they Acted a Comedy, made by a Jeſuit, in praiſe of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary, which he wrote in the Tongue Aymara, which is different from the Language of Peru: the Argument was on thoſe words in the 3*d* Chapter of Geneſis, where it is ſaid, I will put Enmity between thee and the Woman, and that ſhe ſhall break thy Head, &c. This was Acted by Children and Young men in the Countrey, called Sulli. And at Potow they rehearſed a Dialogue, which contained all the Particulars of our Faith, at which about 12000 Indians were preſent. At Cozco another Dialogue was recited of the Child Jeſus, at which were all the Nobles and People of the City aſſembled. Another was recited in the City, which is called the City of the Kings, where the Lord Chancellour and all the Nobility were preſent, together with an innumerable company of Indians: the Argument of which was, the Moſt Holy Sacrament, compoſed in Spaniſh, and the General Tongue of Peru; which was repeated by the Indian Youth in Dialogues, and pronounced with ſuch grace and emphatical expreſſion, with ſuch air and handſome geſtures, intermixed with Songs ſet to pleaſant Tunes, that the Spaniards were much contented, and pleaſed to behold them; and ſome ſhed tears for joy, to ſee the ingenuity and good inclination of thoſe poor Indians, that ever after they conceived a better opinion of them, conſidering them not to be blockiſh, rude and filthy, but docible, gentle and capable of improvement.

When theſe Indian Youths deſire to commit any thing to memory, which is given them in writing, they go to thoſe Spaniards who are acquainted with letters, deſiring them to reade the firſt lines to them four or five times over, untill they have learned them by heart; and to fix them better in their memories, they repeat peat every word often to themſelves, and mark it with Pebbles, or little Granes of divers colours, of about the bigneſs of Peaſe, called by them Chuy, which ſerve for helps to their Memories; and ſuch induſtry and care they uſe, till at length they have perfectly overcome the difficulty, and learned their part or leſſon. Thoſe Spaniards to whom the Young Indians have recourſe for their Learning, how great ſoever they are, do not yet diſdain to teach and inform them, giving them all the encouragement they are able. So that theſe Indians, though naturally dull of invention, have yet an aptitude to imitate any thing which is propoſed before them.

John Cuellas, a Scholar, who was a Native of Medina, and Canon of the Cathedral of Cozco, who taught the Grammar to the Children which were of Spaniſh and Indian Parents, and to others of beſt quality in that City, can give us the moſt clear teſtimony thereof: For he was moved to perform this charitable Office at the intreaty and inſtance of the Scholars, whoſe Maſters and Tutours, in exchange for better preferments, had forſaken their Charge; for though every Scholar gave ten pieces of Eight a Month for his Learning, yet it was but little, in reſpect of their ſmall number, which perhaps were not above 17 or 18 in the whole Town. I knew one amongſt them who was an Inca, called Philip, and was Pupil to a rich and honourable Prieſt, named Father Peter Sanchez, who obſerving the ingenuity of this Youth, took pains to inſtruct him in his Studies; in which he profited ſo well, that he became as good a Grammarian as any that was of the Spaniſh and Indian Bloud. The change of many Maſters was a great obſtruction to their Learning; for every one of them having a different way of Teaching, they began not from the rules and principles formerly taught them, but made them to begin from their own methods, and forget what they had before learned, which was a great prejudice to their proceedings; untill this good Canon undertook to inſtruct them in the Latin Grammar, which he continued for the ſpace of two years, amidſt the Tumults and Wars raiſed between D. Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, and Franciſco Hernandes Giron; which were the cauſe of much bloud, fire and deſtruction; and were of that continuance, that ſcarce was one fire extinguiſhed, before another flame broke forth. At this time this Canon Cuellas obſerving the great docility of his Scholars, and their inclinations to be improved in all Sciences; and the want of able and induſtrious Maſters to cultivate the minds of this people; would cry out, and ſay, Oh, Children! what pity it is that I do not ſee a dozen of you Students in the Univerſity of Salamanca! And indeed this good Canon had reaſon ſo to ſay, becauſe his attendance at the Choire took him off from the employment of Teaching his Scholars with ſuch ſedulity, as to make them perfect in the Latin Tongue: Howſoever, the little improvements they made were good evidences of their natural wit and underſtanding, which now in theſe days (praiſed be God) is much advanced by that abundance of Learning, and light of Sciences, which the Jeſuits have introduced amongſt them. And ſo much ſhall ſuffice to have diſcourſed on this ſubject, it being now time to return to the Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Incas, and of their Conqueſts and great Actions.

BOOK III.

CHAP. I.

Mayta Capac, the fourth Inca, gains Tiahuanacu, and what ſort of Buildings were found there.

THE Inca, Mayta Capac, having performed the Ceremonies due to the Obſequies of his dead Father, reſolved to viſit the remote parts of his Dominions; and though he had already in the time of his Father travelled thoſe Countries, yet being then in his Minority, and under the Tuition of his Parents and Counſellours, he had not the opportunity to demonſtrate the Excellency of his Vertues, nor yet to be obſerved by his people, as he was now, being an abſolute Prince. Wherefore after the example of his Anceſtours he honoured and ſatisfied the ſeveral Provinces of his Kingdom with the luſtre of his Preſence, giving ſuch teſtimonies of liberality, courage and generous diſpoſition to his Curacas, and all other his Subjects, that they remained with great admiration of his Royal Vertues and Abilities of mind.

Having accompliſhed this Viſitation, he re-aſſumed the deſign of enlarging his Dominions after the example of his Anceſtours covering his ambition and covetouſneſs under the ſpecious pretence of reclaiming the Nations from their barbarity and vain ſuperſtitions, to a more civilized life, and to the true and religious worſhip and adoration of the Sun: Accordingly he raiſed an Army, and in the Spring following he began his march with twelve thouſand Men under the Command of four Generals and their Inferiour Officers, taking his way as far as that place, where the Lake Titicaca empties it ſelf; which being the Countrey of Collao, plain and even, and the people ſimple, and yet docible, it was the more inviting, and more eaſily ſubdued.

Being come to this ſtream which runs from the Lake, he made floats, on which he Ferried his Army to the other ſide, and then ſent his uſual Summons to the next Inhabitants, requiring them to ſubmit to his Government and Religion. Theſe Indians having heard the report of thoſe Miracles which the Incas had performed, without much difficulty ſubmitted to his Commands; and amongſt the reſt, the people of Tiahuanacu were reduced to obedience; of whoſe great and incredible Edifices, it is requiſite, that we ſhould declare ſomething in this place. Amongſt the mighty Works and Buildings of that Countrey, there is a certain Hill, or heap of Earth thrown up by hand; which is ſo high, that it is a ſubject of great admiration; and leſt with time it ſhould ſettle, or ſink lower, it is founded on great Stones cemented together: And to what end this was done, no man can conjecture, Unleſs it were like the Pyramids in Egypt, to remain for a Trophy of the Greatneſs of that Monarch who erected it. On one ſide of this mighty heap are the Statues of two Giants cut in Stone, with long Robes to the ground, and Wreaths or Binders about their heads; which being much impaired by time, ſhews the Antiquity of them. There is alſo a ſtrange Wall to be ſeen, raiſed with Stones of an extraordinary bigneſs; and what is moſt wonderfull to conſider, is, how, or in what manner they were brought thither by force of Men, who had not yet attained to the knowledge of Engines fit for ſuch a work, and from what place they were brought, there being no Rocks or Quarries but ſuch as are at a far diſtance from thence. There appear alſo many great and lofty Edifices; and what is more ſtrange, there are in divers places great Portals of Stone, and many of them whole and perfect, made of one ſingle and entire Stone; which being raiſed on Pedeſtals, are found by thoſe who have meaſured them to be 30 foot in length, and 15 in breadth, which Pedeſtals, as well as the Arches of the Portals, were all of one ſingle Stone: And then we may conſider how great thoſe Stones were before they were ſhaped, and what tools of Iron were requiſite for ſuch a labour.

The Natives report that theſe Buildings, and others of the like nature not mentioned here, were raiſed before the times of the Incas, and that the Model of the Fortreſs at Cozco was taken from them, as we ſhall hereafter more particularly deſcribe: Who they were that erected them, they do not know, onely they have heard ſay by tradition from their Anceſtours, that thoſe prodigious Works were the effects of one nights labour; which ſeem, in reality, to have been the beginnings onely, and foundations for ſome mighty Structure. Thus much Pedro de Cieça in his Remarks concerning Peru, and its ſeveral Provinces relates; to which I ſhall farther add, what a certain Prieſt called Diego de Alcobaça, who was my School-fellow; and whom I may call my Brother, becauſe we were both born in the ſame houſe, and his Father educated me as my Tutour and Maſter: This perſon, I ſay, amongſt the many relations of things which both he and others ſent me, concerning my own Countrey; coming to ſpeak of the Buildings of Tiahuanacu, hath theſe words: " In Tiahuanacu, which is a Province of Collao, amongſt " many other Antiquities worthy of immortal memory, there is one particularly " famous, adjoining to the Lake, which is called by the Spaniards Chucuytu, though " its true name be Chuquivitu; this is a Pile of Monſtrous Buildings, to which " is an open Court of 15 Yards ſquare every way, the Building is two Stories " high; and on one ſide of this great Yard or Square is a large Hall of 45 foot " in length, and 22 in breadth; the Covering appears to be Thatch, like thoſe " on the Temple of the Sun, in the City of Cozco: All this Court, or Yard, " which we mention, with its Walls, Floor, Hall, Roof, Portals and Jams of " the doors, and back-gate to this Building, is all of one entire Stone, hewed out " of a Rock; the Walls of the Court, and of the Hall, are three quarters of a " Yard thick, and ſuch alſo is the Covering or Roof; which though it may ſeem " to be Thatched with Straw, is yet of Stone; for the Indians have worked it ſo " artificially, and with thoſe natural lines, that the Stones appear like Straw laid " in the moſt curious manner of Thatch: the Waters of the Lake beat againſt the " ſide of theſe Walls; and both this, and all the other Edifices here about, were all, " as the Natives report, dedicated to the Maker of the Univerſe. Moreover, " beſides theſe Works, there are divers other figures of Men and Women cut in " Stone, ſo naturally, that they ſeem to be living: Some of them are drinking " with Cups in their hands, ſome are ſitting, ſome ſtanding, ſome are walking in " the ſtream which glides by the Walls; other Statues there are of Women car- " rying Children in their armes, and in the folds of their garments; others with " them on their backs, and in a thouſand other manners and poſtures. The Indi- " ans of theſe days report, that for the great Sins of that people, in having ſtoned " a Stranger, who paſſed through their Province, God in his judgment had con- " verted thoſe Men and Women into Stone. Theſe are the words of Diego de Al- cobaça, who hath been Vicar-General of many Provinces in that Kingdom, and Preacher of the Indians; for being a Native of Cozco, and of Spaniſh and Indian Bloud, and conſequently acquainted with the Indian Language, was moſt able to inform and inſtruct that people; and in all probability, he was the moſt likely Man to deliver the moſt true and authentick Relation of thoſe Countries.

CHAP. II.

Hatunpacaſſa reduced, and the Cac-yaviri conquered.

BUT returning now to Mayta Capac, we find him buſied in reducing the Province of Hatunpacaſſa, which is a Countrey to the left hand of that ſtream by which the Lake empties it ſelf; and in performance of this work, he uſed no other means or force, than Doctrine and Inſtruction, teaching them the way to cultivate and manure their Lands, and the art to live in humane and political ſociety; which method, as ſome report, the Incas onely uſed in the firſt beginnings of their Monarchy, which, ſo ſoon as it was grown up and fortified, they turned to open violence and compulſion. But whether this ſubjection were effected by one way or the other, it matters not much here, nor how many days journey every King proceeded; for ſuch repetitions would be both tedious and impertinent; and therefore we ſhall onely recount in ſhort what every Inca gained, and what additions he made to his Empire. This Inca therefore proceeding in his Conqueſts, came at length to that People which is called Cac-yaviri, who were the Inhabitants of a great number of Villages, ſpread all over that Countrey without order or rule; over every one of which ſome petty Lord preſided. Theſe having received the Allarm, that the Inca was coming to conquer and ſubdue them, flocked all together to a little hill, which had been raiſed by labour in that plain, being about a quarter of a League high, and picked at the top like a Sugar loaf. This Hill, whoſe beauty was the more remarkable, for being the onely lofty and eminent ſituation in thoſe Plains, was eſteemed ſacred by the Indians, and the place appointed whereon to adore their Gods, and offer Sacrifice: Hereunto they fled for ſuccour, and hoping that their God would make this place their Sanctuary, to defend them from their Enemies, they built upon it a dry Wall of Stone, and laid a turf of Earth over it; the Men laboured in the ſtone-work, and for better diſpatch the Women cut and brought the turfs; and to this Fortreſs, which they had furniſhed with great ſtore of Proviſions, Men, Women and Children, in great numbers reſorted.

The Inca, according to his cuſtome, ſent them his Summons to ſurrender, particularly aſſuring them, that he came not to take away their Lives, or their Eſtates, but to confer upon them all thoſe benefits, which the Sun, his Father, had commanded him to perform towards the Indians; and therefore that they ſhould be cautious how they wanted of paying due reſpect towards his Children, who were, by the help and aſſiſtence of the Sun, (who was the God which they adored,) ſtrong and invincible in battel: This, or ſuch like, Meſſage the Inca ſent often to theſe Indians, but they perſiſted obſtinate in their refuſals; ſaying, that they lived well already, and had no need of his Inſtructions to teach them to live better; and as to his Father, the Sun, they did not much value him, for that they had Gods of their own, one of which was that fortified Hill, which favoured them, and would preſerve them, and that the Incas might be pleaſed to depart in Peace, and teach others, who were willing to receive their Inſtructions, for that they had no need of their Doctrine. The Inca, who had no great mind to overcome them by fight, but rather to win them with fair words, or at worſt to compell them by Famine, divided his Army into four parts, and therewith beſieged the Hill.

Theſe People of Colla continued many days in this Reſolution not to ſurrender, expecting when the Enemy would aſſault their Fortreſs; which when they found, that the Inca declined, they attributed this backwardneſs to weakneſs, or cowardiſe; with which being encouraged, they made divers Sallies from their Fort; in all which, though the Souldiers of the Inca, according to the command of their Prince, did rather defend themſelves, than ſeek to offend them, yet theſe People, like brute Beaſts, without order, or wit, throwing themſelves on the weapons of their Enemy, periſhed in great numbers; the which gave occaſion to that report which was common amongſt the People of Collao, and afterwards was ſpread over all the Dominions of the Incas, That the Indians ſallying out one day to fight, all the Stones they threw, and the Arrows they ſhot, returned upon themſelves, ſo that many of Colla were killed and wounded by their own Weapons, which retorted againſt their own Breaſts; the which fabulous report we ſhall relate more at large hereafter. With this great deſtruction and mortality the Collaons being affrighted, eſpecially their Curacas, and fearing that greater evils would be the effect of their obſtinacy, reſolved to ſubmit; and accordingly diſpoſing their People in ſeveral Squadrons, or Bands, they marched orderly to crave Mercy. In the firſt place went the Children, next followed the Mothers, then the old Men, and then the Souldiery, with their Captains and Commanders, and laſt of all the Captains with their Curacas, having their hands bound, and halters about their necks, as a ſign that they had deſerved death, for having reſiſted the Children and Family of the Sun; and to make their humiliation the more formal, according to the cuſtome of Peru, they walked deſcalced, or bare-foot, for greater reverence to that Majeſty or Deity which they went to adore.

CHAP. III.

The Collaons upon Surrender are received to Pardon, the Fable is explained.

THE ſeveral ſquadrons preſenting themſelves before the Inca, with all humility proſtrated themſelves to the ground before him, and with loud acclamations ſaluted him by the title of the Son of Phœbus; which ceremony being performed by the Commonalty, the Curacas followed next, who having made their humble reverence after the faſhion of their Countrey, they begged his Majeſty's Pardon for the crimes and offences they had committed againſt him; but in caſe it were his pleaſure that they ſhould be put to death, at leaſt that he would be pleaſed to forgive the multitudes of thoſe poor Souldiers, who being ſeduced by their ill example, had been perſuaded to raiſe Arms againſt his Majeſty; and that he would be pleaſed alſo to extend his Mercy farther to the Women, and to the old Men and Children, who having no part in the guilt of the Rebellion, were objects of his Compaſſion, but as for them, they were at his feet, ready to receive the Sentence he ſhould paſs upon them in ſatisfaction for all the others.

The Inca when he received them, was ſitting in his Chair, encompaſſed with his Men of War, and having heard the Speech of the Curacas, commanded that they ſhould be looſed from their bonds, and the halters taken from their necks, telling them, that he did not onely give them their Lives, but their Liberties alſo, and with gentle words aſſured them, That he came neither to deprive them of their Lives, nor of their Eſtates, but to doe them good, by teaching them to live according to the rules of Reaſon, and the Law of Nature; and that leaving their Idols, they ſhould henceforward adore the Sun for their onely God, by whoſe gratious command he had received them to pardon, and in teſtimony hereof he did again confirm to them their Houſes, Lands and Vaſſals, without other intent than onely to beſtow favours and bleſſings on them, which ſhould be proved by a long tract of experience to them and their poſterity; and ſo much, he ſaid, the Sun had required him to communicate unto them, and therefore now they might return to their own homes, where they had onely to take care of themſelves, and obey him, for that would be for the common good and benefit of them all: And for the better aſſurance of their Pardon, and evidence of the Inca's gratious Favour, he ordered that the Curacas, in behalf of all their People, ſhould accept the terms of Peace on their left knee; and be permitted the honour nour to touch his Perſon, that for ever after they might be acknowledged for his Subjects; the which privilege was eſteemed as a moſt condeſcending favour, becauſe none under the degree of the Royal Bloud, or any other, without his own licence, could be admitted thereunto under a leſs penalty than that which is due for the offence of Sacrilege. In this manner the Inca giving teſtimony of his gratious and gentle mind, cleared the Curacas from all ſuſpicions of fear, who humbling themſelves to the Earth before him, promiſed to be his faithfull Vaſſals; for that having demonſtrated ſuch an unexemplary act of Mercy towards thoſe that had deſerved death; he did thereby give undeniable proofs of his deſcent from the Sun.

And now to explain the Fable in the preceding Chapter, it is ſaid, that the Captains of the Inca obſerving the boldneſs which the Collaons every day uſed by their obſtinate reſiſtence, gave orders to their Souldiers to treat them with all rigour, and ſubdue them with Fire and Sword, for that their bold attempts againſt the Inca were no longer tolerable. The Collaons making their uſual Sallies in a fierce and enraged manner, caſt themſelves without defence or order on the Weapons of their Enemies, who receiving their attempt with more Martial diſcipline, killed the greateſt part of them, and in regard the Souldiers of the Inca had untill now rather dallied than fought in earneſt with them, being deſirous to ſave their Lives, and reduce them without bloud; did at length uſe their beſt endeavours to ſubdue them by violence, which took ſuch effect upon them, and with ſuch ruine and ſlaughter, that the Collaons believed the Report which the Incas made of this battel, That their deſtruction was not performed by their Arms, but by the power of the Sun, who, in puniſhment for their obſtinacy and rebellion, cauſed their own Weapons to be turned upon themſelves; to the belief of which the credulous and ſimple Indians being eaſily perſuaded, were farther thereby admoniſhed by the Incas, and the Amautas, their Philoſophers, how dangerous it was to fight againſt the Sun, who was their God, and diſobey the Incas, who were his Children.

CHAP. IV.

How three Provinces were reduced, and others conquered, what Colonies were planted, and the puniſhment of thoſe who uſed Poiſon.

THis Fable, with the great fame and applauſe which the Piety and Clemency of the King had gained, was divulged through all the neighbouring Countries of Hatunpacaſſa, where theſe things were acted, and cauſed ſo much love and admiration amongſt thoſe People, that they voluntarily ſubmitted to the Inca, Mayta Capac, whom they acknowledged to be a true Child of the Sun, and therefore came to adore and ſerve him; amongſt which three Provinces eſpecially were worthy of note, namely, Canquicura, Mallama and Huarina, (where afterwards that Battel was fought between Gonçalo Piçarro and Diego Centeno,) being all of them Countries large in extent, rich in Cattle, and powerfull with the numbers of warlike People. Theſe being received into grace and favour, the Inca repaſſed the River towards Cozco; and from Hatun Colla ſent an Army, under Command of his four Generals, towards the Weſtern parts, ordering them, that having paſſed the deſolate Countrey of Hatunpuna, (the borders of which Lloque Yupanqui had once ſtocked with Cattle,) they ſhould proceed towards the People on the other ſide, who inhabit the Coaſt of the Sea of Zur, and ſhould try all fair means to reduce them, and though they ſhould find ſome ſo obſtinate and pertinacious, as not to be prevailed with by any terms of friendly accommodation; yet notwithſtanding that they ſhould not preſently break into open Hoſtility with them, being aſſured, that what oppoſition ſoever the barbarous people made, it would be more diſadvantageous, and of loſs to themſelves, than their voluntary ſubmiſſion could prove of benefit to the Inca. With theſe Inſtructions, and great ſupplies of Proviſions, which they daily gathered in their march, they paſſed the ſnowy Mountain with the more difficulty, becauſe they found no path to guide them, travelling for the ſpace of at leaſt thirty Leagues, through an unpeopled, and a moſt deſolate Countrey; at length they came to the Province Cuchuna, which was well inhabited, though they lived not in Towns or Villages, but ſcattered over the Countrey, where every one was moſt pleaſed to raiſe his Cottage. The Natives being allarmed with the approach of this Army, built a Fortreſs, and retired into it with their Wives and Children; the place was ſo weak, that it might eaſily have been forced; but the Incas in obedience to their King, encompaſſed it with their Army, and offered them conditions of Peace and Friendſhip; all which they refuſed, and for the ſpace of above fifty days perſiſted in their obſtinate Reſolution; during which time the Incas had frequent opportunities to have deſtroyed them; but the orders of their King, and their former Cuſtoms and Principles of Mercy and Gentleneſs forbad them to make uſe of the advantages which offered. Howſoever at length Famine, the uſual deſtroyer of the beſieged, began to rage amongſt them, having not had time to make their proviſions for a Siege, which they could not imagine would have endured ſo long; but being much diſtreſſed by Hunger, which the Men and Women more eaſily ſuffered than their Children, were forced at length to permit the younger ſort to adventure abroad, and gather the herbs of the field for their ſuſtenance; many of them fled to the Enemy, which the Parents more willingly ſuffered, than to ſee them die with hunger before their faces. The Incas ſeizing thoſe that were ſent abroad, gave them to eat, with ſome Proviſions to carry with them to their Parents, and with the ſame occaſion offered the uſual and accuſtomary terms of Peace and Friendſhip. The Indians obſerving this kind treatment, and being without all expectation of Succour, reſolved to commit themſelves to the Mercy of their Enemies, concluding, that if they were ſo pitifull to them at a time when they ſtood out in oppoſition to them, how much more compaſſionate would they be after their ſubmiſſion and reſignation to their Will and Pleaſure: With theſe hopes they left their Fortreſs, and ſurrendred all to the Command of the Incas; nor were they deceived in their expectations, for all kind and friendly reception was given them, meat being ſet before them to ſatisfie their hunger; and then they farther informed them, that the Inca, whoſe Father was the Sun, had no other deſign than of doing good to the Inhabitants of the Earth, and that they might be better aſſured hereof by their own experience, Garments, and other Preſents, were given to the moſt principal Commanders of them, in the name of the Inca; and the common ſort being feaſted, at leaſt their preſent hunger ſatisfied, they were all diſmiſſed, and ſent to their own homes with entire contentment and aſſured ſecurity.

The Generals after this diſpeeded Intelligence to the Inca of all that had paſſed, deſiring that People might be ſent them for planting two Colonies in that Countrey; for in regard the ſoil was rich and fruitfull, it was capable to maintain a conſiderable number of People; and that it would be requiſite alſo to eſtabliſh a Gariſon in thoſe parts, both for ſecurity of the late Conqueſts, as alſo for prevention of ſuch miſchiefs as may ariſe for the future. The Inca accordingly ſent them Women with their Children, ſufficient for two Colonies, one of which they planted at the foot of the Mountain, where the Fortreſs was built, which they called Cuchuna, after the name of the Mountain, and the other Moquehua; which People are diſtant five Leagues one from the other, and the Provinces conſerve ſtill their denomination, being within the Juriſdiction of Colliſuyu. Whilſt theſe Commanders were buſied in regulating theſe People, and giving orders for their inſtruction in Religion and Laws, they came to underſtand that theſe Indians were notoriouſly skilled in the arts of poiſoning, which upon every occaſion of offence they adminiſtred to their Adverſaries, the which was not ſo deadly as to kill preſently, but with time reduced the body to a languiſhing and macerated condi-

condition; such as were of so strong a Constitution, as to resist the Poison and live; were yet rendred loathsome by botches and boils, which broke from their Bodies, and became overspread with a white Leprosie, nor did it onely affect their Bodies, but their Minds also, making them fools, or stupid, or else mad and raving; which were all pleasant effects to the revengefull adversaries, though nothing could be more grievous and heavy to their Parents and Relations. The Captains being informed of this evil which was amongst this People, gave advice thereof unto the Inca, who thereupon immediately commanded, that whosoever should be found guilty of that Crime, should be burnt alive, that no reliques or memory should remain of them. This Law of the Inca was so joyfully received by the Natives, that they themselves gave information against the Criminals, and readily with their own hands executed the Sentence, burning not onely the Offenders, but whatsoever moveables also were found in their Houses, which they demolished, and laid level with the ground: With them also they burnt their Flocks and Herds, rooted up the Trees which they had planted, and destroyed every thing that they possessed, lest the evil and pestilence of the Master should adhere unto, or infect the Inheritance. The which punishment, and severity in its execution, so affrighted the Natives, that they never after durst more attempt this wickedness, during the time of the Incas; though so soon as the Spaniards came amongst them, they revived this evil again, which till then was out of use, and forgotten. The Captains having in this manner settled their Plantations, and reformed this abuse by the rigorous punishment of the Delinquents, they returned to Cozco, to render a more large account to the Inca of their Negotiations, who gratiously received them, and gratified their good Services with due Rewards.

CHAP. V.

The Inca gains three Provinces, and conquers after a bloudy Battel.

After some years Mayta Capac resolved to make another sally abroad for the Conquest of new Provinces, for the Covetousness and Ambition of the Inca increased with his Dominions and Success. Wherefore having raised his Army, and supplied them with sufficient Provisions, they marched towards Pucara of Umasuyu, which were the most remote, or last, People which his Grand-Father (or as some will have it) his Father had reduced. From Pucara he bended his course Eastward, to that Province which they call Llaricassa, where the Natives surrendred themselves without resistence, being much contented to receive the Inca for their Lord and Master. Then he proceeded to the Province called Sancavan, which submitted with the like readiness and facility; for the Fame of the Inca being now spread over all Countries, and the great Honours atchieved by the Father and Grand-Father of this Prince being the common discourse, so moved the Nations in all adjacent parts, that with unanimous consent they ran to embrace those conditions of Vassalage which the Inca should impose upon them. These two Provinces are about fifty Leagues in length, and about twenty at one place, and thirty another in breadth, and are both populous, and abounding with Cattle. The Inca having given orders for instructing the Natives in the doctrine of his Idolatrous Religion, and regulated the civil Affairs, passed forwards to the Province of Pacassa, where he encountred no opposition or contest in Battel, but every thing fell down down before him with ſuch Obedience and Veneration, as was agreeable to one whoſe birth and deſcent was from the Sun.

This Province is part of that which we have already mentioned to have been reduced by Lloque Yupanqui, ſo that now by the Father and Son this Countrey, which contained many People, was entirely ſubjected. Hence entering upon the Royal Way of Umaſuyu, they marched towards that People, which to this day is called by the name of Huaychu, where they received intelligence, that a great number of People were aſſembled in a Body to oppoſe him in his paſſage, the which report rather haſtened than retarded the march of the Inca in purſuite of his Enemies, whom he firſt encountred at Huychu, where they appeared in defence of a paſs on that River, ſo called, and were about thirteen or fourteen thouſand in number, all of them Indians, bearing arms; and though they were of divers Nations, yet they called themſelves by the common appellation of Colla. The Inca, according to his uſual Method, ſent frequent Meſſages to the Enemy, offering them terms of Peace and Friendſhip, which were all rejected by them, and interpreted to be effects of fear; and thence took ſuch encouragements, that they daily became more inflexible, and at length ſo daring, and impudent, as to attack the very Royal Quarters of the Inca; notwithſtanding which, the Inca perſiſted with ſuch patience in his forbearance, that his Souldiers began to murmur, and ſay, That it was no longer tolerable to permit thoſe Barbarians to inſult over the Majeſty of him who was deſcended from the Sun, nor could their inſolence be longer ſupported, without loſing that Reputation which they had formerly acquired.

Howſoever the Inca endeavoured to moderate the diſpleaſure of his People, by telling them, that it had been the cuſtome of his Anceſtours, and the Command of his Father the Sun, whoſe deſign was to doe good unto the Indians, to ſave their Lives, and advance their wellfare, and not break immediately into War and Bloud, but rather to expect with patience, and ſee whether they would come to any ſight or knowledge of that good which was deſigned for them. With ſuch fair words as theſe the Inca for ſome days reſtrained the fury of his Captains from engaging with the Enemy, untill one day being importuned by his Souldiers, and moved by the inſolence of his Enemies, who preſſed hard upon him, he gave order to put his Army in Array, and provide for a Battel.

The Incas, who greatly deſired to fight, readily entred the Field, and the Enemy, who had often provoked them to an Engagement, as willingly joined, ſo that the Fight began, and was maintained on both ſides with great heat and courage, one part (as they imagined) contending for their Liberty, reſolving to ſubmit to none, though he were of the Race and Offspring of the Sun, and the other, not ſupporting ſuch inſolent obſtinacy towards their King, were animated to contend unto the utmoſt in defence of his Honour and Dignity. The Collas notwithſtanding fought with great Courage and Reſolution, but yet with ſo little Art or Diſcipline, that like deſperate Men, they threw themſelves on the Weapons of their Enemies, which occaſioned great ſlaughter amongſt them. The Battel continued the whole day, in which the Inca behaved himſelf like a great Captain, ſome time ordering and encouraging his Squadrons, and again venturing his Perſon in the midſt of his Enemies, and in both Offices deſerved the merit of a good Souldier.

CHAP. VI.

The Auaychines yield themſelves, and are Graciouſly received to Pardon.

OF the Collaons (which is the common Name of theſe people) were killed according to their own account, ſix thouſand in this Battel; the which ſlaughter was chiefly occaſioned by their own unskilfulneſs, and want of art to defend themſelves; when, on the other ſide, by reaſon of their Diſcipline in War, there periſhed not above five hundred: Howſoever, the Battel was fought with ſuch courage, that it ended not untill the darkneſs of the night ſeparated both parties, and cauſed them to retire to their reſpective quarters: The day following the Collaons viewing the heaps of their dead, and feeling the ſmart of their wounds now cold, began to droop, and loſe all their former hopes and courage, not knowing what courſe or reſolution to take; for to overcome, and fight their way through their Enemies, was impoſſible, and to eſcape by flight was equally as difficult, being encompaſſed on all ſides by their Enemies; and to ſurrender and yield to Mercy ſeemed dangerous, for having already refuſed thoſe advantageous Conditions which the Inca had profered; and having provoked him to anger by their obſtinate reſiſtence, they feared, leſt they had put themſelves beyond all hopes or expectations of pardon. Howſoever, in this perplexed condition, they embraced the counſel of the moſt aged and wiſeſt amongſt them, which was to yield and invoke the Clemency of the Prince; for having heard the report of that Mercy which this Inca, after the example of his Anceſtours, had uſed towards all, as well towards Rebels, as to the obedient, they conceived ſome hopes, that they alſo might prove the effects of his natural compaſſion. Wherefore ſo ſoon as it was day, they attired themſelves in the moſt penitent and humble manner that they were able; the attires of their heads were put off, their feet bare, and no other garment on their bodies, than their Shirts; their Captains and Leaders appeared with their hands bound, and in this humble poſture they proceeded with ſilence to the Gates, where the Inca was quartered; and there kneeling down before him, they ſaid, That they came not to ask his pardon, for that they well knew, that their offence and rebellion had put them beſides all hopes of obtaining it; onely they were before him to preſent themſelves to the Swords of his Souldiers, that their Bloud might expiate their Rebellion, and ſerve for caution and example to other Nations, how they reſiſted or diſobeyed him whoſe Father was the Sun.

In anſwer whereunto the Inca commanded one of his Captains to tell them in his Name, that his Father the Sun had not ſent him on the Earth to kill or deſtroy the Indians, but on the contrary had commanded him to ſuccour, comfort and doe them good; and that teaching them to reform their beſtial manner of life, he ſhould inſtruct them in the true Religion and Worſhip of the Sun, who was their God: To which end, and to no other purpoſe (for he ſtood in no need of their ſervice) he travelled from Countrey to Countrey, that he might publiſh theſe Laws and Ordinances of rational Government amongſt them, which he had received from his Father the Sun: And as the pious Off-ſpring of ſuch a Father, he received them to pardon, though their Rebellion deſerved puniſhment, of which his interceſſion on their behalf with his Father the Sun, had procured a releaſe; conditionally, that for the future they ſhould reform their Manners, and obey the Sun, under whoſe Laws and Protection they might expect all bleſſings of proſperity and repoſe. With this anſwer he commanded that they ſhould be cloathed, and care taken of the wounded, and all of them feaſted and refreſhed with proviſions; and with ſuch entertainment diſmiſſing them to their own homes, they acknowledged that Rebellion was the cauſe of all their miſchief, and that Submiſſion and Obedience was by the Clemency of the Inca their onely remedy.

CHAP

CHAP. VII.

How many other People were reduced; and in what manner the Inca made a Bridge of Oſiers.

THE News of this bloudy battel was ſoon ſpread over all the Neighbouring Countries, and every-where interpreted as a juſt judgment ſent from the Sun on the Indians, who had refuſed his beneficial conditions, and diſobeyed the Inca; on which apprehenſion many of thoſe people, who had taken up Arms, and formed their Camp with intent to oppoſe the Inca, did now lay aſide their thoughts of War, reſolving to ſubmit and depend on the Clemency of the Inca; who accordingly received them with grace and favour, preſenting them with Veſts, and other gifts, with which the Indians remained greatly ſatisfied, and in every place publiſhed the Incas to be the true and undoubted off-ſpring of the Sun.

The people which were thus reduced, were the Inhabitants from Huaychu to Callamar, which is thirty Leagues to the Southward. Hence the Inca proceeded from Callamarca, twenty four Leagues farther, by the high-way of Charcas to Caracollo; Summoning all the Natives to his ſervice both on one hand, and the other as far as to the Lake of Paria; thence taking a compaſs to the Eaſtward as far as Antis, he came at length to that Vally, which to this day is called Chuquiapu, which in the common tongue is as much as to ſay, the principal or chief Lance; in which diviſion he planted ſeveral Colonies, becauſe he had obſerved, that thoſe Valleys being fruitfull and warm, were a better Soil for producing Mayz (or Indian Wheat) than any of thoſe Provinces within the Precincts of Colla. From the Vale of Caracatu he continued his March Eaſtward, to the skirts of the great Snowy Mountain of Antis, which is above thirty Leagues diſtant from the Royal way of Umaſuyu.

In theſe Marches, and in the employment he had of ſettling Colonies, and conſtituting Laws and Government in his new Conqueſts, the Inca ſpent three years, and then returned again to Cozco, where he was received with expreſſions of joy and acclamation. And having there repoſed two or three years more, he commanded, that preparations ſhould be made againſt the next Spring, both of Men and Proviſions, for a new Conqueſt; for his active mind not ſuffering him to ſit idle, moved him to enterprize ſomething in the Countrey of Contiſuyu, which is to the Weſt of Cozco, containing many great and large Countries under it: And becauſe they were to paſs the River called Apurimac, he commanded a Bridge to be made for tranſporting his Army; for framing of which, becauſe it was a thing as yet new and unknown, he conſulted with the moſt ingenious Indians in the contrivance; and becauſe it was the firſt Bridge of Oſiers that was ever made in Peru, I ſhall deſcribe the manner how it was made; not agreeing with the Writers of Peru, who tell us Stories of Bridges made of Feathers, but omit to declare the manner and faſhion of them.

In making this Bridge they twiſted, or weaved, great quantities of Oſiers together, which are not of the ſame ſort which we have in Spain, but of a more fine and pliable Sprig: Of three Oſiers they made one Twiſt for the length, and another for the breadth which the Bridge was to be; to theſe Twiſts of three Oſiers, they added another of nine, and weaved three of theſe together, ſo that it came to be twenty ſeven Oſiers in thickneſs; and ſo they went on Weaving in this manner, till it came to be as thick as a Man's body, and of this ſort they made five pieces.

Having thus prepared their Bridge, ſome Indians either ſwam or ferried themſelves over on a Float to the other ſide, carrying with them the end of a ſmall Cord, which was faſtned to a Baſſe-rope, made of Ruſhes, called by the Indians Chahuar; this Rope or Cord was tied to the end of one of the twined or matted pieces, and by the force of many hands they drew it over to the other ſide of the River, ver, as are also the other four; all which they strained very hard, by help of the Rocks on the other side; and where they found not the convenience of Rocks, there they drove in Stakes, or cut into Quarries of Stone, as strong and stable as the Rock it self. The Bridge of Apurimac, which is now in the King's Highway of Cozco, is fixed on one side to a living Rock, and on the other side to a Pillar hewed out of a Quarry. These shores or supports of the Bridge are made with great holes and trunnels, through which the Ropes pass; and for strengthning them the better, they are fortified with Walls on each side; through this hollowness of the Rock five or six Beams are crossed from one Wall to the other, and placed one above the other, like the steps of a Ladder; on each of these Beams they give a turn of the Rope belonging to the several pieces, which are Matted with Osiers, and strain them as hard as by a Capstone, so that the Bridge may not sink with its own weight: Howsoever, this Bridge is not so tight, but that it sinks in the middle, whereby those who pass it descend at first, and afterwards mount again, untill they come to the end, so that it remains in the fashion of a Bow; nor is it so firm, but that it shakes as often as the Wind blows harder than ordinary.

Three of these thick matted pieces were laid one on the other for the floor and foundation of the Bridge, and the other two served for the Rails or Walls on each side: the floor they covered with thin Boards, which they laid crossways, so that the length of the Board took the whole breadth of the Bridge, being about two Yards: these Boards served to strengthen the matted pieces, and keep them from being suddenly worn out; and also they were crossed with Rims or Ledges of Wood, which served to keep the feet of the Beasts which passed from slipping: the Rails or Walls of the Bridge were greatly fortified with thin Boards, close tied to the matted pieces, which served to strengthen it in that manner, that both Man and Beast might pass securely over it. This Bridge of Apurimac, which is the most considerable of any, is about two hundred paces in length. For my own part, I cannot say that I ever measured it, but that discoursing thereof with some in Spain, they assured me that the length was rather more than less, and that several Spaniards had passed it on horse-back, and some of them running, which shews perhaps more rashness than prudence, and less wit than fear. This great Machine, which is begun onely with a Twist of three Osiers, is at length brought to a mighty and stupendious work, and is more curious and wonderfull than I have been able to describe; the usefulness of it hath proved so great, that it hath been untill these days kept in repair at the publick charge, and not suffered to fall to decay like other greater Machines which the Spaniards found in that Countrey. In the times of the Incas those Bridges were yearly repaired by the Neighbouring Provinces, which were appointed to provide the Materials, and pay the Workmen according to a Tax laid on them respectively, and proportioned to their nearness and ability; which also is in use to this day.

CHAP. VIII.

The Renown and Fame of this Bridge is the cause that many Nations submit themselves.

THE Inca being informed that the Bridge was finished, commanded his Army to meet at their rendezvous; which consisting of twelve thousand able Souldiers, under the Command of experienced Officers, he marched towards the Bridge, which he found well guarded against any attempt the Enemy could make to burn it: But instead thereof, the Indians of Peru, who to the very time that the Spaniards invaded them, were so simple as to admire any new invention, did now ſtand aſtoniſhed at the ſight of this wonderfull Fabrick, and needed no other teſtimony and evidence to prove the Inca's deſcent from the Sun, than that prodigious and myſterious work, which (as they thought) nothing leſs than a Divine Power and Wiſedom could preſent before their eyes. Such apprehenſions they had of the Spaniards, when they ſaw them fighting on fierce creatures, ſuch as their Horſes appeared to them, and to kill their Enemies at a diſtance of two or three hundred paces with Fire-arms, which they called Thunder and Lightning; and with the ſame ignorant Spirit of admiration are they ſtill affected, as often as they behold any new invention not known to them before; as Mills to grind Corn, Oxen to Plow, and Bridges of Stone erected in Rivers with Arches, which they fanſie to be placed and poiſed in the Air; and with aſtoniſhment of theſe and other things, they break out, and ſay, Worthy are the Spaniards to be Maſters of the Indians. And in the time of Mayta Capac, the Indians being yet more ſimple than in theſe days, might well be ſtrook with ſuch admiration at the ſight of this Bridge, that many Neighbouring Provinces needed no other argument than this to perſuade them to receive the Inca; one of which people was called Chumpivillca, ſituated in the Diviſion of Contiſuyu, containing about twenty Leagues in length, and ten in breadth; all which received him as a perſon of high degree and merit, both for the greatneſs of his Birth, being deſcended from the Sun, and for the ſtupendious work which he had framed, and which none but a Divine Wiſedom could contrive and accompliſh, onely a ſort of people called Villilli made ſome weak reſiſtence; for having encompaſſed a ſmall fortreſs at the dread of the approach of the Enemy, they all crouded into it; but the Inca begirting them round, and ſending his uſual Summons, and gratious Propoſitions of Peace; in the ſpace of twelve or thirteen days they all ſurrendred, and were received to grace and pardon; and having ſettled this Province in a peaceable condition, he croſſed the deſolate part of Contiſuyu, containing about ſixteen Leagues, where he came to a Moor or Mariſh ground, of about three Leagues broad, which hindred the paſſage of his Army. Here the Inca commanded a Cawſe-way to be made of great and ſmall Stones, which they filled up with Earth, and covered with Turf: And for better expedition and encouragement of his people, the Inca himſelf worked, helping to raiſe and lay the greateſt Stones; which ſo animated the Souldiers to labour, that in a few days they finiſhed the Cawſe-way, which was ſix Yards broad, and two Yards thick; and which the Indians, even to theſe times, have in ſo great veneration; both becauſe part of it was the proper handy-work of the Inca, as alſo for the convenience and benefit of it, whereby the way is made ſhorter, when formerly with much labour and travel they were forced to take a large compaſs to avoid the Mooriſh Countrey: And for this reaſon they keep it ſtill in good repair, ſo that ſcarce a Stone decays, or ſinks from it, but another is put into its place by the care and induſtry of the Surveyors, who are appointed thereunto by the bordering people, who having ſeverally their diſtinct diviſions and parcels allotted to them, do endeavour to out-vy each the other in conſervation of that common benefit and convenience: the like rule is obſerved for maintenance of all other publick Works, ſuch as Bridges and Royal Palaces, Fortreſſes, and the like. In making the Cawſe-way, the Turf they laid upon it was of great uſe; for it did not onely make the way ſmooth, ſoft and eaſie, but alſo the Roots of the Graſs extending themſelves within the Stones, did greatly bind, and keep all cloſe together.

CHAP. IX.

The Inca gains many other great Provinces, and dies in Peace.

THE Cauſeway being in this manner finiſhed, the Inca, Mayta Capac, paſſed over it to the Province called Allca, and here he encountred the Indians of that Countrey in a warlike poſture, who being encouraged by the advantage of the paſs, which they deſigned to defend, being ſuch as was aſperous, craggy, and horrid to behold, and even ſuch as was difficult to Paſſengers to travell over, how much more muſt it be, when guarded and defended by armed Men; and yet ſuch was the prudence and good conduct of the Inca, and his Military Art and Proweſs, that though People were killed both on one ſide and the other, that ſtill he gained ground and advantage on the Enemy, which they with great admiration obſerving, did unanimouſly conclude, that the Inca was of the true Offspring of the Sun, and therefore was invincible, and on this vain belief with common conſent reſolved to ſubmit, and accordingly received him as their Lord and King, promiſing him all Loyalty and Obedience.

The Inca paſſing in a triumphant manner through this People, called Allca, proceeded farther to other greater Provinces, whoſe Names are Tauriſma, Cotahuaci, Pumatampu, Parihuana Cocha, which ſignifies the Lake of * Pinguins; for in the part of that Countrey which remains unpeopled, there is a great Lake, which the Indians in their Language call Cocha, or the Sea, as they do all great Waters; and Parihuana is that ſort of Bird, which abounding in that Province, gives the denomination to it, and is a Countrey rich, fertile and pleaſant, and where great quantities of Gold ariſe, the Spaniards, by contraction, call it Parina cocha. Pumatampu ſignifies a Den of Lions, Puma is a Lion, and Tampu a Den, becauſe it is a Countrey where many Lions are found.

* A ſort of Bird in that Countrey.

From Parihuina Cocha the Inca marched forward, and croſſed the deſolate Countrey of Coropuna, where is to be ſeen a moſt lofty and beautifull Pyramid of Snow, which the Indians moſt properly call Huaca, which amongſt many other apt ſignifications hath this of wonderfull; and indeed it ſeemed ſo great to the ſimplicity of the ancient Indians, that they adored and worſhipped it for its Beauty and Eminence. Thence the Inca proceeded to the Province called Aruni, which runs along as far as to the Vale of Arequepa, which, as Blas Valera affirms, ſignifies a ſounding Trumpet.

All theſe Provinces and Nations Mayta Capac added to his Empire, with much eaſe to himſelf, and gentleneſs towards thoſe he ſubdued; for they having generally heard of the difficulties the Inca had overcome, and the paſſages he forced through inacceſſible places, could not imagine, that ſuch Actions as theſe were poſſible to be performed by any other than one of Divine Extraction, and deſcended from the Sun, by which opinion they chearfully ſubmitted, and became proud of their ſubjection: In every of which Provinces he continued ſo long as was requiſite, for the ſettlement of Affairs, and peace of the Government; and finding that the Vale of Arequepa, was deſolate, and without inhabitants, notwithſtanding that it was a moſt fruitfull ſituation, and an Air pure, and ſerene, he therefore reſolved to cauſe the Inhabitants of other parts leſs agreeable, which he had conquered to tranſplant themſelves to this more commodious and happy ſoil; and ſuch effect had his perſuaſions on the people, allured by the pleaſures of that Climate, and the commodiouſneſs of the Habitation, that not onely ſome Colonies of the conquered Countries, but alſo ſeveral of the natural Subjects of the Inca tranſplanted themſelves to the number of about three thouſand Families into that pleaſant Valley, which became the Original of four or five diſtinct Nations, one of which is called Chimpa, and another Sucahuaya: And having ſupplied all places with Governours, and neceſſary Officers, the Inca returned to Cozco, having in this ſecond expedition ſpent three years time; during which, and the former in-vaſion, he made an addition to his Empire, in the Diviſion of Contiſuyu onely, of almoſt ninety Leagues in length, and ten or twelve in breadth one way, and fifteen another way; all which tract of Land was contiguous, or adjoining to the other parts ſubjected to his power. The Inca returning home, was received at Cozco, with all the Feſtivity, Joy and Triumph imaginable, and met with Songs and Muſick, chanting out the praiſes of his mighty and heroick Actions. The Inca having rewarded his Souldiers with Preſents agreeable to their merit, disbanded his Army, it ſeeming ſufficient for the preſent time the atchievements already made; and that now it was ſeaſonable to give reſt and repoſe from military actions, and attend to the Execution of the Laws, and to the Government of his Kingdom, a great part of which he conſidered to be the care of making proviſions for Widows and Orphans, and other poor and diſabled People; in which good works he paſſed all the remainder of his days; his Reign having continued for thirty Years, as is ſaid, but the truth is, there is ſo little credit to be given to Reports of this nature, where are no Regiſters, or Letters, that we know not what to believe in the Caſe; onely this is certain, that he dyed full of Honour, and Trophies, having acquired a great name, both in War and Peace; and being much beloved and honoured. His Death was lamented with ſincere grief by all, which, according to the Cuſtome of the Incas, continued for the ſpace of a full Year. His Eldeſt Son, Capac Yupanqui, born of his Wife Adama Cuca, he left his Univerſal Heir of all; beſides whom alſo he left other Sons, and Daughters as well, ſuch as were legitimate, as ſuch as were termed illegitimate.

CHAP. X.

Capac Yupanqui, the fifth Monarch, reduces many Provinces in the Diviſion of Contiſuyu.

THE Inca, Capac Yupanqui, (the interpretation of whoſe Name we have already declared amongſt the proper Names of his Anceſtors) after the death of his Father, bound his Head with the coloured Wreath, in token of his entrance into the poſſeſſion of his patrimonial Inheritance, and having performed the Obſequies of his Father's Interment, he immediately took a Journey through all parts of his Dominions, making enquiry into the Behaviour and Lives of his Officers, and in what manner Juſtice was adminiſtred amongſt them. In this Progreſs he paſſed two years, and then returned to Cozco, where he commanded that Souldiers ſhould be levied, and Proviſions made for the following Year, intending to extend his Conqueſts into thoſe parts of Contiſuyu, which lie Eaſtward from Cozco, where he was informed, that there were many and great Provinces, and abounding with People. For the more eaſie paſſage to thoſe parts he ordered another bridge to be made over the great River of Apurimac, at that place which is called Huacachaca, below Accha, which was accordingly performed with all diligence, ſurpaſſing the former bridge in length and breadth, becauſe the River was wider in thoſe parts.

In this manner the Inca departed from Cozco, attended with twenty thouſand Men of War, and being come to the bridge, which was about eight Leagues from the City, through a rough and aſperous way, three Leagues of which are a ſteep deſcent to the River, though in height it may not be perpendicular above half a League, and the aſcent on the other ſide may likewiſe contain about three Leagues farther. Having paſſed the bridge, and this difficult way, they entred into the pleaſant Countrey of Yanahuara, which at that time contained thirty Nations; what thoſe People were then, and how numerous, we have no certain account, onely we are aſſured, that the Inhabitants on that ſide, called Piti, ſo ſoon as

as they heard of the approach of the Inca, came forth to meet him, both Men and Women, old and young, and with Songs and Muſick, Acclamations, and all things that might teſtifie their Joy, they received him for their King, vowing all Obedience and Vaſſalage to his Perſon. The Inca on the other ſide received them with a gratious Eye, beſtowing on them ſuch Veſts, or Garments, as were in the mode and faſhion of his Court: Of this kind treatment the Piti ſent advice to their Neighbours, being of the ſame Nation with them of Yanahuara, giving them to underſtand that the Inca had taken up his aboad amongſt them, and that they had received him for their Lord and Maſter, according to which example of the Piti, the Curacas of divers Nations came likewiſe in, and ſubmitted themſelves.

The Inca received them all with his accuſtomed goodneſs, and as an evidence of his greater favour, he was deſirous to ſhew himſelf to his People, and viſit their Countrey, which contained about twenty Leagues in length, and about fifteen in breadth. From this Province of Yanahuara, he paſſed into another, called Aymara, between which two there is a ſpace of ground wholly deſolate and unpeopled of about fifteen Leagues over. On the other ſide of this deſart, a great number of People were gathered into a body within a certain incloſed ground called Mucanſa, to ſtop the paſſage of the Inca, and entrance into their Countrey, which contains thirty Leagues in length, and fifteen in breadth, and is rich in Mines of Gold, Silver and Lead, and abounds in Cattle and People, and conſiſted of at leaſt eighty Nations, before they were reduced to the Obedience of the Inca.

At the Foot of this Incloſure the Inca commanded his Army to encamp, ſo as to cut the Enemy off from all ſupplies, who being barbarous, and ignorant of War, had diſpeopled all the Countrey, and gathered them into one body, not conſidering that by this means they were cooped up on all ſides, and hemmed in, as it were in a Cage. The Inca continued ſeveral days in this manner, with an unwillingneſs to attack them, inviting them to ſubmiſſion with all fair terms and propoſals of Peace, and offering no other violence to them than to hinder them from proviſions and ſuſtenance; that ſo what Reaſon and Argument could not effect, Famine and Hunger might enforce. In this reſolute condition the Indians remained for the ſpace of a whole month, untill being conſtrained by the neceſſities of Famine, they ſent Meſſengers to the Inca, giving him to underſtand, that they were ready to receive him for their King, and adore him, as the true Offſpring of the Sun, conditionally, that he, on the Faith and Word of his Divine Progeny, promiſe, that ſo ſoon as they ſhall have yielded themſelves to him, he will conquer and ſubject under his Imperial Command the neighbouring Province of Umaſuyu, which being a numerous and warlike People living upon Rapine and Spoil, did make frequent incurſions to the very doors of their Houſes, eating up their proviſions and paſtures, and committing many other miſchiefs and outrages; for which injuries they had often made War upon them, which ended in bloud and confuſion on the one ſide and the other; and when at length Peace was made, and terms of accommodation agreed on, they ſuddenly broke out again into new violences, not conſidering the Faith and Promiſes they had given: Wherefore if he pleaſed to avenge them of theſe Enemies, and reſtrain their incurſions on them for the future, they would yield, and acknowledge him for their Prince and Lord.

To this Propoſal the Inca made anſwer by one of his Captains, That the deſign of his coming into thoſe parts had no other aim than to relieve the oppreſſed, and reclaim the barbarous Nations from that beſtial manner of living, whereto they were accuſtomed, and that he might inſtruct them in the Laws of Reaſon and Morality, which he had received from his Father the Sun; but as to the avenging them of their Enemies for the injuſtice and injuries they had done them, it was the Office and Duty of the Inca to perform; howſoever it became not them to impoſe conditions on the Inca, who was their Lord and Sovereign, and was to give rather than receive terms, and therefore that they ſhould refer all their grievances to his Wiſedom, who inheriting the juſtice of the Sun, his Father, was inclinable of himſelf to redreſs their Oppreſſions, and reduce their Enemies to terms of Reaſon and Juſtice.

With this Anſwer the Ambaſſadours returned; and the day following all the Indians that were retired within the incloſure to the number of above twelve thouſand fighting men, with their Wives and Children to about thirty thouſand ſouls, came forth, and in ſeveral Diviſions preſented themſelves on their knees before the Inca, profeſſed themſelves to be his Slaves and Vaſſals, and in teſtimony thereof offered unto him Gold, and Silver, and Lead, and whatſoever elſe was the product of their Countrey. The Inca receiving them with his accuſtomed Goodneſs, ordered that meat ſhould be given them to ſatisfie their preſent hunger; and likewiſe proviſions for their journey, that ſo they might all return to their reſpective Habitations leſt they ſhould faint by the way, and want due refreſhment and care in their Travel.

CHAP. XI.

The Conqueſt of thoſe of Aymara: The Curacas are received to Pardon: Marks are ſet up for boundaries on the Confines.

THeſe People being ſent home to their reſpective dwellings, the Inca proceeded to another part of the ſame Province of Aymara, called Huaquirca, which even to this day contains two thouſand Families; from thence he diſpatched Meſſengers to ſummon the Caciques, or Lords of Umaſuyu to appear before him; for that being deſcended from the Sun, he claimed it as his Prerogative, to hear and decide the differences between them and their Neighbours of Aymara, about the paſturage, and places where they feed their Cattle: and that reſiding now in Huaquirca he expected their coming thither, ſo that he might impoſe Laws and Rules of Reaſon on them, whereby to meaſure their actions, that they might not like brute Beaſts deſtroy one the other, for cauſes of ſo ſmall import or moment, as that of paſturage, ſince it was evident that the Countrey was large, and the grounds abounding with Graſs, ſufficient to feed the Flocks both of one and the other People. The Curacas, or Chiefs of Umaſuyu, being aſſembled together to conſult of this common concernment, gave this general anſwer, That they had no buſineſs with the Inca, ſo as to oblige them to repair to his place of Reſidence, but if he had any occaſions for them, that he ſhould ſeek them within their own Territories, where they were ready to attend and receive him with Arms in their hands; whether the Sun were his Father, or not, they did neither know nor care, and if he were, yet the Sun was no God of theirs, for they had natural Gods of their own, whoſe Protection and goodneſs they had ſo well proved, as not to change them for any other: That the Inca might beſtow his Laws and Ordinances on his own Subjects, for that they would accept of none which reſtrained them from a liberty of taking that, to which their Arms and Power gave them a right and title; and by the ſame Arms they would defend themſelves and their Countrey againſt any who ſhould dare to diſturb them in their Peace and enjoyments. This, they ſaid, was all the anſwer that they would give, and that in caſe the Inca required any other, he ſhould appear in the field, and decide the controverſie like a valiant Souldier. The Inca, Capac Yupanqui, entering into conſultation with his principal Officers, upon this anſwer of thoſe of Umaſuyu; agreed and concluded, that the ſucceſs of this War depended on diſpatch, and therefore that they ſhould without delay make an attempt upon them, the ſuddenneſs of which would ſo diſtract and confound them, that the ſurpriſal and fear, more than the real hurt, would affright them into ſubmiſſion; for that it being a Law and Maxime of the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, and from him derived to all his Royal Poſterity to ſpare the bloud of the Indians, and gain them by all arts and contrivances of Gentleneſs and Invitation; and that War and Force were to be the laſt remedies: In conſideration of which, Capac Yupanqui thought fit to make uſe of this Strategeme, commanding eight thouſand ſelect Men of his Army to march day and

and night into the Province of Umasuyu, so that by the speediness of their march they might surprise the Enemy, who did not expect the motion of so great a body in less than the space of a whole month; but seeing them already in the midst of their Countrey with a flying Army, and the gross Body on their march towards them, and considering that it was impossible for them to assemble so soon together, as to make a head sufficient to resist, began to repent of their pertinacious answer; and now laying aside the thoughts of War, the Curacas with speed and haste assembled together from all parts, resolving that the onely expedient in that exigency was to ask pardon, and mercy for their late offence; so that one after the other, as they chanced to come in, prostrated themselves before the Inca, acknowledging him for a true Child of the Sun, and as such they swore and vowed unto him all Faithfulness and Obedience.

The Inca, contrary to the expectation of the Curacas, who expected nothing less than death, or punishment, received them with a gratious Clemency; telling them by one of his Captains, that when he considered their Barbarity, and that they were wholly ignorant of all kind of Morality, he did not admire at their refusal to accept his Religion, and the lenity of his government, being assured that when they shall have once learned and proved those things which conduce to humane Life, they will bless the hour in which they were persuaded to forsake those their Idols, which were formed in the similitude of Beasts, and vile Creatures, and capable of nothing but contempt; wherefore now he commanded them, that in every thing they should resign themselves with implicite Faith, and entire Obedience to the Religion, Laws and Government which the Inca and his Ministers should impose upon them, for such was the pleasure of the Sun his Father.

The Curacas with most profound humility answered, That they did promise and vow to acknowledge no other God than the Sun, nor no other King than the Inca, whose Laws and Ordinances being founded on Reason and Justice, were the best Rules whereby to make his Subjects happy. The Inca, in favour and honour to these his new Subjects, settled his Court for a while in the Province of Chirirqui, which is the chief and capital Seat of this People; at which place informing himself of the situation and position of their pasturages, and of the Causes and Original of the differences arising between these People and their Neighbours, did after mature consideration determine where the confines of each Countrey should be limitted; and in testimony thereof caused heaps of Stones to be thrown up at such places, where he thought fit, to remain for Boundaries and Marks to distinguish the Lands of one People from the other; the which Land-marks are to this day conserved, and continued in great Veneration, because they were the first of that Nature, which had been raised in Peru by order of the Inca.

The Curacas of both Provinces being entirely satisfied with this Sentence and Determination of the Inca, with profound humility kissed his Hands, and returned to their respective abodes, whilst the Inca in the mean time visited at his leisure the chief places of both these Provinces, that so he might settle his Government, and establish his Laws amongst them, after which not judging it fit to proceed farther in his Conquests, though his Prosperity and Success was greatly inviting, he returned back again to Cozco, where he entred in this triumphant manner into his Imperial City. First the Curacas and Nobles of the two late reduced Provinces, who came out of curiosity to see the Imperial Seat, carried the Inca on their Shoulders in a Chair of Gold, in token of their servitude and subjection, the Souldiers marched before in their military order, their Captains, and Chiefs followed immediately after the Chair; every Squadron keeping its due order, according to its degree of precedency, the which was allotted them according to their Seniority, the new Conquests giving place to the more ancient subjects: and thus the triumph being ranked in this order, the whole City concurred to the solemnity, going forth according to their usual manner, to meet and receive their Inca with Musick, and Songs, and all Festivity.

CHAP. XII.

The Inca ſends to Conquer the Quechuas, who with great willingneſs ſubmit themſelves.

THE Inca having for four years attended onely to the adminiſtration of his Government, and the benefit of his Subjects, thought it not fit to ſpend more time in quietneſs and eaſe, leſt his Souldiers living in peace and repoſe, ſhould grow reſty and luxurious, and forgetfull of their Military Diſcipline; wherefore he commanded, that the Souldiery ſhould be in a readineſs, and Proviſions made for War againſt the following year.

And now the time of entring into the Field being come, he appointed his Brother Auqui Titu for his Captain-General and four other Incas of his neareſt relations, who were well practiſed in the affairs both of War and Peace, to be Major-Generals, every one of which had an equal ſhare of 5000 Men committed to his charge, and all five of them in joint commiſſion commanded the Army: The deſign was to carry on that Conqueſt which they had already begun in the Diviſion of Contiſuyu; and for a good beginning and omen to their future proceedings, the Inca was pleaſed in perſon to accompany them as far as to the Bridge of Huacachaca; where having recommended to them the example of his Anceſtours as the pattern for them to follow, he returned again to his City of Cozco.

The General, with his other Commanders, entred into the Province called Cotapampa, where they were met by the Lord thereof, accompanied with one of his Kinſmen, who likewiſe commanded another Countrey called Cotanera, and both of them Natives of Quechua. The Caciques having intelligence that the Inca had ſent an Army into their Countrey, aſſembled together, and unanimouſly reſolved to receive him, as their King and Lord, with all readineſs; for having many days expected and deſired his coming, they all upon news of his approach went forth with Songs and Dances to meet the Inca, Auqui Titu, making great demonſtrations of joy and contentment, one of them in behalf of all the reſt, expreſſing himſelf in this manner: Inca Apu, (which ſignifies General) thou art welcome, becauſe thou art here to give us a new Being, and a new Title of being Servants and Subjects to that great Prince, who derives his Pedigree from the Sun: And becauſe that thou art his Brother, we honour and adore thee; giving thee to underſtand, that hadſt thou not come in a ſhort ſpace to have reduced us to this Service of the Inca, we were all reſolved to go the next year unto Cozco, there to have owned and acknowledged our ſelves for Servants of your King, beſeeching him to receive us under his mighty defence and protection; for the fame of thoſe great atchievements and miraculous actions performed by this Off-ſpring of the Sun both in War and Peace, have affected us with ſuch wonder and love towards him, that every day ſeems a year, untill we enjoy the honour and privilege of being his Subjects: And indeed hereby we promiſe our ſelves the happineſs of being delivered from the Tyrannies and Cruelties with which our Neighbours of Chanca and Hancohualla have for many years from the times of our Anceſtours and Forefathers moſt grievouſly vexed and oppreſſed us; and ſo if thou wilt receive us under thy protection, our deſires will be fulfilled, and our happineſs conſummated, and may thy Father the Sun evermore defend and preſerve thee. Having ſaid theſe things, they made their Obeiſance to the Inca and his Generals, delivering a great quantity of Gold to be ſent as a preſent to the Inca their Sovereign. This Province of Cotapampa, after the War of Gonçalo Piçarro, was the portion allotted to Don Pedro Luys de Cabrera, a Native of Seville; and the Province Cotanera, and another called Huamanpallpa, of which we ſhall have occaſion hereafter to ſpeak, was the poſſeſſion of my Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega; and was the ſecond Dividend which was made in Peru; and of the firſt we ſhall ſpeak in its due place. In anſwer hereunto the General Aqui Titu, and his Captains, replied in the name of the Inca; that both their deſires and affectionate expreſſions towards them were very acceptable, and ſo obliging, that they promiſed to recount count every ſyllable of them to the Majeſty of their Inca, who, no doubt, but would remain ſo ſenſible of their good will, that he would not omit to make ſutable returns in the ſame, if not in a higher degree, than he had towards others. The Curacas were greatly pleaſed, that their words ſhould have the honour to reach the Ears of the Inca; and therefore every day gave new teſtimonies of their affection, by their readineſs to execute what Commands ſoever the Captains impoſed upon them. And having left in this place ſuch inſtructions as were convenient for the orderly government thereof; they proceeded to another Province called Huamampallpa, which yielded it ſelf without any contradiction or oppoſition whatſoever. Thence the Incas paſſed a River which divides the two Provinces by two or three ſtreams, which afterwards a little lower falling in together, make that famous River of Amancay.

One of thoſe ſtreams paſſes thorough Chuquiinca, where the Battel was fought between Franciſco Hernandez Giron, and the Mareſchal Don Alonſo de Alvarado; and ſome years before, on the very ſame place, a Battel was fought between Don Diego de Almagro, and the ſaid Mareſchal; in both which Don Alonſo de Alvarado was overthrown, as we ſhall recount in its due place, if God gives us life to arrive ſo far in this Hiſtory. Thus the Incas continued their progreſs in reducing the Countries both on one ſide and the other of this River Amancay; which though they be many in number, yet they are all contained under the common appellation of Quechua, which abounds with Gold and Cattel.

CHAP. XIII.

Many Plains and Vallies by the Sea-coaſt are reduced, and the Sin of Sodomy puniſhed.

SUch Orders being given and eſtabliſhed as were requiſite for the better government and adminiſtration of affairs in the conquered places, they proceeded into the deſolate Countrey of Huallaripa, which is a deſart much famed for the great quantities of Gold extracted thence, and where much more remains to be ſtill digged; and having croſſed one ſide of the deſart for about 35 Leagues, they deſcended into thoſe Plains which run along by the Sea-coaſt: All this Countrey by the Sea-coaſt, the Indians call Yunca, which is as much as to ſay, the Hot Countrey, under which name are comprehended all the Vallies which border on the Sea; and the Spaniards call the Low grounds Vallies, which are watered by the ſtreams that fall from the Mountains; for in that Countrey, that part is onely habitable which lyes towards the Sea; all the reſt being dry, is nothing but dead and barren Sands, where grows neither Graſs, nor Herb, nor any thing for the ſuſtenance of Mankind.

On that ſide, by which the Incas paſſed into thoſe Plains, lyes the Vale of Hacari, which is wide, rich and well peopled, and which in times paſt contained 20000 Indians; all which with much willingneſs ſubmitted to the obedience and ſervice of the Inca. This Vale of Hacari led them into other Vales called Vuinna, Camana, Caravilli, Picta, Quellca, and others, which run for the ſpace of 70 Leagues North and South along the Coaſt of the Sea of Zur: All which Vales here named, are each above 20 Leagues long from the deſart to the Sea, and all watered by ſtreams on one ſide and the other; ſome of which are ſo full and plentifull, that after they have ſupplied the Lands with ſufficient moiſture, the remainder empties it ſelf into the Sea; and others perhaps having refreſhed the Lands for two or three Leagues from their Source or Fountain-head, are afterwards abſorpt, or drank up by the drineſs of the Earth. The General Aqui Titu, and his Captains, having reduced all theſe Vallies to obedience without fighting one ſtroke, rendred an account to the Inca of their ſucceſs; and particularly, that having made enquiry into the ſecret cuſtoms of thoſe Natives, and into their Rites and Ceremonies, as alſo what Gods they worſhipped: They obſerved and found, that their chief Deity was the Fiſh which they killed and eat; and alſo, that there were Sodomites amongſt them; but howſoever, that this wickedneſs was not general or common to all the Vallies, but to ſome few; nor was it openly practiſed, but in ſecret, being that which nature and the light of humane reaſon did abhor. They farther likewiſe acquainted the Inca, that being arrived to the utmoſt bounds which are terminated by the Sea, there remained on that ſide no other Land to ſubdue. The Inca was much pleaſed with the Relation of theſe Conqueſts, and much more, that it had coſt no bloud; wherefore he ſent to Command his Souldiers, that having left and eſtabliſhed ſuch Orders as were neceſſary for the government and ſecurity of thoſe Countries, they ſhould return to Cozco; but firſt, that they ſhould make ſtrict inquiſition concerning thoſe who were eſteemed guilty of that unnatural ſin of Sodomy, and not onely burn thoſe alive in a publick place, who were evidently convicted of that crime, but even thoſe who were but ſo much as ſuſpected thereof; that they ſhould alſo burn and deſtroy their Houſes, their Trees and Inheritance, leaving them a ſad ſpectacle to their neighbours and acquaintance. And farther, the Inca commanded that they ſhould proclaim and publiſh this his Edict againſt Sodomy for the future to be, That whoſoever ſhould be found guilty of this abomination, that not onely he ſhould be deſtroyed in particular, but likewiſe his Relations, his Neighbours, and all the Inhabitants of the parts round ſhould be puniſhed with the ſame deſtruction, ruine and deſolation.

All which being performed exactly according to the pleaſure and direction of the Inca, this new Law was with great admiration and aſtoniſhment of the Natives put into execution on the Offendours; for being a crime ſo ſhameſull and deteſtable to the Inca, and his proper Subjects, the mention and name thereof was not without ſome abhorrence taken into their mouths; ſo that if any Indian, who was a Native of Cozco, ſhould at any time in paſſion revile his neighbour with that word and opprobrious term, he was preſently looked upon as one defiled, and for many days polluted, untill his mouth were cleanſed from a word ſo filthy and deteſtable.

The General and his Officers having in this manner executed all the Commands of the Inca, they returned to Cozco, where they were received in great triumph, and rewarded with honours and favours agreeable to their merit. But many years had not paſſed after theſe Conqueſts, before the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, reſolved to begin a new Expedition in perſon for enlargement of his Dominions on the ſide of Collaſuyu; (for as yet in his late Marches he had not paſſed the Diviſions of Contiſuyu) ſo that in order hereunto, he commanded that twenty thouſand ſelect men ſhould be put in a readineſs againſt the following year. And that in the mean time nothing ſhould be omitted, which might contribute to the due adminiſtration of his Government, he appointed his Brother Aqui Titu to remain Deputy in his place, and that the four Major-Generals which had accompanied him in the laſt Wars ſhould be his Counſellours. Into their places he choſe four other Generals, and both they and all the Captains and Officers of the Army were not of leſs degree or quality than that of an Inca; for though the Forces which came from divers Provinces were conducted by their own Chief or Commander, yet afterwards, when they came to be united with the Imperial Army, an Inca was given to preſide over them, ſo that the Chief became, as it were, his Lieutenant; by which means the whole Army had Incas for their Officers, and yet none ſeemed to be diſplaced or acquitted of his charge. By which method and policy in government, things were preſerved in their juſt balance; for unleſs it were in matters of Law and Juſtice, which admitted of no diſpenſation, it was a Maxim amongſt the Incas never to diſoblige their Curacas, but in every thing to render their Yoke ſo eaſie and gentle, that the Indians might be fond of it; and that the love of the people might be the baſis and foundation of their Government. Moreover, the Inca thought fit to take his Son, who was his Heir, to accompany him; for though he were young, yet his years were capable of education and practice in the War.

CHAP. XIV.

Two Curacas, of great Power and Authority, refer their differences to the Arbitrement of the Inca, and become his Subjects.

THE appointed time for this expedition being come, Capac Yupanqui departed from Cozco, and marched as far as the Lake of Paria, which was the ultimate bound or limit of his Fathers Conqueſt; and in the way, as he marched he gathered the recruits which divers Provinces had made ready for him, not omitting to viſit the Nations, as he paſſed, that ſo he might favour and honour them with his preſence; the which they eſteemed ſo high an obligation, that in divers Countries they have noted the places with a particular remark, where the Inca pitched his Camp, or where they ſent him proviſions, or refreſhed himſelf; the which places to this day the Indians conſerve in great Veneration, as if the ground had been hallowed by his ſacred feet.

So ſoon as the Inca arrived at the Lake of Paria, all the neighbouring People ſubmitted themſelves to his Service and Juriſdiction; ſome of which inclined to Obedience out of an eſteem they had of his gentle and wiſe Government, and others out of fear, and dread of the power, which they were not able to reſiſt. In theſe Marches Meſſengers arrived at the Court, from two great Captains in the Diviſion of Collaſuyu, who made War one on the other. Theſe two powerfull Curacas were deſcended from two great Generals, who in times paſt, before the Empire of the Incas, being Souldiers of Courage and Bravery, raiſed ſeparate Armies, and began each to ſet up for himſelf, and lay foundation for Authority and Power: But as Rule and Empire can bear no Equal, or Competitor, theſe two great Men turned their Arms one againſt the other, and continued a War during the whole courſe of their Lives: the which created ſuch animoſities between their People, that their Children inherited the like anger, and took up the ſame occaſion of Quarrel, which was never decided untill the Inca, Capac Yupanqui determined their differences.

For theſe People obſerving the conſtant miſeries of War, in which they were engaged, deſtroying one the other without advantage; for that their courage, and skill in war being equal, neither ſubmitted to the other, or reaped other benefit than deſolation, and the fatal conſequences of War; they therefore agreed with mutual conſent, and with concurrence of their Captains and Relations, to remit all their differences and quarrels to the ſole Arbitrement and determination of the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, reſolving to ſtand to whatſoever he ſhould ſentence in determination of Right, and accommodation of the Quarrels, and for moderating the heats and fury between them. Theſe terms being reſolved, they both deſired and courted the acquaintance of the Inca, whoſe Fame and Reputation for Juſtice and Equity, derived from his ancient Progenitors, and the great Actions which he had performed, with the aſſiſtence and help of his Father, the Sun, were publiſhed and made known to all thoſe Nations. One of theſe great Lords was called Cari, and the other Chipana, both which were the Names of their Fathers, and which each of them conſerved from Father to Son, ſucceſſively for many Generations, in remembrance of their Anceſtours, and for a motive to imitate and follow their Bravery and Valour. Pedro de Cieça in his Hiſtory touches this paſſage briefly, and calls one of theſe Curacas Cari, and the other Capana. Theſe Perſons having underſtood that the Inca proceeded in his Conqueſts, in all parts adjacent, diſpatched their Meſſengers, to render him a particular account of all the Wars, Differences and Diſputes which were between them, beſeeching him that he would be pleaſed to permit them licence to appear in his preſence, that they might kiſs his hands, and give him a more large relation of the grounds and cauſes of their Quarrels and Differences; being desirous to remit all their pretensions to the sole determination, and arbitrement of his Majesty, for in regard that he was descended from the Sun, they were assured of his Justice and Rectitude, and that his Sentences were infallible; and therefore protested that they would adhere unto and rest satisfied with whatsoever he should declare to be his Judgment and ultimate Decision in their Controversie.

The Inca having heard the Message, gave answer, That the Curacas might be pleased to come at such time as would best suit with their convenience, and that then he would use his best endeavours to bring them to a right understanding of each other; of which he did not entertain the least doubt, in regard that he, resolving to consult the Wisedom of his Father the Sun in their case, and apply his Ordinances and Laws to the present difference, the Judgment he should pronounce would be infallible, and uncapable of any Errour or Mistake.

This gratious Answer was very satisfactory to the Curacas, so that they both met before the Inca at the time appointed, and both at the same time cast themselves on their knees, and kissed his Hand, that neither might seem to have a preference before the other. Cari, whose Lands bordered neareſt on the frontiers of the Inca, was the first that had the privilege to speak in the name of them both, rendring a large account of the differences which were between them, and of the Original from whence they did arise; he declared, That their Quarrel was enflamed by Envy and Emulation, whensoever one observed the other to gain and advance in honour, and to be more prosperous than himself; sometimes Covetousness was the motive, when both designed on each others Territories; but most commonly the Boundaries and Limits of their respective Jurisdictions was the occasion of their Wars: For determination of which they presented themselves before his Majesty, humbly imploring his sacred Sentence and Arbitrement to determine those Wars, of which they were weary, and which had for many years wasted their Countries, to the great Misery and Desolation of each others People and Subjects. The Inca heard and received their Request with his accustomary gentleness and favour, and ordered that for the present two of his Captains, who were Incas, and ancient Counsellours, should severally take one of these Curacas into his charge and tuition, to teach and instruct him in the Laws of Nature, which were the Rules the Incas observed in the Government of their People, that so they might live in peace and unity, and giving unto every one his due and right, both in Estate and Honour. And as to the differences which arose about the Bounds and Extent of their respective Jurisdictions, he told them that he would send two Incas, who were of his Kindred, to take informations from the Curacas of the Provinces, concerning the Cause and Original of their long continued War and Quarrel. The which being performed, and the Inca maturely advised in every particular, he debated the matters with his Council, and then calling the Curacas before him, he told them in few words, That his Father the Sun had revealed unto him, that the onely way and means to reconcile these dissenting Parties, was to enjoin them to keep his Laws and Precepts, the design and intent of which was to conserve Peace and Concord in the World, and that since War produces nothing but Destruction, a proof and evidence whereof they had by their own, which had wasted each others force, they should now at length be advised to Peace, lest they both become a prey to some other, who observing their enfeebled and consumed condition, may take his opportunities to invade them in their weakness, and destroy them both: And as to the Limits of their respective Territories, he appointed that heaps of Stones, or Mounts should be cast up, for Land-marks and Boundaries of their Frontiers, which being passed and invaded in a hostile manner, should be accounted a breach and violation of the Peace on the side of the first Aggressor. Lastly, he told them, That this was the Sentence and final Determination of his Father the Sun, for procuring Peace, and ending all strife and variance between them; and that since they had by mutual consent constituted him the Umpire and Arbitrator of their Differences, he protested that he confirmed the Sentence of his Father, and resolved to proceed severely against him who should give the first occasion to violate the same.

The

The Curacas replied, That they would ſincerely obey his Majeſty, and that out of a reſpect they bore to his Service, they promiſed to be his true Friends and faithfull Allies.

Afterward theſe Caciques, Cari and Chipana, being in private together, entred into Diſcourſe concerning the Laws of the Inca, the Government of his Hou and Court, and the rare adminiſtration of Juſtice through his whole Kingdom, where no Injury or Offence paſſed without puniſhment; but more particularly they obſerved the gentle compulſion and ſoft violence he uſed in his War, as alſo the ſweetneſs of his temper, and Impartial Behaviour towards them both; all which being rare and admirable evidences of his Excellencies and Vertues, they both reſolved, after ſome ſhort conference together, to yield themſelves and Subjects to the Service and Devotion of the Inca. And hereunto they were more eaſily inclined, becauſe they perceived that the Inca began to approach near to them, and to have his Confines contiguous with their Frontiers, and therefore conſidered that it was good to make a Vertue of Neceſſity, and ſeem to doe that out of Choice and free Will, rather than by being compelled to what is irreſiſtible, looſe all the merit of a voluntary Submiſſion. With this Reſolution preſenting themſelves before the Inca, they implored His Majeſty's Protection, vowing unto him all Homage and Obedience, deſiring alſo that he would be pleaſed to ſend Inſtructors to them, who might direct them and their Subjects in the Laws of his Father the Sun, and inform them of all particulars which may be requiſite for his ſervice.

In anſwer whereunto the Inca told them, That he accepted their good Intentions, and would watch all occaſions to requite them; then he commanded that ſuch Veſts ſhould be given to the Caciques, as he himſelf wore, and to their Kindred and Attendance, Garments of a courſer Thread, for which they made many acknowledgments of Duty and Obligation. In this manner the Inca reduced thoſe ſeveral People and Provinces to his Empire, which within the Diviſion of Collaſuyu were ſubjected to the Dominion of thoſe Caciques. Moreover he added to theſe new Conqueſts the Countries of Poco, Ata, Muru, Maccha, Caracara, and all thoſe other Provinces which run as far Eaſtward as the great Mountain of Antis, together with all that waſte and deſart Countrey which reaches to the borders of that Province which is called Tapac-ri, and now by the Spaniards Tapacari, containing in breadth thirty Leagues; and by reaſon of the coldneſs of it is much unpeopled; howſoever it is fruitfull in paſtures, and abounds with all ſort of Cattel and wild Beaſts, and is full of Fountains; and particularly there is one Spring of Water, iſſuing from Mines of Sulphur, ſo hot, that none can ſuffer his hand in it for a moments ſpace; and yet what is ſtill more obſervable, there are other Springs, not far from thence, of cold and pleaſant Waters, both which meeting afterwards together, make that River, which is called Cochapampa.

Having traverſed this deſart Countrey, which abounds, (as we have ſaid) with Fountains and Paſtures, there appears a Mountain, which deſcends for ſeven Leagues, and leads to the plain of the Province Tapacri, where my Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega, had his firſt proportion allotted to him in the Lands of Peru: It is a Countrey very fruitfull and populous, ſtored with all ſorts of Cattel, for the ſpace of twenty Leagues in length, and about twelve in breadth: About eight Leagues farther, is that moſt pleaſant Province of Cochapampa, which is a Valley of thirty Leagues long, and four broad, all which is made fruitfull by a plentifull River, that waters the whole Countrey: Theſe two pleaſant Provinces, with divers others, were the inheritance of Cari and Chipana, (as before related) and were now added to the Dominion and Empire of the Incas, extending ſeventy Leagues in length.

In theſe parts, becauſe they were pleaſant and fertile, the Spaniards in the Year 1575. ſettled a Colony, which they called St. Peter of Cardenna, ſo named by the chief and firſt Planter thereof, who was a Gentleman, and a Native of Burgos, called Captain Lewis Oſorio.

The Matters of theſe two Caciques being in this manner ordered and diſpoſed, the Inca commanded two of his principal Officers to make a ſurvey of their Countries, and to take with them ſuch Perſons as were proper and able to govern thoſe new Subjects, and inſtruct and teach them in the Laws they were now to obſerve, ſerve. And thus the Inca having finiſhed this work, which he eſteemed ſufficient for that year, and more than was expected, he returned to Cozco, accompanied with the two Caciques, who were curious to ſee the ſplendor of the Indian Court, where they were kindly received, and treated with Banquets and Sports; and becauſe it was pleaſing to the Inca, the whole City endeavoured to honour and careſs them with all the demonſtrations imaginable of Civility and Reſpect. After ſome days thus paſſed, he gave them liberty to return into their own Dominions, being greatly ſatisfied with the entertainment they had received, and at their departure he gave them to underſtand, that he intended ſpeedily to viſit their Countries again, that ſo he might reduce thoſe Indians which inhabited the parts beyond them, and that therefore they ſhould make ſuch proviſions as were neceſſary for the ſupport and maintenance of his Army and Attendance.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Bridge made with Straw, Ruſhes and Flags; and how Chayanta was reduced at that place where the Lake empties it ſelf.

THE Inca, Capac Yupanqui, was ſo much pleaſed with the convenience and ſucceſs of the laſt Bridge, which (as we ſaid) was built at Huacachaca, over the River of Apurimac, that he ordered another of the like ſort to be made at that place where the Lake Titicaca empties it ſelf, that ſo it might be in a readineſs againſt the time that he intended to return to complete his Conqueſts in the Diviſion of Collaſuyu; and becauſe thoſe Countries were plain, and commodious for the march of an Army, the Incas were unquiet untill they could make a complete and entire Conqueſt of all that Diviſion. The Bridge of Huacachaca, as alſo all the others which are in Peru, are made of Oſier, onely that which paſſes the water called by the Spaniards, The Conduit, becauſe it is the vent by which the Lake empties it ſelf, is made of Flags and Ruſhes, and ſuch like materials: This paſſes over the water, as that at Seville, which is made upon Boats, and is not arched, as that we have formerly mentioned. There is a ſort of Ruſhes which grow over all Peru, that are of a fine and pliant ſort, convenient and eaſie to weave with, the Indians call them Yehu, which they uſe in thatching their Houſes. That ſort which grows in Collao is excellent feeding for the Cattel, and of which they make their Baskets and Hampers, like little Cheſts with covers, (called by them Patacas) and hereof alſo they make Cords and Ropes; the beſt ſort of theſe Ruſhes grows in the River which falls from the Lake Titicaca, whereof there is great abundance, as alſo of Flags and Bulruſhes, and a ſort called Enea. The Indians cut great quantities hereof, at the proper ſeaſons of the year, of which they make proviſions, to be dried and prepared for ſervice of the Bridge, as occaſions ſhall require. With theſe Ruſhes they twiſted four great Ropes, as big as a Man's Leg, two of which they caſt over the River, and faſtened them on each ſide: This water on the top or ſuperficies of it, ſeems ſtill and quiet, but towards the bottom runs with a ſtrong current, as ſome ſay that have made an experiment of it. Theſe Ropes, or Cables, which ſerve in the place of Boats, are covered with great bundles of Flags and Ruſhes, all twiſted and twined one within the other; and over theſe they throw the other two great Ropes, to keep down and ſtrengthen the whole work; over theſe Ropes they caſt great quantities of Ruſhes, twined into leſſer cords, about the bigneſs of a Man's Arme, woven one within the other, and made ſo firm and cloſe, that neither the trampling of Beaſts or the Feet of Men can break or diſorder them. Theſe ſmaller cords the Spaniards call the

the floar of the Bridge, which Bridge was about thirteen or fourteen Foot broad, and about a Yard thick, and about an hundred and fifty Paces in length; ſo that we may imagine what a vaſt quantity of Ruſhes is required for a work of this nature. It is moreover obſervable, that this Bridge requires reparations every ſix Months, or rather, to be made new, for the whole compoſition of it being nothing but Straw and Ruſhes, which are fading and decaying materials, muſt be often renewed, eſpecially the Ropes or Cables, which are the main traves of the work, muſt be maintained, and kept in good repair. This Bridge, as likewiſe all other publick conveniences, were in the times of the Incas kept up, and maintained at the charge and labour of the neighbouring Countries; ſo that many Hands making light work, and the materials provided from year to year, the good order obſerved, made it a matter without much trouble or difficulty. The end of theſe main Cables, which were the Foundation of this ſort of Bridge, were fixed in the ground, and not ſeiſed, or made faſt to Rocks of Stone, as ſome others were; and the Indians ſay, that this is the better invention, for that this Bridge may be removed, and carried either higher or lower on the River, as occaſion requires.

The Bridge being thus made and completed, the Inca, with his eldeſt Son and Heir, departed from Cozco, travelling by ſhort journies, untill they arrived at the remoteſt parts of thoſe Provinces which belonged to Cari and Chipana, being thoſe Countries which we formerly mentioned by the names of Tapacri and Cochapampa, where the Caciques attended in a readineſs with their Souldiers to receive the Inca. From Cochapampa they proceeded forward to Chayanta, and in their way thither they paſſed a moſt deſolate and barren Countrey, where is not one Foot of good Ground, but onely Stones and Rocks; and which produces nothing but Buſhes bearing Thorns, as long as a Man's finger, and which the Indians uſe for Needles to ſow the poor Drapery they wear; and which ſort of Thorn grows common in all parts of Peru: Having paſſed this deſart, which contains about twenty Leagues in length, and about as much in breadth, they entred into Chayanta; where the Inca commanded the Prince his Son to ſend the Summons which were uſual, and accuſtomary to the Inhabitants of that Province.

At the receipts of theſe Summons the Indians were divided into different opinions; ſome were for preſent Submiſſion and Obedience to this celeſtial Race which was deſcended from the Sun, being aſſured all thoſe Laws which were given and impoſed by ſuch an infallible Light, could not be other than juſt, gentle, and ſuch as tended rather to the Liberty and Security of the Subjects, than to the Intereſt and Advantage of the Governour. Howſoever others that were of a different ſentiment, and more ſtubborn in their humour, argued, That they had no need of a King, or new Laws, ſince that thoſe which they had already were good and profitable, and ſuch as their Anceſtours had lived under with great happineſs and ſecurity; that they had Gods already of their own, whom they worſhipped and ſerved, and knew no neceſſity that there was of a new Religion, or Cuſtoms; and what was moſt grievous, that they muſt ſubmit to the pleaſure of a Prince, who preached Religion and Sanctity to them, and made them promiſes of Privilege and Liberty; whenas perhaps to morrow, ſo ſoon as he had gained them under his power, he would then impoſe ſuch Laws as were ſlaviſh and agreeable to his own Luſt and Pleaſure; and therefore they concluded, that it was better not to truſt to ſuch a hazard, but rather to live in their own freedom, or elſe die in the defence of it.

In this Suſpence matters remained for ſome days, both parties inſiſting on the truth of their opinions, untill at length the fear of compulſion from the Inca, and the hopes of receiving good and wholſome Laws from him, extorted an anſwer which was dubious, and ſavouring ſomething of both opinions; for they declared that they were willing to receive the Inca for their King and Lord, but as to his Laws, they were ignorant of them, not knowing whether they conduced to their Benefit or Damage; untill which time, that they were informed of the ſubſtance and form of them, they deſired a ceſſation of Arms, and of all violence, and that the Inca, with his Army, might enter into their Countrey upon parole, that in caſe his Laws proved not to their contentment, that then he would quit his ſtation, and leave them to their own freedom and liberty; but if they appeared as good as he avouched and affirmed them to be, that then immediately they would would ſubmit and proſtrate themſelves before him, and acknowledge him to be of the true race and progeny of the Sun.

Though this people was in no capacity of giving conditions to the Inca, yet he was pleaſed to accept ſuch as they offered; being reſolved to adhere to the old Maxim of his Anceſtours, which was rather to conquer with love and affection, than by force; and therefore he aſſured them on his word, that in caſe they did not think to adore his Father the Sun, nor yet to accept his Laws, he would then leave them to their own choice and freedom: The which promiſe he made on an undoubted confidence, that ſo ſoon as thoſe Myſteries and excellent Statutes were revealed to them, they could not but accept and embrace them; and that they would onely be troubled, that ſuch admirable beauty of reaſon arrived ſo late to their hearing and knowledge.

Upon this aſſurance and promiſe the Inca entred into Chayanta, where he was received with much awe and veneration, but not with that mirth and rejoycing as they uſed in other parts at this Solemnity: For as yet theſe poor people ſtood wavering between hope and fear, untill the Reverend Counſellours deputed by the Inca, with the Prince his Son and Heir, took ſome pains for ſeveral days to declare, and expound to them the Laws relating to their Idolatrous Religion, and to their Secular Government: the which they inculcated ſo frequently, and with ſuch patience and plainneſs, untill at length they became capable of that Doctrine which they taught. The Indians ſtood gaping all this while with wonderfull attention, admiring that ſuch Laws ſhould be made for their honour and advantage; and then burſt out into Acclamations, ſaying, That worthy were they to be accounted Gods, and eſteemed for Lords of the Univerſe, who were able to frame and deliver ſuch Laws and Statutes to Mankind; the which they promiſed to receive and obey; and that renouncing all their former Idols, rites and vain cuſtoms, they vowed and ſwore to embrace the Religion of the Inca; and in token thereof they proſtrated themſelves before the Prince, who repreſented the Perſon of his Father the Sun, and the Inca, Capac Yupanqui.

Having thus yielded themſelves in a ſolemn manner, they fell to Dancing after the faſhion of their Countrey, ſhewing ſome new Dances which they had purpoſely made for the entertainment of the Incas; and all people habited themſelves in their beſt cloathes, with Tinſel and Ribbons, ſinging Ballads made in honour and praiſe of the Sun, and the Incas, and of their good Laws and Government; and in fine, they made all the demonſtrations of love and affection imaginable.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the many Inventions which the Indians made to paſs Rivers, and to take Fiſh.

HAving already mentioned the two ſeveral ſorts of Bridges, which the Incas made for paſſing Rivers; one of which was compoſed of Oſiers, and the other of Ruſhes and Canes. We ſhall now proceed to declare ſome other Inventions which the Indians projected for the ſame purpoſe; for in regard the labour and charge of making Bridges was ſo great, that they were onely made for convenience of the great Roads and the King's High-ways; and that the Countrey being in other places large and wide, wanted that convenience whereby the people might maintain communication one with the other; wherefore Neceſſity, which is the Mother of Ingenuity, taught them ſeveral contrivances according to the diſpoſition and nature of the Rivers, as alſo how to ſwim on the Seas with ſuch floats, as ſerved their preſent occaſions; for they had not as yet attained to the the Invention of Boats, or ſuch Canoes, as they uſe in Florida, or the Iſles of Barlovento, and other places of the Main Land, which are a ſort of Troughs hewed out of Timber, and are all of one piece: but the Wood in Peru is not fit for this uſe, being ſappy, and heavy as Iron, and therefore not boyant, as the nature of ſuch floats require: Wherefore they made choice of another ſort, of a more light and ſpungy Timber, which grows in the Provinces of Quitu, from whence, by order of the Inca, many Trees were felled, and brought down to the banks of the Rivers. Hereof they made all their Boats greater or leſſer, ſome of them were of five, others of ſeven pieces of Wood, which ſerved for the bottom, tied one to the other, that in the middle being the biggeſt: The firſt Boards on the ſide were ſomething ſhorter than thoſe of the Keel; the ſecond above were ſhorter, and the third ſhorter than thoſe below; that ſo that being pinched in above, and not all of the ſame breadth, the Veſſel would find leſs reſiſtence in its motion through the Water; and the Stern and the Head of the Boat were both of the ſame faſhion: To both the ends of theſe Boats they faſtned a Cord, ſo that Paſſengers being deſirous to Ferry over, they drew the Cord on one ſide; and being to return, they drew that which was faſtned to the other. I remember that I paſſed a River in one of theſe Ferries; which becauſe it had been made in a time when the Incas reigned, the people accounted it a Relique, and had it in great eſteem and veneration.

Beſides theſe Ferries, they have other leſſer Boats more manageble, made of Canes and Reeds cloſely woven, and ſhaped upwards ſharp, like the Prow of a Boat, that they may with leſs reſiſtence cut the Water: the Mid-ſhips are made broad, and wide, and capacious to receive the Loading: One of theſe Boats is governed by a ſingle Indian, who places himſelf at the Stern, and lying on his breaſt with his hands and feet on each ſide in the water inſtead of Oars, he Sculls and Steers along with the current to the place he deſigns: If the current be very rapid, they row along the bank of the River to take the advantage of a hundred paces upwards, making account that the ſwiftneſs of the ſtream will carry them 200 paces downwards before they can reach the other ſide: When a Paſſenger Ferries over, they order him to lye flat on his face, ſtretched at length in the Boat, with his face towards the Ferry-man, and to hold himſelf faſt by the Cords, and by no means to riſe or ſtir, or ſo much as open his eyes. I once croſſed a very ſwift current in one of theſe Boats, which is ſomething hazardous; (though on ſmooth and ſtill waters there is no danger) I then remember that the Ferry-man conjured me with all the Loves in the World, that I would neither lift up my head, nor open my eyes: I being then but a Boy, was ſo affrighted, that I thought either the Earth would ſink, or the Heavens fall: Howſoever, I could not for my life but lift up my head, and open at leaſt one of my eyes to ſee if there were any enchantment, or ſome diſcovery of a New World in the matter; and being in the middle, I lifted up my head a little, and ſeeing the water round, me-thoughts we had fallen from Heaven above; and I became ſo giddy, that my brains turned, and ſwam faſter than the Boat, which was carried with a very rapid and violent ſtream; ſo that I preſently ſhut my eyes again, and confeſſed that the Boat-man had much reaſon for the caution he gave me.

They have likewiſe another ſort of Float made of large Gourds, joined and faſtned ſtrongly together, about the bigneſs of a Yard and a half ſquare: Hereunto they fit a Rope in faſhion of a Poitral to a Horſe's Saddle, wherein the Indian Boat-man puts his head; with which ſwimming away, he Tows the Boat after him with her Lading, untill he paſſes to the other ſide of the River, or Arme of the Sea; and if the Lading be heavy, ſo that the Boat draws much water, he is then aſſiſted by an Indian or two more, who puſh at the Stern, and drive the Boat forward.

But in thoſe great Rivers, where the current is very forcible and rapid, ſo that they are not paſſable in theſe Boats of Gourds or Ruſhes; and where alſo the banks of the River are ſo rocky, that there is no place to Land either on one ſhore or the other: there they make uſe of their great Cables made of Canes, called Chahuar, which they throw over from the higher parts of the craggy places, faſtening them to great Trees or firm Rocks: Within this great Cable they put a Caſe, or Basket made of Oſiers, capable to receive three or four perſons; to each end whereof they fix an Ear, or handle of Wood, through which they paſs the Cords for drawing it from one ſide to the other; and in regard the Cable is very large, it hath a mighty ſwing and fall in the middle; and therefore they lore the Ropes of the Basket very eaſily, and by degrees, untill it comes to the middle, which is the loweſt part of the Cable; and thence by main force they draw it upwards. There are certain Indians who live near that place, and are appointed by the Countrey for that work, and are very aſſiſtant and helpfull to Paſſengers without any conſideration of intereſt, or payment whatſoever. Some Paſſengers who have uſed that kind of Ferry, putting their legs and feet in the basket, have without other help than their armes and hands onely forced themſelves upwards upon the Cable. I remember, when I was a Boy, that I paſſed this way three or four times; but being very young, the Indians carried me on their backs; in the ſame manner they tranſport their Cattel on the other ſide; but this is done with much more trouble: For but few of them can paſs at a time, and thoſe of the leſſer ſort, ſuch as Sheep, Goats and Kids, which they tye faſt within the basket; and as for Mules, Horſes, Aſſes or Cows, they are of too great a burthen for this ſort of Ferry, but are driven about to the great Bridges, or to ſhallower places, where the River is fordable. This kind of paſſage the Indians call Uruga, and is onely made uſe of by the Countrey people, that have occaſion to paſs from one ſide to the other; but in the great Roads the convenience is better.

The Indians all along the Coaſt of Peru, Fiſh in their little Boats made of Ruſhes, and adventure four or five Leagues out at Sea in them, and farther if occaſion require; for that Sea is called the Pacifick, being calm for the moſt part, and not ſubject to bad weather; but when they carry things of great burthen, they uſe Floats made of Timber. The Fiſher-men, when they go to Sea, kneel down in their Boats, and ſit on their legs, and ſo row with a Paddle made of a large Cane, cleft towards the end; for in that Countrey they have great Canes, which are as big as a Man's thigh; of which we ſhall treat more largely hereafter. This Cane they hold with both hands, one being placed at the top, and the other in the middle; and the end being made broad in the ſhape of an Oar, they Row their Boat forward; the Boat being very light, feels every ſtroke of the Oar, and turns, then they change the hand to the other ſide, and ſo ſhift it over again, which moves the Boat with an incredible ſwiftneſs.

Then for their Fiſhery, when they go to take great Fiſh, they uſe a Fiſgig in the ſame manner as they ſtrike Whales with in Biſcay. To this Fiſgig, which is a ſharp Spear at the end of a Staff, they faſten a line of about 20, 30 or 40 fathom in length, the end of which they tye to the head of the Boat; the Fiſh being ſtrook, the Indian vears his Line, and gives him Rope as faſt as he can; and when he hath given it all out, he then plays with the Fiſh untill it is quite tired; and ſo maſtering it, they take it, and ſome of them are of an incredible bigneſs. They Fiſh alſo with Nets and Hooks; but they make no great matter of their Fiſhing in that manner; for their Nets being ſmall and manageable by one Man, can never incloſe any number; and their Hooks being ill made, not knowing the uſe of Steel or Iron, they take very few with that Art; for though they have Mines of both Metals, yet they know not how to ſeparate and purifie the Ore: Their Boats of Ruſhes are not able to bear Sail, becauſe they have no Keel, nor hold in the water, and perhaps make better way with a Paddle, than with a Sail; though on their Floats made of Wood, they ſet up a Sail, which ſerves them before the Wind.

Theſe are the Arts which the Indians have invented for making ſhort Voyages on the Seas, and for paſſing ſwift and rapid currents; the which have received little improvement, for they were in uſe when I was there, and believe they have ſtill continued in the ſame manner without alteration; for they being a poor ſort of miſerable people, of mean dejected ſpirits, follow the old road, not aſpiring to greater matters, than a ſupply of their neceſſities. In the Hiſtory of Florida, the ſixth Book, treating there of their Canoes, we have touched upon their contrivances to Paſs and Navigate on Rivers, which have a ſwift and rapid current; ſo that now we ſhall not enlarge farther thereupon, but rather proceed to the other Conqueſts of the Inca, Capac Yupanqui.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Conqueſt of five large Provinces, beſides others of leſs conſideration.

THE Inca having ſecured the Countrey of Chayanta with a ſufficient force and ſupplied it with Officers requiſite for adminiſtration both of their religious and civil Government. He proceeded forward to other adjacent Provinces, amongſt which Charca was of great Renown, comprehending many different Nations and Languages under its Dominion; all which were in the Diviſion of Collaſuyu: The chief or principal Countries of which were Tutura, Sipiſpo, Chaqui; to the Eaſtward of which, and towards the Mountain Antis, are other Provinces called Chamuru, where grows great plenty of the Herb which they call Cuca, though it be not ſo good as that which grows about Cozco. There is alſo another Province named Sacaca, with divers more, which for brevity ſake we omit; to all which the Inca ſent his Summons in his accuſtomary form and manner.

Theſe ſeveral Nations, who had already been informed of all the particulars which had paſſed in Chayanta, returned their anſwers much after the ſame manner; the ſubſtance of all which was, That it was their great honour to have the knowledge of ſo holy a Religion, as that which enjoined them to adore the Sun, and to ſerve the Inca, who was deſcended from him; and that they had the privilege to be offered ſuch good and wholſome Laws for their Government: And therefore deſiring his Majeſty to receive them under his potent Protection, they reſigned up their lives and fortunes to his diſpoſal; and in regard, that having received new Laws and ſuperſtitious Rites, differing from thoſe of their adjacent Neighbours, they ſtood in great danger of having their Apoſtacy revenged by them; they therefore deſired, that thoſe people alſo might be reduced, and obliged to embrace the ſame Laws, Religion and Worſhip with them.

The Inca returned them anſwer, That they ſhould not need to trouble themſelves for thoſe matters, but that they ſhould rather with entire confidence remit all their care unto him, who knew the times and ways beſt for their protection, being aſſured that their ſubjection to him was their beſt ſecurity, and that none had ever ſuffered for receiving his Laws and Vaſſalage, but rather lived with joy and comfort under thoſe infallible Oracles which the Sun had gratiouſly diſpenſed to them. With theſe aſſurances this people, without other Queries or Demurs, yielded themſelves; on which particulars we ſhall not farther enlarge, in regard nothing of moment offers on that ſubject. In this Conqueſt the Inca ſpent two, and ſome ſay three years; and having left Guards ſufficient in the Countrey to curb and prevent all Incurſions of the Neighbourhood, he returned to Cozco, viſiting in his way all thoſe Nations which had formerly ſubmitted themſelves; he commanded the Prince his Son to take another way, that ſo he might pleaſe his Subjects in other parts, who eſteemed themſelves highly honoured with the preſence of their Kings and Princes.

The Entry which the Inca made to his Court was very Magnificent and Royal, being attended by his own Captains, and with the Curacas of the late ſubjected Provinces, who out of honour to the Inca, and curioſity to ſee the Imperial Court, made up ſome part of his Equipage; and the people with Demonſtrations of Joy and Triumph were not wanting to welcome the return of their Inca. Some few days after the Prince Rocca likewiſe came, whoſe Arrival the people alſo celebrated with Dances and Songs in praiſe of his Noble and Victorious Actions. Then the Inca having gratified his Commanders for their pains and faithfulneſs in the late Expedition, he gave them leave to return to their own Houſes, there to enjoy repoſe and reſt after their long and tedious journies; and reſiding now at his own Court, he attended to the government and adminiſtration of thoſe matters which reſpected the happineſs and advantage of his Subjects; for his Territories were now become very large, extending from Cozco along the Coaſt of that Sea which is called Zur, above one hundred and eighty Leagues as far as Tutyra and Chaqui; then to the Weſtward from the City, the Dominion reached ſeventy Leagues one way, and eighty another: and to the Eaſtward it ran to the River Paucar tampu, being thirteen Leagues full Eaſt from the City; and to the South-eaſt forty Leagues; ſo that the Empire being grown thus large and wide, the Inca thought fit for ſome time to fix boundaries to his Conqueſts, that ſo he might attend to the conſervation of what he had already gained, and to the benefit and ſecurity of his Subjects: And now living for ſome years in peace and plenty, he had leiſure to enrich and adorn the Temple of the Sun, and of thoſe ſelected Virgins which the Inca, Manco Capac, had endowed: he alſo built many other Edifices, both within and without the City, and in divers Provinces, where they were moſt to advantage. He made likewiſe Aqueduct, and opened Springs for watering the grounds; he built divers Bridges to paſs Rivers and Streams, to the great convenience of publick Roads; he opened divers new ways for commodious travel, and for better communication of one Province with another. In ſhort, he omitted nothing which might conduce to the publick benefit, to the advantage of his Subjects, and to the greater Glory and Grandeur of his own Majeſty.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Prince Inca Rocca reduces many and great Provinces, both within the Land, and along the Sea-coaſt.

IN theſe, and ſuch like Affairs, the Inca employed himſelf, for the ſpace of ſix or ſeven years; and then it was judged fit to reaſſume again the thoughts of War, for the farther enlargement of Empire; to which end orders were given for raiſing an Army of twenty thouſand men, under the conduct of four Major Generals, and of the Prince Rocca, who was to command in Chief: The Deſign was to march towards Chinchaſuyu, which lies Northward from Cozco; on which ſide their Dominions did not reach farther than Rimac tampu, which was not above ſeven Leagues, and was the utmoſt Bounds in thoſe Quarters to which the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, had proceeded; ſince which time the other Incas did not eſteem it worthy the troubles of a Conqueſt, being a Countrey deſolate, rocky and without Inhabitants.

The Prince leaving Cozco, came to the River Apurimac, which he paſſed on great floats, prepared for that purpoſe; and becauſe the Countrey was deſolate, he proceeded as far as Curahuaci, and Amancay being about eight or ten Leagues from the City, and without any oppoſition reduced all thoſe poor Indians whereſoever he paſſed. From the Province Amancay he took to the left hand along the great road, which leads from Cozco to Rimac, and leaving the Deſart which is called Cochacaſſa, being about twenty two Leagues over, he entred into the Province called Sura, which is very populous, and rich, both in Gold and Cattel, and where the Inca was received with ready ſubmiſſion. Thence he proceeded to the next Province, called Apucara, where alſo he was received without oppoſition; for in regard theſe Countries were always at enmity together, they were not able to unite in a common League, nor yet reſiſt in a ſingle condition.

From Apucara he marched forward to the Province Rucana, which is divided into two parts, the leſſer and the greater: The People hereof are both beautifull in their Bodies, and ingenious in their Minds, by advantage of which they more eaſily apprehended the felicity they ſhould obtain under the Government of the Inca, and therefore with joy and applauſe received his Commands. Thence he deſcended to the Sea Coaſt, which the Spaniards call the Launes, and paſſed the firſt Valley, which in thoſe parts hath the name of Nanaſca, which ſignifies doleſull, or diſmal; what might be the occaſion of this Epithet, is not certain, but it is believed that it might be from ſome great puniſhment, or calamity, which had happened there; the Spaniards call it Lanaſca, where alſo the Inca was received without oppoſition, and obeyed without conditions; the like ſubmiſſion was yielded by the Inhabitants of all the Vallies from Nanaſca to Arequepa, which lies by the Sea-coaſt for the ſpace of above eighty Leagues in length, and fourteen or fifteen in breadth: the chief Valleys are Hacari and Camata, containing twenty thouſand Inhabitants; there are other Vallies of leſs conſideration, which are Atica, Ucunna, Atiquipa and Quellca, all which yielded ready Obedience, both becauſe they neither had force to reſiſt, being a poor naked People, and becauſe every Valley had its particular Lord, and ſome of them two or three, amongſt whom were perpetual Quarrels and Diſſentions.

And ſince we are now treating of thoſe places, it will not ſeem an improper Digreſſion, though perhaps out of its due order, if we ſhould recount a remarkable paſſage, which happened in the Valley of Hacari, ſome time after that the Spaniards were Maſters of it. The occaſion was this: Two Curacas, who had not as yet been baptized, were greatly at variance together, about the Limits or Bounds of their Juriſdictions, which increaſed ſo high, that they often endeavoured to decide the Difference in Battel; to prevent which, the Spaniſh Governours ſent a Commiſſioner to them, with power to determine, and put a final end to their Diſputes by a friendly and amicable Compoſure: The Judge, or Umpire, having heard both ſides, allotted unto each ſuch Boundaries as he thought did of right belong unto them, reſpectively obliging them to maintain Peace and Friendſhip together; which though they promiſed to doe, one of them who thought himſelf injured and aggrieved by this Diviſion, concealed his paſſion and intention to Revenge under the ſpecious appearance of Friendſhip: for the Day being come, when the Solemnities of the Peace were to paſs, they both ate and drank together; the Banquet being ended, the offended Curaca aroſe, and taking two Cups in his hand, filled with Liquour, as if he intended to drink a Health to the confirmation of their Friendſhip, (as the cuſtome amongſt the Indians is) he offered one of the Cups, which was prepared with poiſon, to his Enemy, reſerving the other, which was wholſome, for himſelf; but the other Curaca obſerving ſome change in the Countenance of him who made him the offer, and a Diſſatisfaction in the terms he received, refuſed the Cup which he reached to him, deſiring rather to have the other which he reſerved for himſelf. The Curaca, not to ſeem cowardly, or to offer that which he refuſed himſelf, was eaſily perſuaded to change his hands, and with that reached to his Enemy the wholſome Cup, and without difficulty drank up the Poiſon himſelf; of which dying in a few hours after, he gave a ſufficient evidence, that the Draught was not more deadly than the Poiſon of his own Rage and Malice, with which he ſwelled and burſt.

CHAP. XIX.

How Colonies were tranſplanted from parts on the Sea Coaſt to the Inland Countries.

FRom Nanaſca the Inca tranſlated ſome Indians, who were Incas of that Nation, to plant themſelves on the River Apurimac, becauſe that the Climate of that Region, from Cozco to Rimac, being very hot, agreed beſt with the Temperament or Conſtitution of the People of Nanaſca, whoſe Countrey was in the ſame degree of heat with that of Apurimac, whenas on the contrary, the People which were tranſplanted from the Deſart, which is a more cool and moderate Climate, were ſubject to Diſeaſes and Calentures, and not able to ſupport the intolerable heats; for which reaſon the Incas in the eſtabliſhment of their Colonies, had always a reſpect to the Conſtitution of the People, that ſo they might not paſs from one Extreme to another, but that their new Habitation might correſpond in ſome degree with the Air of their native Soil. This regard the Inca having always to his Colonies, the People which he planted on the Banks of the River Apurimac, were extracted from the hotter Climates; but there was no need of great numbers for this occaſion, becauſe that moſt of the Land on both ſides of that River is rocky and barren; onely there are ſome pieces of good ground, which the Inca was deſirous to have manured in the manner of Gardens, and places of Pleaſure; becauſe that ſoil which borders on the River, produces moſt excellent and rare Fruit.

Matters being ſettled in this poſture, and every thing eſtabliſhed in due order, relating to the Government of the new acquired Provinces, the Prince Rocca returned to Cozco, where he was kindly received by his Father, and the whole Court, and being then to disband his forces, he diſmiſſed the Commanders with ſignal marks of his Favour and Eſteem.

And now the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, finding himſelf to decay with Years, and to enter into a Region of Life, which required eaſe and repoſe, he reſolved to put a full ſtop to the enlargement of his Conqueſts, and onely ſpend the remainder of his Days in the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, and performing matters tending to the Benefit and Advantage of his People. In this eaſineſs ſeveral years paſſed, during which time the Inca performed the part of a kind and indulgent Prince, and the People of loving and loyal Subjects, who with all readineſs and affection applied themſelves to the ſervice of the Inca; particularly in building the Temple of the Sun, and erecting other Edifices, wherein they ſhewed great willingneſs and diligence, becauſe they were works recommended to them by the Inca; moreover they of their own accord, within the Diviſion of every Province, built other Houſes for the Convenience and Divertiſement of the Inca.

In this Proſperity and Eaſe the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, died, with the Character of a valiant and able Prince, and worthy of the Title Capac, which cauſed him to be much lamented in the Court, and in all parts of his Kingdom, with deep Reſentments; he was afterwards embalmed, and interred in the Sepulchre of his Fathers. He left for his Heir and Succeſſour Rocca, his Eldeſt Son, which he had by Coya Mama Curi-yllpa, his Wife and Siſter; he left alſo many other Sons and Daughters, as well natural as legitimate, the preciſe number of which we cannot determine, though ſome ſay, that they were above Eighty, which is not much, for ſome of theſe Incas have arrived to a hundred, ſome two hundred, nay ſome are confidently reported to have had three hundred Sons and Daughters.

CHAP. XX.

The Description of the Temple of the Sun, and of its great Riches.

THE principal Idol in esteem both with the Inca and his Subjects, was the Imperial City of Cozco it self, which the Indians adored as a sacred Relique, both because it was founded by the first Inca, Manco Capac, and because it was the Repository of innumerable Trophies acquired by Victory, and was the Seat and Throne of the Incas, who were esteemed for Gods. This superstition appeared in every little instance; for in case two Indians of equal quality did but meet on the way, one coming from Cozco, and the other travelling thither; he that came from thence, gave always the first salutation, and the upper hand to him who was going thither; and if he, who had been at this City, was ever after esteemed by his Neighbours as a Pilgrim or a Holy Man, how much more was he to be reverenced, who was a Citizen, or Native of the place: And in pursuance of this humour and opinion, whatsoever was said to come from Cozco, though it were but Lentils or Seeds, and did not surpass others of like kind in its Excellency, yet it had always the pre-eminence, and was thought an impiety to think or judge otherwise. To keep up this fancy and belief in the people, the Incas laboured to adorn and enoble the City with many Sumptuous Edifices and Royal Palaces, many of which they built for their own use, as we shall hereafter declare, when we come to describe the publick Buildings, amongst which there is none comparable to the Temple of the Sun, which was enriched with incredible Wealth; to which every Inca particularly added something, and improved and perfected that which his Predecessour had left deficient. The Riches of that Temple were so immense, that I should not adventure to describe them, did I not find them mentioned in all the Spanish Histories of Peru; but neither what they have wrote, nor I delivered, are able to reach the vastness of that real Wealth. The Building of this Temple is esteemed the Work of the King Yupanqui, the Great Grandfather of Huayna Capac; not that he was the Founder of it, having received its beginning from the first Inca, but because he completed the Adornment of it, and exalted it to those immense Riches and Majesty in which the Spaniards found it.

Now to describe this Temple; it is to be noted, that that place which was the Chamber of the Sun, is now the Church of the Divine St. Dominick; but because I have not the exact measures of the length and breadth of it, I omit to mention it at gues; onely that how large soever it be, it is all made of Freeze-stone well polished.

The High Altar (which for our better understanding we call by that Name, though the Indians knew not how to erect an Altar) is placed at the East-side; the Roof was flat, made of lofty Timber; but the Covering was thatched with Straw, because their Art arrived not to make other. All the four Walls of the Temple were Wainscoated from the top to the bottom, with Panes and Frames of Wood all over guilded: In the upper place, where we seat the High Altar, was the Figure of the Sun drawn upon a Plate of Gold, much broader and thicker than the Boards which covered the Walls; this Figure represented the Face of the Sun in a round shape, with all his Rays and Emissions of Fire, and Light proceeding from him much in the same manner as our Painters draw him: The Figure was so great and large, that it took up all the Quarter of the Temple, from one Wall to another: Besides this Representation of the Sun, the Indians erected no other Idols in their Temples, because they did not acknowledge, nor adore any other Gods, though ſome Writers maintain a different opinion. When the Spaniards firſt entred the City of Cozco, this Figure of the Sun fell to the lot of a certain Nobleman called Macio Serra de Leguiçano, whom I knew, and left there alive, when I came thence for Spain; he was ſo great a Gameſter at * Primero, and all other Games; that though the Image was very great, yet he made a ſhift to loſe it in one Nights play; whence that Proverb came, as Acoſta ſays, Play for the Sun before the Day breaks. Sometime after which, the Common-Council of the City taking notice, how much this Son or Member of theirs was given to play, and how much he loſt, thought fit, as the beſt expedient to wean him from that Vice, to chuſe him Alcalde, or Chief Juſtice in Ordinary, for the ſpace of a year: In execution of which employment he applied himſelf with ſo much diligence and care in the diſcharge of his truſt, that being a Gentleman of excellent parts, he took not a Card in hand for the whole year following; the City obſerving this his active diligence, continued him in Office for a year longer, and afterwards kept him conſtantly employed in one publick charge or other; ſo that this Macio Serra diſuſing his courſe of Gaming, came at length to abhor it, calling to mind the many dangers, troubles and inconveniences to which it had betrayed him; which ſerves as a pregnant example to demonſtrate to us, how much idleneſs contributes to Vice, and employment unto Vertue. But to return to our Hiſtory, we ſay, that a Calculate may in ſome meaſure be made of the Riches of that City, when an Image of Gold of that proportion and value fell to the lot and ſhare of one ſingle perſon. On each ſide of this Image the Bodies of the dead Incas were placed, embalmed with ſuch rare Art (we know not how) that they ſeemed ſtill living: their poſtures were ſitting on Chairs of Gold, erected on thoſe very Frames of Gold on which they uſually ſate when they were alive: their Faces were turned towards the people; onely Huayna Capac, as if he had merited a ſupereminence over all the others, was placed with his Face towards the Figure of the Sun, as if he had been the moſt beloved, and greateſt Favourite of all his Race; and indeed his Vertues and Royal Endowments, which appeared in him from his Infancy, were ſuch, as procured for him a degree above the reſt, and a place amongſt the Gods which they adored. Theſe Bodies, with what Treaſure they were able, the Indians concealed in ſuch ſecret Vaults, that none of them came to appear untill this year of 1559, when the Licenciado Polo made a diſcovery of five of them, three whereof were Kings, and the other two were Queens.

* A Game at Cards.

The principal Gate opened to the North, as it is at preſent; beſides which there were ſeveral other ſmall Doors for better convenience of the Temple; all which were lined on the inſide with Plates of Gold, as alſo the Jambs or Poſts of the Doors. On the top of the Temple without, on the higheſt Wall, was a large Circle of Gold in form of a Crown, of above a Yard in breadth, which encompaſſed the whole Temple.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Cloiſters of the Temple, and of the ſeveral Chambers of the Moon and Stars, Thunder and Lightning, and of the Rain-bow.

FRom the Temple there is a paſſage into the Cloiſters, which are encompaſſed with four Walls, one of which is the Wall of the Temple: the top of this Cloiſter is ſpread with a Cieling of Gold, of about a Yard in breadth, and was the Ornament and Crown aloft; but the Spaniards afterwards deſpoiled the Roof of the Gold, and in place and memory thereof laid a Cieling of white Plaſter; the which, when I departed thence, was ſtill white and freſh, and the Walls ſound and ſtanding as formerly. The Provoſt, or Maſter of this Cloiſter, had five large Chambers ſquare allowed him for his Lodgings, not contiguous, or joyning one to the other, but ſeparate and apart, being covered in form of a Pyramid, and which made the other three Walls of the Cloiſter.

One of theſe ſquare Chambers was dedicated to the Moon, whom they ſtyled the Wife of the Sun, and therefore was neareſt to the principal Chapel of the Temple; all the ſides within, as alſo the Doors were Plated with Silver, for the better correſpondence and reſemblance with the colour of the Moon, whoſe Image was alſo erected in Silver, with the face of a Woman, and placed in the ſame manner as that of the Sun. Into this Chamber they did uſually enter to make their viſits to the Moon, and recommend themſelves to her favour; for that ſhe being the Siſter and Wife of the Sun, was conſequently the Mother of the Incas, and of all their generation; wherefore they called her Mamaquilla, which ſignifies as much as Mother-Moon, to whom they offered Sacrifices as they did to the Sun. On each ſide of this Image they placed the Bodies of the dead Queens, according to their Order and Seniority. Onely Mama Ocllo, who was the Mother of Huayna Capac, had the chief place, being ſeated neareſt, and with her face juſt oppoſite to the Moon; in regard, that having been the Mother of a Son ſo excellent and famous, did ſeem to have merited the primary place of Honour.

The Chamber next hereunto was dedicated to Venus the Evening-Star, and the other ſeven Stars, and to all the other Stars in general. The Star Venus they called Chaſca, which is as much as to ſay, long and curled Locks; they named this Star the Page of the Sun, becauſe it always attended on him, going ſometimes before, and ſometimes after him; for the ſeven Stars they entertained a particular reſpect, becauſe of the ſtrangeneſs of their poſition, and their equal proportion: Theſe Stars they fanſied to be the Attendants and Hand-maids to the Moon; and for that reaſon they lodged them in the Lobby, or Chamber next to her, that ſo they might be near, and the place more commodious for their ſervice; for they were of opinion, that the Stars were Attendants belonging to the Court of the Moon, and not of the Sun, becauſe they appeared in the Night onely, and vaniſhed ſo ſoon as the Morning dawned, and the Sun aroſe.

This Chamber had its Walls and Doors all plated with Silver like that of the Moon; the Roof was painted like a Starry Sky, full of Stars of the greater and leſſer Magnitude.

The next Chamber hereunto was dedicated to the Lightning, Thunder and Thunder-bolt, which three they comprehended under one common Name of Yllapa, and the diſtinction of them was denoted by the Adjunct Verb: As for example; when they ſay, Did you ſee the Yllapa? then they mean Lightning; or did you hear the Yllapa? then it is Thunder; or did you ſee where the Yllapa fell, or the damage it did? then they underſtand the Thunder-bolt.

All which they did not eſteem for Gods, but regarded them as Servants of the Sun, as the Ancients did, who fanſied the Thunderbolt to be the Arms of Jupiter; and for that reaſon they allotted them Lodgings in the Temple of the Sun, the which were adorned all over with Gold: howſoever they formed no Statue or Repreſentation of them, becauſe they knew not how to decypher any Similitude or Hieroglyphick to expreſs them: This triple ſignification of Yllapa the Spaniſh Hiſtorians have not underſtood, for if they had, they might have made a proper uſe of it, in making our word Trinity more intelligible to the capacity of the Indians, than by ſome other leſs ſignificant terms which they have uſed and framed, but have not reached the Imagination or Genius of that People. Thus much I write, and as I have often ſaid, ſo I ſtill aver the ſame to be true, becauſe I have ſucked it in with my milk, and have heard it from my Anceſtours; and as to other matters concerning the Thunder, we refer the Reader to what we have already declared.

The fourth Chamber they dedicated to the Rain-bow, becauſe they apprehended it to be a Ray, or Emiſſion from the Sun, and for that reaſon the Incas placed it in their Arms, or Scutcheons, as a badge of their Family and Alliance; this Chamber was alſo furniſhed with Gold, and on the Walls a Rainbow was painted very naturally, with all its colours, which reached from one ſide to the other; the Indians call it Cuychu, and have it in ſuch Veneration, that when they ſee it in the Air, they ſhut their Mouths, and clap their Hands before it; becauſe they have an opinion, that if the Rainbow ſhould diſcover their Teeth, his Influences would ſpoil them, and cauſe them to rot; the which was one amongſt their vulgar Errours, which they held without any reaſon, or foundation for it.

There was moreover a fifth and laſt Chamber appropriated to the High-Prieſt, and other inferiour Prieſts under him, who attended on the ſervice of the Temple, who were all Incas, deſcended from the Royal Bloud: This Chamber was not ordained for a room to ſleep or eat in, but for a place of audience, or conſultation, in what manner to regulate the Sacrifices, and all other matters appertaining to the Services of the Temple; the which Chamber, as all the others, was furniſhed and adorned with Gold from the top to the bottom.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Name of the High Prieſt, and of other parts of this Houſe.

THE Spaniards call the High Prieſt Vilaoma, by corruption of the true word Villac Umu, which is compounded of Villa, which ſignifies as much as to ſpeak or utter, and Umu, which is to divine or foretell; as if we ſhould ſay, a Soothſayer, or one skilfull in Divination; not that he is to declare his own ſentiments, but ſuch as by his frequent intercourſe and communication with the Sun, and by virtue and privilege of his Prieſthood, he ſhall have received from him, namely, all thoſe Fables which the Devils have uttered through the Organs of their Idols, or by ſecret voices, ſounding in their Sanctuaries, or by the Interpretation of Dreams, or ſuch kind of ſuperſtitious Rites, have all been eſteemed oraculous and myſterious ſayings, conveyed to them by the Adminiſtrations of the High Prieſt.

Of

Of thoſe five Chambers which we have already mentioned, there were three onely that I ſaw remaining in their ancient ſtate of Walls and Roof; and theſe alſo were deſpoiled of their Plates of Gold and Silver; but the other two, which were the apartments of the Moon and Stars were demoliſhed, and laid level with the ground. In the outſide of theſe Walls, which bordered on the Cloiſters, were four Niches, or Tabernacles made of free Stone, as the Walls themſelves were; and theſe Niches had caſes of Stone cut and placed within the hollow of the Tabernacle, the which were lined with Plates of Gold, not onely on the top and ſides, but on the bottom alſo; and the corners of theſe ſtone-caſes, or frames, were all inlaid with pretious Stones, ſuch as Eſmeralds and Turquoiſes, becauſe that Countrey neither yields Diamonds, nor Rubies: On great feſtival Days the Inca did uſually ſit in one of theſe Tabernacles, ſometimes in one, and ſometimes in another, as was appointed for the Feſtival.

In two of theſe Tabernacles, in the ſame Wall which looked to the Eaſtward, I remember that I obſerved many little holes in the Caſes, or Frames, which were emboſſed within the Stone, and thoſe which were in the corners reached from one ſide to the other; thoſe holes which were in the middle of the Tabernacle, onely marked or pitted the Wall: Enquiring of the Religious which belonged to that Houſe, what theſe holes meant, they told me, that in the times of Indian Gentiliſm thoſe were the places in which the pretious Stones were ſet; theſe Tabernacles, and all the Doors, which were twelve in number, that opened to the Cloiſter, were all plated with Leaves of Gold, excepting onely the Chambers of the Moon, together with thoſe of the Stars, which, as we have ſaid, in reſemblance of what they repreſented, were overlaid with Silver onely.

Beſides theſe five principal Chambers (which we have already mentioned to be appertaining to the Temple of the Sun) there were other Rooms of leſſer note, which belonged to the Prieſts, and the Servants under them, who were made Incas by privilege, becauſe that no other Indian, how great ſoever he were, though a Curaca, or Lord, had not the liberty to enter within that Houſe, much leſs was it granted to Women, though Daughters, or Wives of the King himſelf: The Prieſts attended to the ſervice of the Temple by Weeks, which they reckoned by Quarters of the Moon; during which time they abſtained from the company of their Wives, not departing from the confines of the Temple, either by day or night.

Thoſe Indians which performed the Drudgery of inferiour Services of the Temple, ſuch as Porters, Sweepers, Cooks, Butlers, and the like, were the very ſame that were Menial Servants and Officers in the Palace of the Incas; for theſe two Houſes of the Father and Son were ſerved with like attendance, excepting onely that in the Temple of the Father no Woman had admiſſion, and in the Palace of the Son no Sacrifices were offered; all other matter had an equality of Grandeur and Majeſty.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Places where they offered Sacrifice, and where they put off their Shoes before they entred into the Temple; as alſo of the Fountains which belonged to it.

THE places where they burned their Sacrifices were appointed according to the ſolemnities of them; for ſome were offered in one open ſquare, and ſome in others; for there were many hallowed places belonging to the Temple, in which the Incas ordered the celebration of the Sacrifices, according as their pleaſure and devotion directed. That general Sacrifice which was made at the great Feſtival of the Sun, called Raymi, was offered in the open Market-place of the City; other Feaſts of leſſer note were celebrated in an open Court before the Temple, where all the People and Nations of divers Provinces, belonging to the Dominion of the Empire, aſſembled together to keep the Holy-day with Dances and Songs, and other Recreations; but they could not paſs beyond that place into the body of the Temple, nor remain there with Shoes on their Feet, becauſe the ground was hallowed, being within the confines, and ſanctified limits of the Temple; the which we obſerve here, to denote how far thoſe boundaries extended.

There were three principal Streets, which ran Northward from the Market-place to the Temple; one of which paſſed by the brook ſide, and another, which in my time they called the Priſon-ſtreet, becauſe the Spaniards made their Priſon in it, (which, as I am informed, is ſince changed;) a third led from a corner of the Market-place to the Temple. There is another Street to the Eaſtward of theſe three, which leads alſo to the ſame place, and which is now called the Street of St. Auſtin; through all which four Streets there was a way to the Temple; but the principal Street, and moſt direct way thither, was that which we call the Street of the Priſon, though the Indians called it the Street of the Sun, becauſe that that being in the middle, and in the ſtreighteſt line of all the reſt, was the common paſſage by which they went, and carried all their Offerings and Sacrifices to the Temple. There was alſo another Street which ran Eaſt and Weſt, and croſſed the other four mentioned Streets, which was the place determined for them, where to leave their Shoes; and though they intended not to go ſo far as the Temple, yet that ground being within the Verge of it, no perſon could paſs it, unleſs deſcalced, and with bare feet paid his reverence to the hallowed Earth, from which place are above two hundred paces to the Gate of the Temple.

But to return now to the Ornaments of the Temple; there were five Fountains of Water, which ran from divers places through Pipes of Gold; the Ciſterns were ſome of Stone, and others of Gold and Silver, in which they waſhed their Sacrifices, as the Solemnity of the Feſtival appointed. In my time, there was but one of thoſe Fountains remaining, which ſerved the Garden of a Convent with Water; the others were loſt, either for want of drawing, or opening, or cleanſing; and this is very probable, becauſe to my knowledge, that which belonged to the Convent was alſo loſt for ſix or ſeven months, for want of which Water, the whole Garden was dryed up, and withered, to the great lamentation of the Convent, and the whole City, nor could any Indian underſtand how that Water came to fail, or to what place it took its courſe.

At length they came to find, that on the West-side of the Convent the Water took its course under ground, and fell into the Brook, which passes through the City; which in the times of the Incas had its banks kept up with stones, and the bottom well paved, that the Earth might not fall in; the which work was continued through the whole City, and for a quarter of a League without; the which now, by the carelesness and sloth of the Spaniards, is broken, and the pavement displaced; for though the Spring commonly yields not water very plentifully, yet at some times it rises on a sudden, and makes such an incredible inundation, that the force of the current hath disordered the Chanel, and the bottom.

In the Year 1558. there happened a great eruption of Water from this Fountain, which broke the main Pipe, and the Chanel, so that the fury of the Torrent took another course, and left the garden dry; and now by that abundance of rubbish and sullage which comes from the City, the chanel is filled up, and not so much as any mark, or signal thereof remains.

The Friars, though at length they used all the diligence imaginable, yet they could not find the ancient Chanel, and to trace it from the Fountain head by way of the Pipes, it was an immense work, for they were to dig through Houses, and deep conveyances under ground, to come at it, for the Head of the Spring was high: Nor could any Indian be found that could give any direction herein, which discouraged them in their work, and in the recovery of the others which anciently belonged to the Temple.

Hence we may observe, the ignorance and inadvertisement of those Indians, and how little the benefit of Tradition availed amongst them; for though it be onely forty two Years at this day since those Waters forsook their course; yet neither the loss of so necessary a provision as Water, which was the refreshment of their Lives, nor of that stream which supplied the Temple of the Sun, their God, could by Nature, or Religion, conserve in them the memory of so remarkable a particular. The truth is, that it is probable that the Undertakers, or Master-workmen, of those Water-works, did communicate, or make known to the Priests onely the secret conveyances of those Waters, esteeming every thing which belonged to the Honour and Service of the Temple to be so sacred, that it was not to be revealed to common ears; and for this reason, perhaps, the knowledge of these waters might dye, and end with the order of Priests. Had any thing remained which was to have been enquired into, as matters of Tribute, or of things relating to the Regalities, or Services, which are secular and profane; there is no doubt but the Memory of the People or Tradition would have given us light therein, as we plainly see in the History of these Countries, which were conserved by appointed, and approved Notaries, though in these days they begin to fail, and wear out of memory, being swallowed up by the modern Histories of this New Empire.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Garden of Gold, and of other Riches belonging to the Temple, and of many other things in that Empire, after the Faſhion of them.

TO return now to this Fountain, I ſay, that at the end of ſix or ſeven months after it was loſt, it happened, that ſome Indian Boys playing about the Stream, diſcovered an eruption of Water from the broken Pipe; of which they acquainting one the other, at length it came to the knowledge of the Spaniards, who judging it to be the water of the Convent, that had been loſt, and diverted from its former courſe, gave information thereof unto the Friars, who joyfully received the good news, and immediately laboured to bring it again into direct conveyance, and conduct it to their Garden; the truth is, the Pipes lying very deep, were buried with Earth, ſo that it coſt much labour and pains to reduce it to its right chanel; and yet they were not ſo curious or induſtrious as to trace the Fountain to the Spring Head.

That Garden which now ſupplies the Convent with Herbs and Plants, was the Garden which in the times of the Incas belonged to their Palace, called the Garden of Gold and Silver, becauſe that in it were Herbs and Flowers of all ſorts, lower Plants, and ſhrubs, and taller Trees, made all of Gold and Silver, together with all ſorts of wild Beaſts, and tame, which were accounted rare and unuſual; there were alſo ſtrange Inſects, and creeping things, as Snakes, Serpents, Lizards, Camelions, Butter-flies and Snails; alſo all ſorts of ſtrange Birds and every thing diſpoſed and in its proper place with great care, and imitated with much curioſity, like the nature and original of that it repreſented.

There was alſo a Mayzall, which bears the Indian Wheat, of an extraordinary bigneſs, the ſeed whereof they call Quinua, likewiſe Plants which produce leſſer Seeds, and Trees bearing their ſeveral ſorts of Fruit, all made of Gold and Silver, and excellently well repreſenting them in their natural Shapes. In the Palace alſo they had heaps or piles of Billets, and Faggots, made of Gold and Silver, rarely well counterfeited. And for the greater adornment and Majeſty of the Temple of their God the Sun, they had caſt vaſt Figures in the forms of Men, and Women, and Children, which they laid up in Magazines, or large Chambers, called Pirva; and every year at the principal feaſts the People preſented great quantities of Gold and Silver, which were all employed in the adornment of the Temple; and thoſe Gold-ſmiths whoſe Art and Labour was dedicated to the Sun, attended to no other work than daily to make new Inventions of rare workmanſhip out of thoſe Metalls. In ſhort, they made all ſorts of Veſſels, or Utenſils, belonging to the Temple, of Gold and Silver, ſuch as Pots, and Pans, and Pails, and Fire-ſhovels, and Tongs, and every thing elſe of uſe and ſervice, even their very Spades, and Rakes of the Garden were made of the like Metall, that with very good reaſon they might call the Temple, and all the Houſe of the Sun, the Coricancha, or the Ingot of Gold.

In imitation of this Temple at Cozco, they made the Temples which were in the other Provinces of that Kingdom, of many of which, as alſo of the ſelect Virgins Pedro de Cieça de Leon makes mention in his Obſervations of that Countrey; but omits to deſcribe either the number of them, or the places, in which they were, but onely ſuch as occurred to him in his travels through the great roads leaving thoſe unmentioned, which remained on both hands out of the way; perhaps to avoid a tedious prolixity he might paſs them by, in regard that by the model of one, the others may be deſcribed.

In

In the adornment of which Temples the Curacas contended, according to that abundance which their Countries produced of Gold and Silver, and herein they were very zealous, that ſo they might both honour their God, and flatter their Prince; by which means all the other Temples were plated with Gold and Silver, and might ſtand in ſome competition and terms of compariſon with that of Cozco.

The neareſt Kindred or Relations to the Curacas were made the Prieſts of thoſe Temples which were in the Provinces, though the Chief Prieſt, or Superintendent over them was an Inca of the Bloud Royal, becauſe it was neceſſary that he ſhould direct the manner and order of their Sacrifices, after the uſe and cuſtome of Cozco; for in regard they were now to abhor and reject their Sacrifices of Men, and Women, and Children, and were forbidden to eat Man's Fleſh, and many other barbarous Rites of abomination and ſuperſtition; it was neceſſary for them to have the ſuperiour guidance of an Inca, leſt they ſhould forget the true way, and relapſe back again into their former cuſtomes. This Superintendency which the Incas exerciſed was very acceptable to the Indians, for as they eſteemed much of their management both of civil and martial Affairs; ſo likewiſe they believed that they had moſt need of their direction in religious Worſhip, from whom all the knowledge thereof was deſcended to them. And thus much ſhall ſuffice to have touched concerning the riches of that Temple; other matters of which may be properly related in their due places.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the famous Temple of Titicaca, and of the Fables and Allegories alluding to it.

AMongſt the many famous Temples, which were dedicated to the Sun in Peru; and which in Ornament and Riches might compare with that of Cozco; that in the Iſle of Titicaca was of chief Fame and Renown. The word Titicaca ſignifies the Foreſt of Lead, being compounded of Titi, which is lead, and Caca, which is a Foreſt, the Lake in which this Iſland is ſituated, hath taken the ſame name, being about two Muſquet ſhot from the main Land, and is about five or ſix thouſand paces in compaſs, where the Incas reported, that the Sun their Father firſt placed his two Children, the Man and Woman, whom he ſent into the World to convert Mankind from the Errour of their ways, and to teach and inſtruct them the Rules of right Reaſon and Religion. To this Fable they add many others of ancient date, ſaying, that the Rays of the Sun, after the general Floud, were firſt ſeen in that Iſland, and in that Lake, before they appeared in any other place; and that this Lake is ſeventy or eighty fathom deep in ſome places, and about eighty Leagues in compaſs; the reaſon they give for not being navigable, or why Boats cannot go upon it, I can ſay little unto, onely Blas Valera writes, that there is ſuch quantities of the Magnet, or Load-ſtone in all parts of it, that hinder the Navigation, or uſe of the Compaſs.

By help of this Fable, and his own Ingenuity, the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, took the advantage to perſuade the Indians, that he and his Wife were the Children of the Sun, and that they were placed in it by their Father, that from thence they might proceed into the World, to teach and inſtruct it in the way of true Religion, as we have at large related in the beginning of this Hiſtory. The Incas, who were Amautas, or Philoſophers, and wiſe in the politicks, made uſe of both theſe Fables, and related them by way of Prophecy: ſaying, that when the Sun darted his firſt Rays of Light into that Iſland, he then gave a ſign and promiſe, that from that place the firſt Doctrines of Light ſhould iſſue; the which promiſe was afterwards accompliſhed by thoſe Kings, who proceeded thence, and taught the World how to caſt away the turpitude of their manners, and live by another Law and Rule of Reaſon. By advantage of theſe, and other ſuch Inventions, it was not difficult for the Incas to perſuade the other Indians of their deſcent from the Sun, and to confirm their belief by thoſe many benefits and advantages which their Doctrine and Religion brought with them. On the aſſurance of theſe two Fables the Incas, and all his Subjects did really eſteem this Iſland to be a ſacred and a holy piece of Ground; and with that opinion they erected a rich Temple on it, all plated with Gold, and dedicated to the Sun; where generally all the Provinces ſubjected to the Inca, did yearly offer Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, in a thankfull acknowledgment of thoſe two Bleſſings he had given them in that place; and that Temple being of greater Devotion, had the ſame attendence, and Officers belonging to it, as that of Cozco. And ſo immenſe was the quantity of Gold and Silver, which was amaſſed in that Iſland, beſides that which was caſt and framed into Utenſils, for the ſervice of the Temple, that the Report which the Indians make of it is incredible, and more to be admired, than believed. Blas Valera ſpeaking of the Riches of this Temple, and of the quantities of Gold and Silver which abounded, after all Veſſels and Ornaments were ſupplied, ſaith, that he was informed by thoſe Indians who are called Mitmac, and are a Colony who inhabit in Copa-Cavano, that there was ſuch a ſuperfluity of Gold and Silver, after all was finiſhed, as might have been ſufficient to have raiſed and completed another Temple, without other materials whatſoever; and that ſo ſoon as thoſe Indians had news of the Invaſion of the Spaniards, and were informed that their Errant and Buſineſs was to deſpoil them of their Riches, they demoliſhed their Temple, and threw all the materials, and the immenſe Wealth of it, into that great Lake.

There is another Story which paſſes, not unlike this, That in the Valley of Orcos, which is about ſix Leagues from Cozco, towards the Sea of Zur, there is a little Lake of leſs than half a League round, but very deep, and encompaſſed with high Woods; It is reported, that when the Indians underſtood of the Arrival of the Spaniards, they threw a great quantity of the Treaſure belonging to Cozco into it, and amongſt the reſt, that Chain of Gold which Huayna Capac cauſed to be made, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its due place; upon aſſurance and belief hereof twelve or thirteen Spaniards, who ſojourned at Cozco, not Inhabitants, but Merchants, and Adventurers, entred into an agreement together, on terms of equal benefit and loſs, to poſſeſs themſelves of that Treaſure by draining the Lake for it; in order whereunto they ſounded the depth, and found twenty three or twenty four fathom water, beſides the mudd, which was alſo deep; then they reſolved to open a ſluce, or bay, at the loweſt ground, or level of the Lake, that ſo a wide chanel being made for the water to paſs into the River of Yucay, the Lake might be ſewed or emptied by the great vent it would find by ſuch an evacuation; in other parts they could not open it farther, becauſe of the Rocks, and diſadvantage of the ground, nor did they lay their Trench open to the top, (which perhaps might have been better,) but to ſave charges made a Mine, and cut their Drain under ground. This work was begun in the Year 1557. with great hopes and expectations of Treaſure; and being entred about fifty paces within the Earth, they unhappily croſſed upon a Vein of hard Rock, at which pecking a long time, they found that they ſtruck more fire out of it, than they drew water; in which having ſpent much money, time and labour, they at length gave over the work as deſperate, and deſiſted from their Enterpriſe. I remember that I entred two or three times within the vault, whilſt they were working, and have heard it often reported, that the Indians threw infinite Treaſure into Lakes, Caves and Mountains, beyond all hopes or poſſibility of recovery.

Thoſe Kings who were Incas, beſides the Riches they beſtowed, and encouragement they gave for the adornment of this Temple, they endeavoured much to improve the very Land of this Iſle, that ſo they might render it fertile, and fit to bear Fruit; and that in gratitude to this place, on which their Anceſtours deſcending from Heaven, had ſet their firſt footſteps, they might enoble it with all ſorts of good Husbandry and Agriculture: to this end they levelled and cleared it of Rocks and Stones, then they made Walks, and covered them over with good Earth, and Manure brought from far; and made the ground capable to produce Mayz, or Indian-Wheat, which by reaſon of the coldneſs of the Climate, is not produced produced in that Countrey; this grane, with other ſeeds they ſowed in the Gardens, which they had made, and which yielded good increaſe, together with a ſmall quantity of Flax, the which Fruits the King ſent as ſacred Preſents to the Temple of the Sun, and the ſelect Virgins at Cozco, with orders to diſperſe them all over the Convents and Temples of his Dominions, of which they ſent ſome grane of this Year to this place, and next Year to the other, which were in high eſteem, as Reliques or ſacred Donatives; and hereof they ſowed ſome in the Gardens belonging to the Temples of the Sun, and of thoſe Houſes which were of publick uſe within the Provinces; and divided and reparted them amongſt the People; ſome Granes of this Corn they caſt into the Granaries of the Sun, and of the King, and into the publick Magazines of Corn, believing that ſome divine virtue was contained in it, and that it would bleſs and increaſe the Corn with which it was mixed, and conſerve it from corruption, and render all more wholſome for humane ſuſtenance; and that Indian who was ſo happy as to be able to get but one grane of this Mayz, to throw into his Heap, was poſſeſſed with a certain belief, that he ſhould never want Bread in the whole courſe of his Life; ſo ſuperſtitious were they in all matters relating to their Religion, and their Incas.

BOOK IV.

CHAP. I.

Of the Convent of thoſe Virgins who were dedicated to the Sun.

AMONGST the many things worthy of Obſervation, which thoſe Heathen Kings followed in their vain Religion and Gentiliſm; the Profeſſion which ſome of their Women made of perpetual Chaſtity, and the Retirements which were built for them in ſeveral Provinces are not here to be omitted; and for better underſtanding who thoſe Women were, to whom they dedicated themſelves, and wherein they were employed, we ſhall declare very diſtinctly, becauſe it is a matter which the Spaniſh Hiſtorians touch but ſlightly, and as the Proverb goes, as the Cat doth a Coal of fire: and particularly we ſhall here treat of the Houſe at Cozco, becauſe that that was the model or pattern of all the reſt.

In that City is a certain Lane, which they call Acllahuaci, which is as much as the Houſe of the ſeparated Virgins: This Lane paſſed through the two Streets, which lead from the Market-place to the Convent of St. Dominick, which was anciently the Temple of the Sun; one of theſe Streets paſſed directly from a Corner of the Market-place, bending on the left hand towards the great Church to the Northward. When, in the Year 1570. that I departed from that City, this then was the chief Street for the Merchants; and the other Street which paſſes from the middle of the Market-place, where in my time the Priſon was, led directly on the right hand to the ſaid Convent of St. Dominick: The Front of this Houſe was juſt oppoſite to the Market-place, and opened between thoſe two Streets before mentioned; the backſide of it bordered on another Street, which croſſes Eaſt to Weſt; ſo that this Houſe was placed in an open ſquare between the Market-place and the three Streets; and between this and the Temple of the Sun, there was a ſeparate pile of Buildings, with the great Area, or Court-yard, before the Temple. Whence we plainly perceive the miſtake of thoſe Writers, who report, that thoſe Virgins had their Lodgings within the Temple of the Sun; and that they were Prieſteſſes, and Aſſiſtants to the Prieſts in their Offertories and Sacrifices. For in regard it was the deſign and intention of the Incas to ſeparate theſe Virgins from the converſation, and ſociety of Men; and that as Women were not permitted to enter within the Temple of the Sun, ſo neither were men allowed admiſſion into the retirements of theſe Virgins; it cannot be rationally believed that theſe Virgins could have any other than a diſtinct Houſe, diſtant and diſjoined from any other; and for this reaſon they called them the ſelect, becauſe they were ſelected apart and choſen with reſpect to their lineage and beauty; and that for aſſurance, that they were Virgins at the time of ſuch admiſſion into the Monaſtery, they were received into that Order at eight years of-age, or under.

And becauſe theſe Virgins who belonged to the Monaſtery at Cozco were dedicated, and as it were eſpouſed to the Sun, it was eſteemed neceſſary that they ſhould be of his Lineage and Bloud, that is, Daughters of the Incas, or of his Uncles, and ſuch who were deſcended by Father and Mother of the ſame Lineage, and not Baſtardized by mixture of humane bloud with divine race, but pure and unſpotted; for ſince their opinion was, that they were eſpouſed unto the Sun, and that he was to have Children by them, 'twas reaſon that they ſhould be without ſpot or blemiſh, and their bloud pure and undefiled.

Theſe Monks, or Nuns, were commonly about 1500 in Number, governed by grave Matrons, admitted to the ſame profeſſion, who had lived and grown old under the ſame rules and obſervance of their Vow: To theſe were properly committed the care and government of the younger ſort, and from this Office they took the Name of Mamacuna, or Mother of the Maids, the word Mama ſignifying a Mother; and Cuna in compoſition, care or watchfulneſs. With this Title their Offices were very agreeable, for ſome were Abbeſſes, others Miſtreſſes to inſtruct the Novitiates, not onely in their Religious Worſhips, but likewiſe in Spinning, Weaving, Sowing, and the like employments; ſome alſo were Porters belonging to the Gates, others took care of the Huſwifery, and Management, of the domeſtick affairs, and to make a proviſion of Neceſſaries, with which they were ſufficiently ſupplied out of the Eſtate of the Sun; for they being his Wives, could not be denied a maintenance out of his Revenue.

CHAP. II.

Of the Rules and Statutes, and Employment of theſe Select Virgins.

THey were Recluſes, and for ever ſhut up, during the whole term of their lives, and obliged to perpetual Virginity; they had no Locutory, or place allowed them at which they might ſee or converſe with Man or Woman; nor had they other ſociety than one with another; for they held, that the Wives of the Sun were to have no communication with other, than with himſelf; and this their Secluſion was ſo ſtrict and rigorous, that though the Inca might perſonally have claimed this privilege, yet becauſe no other ſhould dare or adventure on this attempt by his example, he alſo denied himſelf this liberty; onely the Coya, or Queen, with her Daughters, had the freedom to enter in, and viſit this Monaſtery; and by them the Inca preſented his Salutes, demanding of their health, and what their occaſions and neceſſities required. I once ſaw this Houſe ſtanding alone, without any other Building before it; for onely that, and the Temple of the Sun, which made up two Streets, and four other great Courts, which had been the Palaces of their Kings, remained entire; having been ſpared by the Indians, out of reſpect to their God the Sun, and the Incas their Kings, when in a general Inſurrection againſt the Spaniards they ſet fire, and conſumed all the reſt of the City. Amongſt other rarities of this Building, there was a narrow Gallery, in which two onely could go a-breaſt, that ran through the whole Houſe; and this was the paſſage to ſeveral Chambers and Apartments on each hand, where the Offices of the Houſe were kept, and where the Women worked: At every one of theſe Doors was a Portreſs; and in the fartheſt Chamber, at the end of the Gallery, was the Apartment for the Wives of the Sun, where none entred beſides themſelves. This Houſe had its common Gate, which we call the Great Gate;

Gate; at which none entred beſides the Queen, and ſuch as intended to profeſs the Order.

At the entrance of this Gallery there was a Gate for the common uſe and ſervice of the Houſe, at which there were twenty Porters always attending to bring in, or carry away whatſoever was needfull; but none of them could paſs farther than the ſecond Gate upon pain of Death, though they received Commands from within ſo to doe; nor could any that was within give ſuch Command, or Licence, but on the ſame penalty.

There were 500 Maidens appointed to attend the Service of theſe Virgins, who were Daughters of thoſe who had the privilege to be called Incas; not ſuch as were deſcended from the true Line, and pure Bloud of the Royal Incas, for thoſe were eſteemed and ſeparated as Wives, or Spouſes of the Sun; but ſuch as the Firſt Inca had made Incas by title and privilege, as before related; to which ſtrangers, or thoſe who were afterwards reduced, could not attain. Theſe Maidens had alſo their Mamacunas, or Matrons of the ſame Lineage appointed to them, being ſuch, as having paſſed their years, and grown old in that Houſe, had part of the care and management thereof committed to them. When the Spaniards had overcome this City of Cozco, and that they divided the publick Buildings amongſt themſelves for places to dwell and inhabit; one half of this Convent, which belonged to the Offices, fell to the lot of Pedro del Barco, whom in the ſequel of this Hiſtory we ſhall have occaſion to mention; and the other half was the ſhare of the Licenciado de la Gama, who reſided there when I was very young; and afterwards it belonged to Diego Ortiz de Guzman, a Gentleman born at Sevil, whom I knew, and left at Cozco, when I departed thence for Spain.

The principal employment of theſe Wives of the Sun was to Spin and Weave all the garments which the Inca and the Coya his lawfull Wife wore on their own Perſons; they made alſo all the fine Linen which was offered to the Sun in Sacrifice; and what the Inca wore about his head, which was called Llautu, which was about the breadth of the middle finger, but very thick, and ſo long as to take four or five turns about the head, with a coloured Liſt reaching from one temple to the other.

Their Cloathing was a ſhirt which reached to their knees, called Uncu; the Spaniards called it Cuſma, which was not the common name of it, but onely that which a particular Province gave to it: They wore alſo a ſquare Mantle of about two Foot deep, which ſerved for a Cloak, called Yacolla. Moreover, theſe Nuns made Purſes for the Inca of about a quarter of a Yard ſquare, which they carried under their Arme, hanged by a fine Twiſt curiouſly embroidered, of about two fingers broad, and was in faſhion of a Ribbon on the left Shoulder, reaching croſs to the right ſide: Theſe Purſes they called Chuſpa, and ſerved them to put their Cuca into, which was an Herb that Indians now commonly eat, but was then ſo rare, that none had the privilege to eat of it but the Inca onely, and his Kindred; unleſs ſome Curacas, to whom the King out of a particular favour and affection ſent perhaps ſome Baskets of it every year.

They alſo made certain Twiſts of two colours, which were Straw-colour and Carnation, which they called Paycha: theſe Twiſts were very fine, of about a Yard long; but were not deſigned for ſervice of the Inca, but for others of the Royal Bloud, which they wore on their Heads, binding their Foreheads from one temple to the other.

CHAP. III.

Of the reſpect they ſhewed to the Works which theſe Select Virgins made, and what Law there was againſt thoſe who attempted on their Chaſtity.

ALL theſe Curioſities were the handy-work of theſe Virgins, made in great quantity for their Spouſe the Sun; but becauſe he was not capable to receive or wear thoſe Ornaments on his own Perſon, they were ſent unto the Inca as his lawfull and undoubted Son and Heir, that ſo he might uſe them in the ſtead and place of his Father; the which were eſteemed by him as Sacred, and with great reverence and devotion reſpected by the Subjects of his whole Empire. And if the Greeks and ancient Romans did in the times of their Gentiliſm adore Juno, Venus and Pallas for Goddeſſes, it ought not to ſeem ſtrange if theſe poor and ſimple people, who were under the higheſt circumſtances of invincible ignorance imaginable, ſhould with a ſuperſtitious zeal, and devout affection, adore and worſhip whatſoever their Religion taught them to be Divine and Sacred; for they apprehending that theſe Virgins were Coyas, or Queens and real Wives of the Sun, could not but ſhew reſpect and reverence to whatſoever proceeded from their hands and labour; for which reaſon, the Incas themſelves could not beſtow their Works on any that was not an Inca of the true Bloud; for that were a prophanation of ſuch holy things, and a direct ſacrilege to employ divine productions to common and humane ſervices. And though, as we have formerly ſaid, the King gave Veſtments to Curacas, and other Governours, as Signals of his grace and favour; yet thoſe were of another ſort, as we ſhall hereafter make appear.

Moreover, the employment and office of theſe Virgins was to make the Bread, called Cancu, which at the great Feſtivals of the Sun, named Raymi and Cittua, were offered to him in Sacrifice: they alſo made the Liquour which the Inca and his Kindred drank on the Holy-days of thoſe Feſtivals called Aca. All the Veſſels which were uſed in this Houſe, ſuch as Kettles, Pots, Jars, and the like, were all made of Gold and Silver, it being reaſonable that the Wives of the Sun ſhould live in an equipage agreeable to the quality of ſuch a Husband; ſo that their Garden alſo was adorned with Trees and Fruit all made of Gold and Silver, with Plants, and Flowers, and Herbs, and Birds, and other Animals, all rarely counterfeited after the manner of thoſe in the Garden of the Sun.

Theſe were the chief employments of thoſe Nuns which lived in the City of Cozco; the other part of their Life and Actions was agreeable to the profeſſion they made of perpetual Virginity, and of Recluſes from the reſt of the World. That Nun who violated her Chaſtity, was buried alive, and her Lover hanged: But in regard that (as they ſaid) a ſimple death onely ſeemed too mean a puniſhment for ſo exorbitant an offence, which imported no leſs than the violation of a Wife dedicated to the Sun their God, and Father of their Kings; they ordained, that with the Delinquent his Wife and Children, Servants and Kindred, with his very Neighbours and Herds of Cattel, ſhould without any remorſe, compaſſion or lamentations of any be put to death; that all his Fields and Farms ſhould be laid deſolate, and covered with heaps of ſtones, that ſo no Cattel might ever feed more thereon, or ever be more trod with humane feet, which had produced or maintained a wretch ſo vile and impious as this accurſed tranſgreſſour.

This was the Law, but it was never put into execution, becauſe none ever did tranſgreſs againſt it: For as the Indians of Peru (as we have ſaid before) were great obſervers of their Law, and eſpecially devoted to that part which reſpected their Religion, and the awe and reverence due to their Princes, ſo they were very ſevere in execution of thoſe puniſhments which the Law preſcribed, adhering to the very rigour of the letter without more remorse or compassion, than if they had destroyed a swarm of Wasps, or drowned a litter of Whelps; for the Incas designing their Laws for the Rules of Humane life, would never suffer them to be frustrated or eluded by the boldness of any that attempted to break them.

CHAP. IV.

That there were many other Houses of these Select Virgins. The severity of the Law before-mentioned, is proved by Example.

ALL that we have said before had relation to the House of those Virgins at Cozco, who were dedicated to the Sun: But besides this, there were several other Houses for Women of the same profession in divers of the principal Provinces, which the Inca out of his bounty and favour commanded to be built and endowed; but into these, Maids of all conditions and qualities had admission, as well those whose bloud was tainted with common mixture, as those who were of the pure and limpid streams of Royal Bloud. The Daughters also of Curacas, as a mark of favour, were sometimes admitted here; some Maids also of exact beauty, and rare features, though of the common race, were sometimes also received in, the which both their Fathers and themselves esteemed for an extraordinary favour; but then they were not admitted under the notion of Wives, or Concubines, to the Sun, but of the Inca onely. Howsoever, they reserved themselves with the same retirement and care as those of the Sun; and were attended with young Maidens for their Servants, and maintained at the charge of the Inca: Their employment also was the same with those at Cozco, being to Spin and Weave, and make Garments for the Inca, which they performed in great abundance, and in the same manner as we have related of the others: But howsoever, those Vestments were not esteemed so sacred, as to be onely appropriated to the Person of the Inca, but were such as the Inca bestowed on his great Lords and Captains, and other Subjects, whensoever he was pleased to honour them with some signal note, or mark of his favour.

These also had their Mamacunas, or Matrons to oversee them, as those had which lived at Cozco, and were governed by the same rules; excepting that those who lived at Cozco were all of the true Royal Bloud, and obliged to a perpetual Cloister and Virginity; but these were Maids of all sorts and conditions, provided that they were beautifull, being not designed for Wives of the Sun, but Concubines to the Inca.

The same rigour of Law was practised against those who debauched and defiled the Women of the Inca, as against those who became Adulterers with the Virgins espoused to the Sun; for the crime being the same, required the same punishment; but as there was never any such offence committed, so there was never any such severity executed; but to confirm that there was such a Law, we have the authority of Augustin de Carate, who in the seventh Chapter of his second Book, discoursing of the causes of the violent Death of Atahualpa, hath these very words, which I have copied out Verbatim, being very much to our purpose. And as (saith he) all the Allegations which were made hereupon were all pronounced by the Tongue of the same Filipillo, he interpreted nothing but what made to his own purpose. What might be the cause which moved him hereunto, can never be certainly determined; though it must be one of these two things, either that this Indian entertained private Amours with one of the Wives of Atabaliba, and expected by his death to enjoy her with with more ſecurity; which being come to the knowledge of Atabaliba, he complained thereof to the Governour, ſaying, That he was more ſenſible of that misfortune, than he was of his impriſonment; and that no miſery, though accompanied with Death, could touch him ſo nearly as this; for that a common Indian of baſe extraction, ſhould eſteem him at ſo mean a rate, as to make him the ſubject of ſo high an affront, in deſpight of that Law of their Countrey, which aſſigned no leſs a puniſhment for it, than that ſuch offendour ſhould be burnt alive, with his Wives, Fathers, Children, Brothers, and all the reſt of his Kindred, nay the very Flocks and Herds of ſuch an Adulterer were to be deſtroyed, his Lands laid deſolate, and ſowed with Salt, his Trees eradicated from the very Roots, his Houſes demoliſhed, with many other inflictions of the like nature. Thus far are the words of Auguſtin de Carate, which ſerve to confirm what I have wrote concerning this matter, and indeed I was pleaſed to have my words avouched by the teſtimony of this Spaniſh Cavalier: For though other Hiſtorians mention this Law, yet they onely ſay, that it was with the Death of the Offendour, omitting that of his Wife, and Father, and Relations, and all the other Solemnities of this puniſhment; whereby we may underſtand how grievous that offence was eſteemed; and how deeply that poor Inca Atahualpa reſented it, when in the Agony of his Heart, he ſaid, That he felt it more than his Impriſonment; and all other infelicities, though attended with Death it ſelf.

Thoſe Women who had the honour to be extracted from theſe Houſes for Concubines to the King, were made uncapable of ever returning thither again, but remained in the Court as Ladies and Attendants on the Queen, untill ſuch time as they were diſmiſſed, and licence given them to return into their own Countries; where for ever afterwards they were provided with Houſes and Revenue agreeable to their Quality, and to the Dignity and Honour they had acquired by having been Miſtreſſes to the Inca. Thoſe who could not attain to this Honour, were obliged to remain in their Cloiſter untill they were ancient, and then had liberty either to continue till the time of their Death, or to return to their own Countrey, where they were treated with ſuch reſpect as was due to the profeſſion they had made.

CHAP. V.

Of the Quality and Ornament of theſe Select Virgins, and that they were not to be given unto any perſon whatſoever in Marriage.

THoſe Virgins which were dedicated or deſigned for the preſent King, had the Title after his Death of Mothers to the Succeſſour, with the Addition alſo of Mamacuna, which was a Name properly belonging to their Office, which obliged them to teach and overſee the young Novices, who were admitted for Concubines of the New Inca, and treated by them as their Children and Daughters-in-law. Every one of theſe Convents had its Governour or Superiour, who was an Inca, and whoſe buſineſs it was to provide all Neceſſaries for the uſe of theſe Wives of the Inca; for though in reality they were but Concubines, yet in reſpect and courteſie they gave them the Honourable title of Wives. In every one of theſe Houſes belonging to theſe Maidens, ſeparated for the uſe of the Inca; all their Utenſils and Services of the Houſe were made of Gold and Silver, as thoſe were which belonged to the Wives of the Sun, and to the famous Temple, and (as we ſhall hereafter declare) to the Royal Palaces; for indeed all the Gold and Silver, and pretious Stones which were found and amaſſed in that great Empire, were, for the moſt part, employed to no other uſe, than to the Service and Adornment ment of the Temples of the Sun, which were very numerous, and of the Cloiſters of thoſe Virgins, which were equally conſiderable, and to embelliſh the Royal Palaces with agreeable pomp and magnificence; the quantity conſumed in the Services of Curacas, and great Men was little, and that chiefly in their Cups, or drinking Veſſels, which was alſo limited and moderated according to ſuch a degree of Weight and Number as the Inca was pleaſed to allow them; there was alſo ſome ſmall matter licenſed for their Garments and Cloathing, when the grand Feſtivals were celebrated.

It is a great errour and miſtake of thoſe who report, that any of theſe ſeparated Virgins might lawfully be given for Wives to the great Commanders and Captains by any favour or diſpenſation of the Inca; for being once dedicated and conſecrated for Wives of the Inca, and admitted to that profeſſion, they were ever after rendred uncapable of ſo low a condeſcenſion as to own any other Husband; for that were to prophane that Sacred Character whereby they were dedicated to the Inca, and an injury to the Woman, who thereby would be forced to renounce all the grandeur and privileges ſhe enjoyed, under the Reverend Title of one Married to the Inca, that ſhe might receive the leſs honourable condition of a private perſon. And ſince it was a fundamental Law amongſt them, That none was to be injured, much leſs ought any diminution to be offered to their Kings, who, as we have ſaid, were honoured and adored by them under the Notion of Gods.

CHAP. VI.

What Women thoſe were whom the Inca preſented and beſtowed in Marriage.

THE truth is, there were ſome Women, of whom the Inca made Preſents to ſuch Curacas and Captains, who by their Services had merited rewards from him; but then theſe were but the Daughters of other Curacas, which the Inca took from them to beſtow in Marriage upon thoſe who had deſerved well from him, which ſeemed a favour to them both; unto the one that the Inca would vouchſafe to receive and prefer his Daughter; and to the other, that he was pleaſed to beſtow her on him with his own hand, being for that reaſon eſteemed pretious; for not ſo much the gift, as the Donor being regarded, rendred the leaſt preſent from the Inca's hand equal to the higheſt treaſure, as if it had ſomething of Divinity conferred with it. Sometimes, though but ſeldom, the Incas preferred their natural Daughters of the Royal Bloud to the Curacas, and Governours of Provinces for Wives, as ſignals of his favour, and as engagements to them to continue in their Loyalty; of which ſort the Inca having many to beſtow abroad, had no neceſſity to have recourſe to thoſe for a ſupply, who were entred in the Sacred and Royal Foundations; for that would have been a diminution to their exalted Degree, a violation to their Religion, and an impiety to mix divine race with prophane Bloud.

CHAP. VII.

Of other Women, who conſerved their Virginity, and of Widows.

BEſides theſe Virgins, who lived Recluſes in Cloiſters, under the Vow of perpetual Chaſtity, there were many other Women of Royal Bloud, who lived in retirement, and vowed to conſerve their Virginity, though with liberty to go abroad, and viſit their neareſt Relations, and aſſiſt the ſick, and Women in their Travels, and to be preſent at the Ceremony of ſhaving, when they gave a Name to their firſt-born. Theſe Women were held in great Eſteem and Veneration, for their Chaſtity, and purity of their Lives; giving them by way of Excellency, or of ſome Vertue Divine, the Title of Occlo, which ſignifies ſomething of ſupereminent Sanctity; and this their Chaſtity was not pretended, or feigned, but true and real; for if any falſity or hypocriſie were diſcovered in it, they burnt them alive, or threw them to the Lions to be devoured. I remember that I knew one of theſe that was very ancient, and had never been married, which they called Occlo; ſometimes ſhe viſited my Mother, and, as I have heard, ſhe was her Aunt by the Grandfather; I can ſay, I am a witneſs of the great reſpect they bore towards her, and eſpecially my Mother, who for her Relation, Years and Vertue, behaved her ſelf towards her with all imaginable Reverence and Veneration.

Nor muſt we here omit the Modeſty and Vertue of Widows in general, who for the firſt Year of their Widowhood kept themſelves retired, and free from all converſation, there being very few of thoſe, who had not Children, that married again, much leſs thoſe who were provided with them, did ever return to a ſecond Marriage, but lived with Continence and Chaſtity; for which reaſon the Laws were favourable towards them, commanding Labourers to plow and cultivate their Lands before thoſe of the Curacas, with many other privileges, which the favour of the Inca indulged to them. The truth is, it was a diſparagement for a Man, who was not a Widower himſelf, to marry with a Widow, for as they ſaid, he loſt I know not what quality and repute by ſuch a condeſcenſion. And this is what is moſt obſervable in reference to Virgins, and Widows, and modeſt Women.

CHAP. VIII.

Of their Marriages in general, and how their Houſes were governed.

IT will now be proper in this place for us to treat of their Marriages, and how they were joined together in the Kingdoms and Provinces ſubjected to the Inca: In order hereunto it is to be noted, that every year, or every two years, the King commanded his Officers to take an account of ſuch young Men and Maidens of his Lineage, as were marriageable, within the City of Cozco, that ſo they might be matched together; the Maidens were to be of eighteen to twenty years of age, and the young Men from twenty to twenty four, and upwards; under which age they were not eſteemed to be of years of conſent, for that it was neceſſary they ſhould be of a ripe age and judgment to govern their Families, which could not be done by Children

Children in their minority. At the Ceremonies of Matrimony the Inca ſtood between the two Perſons, and caſting his Eyes upon them both, he called the Man by his Name, and then the Woman, and taking their hands into his, joined them together, which being the bond of Matrimony, the Function was performed; and being by the Inca conſigned to their Parents, they went home to the Houſe of the Bridegroom's Father, where the Wedding was kept for four or ſix days with great rejoycing: This was the manner and form of their legal Marriages, which for the great Favour and Honour the Inca had performed in this Function, were called in their Language, the Incan Couple. The King having in this manner matched thoſe of his own Lineage, then the next day following the Officers for this Employment joined the Neighbourhood of the City, with reſpect to that Diviſion, which we have mentioned at the beginning of this Hiſtory, of the Upper and the Lower Cozco.

The Houſes which were appointed for the Habitation of the new married Couples, who were Incas, (concerning whom we treat at preſent) were prepared by the Indians of thoſe Provinces, whoſe charge it was, according to ſuch proviſion as was made in that caſe. All the Furniture and Utenſils of the Houſes were provided at the charge of the Parents; every one of their Kindred giving them ſomething towards Houſe-keeping, which was all the Ceremony or Sacrifice performed at that Solemnity; and though many Spaniſh Hiſtorians report divers other barbarous Cuſtoms in uſe at Marriages, it is for want of a diſtinct knowledge of the Rites of one Province from another; for in thoſe Provinces indeed which were remote from Cozco, and where the Seigniority and Rule of the Incas had not as yet arrived, there may have been many abſurd and impious Ceremonies in uſe, which ſince have been corrected, and aboliſhed by the more wiſe and refined Government of the Incas.

But as to the true Politicks of the Incas, they obſerved no other Form of Marriage than this before recited, according to which the Curacas in their Provinces, and the Governours in their reſpective Diviſions conformed their diſcipline, and as Fathers and Lords of their Countrey, practiſed it in the ſame manner as did the Inca. And though the Inca, who was Governour, was preſent at the Marriages which the Curaca ſolemnized; yet it was not to interpoſe, or diminiſh the Authority of the Curaca therein, but onely to approve that in the name of the King which the Curaca had performed by virtue of the power he exerciſed over his own Vaſſals. When the Commonalty, or ordinary ſort married, the Community of the People were obliged to build, and provide them Houſes, and the Parents to furniſh them. It was not lawfull for any to marry out of his own Province, or People; but, as the Tribes of Iſrael, they were obliged to match within their own Lineage and Nation; and excepting onely Siſters, they joined promiſcuouſly together, like Sheep of the ſame flock; ſo that the People of a Province were not allied onely by Nation, but by Kindred and Bloud. By which it appears, that it was not lawfull for any to change his Countrey or Habitation, or paſs the limits of his Diviſion, or Decurion, but to keep himſelf cloſe to his People and Families; for in regard the Aſſemblies within the Community were obliged to build the Houſes of the new married, it was their own duty to conſerve them in Repair, and not to wander without the Barrier, and Confines of their Parentage.

CHAP. IX.

That the Prince, who was Heir apparent, was to marry his own Sister, and the reasons which they gave for it.

HAving now declared the manner in general, and the way how the common Indians married; we shall in the next place proceed to treat of the Marriage of the Prince, who was Heir apparent. In explanation of which it is to be noted, that it was the most ancient Custome, and fundamental Law of those Kings, that the Prince, who was Heir, should marry with her that was his own Sister by Father and Mother, and she onely was capable of being his Legitimate Wife, whom they called Coya, which is as much as Queen, or Empress; and the Eldest Son of these two was allowed for the true and lawfull Heir of the Kingdom.

The Original of this Law and Custome was derived from the first Inca, Manco Capac, and his Wife, Mama Occlo Huaco, who feigning themselves to be the Children and descended from the Sun, and to be Brother and Sister, it was therefore concluded by all the Indians, (who perfectly believed this Story) that by the example of these two, the same Rule was to be observed in the succession of all future Ages; and this they confirmed by another Example of the Sun and Moon themselves, who being Brother and Sister, were joined in Marriage; and therefore this served for an undeniable Authority and Argument to prove the Legality of such a Marriage, by an instance so convincing, as that of these Deities: Yet for want of such Issue female, the Prince might then marry with the neareſt of Kindred, such as his Cousin-German, or Aunt, who, for want of Heirs male, were capable of inheriting the Crown, according to the Custome in Spain.

For want of Heirs male by the first Sister, the Prince might marry with the second, or third, and so on, untill he met with one that produced such issue: and this Rite was punctually observed, and maintained to be legal, from the example of the Sun and Moon, and of the first Inca and his Sister, and from that Rule which enjoined them to keep the Streams of Royal Bloud pure and unmixed, lest they should incur the impiety of mixing Divine Bloud with Humane Race. And because the right of this Inheritance came as well by the Mother as the Father, the same could not be conserved, unless they both concurred to make an Heir with an undoubted Title. Hereunto they added farther, that the Majesty of the Queen could not be communicated to any other, unto whom it did not appertain by Nature; for that her Conjunction and Union with the King could not render her capable of such a Character, which was to be worshipped and adored in the place of a Deity, for that were to commit Idolatry, by giving Divine Worship to a Humane Creature.

Besides the lawfull Queen those Kings might have many Concubines, both of their own Kindred, to the fourth Degree, and also of Strangers; but the Children by them were observed with different degrees of respect; the Sons by the Kinswomen were esteemed legitimate, having no mixture of common Bloud, which quality was ever esteemed with high Veneration, when those by Strangers were accounted Bastards; and though they had some respect shewn them above that of common degree, yet it was not with such exteriour and interiour Devotion, as to those of purer Bloud, who were accounted Gods, when these were onely honoured as Men. So that the King had three sorts of Children, one by his Sister and Wife, who were legitimate, and capable of the Succession; another sort was by his Kinswomen of the same Bloud; and a third by Strangers, who were reputed Natural and Bastard-Sons.

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

Of the different manners of inheriting Eſtates.

FOR want of Iſſue male by the legitimate Wife, the Law then was, that the Eldeſt of the true bloud ſhould ſucceed, as it happened in the caſe of Manco Inca a Huaſcar, as we ſhall hereafter make appear in its due place, for in no wiſe it would be permitted that a Baſtard ſhould inherit; and for want of lawfull Sons of the bloud, the Inheritance fell to the next of Kindred, provided he were truly deſcended by Father and Mother.

By reaſon of this Law Atahualpa deſtroyed the whole Race of the true and Royal Bloud, both Men and Women, (as we ſhall relate in its due place;) for he being a Baſtard, and therefore uncapable to inherit, made way to his uſurped Kingdom by the death of the lawfull Heirs, leſt one of them remaining alive, ſhould recover it again from his Power. All thoſe of the Bloud married together, to the fourth Degree, that ſo the Generation of them might multiply to great numbers; onely the eldeſt Siſter was reſerved for the King, it not being lawfull for any to take her beſides himſelf. The eldeſt Son always inherited the Kingdom for a ſeries of twelve Kings, who ſucceeded without interruption, untill the Spaniards invaded them.

Howſoever amongſt the Curacas, or Lords over Vaſſals, a different Rule and Cuſtome was obſerved; for in ſome Provinces the Eldeſt Son ſucceeded, in others the moſt beloved, and eſteemed for his Vertue, and Affability was the qualification required, of which the People being Judges, the Government ſeemed rather Elective than Hereditary. This Law was a curb to the Sons of the Curacas, reſtraining them from Tyranny, and an obligation to be vertuous; for in regard the Diſpoſal of the Inheritance depended on the pleaſure of the People; the Sons contended in kindneſs towards their Subjects, and every one laboured to render himſelf, by his Valour and Gentleneſs, the moſt beloved and acceptable to the People.

In ſome Provinces the Sons inherited according to their Birth, as when the Father dyed, the Eldeſt Son ſucceeded, then the ſecond, then the third, and ſo forward; and when all the Brothers were extinct, the Inheritance fell to the Eldeſt Son of the Eldeſt Brother, and ſo ſucceſſively; ſo that hence appears the miſtake of a certain Spaniſh Hiſtorian, who ſays, that it was the common Cuſtome of all Peru, that the Brothers of the King ſhould gradually ſucceed one after the other; and that all of them being dead, then the Kingdom aſcended again to the Eldeſt Son of the eldeſt Brother; which Errour proceeded from a miſunderſtanding of the true difference between the manner of inheriting by Incas, and Curacas. For though the Incas did reduce and ſubdue many Provinces to their Power, yet they did not alter their Cuſtomes, and ancient Laws, unleſs they interfered with their Religion, and their own ſupreme and abſolute Juriſdiction; but rather they confirmed many of thoſe Cuſtoms which were good and laudable; particularly that whereby the moſt deſerving Son was choſen to the Government, it ſeeming a ſpur and incitement to Vertue, to have Power and Grandeur ſet up for the Prize and Reward of their Merit: the which appeared ſo reaſonable, that a certain Inca King deſired once to have introduced this Cuſtome into his own Family, and in deſpight of their own ſevere Law of Primogeniture, have made his Sons depend on the favour and air of the Peoples Suffrages, as we ſhall diſcourſe in its due place. There is a People about fourty Leagues to the Eaſtward of Cozco, which I have been amongſt, of the Nation of Quechua, ſome call them Sutcunca, where a particular inſtance happened, relating to the different manner of inheriting in that Countrey. The Curaca of that People, called Don Garçia, finding himſelf at the point of death, called for his four Sons, who were Men grown, with the Nobles of his Province, and admoniſhed them by way of his laſt Words and Teſtament, that they ſhould obſerve and keep that Law of Jeſus Chriſt which they had lately received, and for ever praiſe and thank God for ſending them ſo ineſtimable a benefit and honour, and ſerve the Spaniards for having been the means and inſtruments of ſuch Divine Revelations; and that they ſhould ſerve and obey their Maſter with ſingular Affection, to whoſe lot and fortune it ſhould fall to be their Lord and Governour; laſtly, he told them, that ſince it was the Cuſtome of their Countrey to elect the moſt vertuous unto their Government, he charged them to make choice of that Perſon amongſt his Sons, whom they eſteemed the moſt deſerving; and that in caſe none of them appeared worthy of their paternal Succeſſion and Honour, that then, paſſing them by, they ſhould chuſe ſuch a Perſon from amongſt themſelves, whom they reputed of greateſt Honour and Worthineſs; for that ſince nothing was ſo dear to him as the common Good, and Benefit of his People, he deſired not the promotion of his Children farther than as it tended to that end and deſign: All which a Prieſt, who had been his Confeſſour, reported as a remarkable Teſtament and Paſſage in thoſe barbarous parts.

CHAP. XI.

Of their Ceremonies when they weaned, and ſhaved, and gave Names to their Children.

THE Incas, when they weaned their Eldeſt Sons, they made great Feaſts and rejoycing, which they did not obſerve for their Daughters, or ſecond or third Sons, at leaſt not with that ſolemnity; for the order of Primogeniture of Males was in high Eſteem with the Incas, and by their Example with all their Subjects.

They weaned them at two years of age, and upwards, and then clipt off the Hair of their Heads, and with that gave them their Names: At which ceremony the Kindred aſſembled, and he that was to impoſe the Name, ſhore off the firſt lock of the Infant's Hair. Their Sciſſers were made of a Flint, for as yet the Indians were not arrived to a better Invention; after the God-father had ſnipped his lock, the reſt of the Kindred did the like, one after the other, according to their Age and Quality; and when the Infant was quite ſhorn, then the Name was given, with the Preſents which they brought; for ſome gave him Garments, and clothing, others beſtowed Cattle, others Arms of divers Faſhions, others Cups of Gold and Silver to drink in: the which was performed onely towards the Princes of the Royal Bloud; for that the Commonalty were not permitted this Honour, unleſs by particular Privilege or Diſpenſation.

After this Ceremony was ended, then came in their drink, for a dry Feaſt was accounted dull, and with Singing, and Dancing, they paſſed the whole Day, untill Night parted them; which Jollity being the next day renewed, continued for three or four days, according to the quality of the Parents; the like Ceremony was obſerved, when the locks of the young Prince, and Heir apparent, were clipt, at which the High Prieſt of the Sun aſſiſted, and was the firſt to cut his Hair; moreover at this ſolemnity the Curacas of the whole Kingdom, either in Perſon, or by their Deputies appeared, and were aſſiſting at this Feſtival, which continued for the ſpace of at leaſt twenty days, offering their Preſents of Gold, and Silver, and pretious ſtones, and what elſe was curious and rare, in their reſpective Provinces.

In reſemblance hereof (becauſe it is natural for People to imitate their Prince) the Curacas, and generally all the Nations of Peru followed this Example, in ſome proportion agreeable to their Quality and Ability; and this was accounted one of their moſt jolly and merry meetings.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII.

That they educated their Children without any tenderneſs.

AS well the Incas, as the Commonalty, both rich and poor, bred up their Children with the leaſt of tenderneſs and delicacy that was poſſible: for ſo ſoon as an Infant was born, they waſhed it in cold water, before they ſwathed it in its Mantles; and then every morning they bathed it in cold water, and ſometimes expoſed it to the dew of the night; perhaps the Mother would ſometimes out of tenderneſs ſpirt the water out of her mouth on the Child, and ſo waſh it; but generally they had an opinion, that cold and exerciſe did corroborate and ſtrengthen the Body and Limbs: their Armes they kept ſwathed, and bound down for three months, upon ſuppoſition, that to looſe them ſooner, would weaken them; they kept them always in their Cradles, which was a pitifull kind of a frame, ſet on four legs, one of which was ſhorter than the reſt, for convenience of rocking; the Bed was made of a ſort of courſe knitting, which was ſomething more ſoft than the bare boards, and with a ſtring of this knitting they bound up the Child on one ſide, and the other, to keep it from falling out.

When they gave them ſuck they never took them into their Lap or Armes, for if they had uſed them in that manner, they believed that they would never leave crying, and would always expect to be in Armes, and not lie quiet in their Cradles; and therefore the Mother would lean over the Child, and reach it the Breaſt, which they did three times a day, that is, at morning, noon and night, and unleſs it were at thoſe times, they never gave it ſuck; for they ſaid, that not accuſtoming it to ſet hours, would cauſe it to expect ſuckling the whole day, and be never quiet, but when the Breaſt was at the Mouth; which cauſes frequent vomits and pewkings, and made them, when they were grown Men, to be gluttons, and drunkards; for we ſee, ſaid they, in other Creatures, that they adminiſter their Dugs and Nipples to their Young at certain hours and ſeaſons. The Mother always nurſed her own Child, for though ſhe were a Lady of the higheſt degree, ſhe would never ſuffer her Infant to be nouriſhed with the milk of another, unleſs in the caſe of ſickneſs, or ſome other infirmity; and during the time of their nurſing, they abſtained from the Bed of their Husbands, as that which would curdle their milk, and make the Child a Changeling. Such as were thus transferred to ſtranger Nurſe, were called Ayuſca, which is a participle of the preterperfect tenſe, and is as much as to ſay, one denied, or renounced, or changed by its Parents; and by way of Metaphor the younger ſort would reproach one the other with that word, intimating that his Miſtreſs ſhew'd more favour to his Rival than to himſelf; to utter that word to a married man were a high affront, being one of thoſe five words that are ſcandalous, and will bear an Action. I knew once a Palla, or Lady of the Bloud Royal, who was forced to give her Daughter to be ſuckled by another; the faithleſs Nurſe proving with Child, her Foſter-child fell into a Conſumption and Convulſions, and became nothing but Skin and Bones; the Mother finding her Daughter in this manner made Ayuſca, at the end of eight months after, when ſhe had almoſt dried up her milk, ſhe reſtored her Infant to her own natural Breaſts, which fetched down her milk again, and applying an Unguent of Herbs to the Shoulders, the Infant recovered, which was before given over, as in a deſperate condition; ſuch is the virtue of the Mother's Milk, that there is nothing more medicinal, and nothing more reſtorative than that natural ſuſtenance.

If the Mother had a ſufficient ſtock of Milk, the Child never received any other nouriſhment than that, untill the time it was weaned; for they were of opinion, that all other ſorts of food created nothing but crudities and indigeſtions. When it was time to take it out of the Cradle, they made a little pit for it in the floor, which reached to the Breaſt, in which they put it, with ſome old clouts to make it ſoft, to which the Child being inured, did not trouble the Mother's Armes, and having ſome few play-things thrown before it, it pleaſed and contented it ſelf without the leaſt diſturbance; and ſo unwilling were they to accuſtome it to the Lap, that though it were a Child of the greateſt Curaca of the Kingdom, it was not treated otherwiſe; and that when it was grown ſo big as to crawl about, they would uſe it to ſuck upon its knees at one Breaſt, and then teach it to creep about to the other, but would never take it into the Armes. The Woman in Child-bed was treated yet more hardily than was the Child; for ſo ſoon as ſhe had brought forth, ſhe went to the next ſtream, or to ſome cold water in the Houſe, where ſhe waſhed her ſelf and her Infant, and afterwards applied her ſelf to her domeſtick Affairs, without any concernment whatſoever: They had no uſe of Midwives, or others, at their Labours, and if any did aſſiſt, ſhe was rather a Witch, or Enchantreſs, than a Midwife. And this was all the cuſtome and manner in Peru, which was equally practiſed by the Rich and Poor, Nobility and Commonalty, both at the Birth of their Children, and breeding them up afterwards.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Huswifery of the married Women.

THE married Women always employed themſelves at home in ſpinning and weaving Wool in the cold Countries, and of Cottons in the hot, every one ſpinning and making Cloaths for themſelves, their Husbands, and Children; ſowing was the leaſt of their work, either for Men or Women, for their thread was bad, and their needles worſe; notwithſtanding whatſoever they wove, whether Wool, or Cotton, all was ſpun, and twined into threads. All their Cloth was made of four threads, and not woven wider or longer, than juſt as much as was ſufficient to make a Mantle, Shirt, or Waſtcoat; their Veſtments were not cut out, or ſhaped, but all of a piece, after the manner that they came from the Loom; for before they began to weave them, they deſigned the proportion of length and breadth, which they intended to give them; ſo that they had need neither of Taylors, Hoſiers, nor Shomakers, for they had no need of thoſe things which we make neceſſaries, and their Women took care of their Houſes and Clothing, onely the Men were to provide the Hoſe, or Stockings, and Arms; and though the Incas of the Royal Bloud, and ſuch as were Curacas, and rich Men, had Servants to perform all theſe works for them; yet ſometimes for divertiſement, and in complyance with the Profeſſion which their Law enjoyned them, they ſometimes did not diſdain to work themſelves, and make a pair of Breeches, or Stockins, or an Arrow, or ſome other ſort of Arms; but as to the Labours of the field both Men and Women, did jointly concur in their aſſiſtence one of the other.

In ſome Provinces far diſtant from Cozco, where the Lands were ill manured, there the Women laboured in the Field, and the Men remained at home to ſpin and weave; but my Diſcourſe is here of thoſe Countries onely to which the Power and Juriſdiction of the Incas did extend, for other parts were ſo barbarous, and void of all humanity, that it were not worth our time or labour to give an account of their Cuſtoms or Manners. The Indian Women were ſo addicted to ſpinning, and ſo unwilling to loſe time from their Labour and Work, that as they walked from the Villages to the City, and ſo in their return home, and alſo in their Viſits, and Converſation together, they ſtill made uſe of their Spindle and Reel; for this was the conſtant employment of the common People; but the Pallas, or Ladies, who were of the Royal Bloud, whenſoever they made their Viſits, they made their Serving-Maids carry their Spindles and work with them, and during their Visits, not to loose time, or be idle, they spun and worked as they discourſed; their Spindles were made of Canes, as we in Spain have them of Iron, they were crooked, but not hollow at the point, as ours are: with their thread they made a kind of Filleting, which they wound in upon their Spindles, twisting it with the fingers of their left hand; their Distaff they carried in their left hand, and not at their girdle; being about a quarter of a yard long, and held between two of their Fingers, and then with both hands they formed the fineneſs of their thread, and cleared it of foulneſs, but did not wet it at their mouths, becauſe in my time they ſpun nothing there beſides Wool and Cottons; nor do they make any great riddance of their work, becauſe their Inſtruments and Tools are bad, as we have already declared.

CHAP. XIV.

How the Women made their Viſits; how they worked; and that common Whores were permitted amongſt them.

WHen any Woman, that was not a Palla, though ſhe were the Wife of a Curaca, who is a Lord that hath command over his Subjects, came to make a Viſit to a Palla, who was a Lady of the Bloud Royal; ſo ſoon as the firſt Salutations and Complements were ended, ſhe preſently asked whether ſhe had any Work for her, or Service to command her; for ſhe carrying not her Work with her, did ſeem to intimate, that ſhe pretended not to ſo much familiarity as to come onely for Converſe, but as an inferiour, to demand wherein ſhe might be eſteemed uſefull in her ſervice. The Palla, to make a courteous return to this humble proffer, would uſually give her ſome of the ſame work which ſhe, or one of her Daughters was then working; for to have put any thing elſe into her hand, which her Maids were doing, would have equalled her Viſitant with them, which in this manner was a Complement, and a courteous preferring her to ſome degree of equality with her ſelf and her Daughters. Such was the courteſie and obliging carriage of one to the other; for it was the deſign and faſhion in that ſtate, for the Superiours to carry themſelves with an affable and winning behaviour towards their inferiours, and for them with all Modeſty and Obſervance to honour and reſpect their ſuperiour Magiſtrates and Rulers; which was the common practice of all, even from the Inca, who was King, to the meaneſt Peaſant, or Shepherd, whom they called Llamamichec.

The Spaniſh Women, which came afterwards to live at Cozco, imitated this cuſtome, after the manner of the Indian Women, carrying always their Work with them, whenſoever they came to make their Viſits; and this faſhion was in uſe amongſt them to their great commendation, untill ſuch time as Franciſco Hernandez began his Civil War, which as it introduced nothing but Tyranny and Cruelty, ſo it aboliſhed this laudable cuſtome, and diſcountenanced all vertuous and innocent practices. I forgot to mention the great care they had in mending their Clothes, in caſe they were broken by any accident, as torn by a Nail, or burnt with a coal of fire, for then they preſently derned it up again with their needle made of a Thorn, and with thread of the ſame colour; and bringing it again to the Loom, they ſo neatly wove in the Thread, that it could not be ſeen where the rent was made; and in this matter they thought they had more wit than the Spaniards, and would laugh at the patches they laid on their Clothes: The truth is, the Web which the Indians wove, was different to the fabrick of Cloth which the Spaniards made, and would not bear the ſame ſort of mending. It is alſo obſervable, that the Fire-hearths which the Indians uſed to dreſs their meat in, were a kind of Ovens, made of clay, bigger or leſs, according to the Wealth or Eſtate of the Maſter: the Fire vented it ſelf at the mouth of theſe Ovens, and on the top was a place for two or three Diſhes, in which they ſet them to ſtew; and was ſo very a great convenience for their Cookery, both in dreſſing their Meat well, and ſaving their Wood; that it ſeemed the moſt ingenious of all their contrivances; and therefore it was ſtrange, that the Spaniards, when they came in amongſt them, ſhould deſpiſe and deſtroy this invention.

To avoid greater evils, the Incas thought fit to permit common Whores to live amongſt them; but then they were not to remain in the City, but in little Huts without in the Fields, ſeparate from all ſociety that ſo by their converſation they might not have opportunity to corrupt other Women: the Name they gave them was Pampayruna, which ſignifies both their profeſſion and place of reſidence; Pampa is a Countrey or open place; and Runa properly is a Perſon, either Man or Woman; ſo that theſe two words in compoſition, are as much as one who lives alone in the Field; and as we ſay, a Hedge-whore; and that as the Fields are open, ſo is her Body, and embraces to receive any one who hath an appetite to come to her. The Men treated theſe Women with all ſort of contempt and ſcorn; and the Women were not ſo much as to name them, under penalty of incurring the ſame title and cenſure; and of having their Heads publickly ſhorn, of being ſtigmatized for infamous, and divorc'd from their Husbands: they never called them by other name, than that of Pampayruna, which is as much as Common Harlot.

CHAP. XV.

The Inca Roca, the ſixth King, ſubdues many Nations, and, amongſt others, the People of Chancas and Hancohuallo.

THE Father being dead, his Son Inca Roca (whoſe Name, as Blas Valera ſays, ſignifies prudent and conſiderate) took upon him the Government, binding his Head with the coloured Wreath; and having accompliſhed the Solemnities of his Father's Funeral, he made a progreſs into all parts of his Dominions, to viſit, and ſettle, and order what was there amiſs; in which Journey he paſſed the three firſt years of his Reign: And then determining to proceed farther in his Conqueſts, he ordered ſufficient force to be levied, and therewith paſſed on the ſide of Chinchaſuyu, which lyes Northerly from Cozco. He commanded alſo that a Bridge ſhould be made over the River Apurimac, which is in the great Road from the City of Cozco to the King's Town; for that he being now King, it ſeemed too low and mean for him to tranſport his Army over the River on Floats, as he had done when he was Prince; being more Great and Royal to erect the fix'd convenience of a Bridge, which for better uniting a correſpondence with the Provinces lately conquered, was now become almoſt neceſſary.

The Bridge being finiſhed, he departed from Cozco with an Army of twenty thouſand Men, under the Command of four Major-Generals, ordering his Men to March three a-breaſt over this Bridge; which being a new device, and not before practiſed, was Recorded to the Honour of his Memory. Thence he proceeded to the Vale of Amancay, or the Cowſlip Vally, becauſe of the great quantities of them which grow in thoſe parts; this Flower is in the faſhion of a Bell, and in that Countrey are of a greeniſh colour, ſmooth, without Leaves; and for their ſimilitude with the Cowſlip, the Spaniards gave them that name. From Amancay he took to the right hand, towards the Mountain Cordillera, which overtops the ſnowy deſart, and between that and the great Road he met ſome few people, people, whom he reduced under his Dominion, the which were called Tacmara and Quinnualla; then he came to Cochacaſſa, where he made ſome ſtay and aboad; and from thence he proceeded to Curampa, and, without difficulty, ſubdued that people, becauſe they were few in number; from Curampa he came to the Province called Antahuaylla, which is inhabited on both ſides of the way for the ſpace of ſixteen or ſeventeen Leagues, by a people both rich and warlike: This Nation is called Chanca, boaſting themſelves to be deſcended from one Leon, whom they eſteemed and adored for a God; and at their great Feſtivals, both before and after they were ſubdued by the Incas, they carried twenty four Pictures in Proceſſion, painted after the manner of Hercules, with a Lion's skin, and a Man's head: I remember I ſaw theſe Pictures once brought forth on Corpus Chriſti day, or the Feaſt of the Holy Sacrament. Under this denomination of Chanca many other Nations were comprehended, as Hanco hualla, Vtunſulla, Vramarca, Villca and others; all of which make their boaſts of being deſcended from different Originals; ſome from this Fountain, others from that Lake; every Nation eſteeming that for their God, and thereunto offering Sacrifice, from whence they owned and derived their Pedigree; the Anceſtours of theſe people were ſaid to be come from far, and to have conquered many Provinces in their paſſage untill they arrived at the Countrey of Antahuaylla; the which they ſubdued by force of Arms, and expelled the ancient Inhabitants of it; and afterwards gaining much Land from the Quechuas, they drove them up, and ſtraitned them in their Quarters, made them pay a Tribute, which they exacted with the higheſt Tyranny, beſides many other famous Atchievements, of which their poſterity did greatly glory. Of all which the Inca Roca being well informed, he thought them worthy of his Conqueſt; ſo that ſo ſoon as he arrived on the Confines of Antahuaylla, he diſpatched his uſual Summons to the Chancas, requiring them to ſubmit to the Offſpring of the Sun, or otherwiſe prepare themſelves for battel. Theſe people aſſembling together to conſider of theſe Summons, were divided into two ſeveral Parties and Opinions. Some maintained that they ought not to refuſe to receive the Inca for their Lord, who was deſcended from the Sun; others who boaſted of their Lineage from Leon, were of a contrary perſuaſion; for being Allied to Leon, and Maſters of many Countries and People, judged it a diſparagement to be ſubjected to any other, or to be cheated with a fabulous pretence of the Sun and his Family; and that it was more agreeable to the Banners which they carried, and the ancient Honours which they had acquired by the Conqueſt of ſo many Nations, rather to ſubdue others, than tamely to ſubmit to an unknown Maſter; and forgetting all their ancient bravery, poorly and baſely to yield themſelves at the firſt Summons without ſo much as an appearance in the Field, or diſplaying their Banners would argue the higheſt piece of degeneracy and cowardiſe of mind in the World.

In this ambiguity of mind and irreſolution, ſometimes inclining to a ſurrender, and then again to adventure a battel, the Chancas perſiſted many days; of which the Inca having intelligence, determined to enter their Countrey, and affright them with the advance of his Army; for that perhaps to a people of their diſpoſition, who availed themſelves much upon their ancient Proweſs and Victories; indulgence and gentleneſs would be argued as a point of fear and cowardiſe, and that therefore to attempt them briskly was the onely way to ſtrike a terrour in them, and aſtoniſh them with the fear of a cruel War, and a ſevere Puniſhment as an effect thereof; in purſuance of this reſolution, he ordered his Major-Generals to invade the Countrey of Antahuaya; and immediately upon their entry to ſend their Summons to the Chancas, telling them plainly, that they muſt either receive the Inca for their Lord, or elſe muſt prepare to offer their lives a ſacrifice to his Sword; for that their contumacy and rebellion was ſuch as was not longer tolerable, and that their delays and impertinencies had already wearied his patience. The Chancas obſerving this reſolution of the Inca, and that the Quechuas, and other Nations, whom in former times they had injured and provoked, judged it convenient to temporize, and with a feigned ſubmiſſion to accept the conditions of Surrender, being moved thereunto out of fear of his force, and of that revenge which their Enemies might by this opportunity take upon them, rather than out of any affection or eſteem they had to his Laws and Ordinances, as will be proved hereafter in the proceſs of this Hiſtory.

The Inca leaving his Officers to receive their ſubmiſſion, proceeded forward in his Conqueſts to another Province called Vramarca, which alſo is ſurnamed Chanca, and is a ſmall Countrey, but very populous, and inhabited by ſuch a hardy and war-like Nation; that had their Numbers been equal to their Courage, they had been capable to have made a ſtout and conſiderable reſiſtance; for that the people on this ſide were not ſo eaſie, and ſimple, and fond of the Incas, and their Government, as were thoſe of Contiſuyu and Collaſuyu; howſoever, to be ſhort, thoſe of Vramarca ſubmitted, but with much reluctancy, and againſt their inclinations. Thence the Inca marched forwards to the people called Hancohuallo and Villca, named by the Spaniards Vilcas, who with the ſame unwillingneſs yielded to the power of the Inca; for that theſe people, being all Chancas, were Lords themſelves of divers Provinces, which by force of Arms they had ſubdued, and did daily enlarge their Dominions; with which their ambition and covetouſneſs increaſing, they could not, without difficulty, forego their Uſurpations and Tyranny over others, to yield themſelves to the ſame conditions; the which refractary humour of theirs the Inca Roca obſerving, reproved in them with ſevere reprehenſion; and though they received his Admonitions with Mortification and Anger, yet they durſt not openly own and diſcover their diſlike. In both theſe Provinces their cuſtome was to Sacrifice Children to their Gods at their principal Feaſts; of which the Inca being informed, he made a diſcourſe to them of the inhumanity and unreaſonableneſs of ſuch a cuſtome, and that for the future they ſhould Adore the Sun for their God, and receive the Statutes and Ordinances which he had given them; declaring to them by his own mouth, that he would exact the life of every Child at their hands, whom they ſhould in that manner attempt to deſtroy; and that in puniſhment for the offence, he would deſtroy and root out their whole Nation, and give their Countrey to be inhabited by a better ſort of people, of more bowels and compaſſion, who ſhould love and cheriſh their own bloud, as nature required them. Nothing could come more doleſull and ſad, than this news to the Ears of theſe people, who were perſuaded by the Devils, whom they worſhipped for their Gods, that this Sacrifice of tender Infants was moſt acceptable of any to the Infernal Powers.

From Villca he took the way on the left hand, and marched Weſtward, towards the Sea-coaſt, and entred one of thoſe two Provinces, which are both ſtyled by the name of Sulla, though for diſtinction ſake one of them is called Vtumſulla: theſe two Provinces comprehend under them many Nations of different Names, ſome of them being full of people, others having but few. And in the Hiſtories of theſe matters, to avoid tedious diſcourſes, they report, that the Number of them might be of about forty thouſand Families; in the ſubduing of which, the Inca is ſaid to have ſpent much time, and ſome report three years; which were chiefly taken up in the perſuaſions and gentle Arts which the Inca uſed for reducing of that people, being more deſirous to conquer them by kindneſs, than the ſeverity of Arms. For thoſe Indians confiding much in their own Numbers, and Art of War, did often incline to a breach, and a defence of themſelves; but that the moderation of the Inca, and his prudent conduct of affairs was ſuch, that with time he reduced them to his ſervice, and a willingneſs to receive his Laws, and ſuch Governours and Miniſters as he was pleaſed to conſtitute over them; and then afterwards with this ſucceſs and victory he returned to Cozco. In theſe two Provinces of Sulla and Vtumſulla, there were about thirty two years paſt, ſome very rich Mines diſcovered of Silver, and Quick-ſilver; the latter of which is very uſefull in Melting the Silver Ore.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Prince Yahuarhuacac, and the Interpretation of his Name.

THE King Inca Roca having paſſed ſome Years in the quiet poſſeſſion and government of his Kingdoms, thought it fit to employ his Son and Heir, named Yahuarhuacac, in the entire Conqueſt of Antiſuyu, which lyes to the Eaſt of Cozco, and not far from the City; for on that ſide no great advance had been made ſince the time of the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, who had not proceeded farther than the River Paucartampu.

But before we proceed farther in the Relation of this Story, it would be requiſite to explain the ſignification of this long name of Yahuar-huacac, and the reaſon which they had to give it to the Prince. It is a Tale amongſt the Indians, that when he was a Child of three or four years old, his Tears were bloud, perhaps it was becauſe he had ſome diſeaſe in his Eyes, and that the bloud, when he cried, might fall from thence with his tears: But it is a general belief amongſt them, that ſo ſoon as he came crying into the World, his Tears were bloud: It might likewiſe perhaps be, that he brought ſomething of the Matritial bloud with him on his Eyes, which the ſuperſtitious Indians were ready to interpret for Tears; but be the cauſe what it will, they would not be perſuaded out of this belief; and on this ſuppoſition founded many of their Witcheries and Prognoſtications, foretelling the anger and diſpleaſure of his Father the Sun againſt him, and that therefore he would be unfortunate and accurſed. The derivation therefore of his Name, is evident from Yahuar, to weep, and Huacac. This manner of Weeping muſt have been when he was a Child, and not at Man's eſtate; for then he was neither overcome nor taken Priſoner, as ſome will have it; for none of the Incas was ever ſo unfortunate, untill the time of the wretched Huaſcar, whom the Traytor Atahualpa his Baſtard-brother took Priſoner, as we ſhall relate in its due place, if God Almighty gives us life and power to arrive ſo far in this our Hiſtory. Nor was he ſtoln away when he was an Infant, as ſome Writers will have it; for it is not probable, that when Indians conceived generally ſuch awe and veneration for their Incas and the Royal Bloud, that any perſon ſhould be found ſo profligate, and daring as to ſteal the Prince and Heir to the Empire; nor is it probable, that the Tutors and Servants ſhould be ſo remiſs in their care and charge; for ſuch was the reverence that the Indians bore towards their Incas, that the very imagination of ſuch an attempt would have terrified them to that degree, that they would have believed the very thought would have procured the vengeance of Heaven, and cauſed the Earth to have opened and ſwallowed both them and their whole Families: For, as we have formerly ſaid, they Worſhipped the Sun for their God, and for his ſake the Incas, whom they accounted Children deſcended from him, were adored with the ſame divine Honours.

Theſe Tears of bloud which the Indians interpreted to be ominous, and to be fore-runners of ſome diſmal fate, put me in mind of another ſuperſtitious fancy of theirs, which they gathered from the motion and twinkling of the eyes; for it was a common opinion both of the Incas and his Subjects, that the Eyes did Prognoſticate by their motion and twinkling either good or bad fortune; for it was accounted good luck when the upper eye-lid of the left eye twinkled, for they ſaid, that it foreſaw matters of contentment and ſatisfaction; but much more when the right eye-lid ſparkled and twinkled, that was a moſt excellent ſign of all happineſs and proſperity, peace and plenty imaginable: And to the contrary, when the lower Curtain of the right eye trembled, it betokened weeping and tears for ſome ſad and unfortunate accident; but if the lower part of

of the left eye moved, it foretold nothing but woe and ſorrow, and ſuch miſeries as would produce nothing but grief, and abundance of tears: And ſuch confidence and belief did they put in theſe ſymptoms, that in caſe the lower eye-laſhes did but ſo much as tremble, they immediately put themſelves into moſt violent paſſions of fear and weeping; and in apprehenſion of what they feared, they made themſelves more miſerable, than if all the misfortunes of the World had already fallen upon them: And then for the onely remedy of the enſuing evils, they entertained another ſuperſtition more ridiculous than the former: they would take the point of a Straw, and wetting it with Spittle, they would ſtick it beneath their eye; and would then ſay, comforting themſelves, that that bleſſed Straw which croſſed their under eye-lid would ſtanch the tears which were to flow from their eyes, and prevent the Evils which the tremblings did Prognoſticate: The like conjectures almoſt they made from a buzzing, or ſinging in their Ears, which I forbear to enlarge upon, becauſe it was not ſo remarkable and certain as that of the Eyes; and both one and the other I can teſtifie, becauſe I have ſeen and heard their Lamentations on thoſe occaſions.

The King Inca Roca (as we have ſaid) reſolving to ſend his Son to conquer Antiſuyu, ordered an Army of fifteen thouſand Souldiers to be raiſed, under the Command of three Major-Generals, whom he joined with him for Companions and Counſellours. The Prince being well inſtructed in all matters, proceeded with good ſucceſs as far as the River Paucartampu, and thence marched forwards to Challapampa, where he reduced thoſe few poor Indians which he found in thoſe Quarters; thence he paſſed to Pillcupata, where he planted four Colonies with a ſort of wandring and vagabond people. From Pillcupata he travelled to Haviſca and Tuna, where the firſt Subjects of Chac-ras de Cuca ſubmitted to the Dominion of the Incas, and where great quantities of that Herb called Cuca grows: the Inheritance of Haviſca was afterwards given to my Lord and Father Garçilaſſo de Vega, and he was pleaſed to beſtow that Eſtate upon me for my life, but I renounced, and left it upon my going into Spain. The paſſage into theſe Vallies where the Cuca grows, is over that high Mountain called Canac-huay, deſcending five Leagues almoſt perpendicular, which makes a Man's head giddy to look down; how much more labourſome muſt it be to aſcend and deſcend thoſe ways turning and winding in form of a Serpent?

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Idols which the Indians of Antis worſhipped, and of the Conqueſt made over the Charcas.

IN thoſe Provinces of Antis they commonly worſhipped Tygers for their Gods, and great Serpents, much thicker than a Man's Thigh, and twenty five, or thirty foot in length, though ſome others might be leſs, called Amaru; they are a certain ſort of a ſluggiſh Serpent, which are not venomous, and, as they ſay, were charmed by a skilfull Sorcereſs, that they ſhould doe no harm, having before been dangerous, and very poiſonous. The Tiger they adored for his nimbleneſs and bravery, ſaying that Serpents and Tygers were the true and natural Inhabitants and Lords of that Countrey, and therefore did juſtly require reverence and reſpect from Men, who were but Strangers and Aliens in it. They worſhipped alſo the Plant Cuca, or Coca, as the Spaniards call it. Thus far the Prince Yahuar-Huacac having enlarged his Dominions, being almoſt thirty Leagues in length, and in a Countrey ill Inhabited, he found himſelf ſtopped in his farther progreſs, by the Mountains, mooriſh Grounds and Bogs, which interrupted him in his paſſage, and which confine and give bounds to that Province, properly named Anti, whence all that ſide takes the Denomination of Antiſuyu.

The Prince having finiſhed this Conqueſt, returned to Cozco, where his Father for that preſent, thought fit to repoſe, and lay aſide all farther deſigns of new Enterpriſes; for on the ſide of Antiſuyu, which is to the Eaſtward, there remained nothing more to conquer; and to the Weſtward, which they called Cuntiſuyu, there was nothing more to be reduced, for they were come as far as to the Paciſick Sea, or the Sea of Zur, ſo that the Empire, from Eaſt to Weſt, extended at leaſt an hundred Leagues croſs along by the way of Cozco, and then from North to South it reached two hundred Leagues: All which tract of Land the Incas laboured to manure, and cultivate, and adorn with Royal Palaces, Gardens, Baths, and places of Pleaſure for divertiſement of the Inca; and for better convenience of the Countrey, they erected in all the great Roads Magazines and Granaries, wherein to lodge their Ammunition, Arms, Corn, Proviſions, and Clothing for the common Souldiery.

Some Years being paſſed in this manner with peace and quiet, when the King Inca Roca reſolved to add another famous Atchievement to the glory of his Reign, that ſo in perſon he might put an end to the entire Conqueſt of thoſe great Provinces, which were called Charcas, the beginning of which was commenced in the time of his Father, in the Diviſion of Collaſuyu: And in order hereunto he commanded thirty thouſand Men to be levied, which was an Army greater than any that his Anceſtours had yet brought into the field; to command this Army ſix Major Generals were appointed, beſides other inferiour Officers; and the Prince Yahuar-Huacac was, with four other Incas for his Counſellors, ordained to remain at home for government of the Kingdom. The Inca took his Journey from Cozco by way of the great Road towards Collaſuyu, and in his march all the forces came in to make up his Army: And being come to the Confines of thoſe Provinces of Chuncuri, Pucuna, and Muyumuyu, which bordered on his Kingdom; he ſent his ſummons to them, acquainting them, that he was come to reduce thoſe Nations, and require them to live under thoſe Laws which his Father the Sun had ordained; and that leaving their Idols made of Stone and Wood, they ſhould worſhip him onely for their God; and that forſaking their corrupt Cuſtoms, and Manners, they ſhould learn and follow the light of Nature, and the Inſtructions of his Wiſdom, which would direct them in ways more agreeable to humane Life. The Natives of theſe Countries received the meſſage with great anger, and the young and hot Captains betook themſelves to their Arms, and anſwered with fury and rage, That it was a hard caſe for them, that they muſt be forced to renounce their own natural Gods, and adore a ſtranger, and a God unknown to them; that that they must reject their own Laws and Customs, and receive new ones from the Inca; who in recompense thereof would impose Tributes and Taxes, and serve himself of their labour and services, as of Slaves and Vassals; which being conditions not to be endured by a People so free as they, they resolved to defend themselves, and dye in the Defence of their Gods, their Countrey and their Liberty.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Argument and Debate which the Old Men held on this matter, and in what manner they received the Inca.

NOtwithstanding this huff of the young Souldiers, the more ancient and considerate amongst them, were of opinion, that they should not so soon break forth into a War, but first of all consider, that for several years they have had a neighbourhood and converse with the Subjects of the Inca; and that they could never hear otherwise from them, but that their Laws were good, and the Yoke of their Government gentle and easie: that he treated his People rather like his Children, than his Subjects; that the Lands which they required, were not those which the Indians had in their possession, but such as lay waste, and unmanured by them; and that he required no other Tribute than the Fruit and Benefit which those Lands, cultivated at his own cost and charge, should produce, and not exact any thing at the labour and cost of the Indians, to whom he rather gave than diminished from their Estates; and in proof and evidence hereof, without other argument, they desired them to enquire, and consider seriously without passion, how much the Subjects of the Incas were improved in their Estates, and how quiet, civil and prosperous they were become, since their submission to his Government; how all their Discords, Animosities, and Civil Dissentions, which in former times had miserably torn and distracted them, were now appeased; how Estates were more secure, and more protected from Thieves, their Wives, and Daughters from Rapes and Adulteries; and in fine, how quiet and well established was the publick Welfare, where none durst offer injury, nor none could receive it without redress.

That they should farther consider, that many neighbouring Provinces, being well satisfied and allured by the gentleness and happiness of this servitude, did voluntarily, and of their own accords, offer themselves, and beg the Protection of the Inca and his Laws. And since these things were thus apparent, it were better to submit readily and without constraint, than defending themselves for the present from that which they know they must in a short time yield unto, provoke the Inca to that degree of Anger and Displeasure, as might divert him from those good Intentions and Favours which he designed towards them; and that therefore it were more safe and secure, both for their Lives and Estates, their Wives and Children, to make a Vertue of Necessity, and submit with a voluntary surrender: and that as to their Gods, which the Inca imposed upon them, reason it self instructed, and taught them, that the Sun more visibly deserved to be adored and worshipped, than any of those dumb and insensible Idols, which they had made and formed with their own hands. With these Arguments, and others of the like nature, the ancient and sage Persons so far prevailed, that took off the mettle and heat of the young Men, so that they all unanimously went to receive the Inca; the young Men marched with Arms in their hands, and the old with their Presents of such Fruits as their Countrey yielded, saying, That the Fruits of their Land were in token of that Livery and Seizin which they were to give unto the Inca thereof: the young men professed that their Arms were to serve the Inca in his his Wars, and to be employed by him for the acquiſition of new Provinces.

The Inca gratiouſly accepted this their Submiſſion with his accuſtomary Goodneſs, commanding, that in teſtimony thereof, the Old Men ſhould be veſted with the better ſort of Garments, in token of greater reſpect; and that the common People ſhould be clothed with the more common Apparel; and that he might not ſeem wholly to ſlight or contemn the offer which the Captains and Souldiers made him of their Arms, he received five hundred of them into his Service, not by choice, but by lot, leſt the preferring of one before the other, ſhould ſeem but a kind of a neglect, or diſcontent, on ſuch as were refuſed; and to ſatisfie the reſt, he adviſed them to return to their homes, leſt they ſhould otherwiſe leave their own Countrey naked and undefended; with the Veſtments which the Inca gave them, and his Behaviour towards them, both the young and old were ſo well pleaſed and ſatisfied, that with loud Acclamations they cryed out, How like art thou to a Child of the Sun! how worthy art thou of the Title of a King! how well doth the Name of being a Friend to the Poor befit thee! for no ſooner had we ſubmitted to be thy Subjects, before thou didſt load us with thy Favours and Benefits. May the Bleſſings of thy Father the Sun light upon thee, and all the Nations of the four quarters of the World obey and fall down before thee; for thou art truly the Capa Inca, who deſerves Riches, and abſolute Power, and univerſal Dominion. With theſe, or the like expreſſions of Honour, the Inca Roca being ſaluted by his new Vaſſals, and having provided and eſtabliſhed Miniſters and Officers to inſtruct and govern them, he marched forwards to the bordering Provinces, called Miſqui, Sacaca, Machaca, Caracara, and others, as far as Chuquiſaca, which is now called the City of Plate: all which were comprehended under the common denomination of Charcas, though they were of different Nations and Languages, and were all as eaſily reduced, as thoſe before mentioned. In this expedition he enlarged his Empire North and South, a hundred Leagues, and as many more Eaſt and Weſt; and having as accuſtomary left Officers and Miniſters to teach and inſtruct them in matters of Religion, and to govern them by Laws, and gather his Revenue, he returned to Cozco, where he disbanded his Army, and rewarded the Commanders according to their Deſerts.

Having atchieved theſe great matters, he ſeemed now to deſire repoſe, and attend onely to Peace, and the quiet Adminiſtration of his Government, in which he ſpent the remaining years of his Life, we cannot ſay how many; but at length he came to dye, having not in the leaſt degenerated from the Vertue of his Anceſtours; but rather imitated and equalled them in the higheſt ſtrain of their glorious and martial Actions, and in Good-will and Beneficence towards his People. He founded ſome Schools where the Amautas taught thoſe Sciences which they had attained; near whereunto he built himſelf a Houſe, as we ſhall declare in its due place, inſtituted Laws, and uttered grave Sentences: And becauſe Blas Valera hath made particular mention of ſome of them, we ſhall repeat them from him, being very remarkable, and worthy to be noted. He was univerſally bewailed by all his Subjects, and embalmed according to the cuſtome of thoſe Kings. He left Yahuar-huacac, his Son and Heir by his lawfull Wife and Siſter Mama Micay, to ſucceed him in the Government of his Dominions: beſides whom he left others, both legitimate and baſtard Children.

CHAP. XIX.

Of ſome Laws which the King, Inca Roca, made; of the Schools which he founded in Cozco; and of ſome of his wiſe Apophthegms, or Sayings.

BLas Valera, who was very curious, and had taken great pains in his Enquiries touching theſe Incas, ſaith, "That this King reigned almoſt fifty Years, "and made many Laws, amongſt which theſe following are the moſt obſerva- "ble. That the Children of the common People ought not to be educated in "the Liberal Arts and Sciences, for that were to make them proud, conceited "and ungovernable; but that the Nobility were thoſe onely to whom ſuch Li- "terature did appertain, to render them more honourable, and capable of Offices "in the Common-wealth. That Thieves, Murtherers, and Adulterers, and In- "cendiaries ſhould be hanged without Mercy. That Sons ſhould obey and ſerve "their Fathers, untill they came to the age of twenty five Years, and that after- "wards they ſhould be employed in matters tending to the good of the Com- "mon-wealth. It is reported that he was the firſt who founded Schools in Cozco, "where the Amautas were the Maſters, and taught ſuch Sciences as were fit to "improve the minds of Incas, who were Princes, and of the chief Nobility, not "that they did inſtruct them by way of Letters, for as yet they had not attained "to that knowledge, but onely in a practical manner, and by daily Diſcourſes: "their other Lectures were of Religion, and of thoſe Reaſons and Wiſedom on "which their Laws were eſtabliſhed, and of the Number and true Expoſition "of them; for by theſe means they attained to the Art of Government and mi- "litary Diſcipline; they diſtinguiſhed the times and ſeaſons of the Year, and "by reading in their * Knots, they learned Hiſtory, and the Actions of paſt "ages; they improved themſelves alſo in the elegance, and ornament of ſpeaking, "and took Rules and Meaſures for the management of their domeſtick affairs. "Theſe Amautas, who were Philoſophers, and in high eſteem amongſt them, "taught ſomething alſo of Poetry, Muſick, Philoſophy and Aſtrology, of all which "they attained to ſome knowledge, though ſuperficial, and in a low and mean "degree. All theſe particulars were inſtituted in manner of a Law by this Inca "Roca, and afterwards, for their better encouragement, he favoured and enlarged "them with fair Endowments; and hereunto Pachacutec, to whom he was great "Uncle, added many other Laws and Precepts. The Sayings of this King Inca "Roca were theſe: That conſidering the immenſe Vaſtneſs, Beauty and Splen- "dour of the Heavens, he would often ſay, That if the Heaven be ſo glorious, which "is the Throne and Seat of the Pachacamac, (who is the great God) how much more "powerfull, glittering and reſplendent muſt his Perſon and Majeſty be, who was the Maker "and Creatour of them all. Other ſayings of his were theſe: If I were to adore any "of theſe terreſtial things, it ſhould certainly be a wiſe and diſcreet Man, whoſe Excellen- "cies ſurpaſs all earthly Creatures. When an Infant is born, he grows up, and then he "dies. He that yeſterday had a beginning, to day arrives at his end. He that cannot make "himſelf immortal, nor recover that Life which Death hath deprived him of, is not worthy "of adoration. Thus far is the report which Blas Valera hath given us.

* What the Knots were, is before mentioned.

CHAP. XX.

Of the Inca, Yahuar-huacac, who was the ſeventh King; of his Fears and Conqueſts, and the Diſgrace of the Prince his Eldeſt Son.

THE King, Inca Roca, being dead, his Son Yahuar-huacac ſucceeded him in the Inheritance of his Kingdom, and governed with Juſtice, Piety and Gentleneſs, cheriſhing his Subjects with as much indulgence and tenderneſs, as was poſſible. His chief deſign was to keep and preſerve what his Father and Anceſtours had left him, not ſeeking quarrels with any, or encroachments on others right; leſt contemning the ill omen of his Name, and the misfortunes which the skilfull Maſters in Divination did daily preſage, he ſhould tempt his fortune, and provoke his Father the Sun to afflict him with all thoſe evils which they prognoſticated. With this fear and apprehenſion he lived for many years, deſiring nothing more than peace and quietneſs, both at home and abroad; but not to remain altogether idle, he viſited all parts of his Dominions three or four times, and improved and adorned them with ſtately Buildings, feaſted, and generally careſſed all his Subjects in a higher degree, and with greater demonſtrations of love and tenderneſs, than any of his Anceſtours, which were effects of the great dangers he apprehended from the Prophecies concerning him; and in this caution and dread upon his Spirits, he continued for the ſpace of nine or ten years: untill at length conſidering that this cautious timidity would argue Cowardiſe and lowneſs of Spirit, of which none of his Anceſtours were ever before taxed, he reſolved to ſend an Army of twenty thouſand Men to the Southweſt of Cozco, along the Coaſt of Arequepa, where a point of Land runs out far into the Sea, which his Predeceſſours had overſeen, or neglected, becauſe it was ill inhabited: His Brother, called Inca Mayta, he made Commander in Chief of his Forces, and for that reaſon was ever afterwards called Apu Mayta, or General Mayta, to whom he added four other Incas, to be Major-Generals under him: But as to himſelf, he would not adventure to go in Perſon; for the thoughts of the ill Omen did ſtill ſo haunt and oppreſs his Spirits, that he could never reſolve to truſt the ſucceſs of any martial adventure to the fortune of his own Perſon; and where the deſire of Glory ſpurred him forward to any great Attempt, there always the dread of the ſiniſter Omen retracted and drew him back. This apprehenſion moving him to commit the charge of his Army to his Brother, and Officers, they proceeded ſo ſucceſsfully in it, that in a ſhort time they reduced all that tract of Land from Arequepa to Tacama, which they call Collaſuyu, to his Empire, being at this time the utmoſt Limit and Confine by the Sea-coaſt of that Countrey which they call Peru, the which Land being long, and narrow, and ill peopled, coſt more time to march it over than to conquer it.

This Enterpriſe being thus happily completed, they returned again to Cozco, where they rendred an account to the Inca, Yahuar-huacac, of their ſucceſs; with which taking heart, and recovering new courage, he began to aſpire to the Honour and Fame of reducing thoſe great Provinces, yet unconquered in the Diviſion of Collaſuyu, called Caranca, Ullaca, Llipi, Chica, Ampara, the which, as they were large, and great, ſo they were populous, and defended by a warlike Nation; and for this reaſon the ancient Incas forbore to moleſt or irritate them, leſt being as yet uncivilized, and unacquainted with the gentle and eaſie Government of the Incas, they ſhould fly to their Arms, and oblige the Incas againſt their Maximes, and natural Diſpoſition, to ſubject them with Slaughter and Deſtruction; and therefore rather choſe to tame and mollifie them by degrees, and prevail by the clear Evidences of their Neighbours Happineſs, to perſuade them into a good opinion of the gentleneſs of that Yoke which the Inca impoſed on his Subjects.

With the cares and fears of this Conqueſt the Inca, Yahuar-huacac was greatly turmoiled, being as it were crucified between his hopes and fears, ſometimes he promiſed himſelf good ſucceſs, and that the ſame Fortune would ſmile upon him, that did on his Brother Apu Myata; then again the dread of the fatal Omen poſſeſſed his Mind, which always kept that awe upon him, that he never durſt attempt any thing in War, wherein there appeared leaſt Difficulty or Hazard. Whilſt he was thus toſſed with theſe Paſſions and anguiſh of mind, he was diverted from his foreign Deſigns by domeſtick Troubles, cauſed by the untoward Diſpoſition of his Eldeſt Son, and Heir of his Dominions; who from his Childhood gave ſymptomes of an evil and cruel Nature, by his harſh treatment of thoſe Boys of his own age, who converſed and played with him; and though the Inca his Father uſed all the means imaginable to reclaim him by due and ſevere correction, and that he hoped that Years and Inſtruction would prevail upon him, yet in the end all proved vain, and without effect, the ferocity of his Mind, and the impetuoſity of his ill Nature prevailing over all the means, and endeavours to reduce him; for neither the Examples of his Anceſtours, nor the gentle Admonitions, nor ſevere Reproofs of his Father, had any influence upon him; ſo that his deſperate incorrigibleneſs became now the greateſt fear and affliction of the Inca.

For ſo far was the Spirit of ill Nature engrafted in the Heart of this Prince, that all the Treacle of wholeſome Advice he converted into Poiſon; the which his Father having obſerved and duely conſidered, he reſolved wholly to diſcountenance and remove him from his Favour, and if that would not operate, then abſolutely to diſinherit him, and conſtitute another of his lawfull Sons in his place, who was of a Spirit more agreeable to that ſweet Temper and generous Galantry of his Anceſtours. This Reſolution he took in imitation of that Cuſtome practiſed in ſome of his Provinces, where the moſt favoured and moſt worthy was elected to the Government; the which on this occaſion the Inca was deſirous to introduce, againſt all the Precedents and Examples of former Incas. With this intention the Inca commanded the Prince, being now of nineteen or twenty Years of age, to avoid the Court, allotting him a place of Reſidence about a League from the City, and where were fair and verdant Paſtures Eaſtward from the City, which they called Chita, and where I my ſelf remember often to have been, and where his Employment was to feed the Cattle of the Sun, in company with thoſe Shepherds who were deſigned for that Service. The Prince not being able to reſiſt the Pleaſure of his Father, ſubmitted to the Baniſhment and the Diſfavour of the Inca, which laid as a puniſhment on him for the Bravery and Gallantry of his Martial Spirit. In ſhort, he ſubmitted and really applied himſelf with the other Shepherds to keep and feed the Cattel of the Sun for the ſpace of three years, and more, where we will leave him untill the time comes which ſhall bring him on the Stage, and to ſpeak well of him, if that which we are to mention of him may be called good.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Intelligence which an Apparition gave to the Prince, enjoining him to communicate it to his Father.

THE Inca Yahuar-huacac having in this manner Baniſhed his Eldeſt Son, whoſe Name we cannot aſſign, becauſe the obſcurity of his condition was ſuch, as made no impreſſion in the minds of Men, ſo as without the help of Letters to conſerve it in remembrance: He ſeemed now to lay aſide all the thoughts of War, and Conqueſts of new Provinces, and to make the Government of his Dominions, and the Conſervation of the common peace and quietneſs to be his onely employment: As to his Son, he thought it not convenient, nor ſecure to remove him far from his ſight, that ſo he might more eaſily apply thoſe remedies to reclaim him, as beſt ſuited with his condition; nor did he judge it fit to impriſon, and diſinherit, and chuſe ſome other in his place, for that ſeemed an expedient too violent, and without Example, and was a new and unpractiſed caſe to depoſe the true Heir, and degrade the Divinity of the Incas of its Right and Honour; beſides, it appeared doubtfull how far the people would aſſent to this impiety, and how ill they would take this harſh uſage of the Prince and Heir to the Empire.

In this wavering and unquiet condition, which deprived the Inca of all contentment and repoſe, he paſſed three years without any obſervable occurrence; during which time, he twice Commiſſionated four of his Kinſmen to viſit his Dominions, giving to every one their reſpective charges, and diſpatches into diſtinct parts of his Dominions, in order to perform ſuch publick Works as might conduce to the honour of the Inca, and the common benefit of his Subjects; ſuch as the making of Aqueducts, raiſing Magazines for laying up Proviſions, Royal Houſes, Fountains and Bridges, Cauſeys, and ſuch other Works of publick uſe: But for his own part, he never had the courage to depart from his Court, but onely there to attend and celebrate the Feſtivals of the Sun, and ſuch like, and adminiſter Juſtice to his Subjects. At the end of this long time, one day about Noon the Prince entred into the Palace of his Father, without any Companion or Attendance, like a Perſon forlorn, and in diſfavour of his Inca; and ſent him word, that he was there to ſpeak with him, having a Meſſage of high importance to deliver: The Inca made a quick Anſwer in his ſudden paſſion, that he ſhould without Demur or Reply retire again to the place of his Confinement, on penalty of being proceeded againſt according to that ſevere puniſhment which the Law inflicts on thoſe who break the Royal Command. The Prince made anſwer, that he was not come thither in contempt of his Commands, but in obedience to the Meſſage and Injunction of another Inca as great as himſelf, who ſent him to impart unto him matters of high and conſiderable importance; which if he were pleaſed to hear, he deſired to be admitted and to have Audience; if not, he had complied with the Commands of him that ſent him, and ſhould return again to render an account of his ſucceſs.

The Inca hearing him mention another, as Great a Lord as himſelf, ordered him to be admitted, for he wondered at the impertinence of the Meſſage, and the boldneſs of any who ſhould dare to employ his baniſhed and diſgraced Son with Advices of any nature whatſoever. The Prince being introduced, and ſtanding before his Father, ſaid in this manner: I am come, Sir, to make known unto you, that ſitting this day, about Noon, under one of thoſe great Rocks, which are in the Fields of Chita, where, by your Order, I was employed to feed the Flocks of our Father the Sun; I know not whether I was aſleep, or well awake, there appeared before me a Man in a ſtrange Habit, and of a Figure different from us: His Beard was above a ſpan in length, his Garments long and looſe, reaching down to his Feet, and about his Neck he carried a ſort of living creatures, creature, which I know not what to call it, becauſe I never ſaw the like before: He called to me, and ſaid, Couſin, I am a Child of the Sun, and Brother to the Inca, Manco Capac, and to Coya Mama, Occlo Huaco his Wife and Siſter, who were the firſt of your Family, and by them I am Allied in Blood to your Father, and all of you, being called Inca Viracocha; and am ſent by our Father the Sun to order you, that you immediately carry this Advice to my Brother the Inca, acquainting him, that the greateſt part of the Provinces of Chinchaſuyu, as well thoſe who are under his Dominion, as thoſe which are not, are in rebellion, and are united in confederacy to aſſault him, and with a ſtrong and numerous Army to caſt him from his Throne, and deſtroy the Imperial City of Cozco; wherefore I order you immediately to give this intelligence to my Brother the Inca, adviſing him from me, that he provide againſt this emergency, and take ſuch vigorous reſolutions to prevent it, as the importance of this matter doth require. And as to thine own particular, let me tell thee, that in what misfortune ſoever thou art, thou loſe not thy courage or ſpirit, for I ſhall ever be at hand, and ready to ſuccour thee as my own fleſh and blood; and therefore I ſtrictly admoniſh thee not to attempt any thing, how great ſoever it be, unworthy thy Family and ancient Blood, and the Greatneſs of thy Empire; for I will ever be aſſiſtant, and near to ſuccour thee in thy greateſt and ultimate exigencies. Having ſaid theſe words, the Inca Viracocha vaniſhed, and I ſaw him no more; and then returning to my ſelf, I delayed no time to come and appear before your Majeſty to communicate unto you the particulars of theſe Matters.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Conſultation which the Incas held upon the Advice which the Apparition gave.

THE Inca, Yahuar-huacac, out of the great diſpleaſure and prejudice which he had taken to his Son, would not give any belief or credence to his Relation, but rather termed him a Fool, and impertinent, and that ſwelled with the vanity of Revelations from his Father the Sun, he was come to impoſe his Enthuſiaſms for divine Truths; and therefore ordered him immediately to return to Chita, and to confine himſelf within thoſe bounds on penalty of his higheſt diſpleaſure; in compliance to which ſevere admonition, the Prince returned again to his retirement, and the keeping of his Flocks. Howſoever the Incas, who were Counſellours, and had the King's Ear, and of a nature very ſuperſtitious and credulous, eſpecially of Dreams, took this advertiſement in another faſhion, than the King apprehended it, telling him, that ſuch an Apparition as this was not to be ſlighted, eſpecially ſince it preſented it ſelf in the form of Viracocha, who was Brother to the Inca, and of Alliance to the Sun, in whoſe name and behalf he brought this Meſſage. Nor was it credible that the Prince ſhould be ſo much an Impoſtour, as to dare to entitle the Sun to ſuch an apparent forgery, or delude the Inca his Father with a Lye; and therefore that it were beſt to examine the matter more ſtrictly; and by Sacrificing to the Sun, make judgment of the good or bad Omens, and not neglect any care or diligence whatſoever in a matter of ſo high importance; for to leave the matter neglected and ſlighted, were to contemn the advice which the Sun had ſent, and his Meſſenger Viracocha; and, in ſhort, to add Errour unto Errours, and Sins unto Sins.

Notwithſtanding all which, the Inca had conceived that prejudice againſt his Son, that he could upon no terms admit the counſel which his Kindred gave him, but rather termed the Viſion he declared, to be the effect of a wild and furious brain, imagining by lyes and forgeries to bring his extravagant humour again into repute; which was ſuch an aggravation of his former folly, that he deſerved on this very ſcore to be deprived of the inheritance, and declared for ever uncapable of of the Succeſſion; and that in the place of him, ſome other of a more flexible and gentle temper, worthy the title of being allied to the Sun, ſhould be ordained and proclaimed the true Heir in the place and ſtead of a revengefull, mercileſs and tyrannical Prince, and of one of a far different temper to that ſweet and pleaſant humour of his Anceſtours, which had been the moſt forcible Arms to win and overcome all the Nations they governed. Moreover, that in Wiſedom they ought to provide againſt all Rebellions, but not on the ſcore or belief of the vain words of a wild fellow; who ought to be puniſhed, and have his Head cut off for daring to break the limits aſſigned for his Baniſhment; and profaning the Sacred Name of the Sun with a pretence ſo falſe and enthuſiaſtick as this: And therefore he charged them not to mention this matter farther, nor ſo much as to name the Prince, for that he had already determined in what manner to deal with him.

The Incas upon this Command of the King were ſilent, and urged the matter no farther; howſoever, they could not forbear to revolve the thing in their minds, as portending ſome ſad and diſmal diſaſters: For the Indians were naturally addicted to Signs and Prognoſtications; and eſpecially if the King, or the Prince, or the High Prieſt, who were eſteemed Gods and Oracles, had any Dream, they were never at eaſe untill the Diviners, or Magicians, made the Interpretation; in which they eſteemed themſelves ſo expert, that they not onely pretended to interpret the Dream, but alſo to declare what the Incas themſelves had related ſhort, or miſtaken in it.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Rebellion of the Chancas, and of their Ancient exploits in War.

THree Months after this Dream of the Prince Viracocha, (for ſo afterwards his Friends named him from the Viſion he had ſeen) a confuſed and uncertain rumour came of an Inſurrection in the Provinces of Chincaſuyu, and that all the people were in Arms, which is from Atahualla, about forty Leagues Northward from Cozco, through all the Countries to the fartheſt extent of the new Conqueſts. This News had as yet no certain authour or ground, being but whiſpered as in caſes of like nature; and though it agreed with the Dream of the Prince Viracocha, and ſeemed an Accompliſhment of the words of his Viſion, yet the King gave no heed or credit to it, believing it to be a Canterbury tale, or Stories of the way, broached to revive the Dream of the Prince, which ſeemed almoſt forgot, and out of memory: Some few days after the report became hotter than before, and common in every Man's mouth, though ſtill uncertain, and without any particulars; for the Enemies had obſtructed all the ways and paſſages in that manner, that no intelligence ſhould be carried, and that the knowledge of their Rebellion might be firſt made known by appearance of their force before Cozco. Howſoever, at length certain and particular information was brought, that the Nations called Chanca, Uramarca, Villca, Utuſulla, Hancohuallu, and other Neighbouring Nations, were all in Arms; and having killed all the Governours and Officers of the Inca, were now Marching with an Army of forty thouſand Men againſt the City.

Theſe Nations (as we have ſaid) being all reduced by the power of the King Inca Roca, rather out of fear, than love, had ever ſince ſuppreſſed their rancour and malice to the Incas, with intention to own and teſtifie the ſame, when occaſion preſented; which now ſeemed fairly to offer it ſelf in the time of this Inca, Yahuarhuacac, who being a Prince not addicted to War, but rather intimidated by the apprehenſion prehenſion and fear he conceived from his ſiniſter Omen; and being alſo moved with compaſſion of the hard uſage, and unnatural treatment which the Inca ſhewed towards the Prince his Son, they judged it warrant and reaſon ſufficient to revenge his cauſe in deteſtation of the baſe cowardiſe and tyranny of this mean-ſpirited, and yet cruel, Inca: Wherefore with what expedition and ſecrecy they could, they incited their Neighbours to rebell, who being already well diſpoſed in the matter, they eaſily took fire, and putting themſelves in Arms, and with a body of thirty thouſand Men marched directly againſt the Imperial City of Cozco. The principal Authours and Contrivers of this War, beſides other Lords, were three principal Curacas of three great Provinces, all comprehended under the common name of Chanca: The firſt of theſe Lords was called Hancohuallu, a Young Man of twenty ſix years of Age, the ſecond was Tumay Huaraca, and the third Aſtu Huaraca; the two laſt of which were Uncles and Brothers to Hancohuallu. The Anceſtours of theſe three petty Kings, before the times of the Incas, waged a perpetual War with their Neighbouring Nations, eſpecially with the people called Quechua, under which denomination five other great Provinces were contained: For which reaſon, and for the Tyranny and Oppreſſion which they ſuffered from them, the Quechuas were greatly pleaſed to accept and receive the Protection of the Incas. And ſo on the contrary, theſe petty Kings greatly reſented the curb and power the Incas impoſed upon them, by reſtraining them in their Progreſs and Conqueſts, rendring them in the place of abſolute and ſovereign Princes, Tributaries and Vaſſals, which they ſtomached and ſuppreſſed untill this ſeaſon, in which they eſteemed it convenient to vent their hatred. And in regard that the life of all deſigns is ſpeedy execution, and that now they were to ſurprize the Inca, unprovided of Men, and power of Reſiſtence, they did not doubt, but by one ſingle Victory to render themſelves Maſters again, not onely of their ancient Enemies, but of all the Empire of the Incas.

With theſe probable hopes and expectations of ſucceſſes, they invited all their Neighbours, as well thoſe that were Subjects to the Inca, as thoſe that were not, to partake with them in the deſign and reward of the enterprize; the which appeared fair and promiſing in this preſent conjuncture. To theſe Summons the Indians eaſily yielded, expecting great advantages, and depending on the great renown and fame in War, which the Ancient bravery of the Chancas had acquired: And having conſtituted Hanco-huallu their Captain-General, and the two Brothers Major-Generals, with other Curacas for Colonels and Officers, they marched directly with reſolution to Summon and make demand of the City of Cozco.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Inca abandons the City, and the Prince ſuccours it.

SO ſoon as the Inca Yahuar-huacac underſtood the certainty of this News, and of the approach of the Enemy, he was affrighted and terrified within himſelf; for it ſeemed a ſurprize to him to underſtand of a rebellion, for as yet no ſuch thing had ever happened in the Provinces, during the lenity of that Government which the Incas had exerciſed from the time of Manco Capac to thoſe very days; under the ſecurity of which, and out of the hatred he conceived to his Son, to whom he could not allow the honour of divine revelation, he neither would give credit to the dream, nor hearken to the advice or counſel of his kindred; but having blinded his underſtanding with paſſion and prejudice, he found himſelf enſnared in inextricable difficulties, having neither time to levy a force ſufficient to encounter his Enemies, nor a Garriſon in readineſs to defend the City, untill other relief or ſuccour could be adminiſtred. Wherefore in theſe doubts he reſolved to give way to the Torrent of his Enemies rage, and retire towards Collaſuyu, ſuyu, where he promiſed to himſelf ſecurity of life, and defence from the Loyalty and Valour of that people. With this intention and deſign he departed from Cozco with a retinue of ſuch Incas as were able to follow him, and came to the Straits of Mayna, about five Leagues Northward from the City, towards the Sea of Zur, and there poſted himſelf on the top Mountain, from whence he could ſurvey the Enemies Camp, and deſcry what they acted in the way as they paſſed. The King having thus abandoned Cozco, the City was expoſed to open violence, none daring to propoſe, much leſs act in the defence of it; every one endeavouring to ſhift for himſelf, and ſave his life in the beſt manner he was able. Of theſe Fugitives, ſome repaired to the Prince Viracocha, informing him of the Rebellion of Chincaſuyu, and of the flight of his Father; and that there was no poſſibility in ſo ſhort time and warning to withſtand or make head againſt the Enemy.

The Prince deeply reſenting this ſad news of the flight of his Father, and the nakedneſs of the City, commanded thoſe who brought him the advice, and thoſe few Shepherds that were with him, that they ſhould immediately repair to the City, and order thoſe that they ſhould find there, and as many as they ſhould meet in the ways, that they ſhould with ſuch Arms as they had, and with as much ſpeed as they could poſſibly, repair to the Inca their Lord and Maſter; giving them likewiſe to underſtand, that it was his intention ſo to doe, and that this was his Order and Special Command to them. Having iſſued out this advice, the Prince Viracocha proceeded in Queſt of his Father, and without viſiting the City, he took a ſhort cut; and loſing no time, overtook him in the Straits of Muyna, from whence he was not as yet departed; and being covered over with ſweat and duſt, holding a Lance in his hand, which he had caſually taken up on the way, he preſented himſelf before the King, and with a grave and melancholy countenance, he thus addreſſed his Speech to him.

How is it, Inca, that upon a report (whether true or falſe, is uncertain) of ſome few of your Subjects riſen in Rebellion, you ſhould abandon your City and Court, and fly before an Enemy, not as yet ſeen, nor appearing? How can you yield and reſign the Temple of the Sun your Father into the power of your Enemies, to be polluted by their prophane and unhallowed feet; giving them thereby liberty to return to their ancient Abominations, and there offer again their deteſtable Sacrifices of Men, Women and Children, with other unhumane and unnatural actions, from which your Anceſtours had reformed them? What account ſhall we be able to render of the charge committed to us for guard and defence of thoſe Virgins dedicated to the Sun, if we abandon and leave them to the brutality and luſts of our Enemies? And what benefit ſhall we get by ſaving our lives, with the loſs of our honour and admiſſion of all the evils and miſchiefs imaginable? For my part, I ſhall never aſſent unto it, but rather appear ſingly before the face of my Enemies, and loſe my life in oppoſing their entrance into Cozco, rather than live to ſee the deſolation of that City, and thoſe abominable practices committed in that Sacred and Imperial Court, which the Sun and his Children had founded: Wherefore let ſuch as have courage follow me, and I ſhall ſhew them how to exchange an infamous and loathſome Life for a noble and honourable Death.

Having ſaid thus much with deep ſenſe and heat of ſpirit, he took his way towards the City, without loſing ſo much time as to eat or drink. The Incas of the Bloud, who untill now had accompanied the King, and with them his own Brothers, Couſins and neareſt Relations, to the number of above 4000 Men, returned and followed the Prince, ſo that onely ſome few old and impotent Men remained with the King: As many as they met in the way they marched, and thoſe alſo who were ſcattered abroad in the Countrey, they called and ſummoned unto them; giving them to underſtand, that the Prince Viracocha was returned to the City with intention to defend that and the Temple of his Father the Sun, with the laſt drop of his bloud. With this news, which was ſoon ſpread over all places, the Indians were ſo encouraged, (the preſence of the Prince giving countenance to the reſolution) that they all unanimouſly returned to the City, intending there to dye with great alacrity and chearfulneſs with their Prince, who evidenced ſo much reſolution and courage in their defence.

In this manner, and with theſe thoughts, he entred the City, and from thence immediately taking the direct road towards Chincaſuyu, which was the Paſs by which the Enemy marched; he commanded his Army, without any delay, to follow him, intending there to place himſelf between the Enemy and the City; not that he expected thereby to give a ſtop to their proceedings, for that it could never be hoped that their inconſiderable number could make head againſt ſuch Multitudes; but that as valiant and deſperate Men, they might dye fighting againſt their Enemies, rather than behold the Barbarians victorious in the Temple and City of their Father the Sun, which was a matter that made the moſt ſenſible impreſſion of all theſe diſaſters.

And becauſe we muſt here ſet a period to the Reign of Yahuar-huacac, (whoſe Life we now write) and as hereafter will appear, we ſhall now put a full ſtop to the current of this Hiſtory, that ſo we may diſtinguiſh the Actions of this King from thoſe of his Son Viracocha: And for variety ſake, and to pleaſe the Reader, we ſhall intermix other matters which are curious and divertiſing, and then afterwards return to the Atchievements and Exploits of the Prince Viracocha, which were famous and of great Renown.

BOOK V.

CHAP. I.

How they enlarged and divided the Lands amongſt the People.

SO ſoon as the Inca had conquered any Kingdom or Province, and that he had ſettled and eſtabliſhed his Government and Religion amongſt the Inhabitants, he ordered that thoſe Lands which were capable of improvement (that is, ſuch as would bear Mayz) ſhould be dreſſed and manured; and in order hereunto they drained all wet Moors and Fens, for in that Art they were excellent, as is apparent by their Works which remain unto this day: And alſo they were very ingenious in making Aqueducts for carrying Water into dry and ſcorched Lands, ſuch as the greateſt part of that Countrey is, which is ſituated under the Torrid Zone, being commonly barren for want of Water to refreſh and make it fruitfull; and for that reaſon, whereſoever they intended to ſow their Mayz or Indian Wheat, they always made contrivances and inventions to bring their Water for them, nor leſs carefull were they to water their Paſtures, which they drowned in caſe the Autumn proved dry, that ſo they might have Graſs ſufficient to feed the numerous Flocks they maintained. Theſe Aqueducts, though they were ruined after the Spaniards came in, yet ſeveral Reliques and Monuments of them remain unto this day.

After they had made a proviſion of Water, the next thing was to dreſs, and cultivate, and clear their Fields of Buſhes and Trees; and that they might with moſt advantage receive the Water, they made them in a Quadrangular form; thoſe Lands which were good on the ſide of Hills, they levelled them by certain Allies, or Walks, which they made, as is to be ſeen in Cozco, and all over Peru unto this day; to make theſe Allies, they raiſed three Walls of Freezed Stone, one before, and one of each ſide, ſomewhat inclining inwards, (as are all the Walls they make) ſo that they may more ſecurely bear and keep up the weight of the Earth, which is preſſed and rammed down by them, untill it be raiſed to the height of the Wall: Then, next to this Walk, they made another ſomething ſhorter and leſs, kept up in the ſame manner with its Wall; untill at length they came to take in the whole Hill, levelling it by degrees in faſhion of a Ladder, one Ally above the other, untill they came to take in all the Hill, and incloſe the ground which was capable of improvement, and of receiving Water; where the ground was ſtony, they gathered up the Stones, and covered the barren Soil with freſh Earth to make their Levels, that ſo no part of the ground might be loſt: The firſt Allies were the largeſt, and as ſpatious as the ſituation of the place could bear, ſome being of that length and breadth as were capable to receive a hundred, ſome two hundred, or three hundred Buſhells of Seed: The ſecond row of Allies were made narrower and ſhorter, and ſo went leſſening, untill at laſt, at the bottom and lowermoſt Ally, they were contracted to ſo narrow a Compaſs, as was not capable to produce more than two or three ſmall meaſures of Mayz. In ſome parts they husbanded their matter, that they brought the Chanels of water from fifteen or twenty Leagues diſtance, though it were onely to improve a ſlip of a few Acres of Land, which was eſteemed good Corn-ground.

Having in this manner (as we have ſaid) improved, and enlarged their Lands, the next thing was to make a juſt Diviſion of them in all Countries; for performance of which they divided the grounds into three parts, one was allotted to the Sun, a ſecond to the King, and a third to the Inhabitants: This Rule was obſerved with great exactneſs, and in favour of the People, that ſo the Natives might not want ground for tillage; for in that caſe, when the Countrey abounded with numbers of People, they abated of the proportion allotted to the Sun, and to the Inca, for the ſake and benefit of the Subjects; ſo that in effect, neither did the King in his own, or in right of the Sun, appropriate to himſelf any Lands, but ſuch as lay untilled, unpoſſeſt, and without a Proprietor. Moſt of the Lands belonging to the Sun, and the Inca, were incloſed, and laid in Allies, being ſo manured and improved by ſpecial Command. Beſides theſe Lands, which by reaſon of their convenient ſituation for receiving water, produced Mayz, they made a Diviſion of other Land, alſo that were in a dry ſoil, without any convenience of water, and yet becauſe they were capable to produce ſome ſorts of grane, and pulſe, ſuch as they called Papa, and Oca, and Annus, which were very beneficial; the Sun and the King had their ſhares allowed thereof. This ſoil, which for want of water was thus barren, they did not ſow above one or two years together, and then broke up freſh ground, leaving the other to lie fallow, untill it had again recovered its former ſtrength.

Their Mayz, or Wheat fields, which had the benefit of water, they ſowed every year, dunging them after every crop, as we do our Gardens, which made them extremely fruitfull; and with the Mayz they ſowed a ſmall ſeed, like Rice, which they call Quinua, and grows much in cold Countries.

CHAP. II.

Of the Order they obſerved in manuring their Lands; and what Feaſt and Joy they made when they tilled the Grounds of the Inca, and of the Sun.

IN cultivating their Lands they obſerved this Rule and Method; thoſe of the Sun were preferred in the firſt place, then thoſe belonging to Orphans, and Widows, and Perſons impotent, by reaſon of age and ſickneſs; all which remaining under the notion of poor, were by order of the Inca provided for, and their Lands manured by ſpecial Command: To perform which, there were Deputies appointed in every Pariſh, or Community of the People, to take care that thoſe Lands were tilled and dreſſed. Theſe Deputies were called Llactacamayu, which is as much as Monitors of the People, whoſe charge it was according to the Seaſons of the Year, to plow, and ſowe, and reap, and gather the fruit, laying it up in places which they had built like Barnes to receive them. The ſummons which the People had to this work, was by ſound of Trumpet, or other loud Inſtrument, to crave attention; and then the Crier proclaimed, That ſuch a day the work of the poor was to be done, and therefore that every one ſhould provide againſt that time to attend that ſervice; and then where they were firſt to begin, and how to proceed, either in that of their Relations, or Neighbours, was aſſigned by the Overſeer. Every workman that came to labour in the fields of the Orphans, or Widows, or impotent brought his own Proviſions with him; for that the Poor were obliged to no care, their infirmities and wants excuſing them from other troubles, than a patient ſufferance of their own evils. If the poor wanted ſeed to ſow their Lands, it was adminiſtred to them out of the publick Granaries, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter.

The Lands of Souldiers, whilſt they were actually employed in the Wars, were manured with the ſame care and manner as thoſe of the poor; their Wives, during the abſence of their Husbands, being liſted into the number of Widows, and the Children of thoſe who were ſlain in the Wars were provided for, and carefully educated, untill the time of their Marriage.

The Lands of the poor being already tilled, in the next place every private Perſon might attend to his own Farm, and the firſt that had done was to help his fellows: then the Lands of the Curaca were to be ſerved, and were the laſt in order after thoſe of the People; the which was obſerved ſo ſeverely, that in the Reign of Huayna Capac, a certain Indian Overſeer was hanged for tilling the Land of a Curaca, who was his Kinſman, before that of a Widow; and to make the puniſhment more exemplary, the Gallows was ſet up in the very Land of the Curaca. The ſeverity of this Law was grounded on the ſame practice, which was obſerved in the Lands of the Inca himſelf; for that the Inca always preferred the Tillage of his Subjects before his own, it being their ſure Maxime, that the Happineſs of the Prince depends on the Proſperity of the People, without which they become unable to ſerve him, either in times of War or Peace.

The laſt Lands to be tilled were thoſe of the King, to which, and to thoſe of the Sun, the People in general applied themſelves with great alacrity and rejoicing; they then at that work appeared in their beſt Cloths, full of Gold and Silver plates, and feathers on their Heads, in the ſame manner as they were dreſſed on their feſtival days. When they ploughed, which ſeemed the more pleaſant work, they ſung the Sonnets made in praiſe of their Incas, with which the time paſſed ſo eaſily, that their Labour ſeemed a Recreation, ſo great was their Devotion towards their God and their King.

With

Within the City of Cozco, bordering on the ſide of that Hill where the Caſtle was built, there was a ſpatious Walk or Alley, containing many acres of ground, called Collcampata, and is ſtill remaining, unleſs they have built houſes upon it, ſince the time I was there: the plat of ground on which it was, took its name from the Walk it ſelf, being the beſt piece of Land, and as it were the Jewel, and Flower of all the Eſtate belonging to the Sun, and was the firſt plat of Earth which the Incas had dedicated to him. This Walk was like a Garden, manured and cultivated onely by Incas of the Royal Bloud, nor was any other admitted to be Gardiner or Labourer there, under the degree of Inca, or Palla, which was a Lady of the Royal Family. All the Songs they made, were Panegyricks in praiſe of the Sun; and the ſubſtance of them was taken from the word Haylli, which in the common language of Peru ſignifies triumph; as if they were victorious, and triumphed over the Earth, when they ploughed and digged into its bowels, forcing it to fructify, and raking fruit from thence. With theſe Sonnets they intermixed the quick and acute Sentences and Sayings of diſcreet Lovers, and valiant Souldiers, tending to the Subject and Work in hand, concluding every ſtaff, or ſtanza of their Verſes with the word Haylli, which was the burthen of the Song, and repeated as often as was neceſſary to fill up the cadence of the Tune; and thus they ſang, and worked backward and forward, as they made the Furrows, with which chearfulneſs the toil and labour was much alleviated.

The Plough they uſe was made of a piece of Wood, of about four fingers broad, and a yard long, it was flat before, and round behind, and pointed at the end, that ſo it might the more eaſily pierce, and enter the Earth; then about half a yard high, on the main ſhaft they bound two pieces of Wood for a ſtay to the Foot, with which the Indian preſſing very hard, thruſt his Plough, or Shovel, up to the very ſtep, or ſtay to the Foot; and therewith ſeven and ſeven, or eight and eight a breaſt, according to the number of the Kindred, or Partnerſhip, drawing all together, they turned up turfs, and clods of Earth of an incredible bigneſs, ſo that thoſe who have not ſeen this Invention before, would wonder that ſo weak an Inſtrument could be able to doe ſo great and heavy a work, and with that diſpatch and eaſe alſo, as did not put the Labourers out of breath, ſo as to ſpoil the Air and Cadence of the Tune. The Women likewiſe were aſſiſtents to the Men in this work, helping to turn up the turf and clods, and pluck up the Weeds and roots, that they might dye and wither; in which labour they bore alſo part in the Muſick, and joined in the Chorus of Haylli, Haylli.

The Indian Tunes having a kind of ſweet Air with them, the Muſick-Maſter of the Cathedral Church at Cozco, in the Year 1551. or 1552. compoſed an Antheme, and ſet it to one of their Tunes, which he plaid on the Organ, upon the Feſtival of the moſt Holy Sacrament, at which Solemnity he introduced eight Mongrel Boys, of mixed Bloud between Spaniſh and Indian, and my School-fellows, ſinging the Songs which he had ſet according to the true Air of Incas Muſick, and each of them carrying a Plough in his hand, accompanied the Proceſſion, repreſenting and imitating the Haylli of the Indians; all the Chapell in the mean time joining in the Chorus, to the great ſatisfaction of the Spaniards, and contentment of the Indians, who were over-joyed to ſee the Spaniards ſo far to honour them, as to practiſe their Dances and Muſick, when they celebrated the Feſtival of their Lord God, which they called Pachacamac, and is as much as to ſay, he that gives Life to the whole Univerſe.

Thus I have related the manner how the Incas celebrated the Feaſt which they held at the time of ploughing, and ſowing the Grounds dedicated to the Sun, the which I ſaw, and obſerved for two or three following years, when I was a Child, and by them we may gueſs at the form and manner of the Feſtivals ſolemnized in other parts of Peru, on the ſame occaſion, though thoſe Feaſts which I ſaw, as the Indians aſſured me, were but faint repreſentations of thoſe in ancient times, and were not to be eſteemed comparable to them.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the Proportion of Land which was allotted to every Indian, and with what ſort of Dung they improved it.

TO every Indian was given a Tupu of Land, which was as much as he might ſow with a Hanega, (which is as much as a Buſhel and a half of Mayz, or Indian-Wheat, though the Hanega of Peru is a Hanega and a half of Spain.) This word Tupu ſignifies alſo a League in travelling, likewiſe all ſorts of meaſures of Water, or Wine, or any other Liquour; as alſo the great Pins with which Women tuck up their dreſſings: The Meaſure of Seed-corn hath alſo another name, which is Poccha.

One Tupu of Land was eſteemed ſufficient to maintain an ordinary Countrey-Fellow and his Wife, provided he had not Children; for then, ſo ſoon as he had a Son, they added another Tupu of Land to his Eſtate, and if a Daughter, half an one: When the Son married, ſo that he left his Father's Houſe, then he reſigned over to the Son his Tupu of Land, in which he had an Original Right and Propriety.

But this was differently obſerved as to Daughters, for they were not to take their Lands with them in marriage, it having been given them for their ſubſiſtence during their Minority onely, but not to accrue to them by way of Portion; for every Husband claiming his ſhare of Land in his own Right, was obliged to ſupport his Wife, the Law taking no farther cognizance of Women after their Marriage; the Land remaining with the Father, in caſe he had need of it, and if not, then it returned again to the Community, for it was not lawfull either to ſell or alienate it.

Proportionably to thoſe Lands which they gave for bearing Mayz, they alſo adjoined others, which were dry Lands, and did not require Water, and yet produced Pulſe and other ſeeds.

To Noble and great Families, ſuch as were thoſe of the Curacas, or Lords who had Subjects under them, they allotted ſo much Land as was ſufficient to maintain their Wives and Children, Concubines and Servants. To the Incas of the Bloud Royal the ſame advantage and benefit was allowed, in any part whereſoever they were pleaſed to fix their abode; and their Lands were to be the beſt and richeſt of any: And this they were to enjoy over and above the common ſhare and right which they claimed in the Eſtates of the King, and the Sun, as Children of the one, and Brothers of the other.

They uſed to dung their Lands, that they might make them fruitfull, and it is obſervable, that in all the Valley about Cozco, and in the hilly Countries, where they ſowed Mayz, they eſteemed the beſt manure to be Man's Dung; and to that end they ſaved and gathered it with great care, and drying it, they caſt it upon their Land before they ſowed their Mayz. But in the Countrey of Collao, which is above an hundred and fifty Leagues long, which, by reaſon of the coldneſs of the Climate, doth not produce Mayz, though it bear other ſort of Grane, there they eſteem the Dung of Cattle to be the beſt manure and improvement.

By the Sea-coaſt, from below Arequepa, as far as Tarapaca, which is above two hundred Leagues, they uſe no other Dung, but ſuch as comes from the Sea-birds, of which there are great numbers, and incredible flocks on the Coaſt of Peru; they breed in little Iſlands, which lie in the Sea, and are unpeopled, where they lay ſuch heaps of Dung, that at a diſtance they ſeem to be Hills of Snow. In the times of the Incas, who were Kings, great care was taken of theſe Birds in the ſeaſon of their Breeding; for then on pain of Death no Man was to enter on thoſe Iſlands, leſt they ſhould diſturb the Birds, or ſpoil their Neſts; nor was it lawfull to take or kill them at any time, either off or upon the Iſland.

Every

Every Iſland was by order of the Inca, aſſigned to ſuch and ſuch Provinces, and if the Iſland were very large, then two or three of them divided the ſoilage, the which they laid up in ſeparate heaps, that ſo one Province might not encroach on the proportion allotted to the other; and when they came to make their Diviſion to particular Perſons, and Neighbours, they then weighed and ſhared out to every Man the quantity he was to receive; and it was felony for any man to take more than what belonged to him, or to rob or ſteal it from the ground of his Neighbour, for in regard that every man had as much as was neceſſary for his own Lands, the taking a greater quantity than what belonged to him, was judged a Crime, and a high offence; for that this ſort of Birds dung was eſteemed pretious, being the beſt improvement and manure for Land in the World.

Howſoever in other parts of that Coaſt, and in the Low Countries of Atica, Atiquipa, Villacori, Malla and Chillca, and other Vallies, they dung their grounds with the Heads of a ſmall fiſh, like our Pilchards, and with no other ſoilage. The Natives of theſe Countries which we have named, and others under the ſame Climate, live with great labour and toil, where they can neither water their Grounds with ſtreams from the Springs or Fountains, nor yet with the Rain or Dews from Heaven: For it is a certain truth, that for the ſpace of ſeven hundred Leagues along that Coaſt it did never rain, nor are there in all that tract of Land ſtreams, or places for water, the whole Countrey being exceedingly hot, dry, and nothing almoſt but ſand; for which reaſon the Natives endeavouring to moiſten their grounds, ſo as to make them capable to yield Mayz, they approach as near to the Sea, as they are able, where they turn aſide, and caſt away the Sand which lies upon the ſurface, and dig down as deep as a Man's Body is in length, and ſometimes twice as deep, untill, having paſſed the Sand, they come to ſuch a ſort of Earth as is able to bear the weight of Water, which places the Spaniards call Hoyas, or Vaults; and being of different proportions, ſome greater, and ſome leſſer; ſome are not capacious enough to receive above half a meaſure of Seed-corn, others again are ſo large as to receive three or four meaſures of Seed: In theſe places they neither plow, nor reap, becauſe they rather ſet than ſow, planting their grane of Mayz at an equal diſtance one from the other; and in the holes or furrows which they make; they caſt three or four grains of Mayz, with a few Pilchards Heads; which being all the dung they uſe, and which is onely, as they ſay, profitable in that ſoil, they expect their Harveſt at its due ſeaſon. And to ſee how Divine Providence taketh care of all Creatures, for that neither the Indians may want that Manure, which onely makes their Land fruitfull, nor the Birds of the Iſlands their food, there are ſuch quantities of Pilchards caſt up by the Sea at thoſe ſeaſons, as are not onely ſufficient for the Food of Men, and Birds, and for dunging the Earth, but even to lade many Ships, if occaſion ſhould require: It is ſaid, that this Fiſh is chaſed aſhore by ſome Dolphins, or greater Fiſh; be it by what means it will, the advantage is great, and the Providence of God is admirable in theſe his Bleſſings towards his poor Creatures. Who was the firſt Inventer of this manner of planting in holes with the Heads of Pilchards, is uncertain; we may rather attribute it to Neceſſity, which is the Mother of Ingenuity; for in regard, as we have ſaid, that there is great want of Bread in all parts of Peru, the ſame Underſtanding which in ſome parts taught them to plant their Mayz in holes, the ſame alſo inſtructed them to make their Allies in the parts of Cozco, and by this means every one ſowing for his own maintenance, and not to ſell, all People enjoyed ſufficient for their ſupport, never any ſcarcity or famine having been known in that Land.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

How they divided their Water into ſeveral Rivulets for the refreſhment of their Land; and what Puniſhment they inflicted on the idle and negligent People that would not work.

IN thoſe Countries where Water was ſcarce, they took care to divide their Waters to every one according to his neceſſities, and by ſuch equal proportions, and with that order, that all quarrels and contentions for it were avoided; and hereunto they had moſt eſpecial regard in dry years, when Rain was wanting; for then they allotted out unto every one his certain hours, having by experience learned in how much time an Acre of Ground might be ſupplied, and drink the Water it required. In which benefit neither the Rich nor the more Noble, nor the Kinſman of the Curaca, nor the Curaca himſelf, nor the Governour, nor the King himſelf enjoyed any privilege or preference before another, but every one took his turn, as his Lands and Furrows lay in order. He that was negligent to take his turn, and to watch his ground whilſt the Water ran into the Furrows, and Dams, was puniſhed for a ſluggard in the moſt affrontive manner; for he was to receive publickly three or four thumps on the Back with a Stone, or whipped on the Armes and Legs with Switches of Oſier, and ſhamed with the diſgracefull term of an idle and ſloathfull fellow, which was a great diſhonour and diſreputation to them, calling them Mizquitullu, which is Eaſie-bones, being a word compounded of Mizqui, which ſignifies ſweet, and Tullu which is bones.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tribute which they gave to the Inca, and of the Veſſels they made to receive their Fruits.

HAving already declared the manner by which the Incas divided the Lands, and the ways and inventions by which the Subjects improved them; we are in the next place to proceed to ſhew what Tribute they gave unto their Kings. The chiefeſt part of their Tribute did conſiſt in their labour, which was to cultivate and manure the Lands belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca, and alſo to gather and reap the Fruits, and lay them up in the King's Barns: One ſort of Fruit which was in eſteem amongſt them, was that which they call Uchu, and the Spaniards Axi, and we in Engliſh Red Pepper. The places in which they laid their Corn called Pirua, were made of Clay, tempered with Straw: In the times of the Incas they were very curious in this work, and made them of different ſizes and faſhions; ſome being long and narrow, and others ſquare; ſome of them were made to receive thirty, ſome fifty, and ſome an hundred meaſures of Corn: Every one of theſe Clay-veſſels was put into a Chamber by it ſelf, juſt fitted to the proportion of the Veſſel, and fixed with Walls on each ſide, ſo as not to be removed; and in the middle of the Chamber a paſſage was left to go from one to the other to empty and fill them according to the ſeaſons of the year; for emptying theſe Veſſels, they opened a little ſhutter before, of about a quarter of a Yard ſquare, or bigger, or leſſer, according to its proportion, by which they knew certainly the quantity that was taken out, and what remained without meaſuring of it; whereby, and by the largeneſs of the Veſſels, they eaſily made the account of the quantity of the Mayz which remained in every Barn or Magazine. I remember that I once ſaw ſome of theſe Clay-veſſels, which remained ever ſince the time of the Incas; they were ſuch as were of the beſt ſort, for they had belonged to the Convent of the Select Virgins, who were Wives to the Sun, and made ſolely for the ſervice of thoſe Women; when I ſaw them, they were in the Houſe of the Sons of Pedro de Barco, who had been School-fellows with me. The Proviſions of the Sun, and of the Inca, were laid up apart, and in different Veſſels, though in the ſame Store-houſe or Magazine. The Corn for Seed was given out by the Lord of the Land, who was the Sun and the Inca; as alſo the Corn which made Bread for the Labourers, during the time that they cultivated and manured their Lands; ſo that all the Tribute which the Indians were obliged to give, was nothing but their perſonal labour, their Lands and Fruits being free of all Tax or Impoſition. The truth of which is affirmed by Acoſta in the fifteenth Chapter of his ſixth Book, in theſe words: "The Inca gave the third part of "the Lands to the People; but it is not certain whether this third part was ſo exactly meaſured, as to anſwer an equality with that of the Inca: But this is "ſure, that great care was taken to render unto every one a ſufficient proportion "of Land for his maintenance and ſupport. In this third part no particular perſon had ſuch a right, as to be able to give it away, or ſell, or by any ways alienate it to another, becauſe the Inca was the ſole Lord of the Fee, and the Original right was in him. Of theſe Lands, new Diviſions were made every "year, according to the increaſe or diminution of Families; ſo that the proportions of Lands were in general aſcertained, and the Diviſions already laid out, "that there needed no great trouble farther therein. Of all theſe Lands ſo given, "no Tribute was exacted, unleſs it was their labour to cultivate and manure the "Lands of the Inca and the Guacas, and to gather the Fruits, and lay them up in "their Store-houſe, which was all the Tribute or Impoſition required of them. Theſe are the words of Acoſta, who calls the Sun by the Name of Guacas.

In all the Province of Colla, which is above 150 Leagues long, Mayz doth not grow, by reaſon of the coldneſs of the Climate; but in the place of it they have great abundance of Quinua, which is a ſort of Rice, beſides plenty of other Grane and Pulſe, and ſuch Corn as grows low upon the ground; ſuch as is that which they call Papa, which is round and juicy, and by reaſon of the great humidity of it inclines much to corruption, and is ſoon rotten; but the better to conſerve it, they ſpread it on the ground upon Straw, of which there is great ſtore, and very good in that Countrey, expoſing it for many Nights to the Froſt; for the Froſts are very ſharp and laſting there; after it hath in this manner, as it were, been digeſted and ripened by the colds, they then gently preſs it, that the watriſhneſs may paſs away with the crude humour cauſed by the Froſt; and after they have thus well preſſed it, they lay it out in the Sun, keeping it from the ſerene damps of the Night, untill it is perfectly dried. And by theſe means they conſerve the Papa for a long time, which then they call by the Name of Chunum, and by that Name all the Papa paſſed, which was gathered from the Lands of the Sun, and of the Inca, and which they conſerved in their Store-houſes, with other Grane, and with their Peaſe and Vetches, and ſuch like.

CHAP. VI.

How they made Cloaths, and Arms, and Shoes for the Souldiery.

BEsides this Tribute of Labour which the Indians beſtowed on the Lands of the Sun, and the Inca, and of the gathering in their Fruit; the ſecond Tribute required was a contribution towards the Cloathing, Shoes and Arms of the Souldiery, as alſo for the poor and needy, who by reaſon of Age, or want of Health, were not able to labour and provide for themſelves: And herein the ſame rule and order was obſerved, as in the former Tribute. The Cloathing in all the Hilly Countries was made of Wool, which was produced by thoſe multitudes of Cattel which were paſtured in thoſe parts for account of the Sun; but in the Plains along the Sea-coaſt, where the Countrey is hot, they made all their Garments of Cottons, which grew in the Lands belonging to the Inca and the Sun; ſo that the Indians were at no farther expence therein, than that onely which proceeded from the labour of their hands. Their Woolen Cloathing was of three ſorts; the courſeſt, which they called Avaſca, was for the common people; the next degree, which was ſomething finer, they called Compi, which was fit for Captains and Nobles, and the better ſort of people, and were made of divers colours, and dreſſed and curried like the Dutch Cloths: To the fineſt ſort likewiſe they gave the ſame name of Compi, which was onely for the cloathing of Incas of the Royal Bloud, and ſuch of them as were Souldiers and Officers both of War and Peace. This fineſt ſort was made in Countries where the beſt Workmen lived, and the moſt ingenious Artiſts; and the courſer was made by the more dull and courſer ſort of Heads. All the Wool for this Cloathing was Spun by the Women; as likewiſe the Avaſca, or courſer ſort, was Woven by them; but the fineſt was Woven by the Men, becauſe they always Weaved ſtanding; and both one and the other was the Work of the Subjects, and not of the Incas, though it were for their own Cloathing; though ſome are of opinion that the Incas worked and weaved for themſelves; which we muſt contradict, and ſhall ſhew hereafter, when we come to treat of the Arms of Horſemen, what it was that they termed the Spinning of the Incas. Thoſe Provinces were moſt charged with the Aſſeſment for Shoeing, where Hemp grew in moſt plenty, and was made from the Stalk of a Plant called Maguey; their Arms likewiſe were made in thoſe Countries where the Materials for them were moſt plentifull: In ſome places they made Bows and Arrows, in others Lances and Darts, in others Clubs and Bills; ſome Countries provided Ropes and Winleſſes for lading and faſtning of Burthens, and others made Helmets and Targets, beſides which they had no other defenſive Arms. In ſhort, every Province furniſhed and ſupplied ſuch Commodities as the Nature of the Countrey did moſt eaſily produce, and ſuch Manufactories as they could make at home; for it was a ſettled and an eſtabliſhed Law through the whole Empire, that no Indian ſhould be obliged to ſeek or ranſack other Countries for the Tribute he was to pay; for as that would not be juſt nor equal, ſo it would be a means to make them Vagabonds, and to open a door to the Inhabitants to go out of their Countrey, and forſake their own habitations; ſo that the Subjects were obliged to furniſh the Inca with four things, viz. Proviſions or food ariſing from the proper grounds of the Inca; Cloathing made of the Wool of his own Flocks, Shoes and Arms, ariſing from Countries where the Materials are moſt common; all theſe Aſſeſments were laid and impoſed with great order and attention; for thoſe Provinces which were charged with Cloths, by reaſon of the quantity of Wool, which abounded in their parts, were freed from the charge and care of providing Shoes; thoſe that provided Shoes, were freed from Arms, ſo that none could be twice charged, nor the Subject agrieved by the weight of his Oppreſſions. By this gentleneſs and lenity of the Yoke which the Inca laid on his people, every one ſerved him with ſuch chearfulneſs and alacrity, that a Spaniſh Hiſtorian much admiring thereat, uſed theſe words: "The Riches of thoſe barbarous Kings conſiſted in the Number of their Subjects, who were all Slaves to them; and what is moſt wonderfull is, that all the labour and toil they uſed for their Kings, was their greateſt delight and recreation; and ſuch was the good rule and order obſerved in it, that no labour was tedious, but rather of contentment and ſatisfaction. Theſe words are not my own, but the expreſſions of Joſeph de Acoſta, a Perſon of good authority, which I gladly inſert here, as in other places, to defend my ſelf againſt the Malice and Obloquy of thoſe who are ready to charge me with Fables forged in honour and favour to my own Kindred and Countrey. And this is what we have to ſay of the Tribute which was given to theſe Idolatrous Kings.

There was another ſort of Tribute which the Kings exacted from the Impotent, and ſuch as were called Poor; and that was, that every one was obliged from ſo many days, to ſuch a time, to deliver into the hands of the Governours a Reed filled with Lice. It is ſaid, that the reaſon why the Incas required this ſtrange ſort of Tribute, was, that ſo no perſon, how impotent ſoever, might pretend an entire exemption from Tribute; and becauſe Lice were the eaſieſt Tribute, the King exacted ſuch as they could pay; and the rather, that ſo this people by ſuch obligation might be forced for payment to clear and make clean themſelves of Vermine, and not pretend to be void of all employment; and the care of this Collection was encharged to a Decurion, or Officer of ten, as before mentioned. By ſuch Acts of mercy and compaſſion as this towards the Poor, the Inca merited the Title of a Lover of the Poor, the which Name he aſſumed to himſelf amongſt his other Dignities and Titles of Honour.

The perſons exempt from all Tribute were the Incas of the Bloud-Royal, the Prieſts and Miniſters of the Temple, the Curacas and Sovereign Lords, Colonels, and Captains, and Centurions, though they were not of the Bloud-Royal; alſo Governours, Judges, Miniſters of State, during the time of their Offices, they were onely obliged to attend their charge and employments, without other trouble or diverſion: All Souldiers who were actually in Arms, and attending in the War, were excuſed from other Services; and Youths under the Age of twenty five years, being untill that time eſteemed Servants to their Fathers, and without power over themſelves; and not capable to diſpoſe of themſelves in Marriage, were not obliged to pay any ſort of Tribute; as alſo new-married perſons for the firſt year were diſpenſed with in that particular. Old Men from fifty years and upwards, as alſo Women, and Maids, and Widows, and Married people were alſo exempt from Tribute, though the Spaniſh Writers alledge, that Women were obliged unto that payment, becauſe they were obſerved to work and labour as other people; but herein they were miſtaken, for that Women were not obliged to this labour by way of Tribute, but onely for the help and aſſiſtence of their Parents or Husbands, that ſo they might more ſpeedily diſpatch their tasks, and finiſh the labour allotted to them. It was alſo an excuſe for any to prove himſelf to have been ſick and indiſpoſed in his health; the lame alſo and the blind, but not the dumb nor deaf were freed from their perſonal labour; the which belonging properly to every particular perſon, became a debt not to be remitted, unleſs on the preceding Conditions and Proviſoes. And thus much Blas Valera alledges ſo agreeable to our ſenſe, as if what we ſhall hereafter declare in this matter, or have already herein delivered, had been onely a Copy, or Extract, out of his Writings.

CHAP. VII.

That Gold, and Silver, and other things of value, were not given by way of Tribute, but of Preſents.

ALL that great quantity of Gold and Silver, and pretious Stones which the Incas poſſeſſed, were not Rents, nor Fruits iſſuing from Tribute, but Preſents which the People voluntarily offered to their Kings; for neither Gold nor Silver were eſteemed neceſſary for maintenance of Peace, nor (as we will have it) the Sinews of War, nor reckoned as any part of Riches, or Eſtate, nor were they meaſures in buying or ſelling, or given in payment to the Souldiers; for they could neither drink nor ſatisfie their hunger with thoſe Metalls, and therefore were valued at no other rate, than for their glittering Luſtre, and reſplendent Beauty, deſigned onely for Ornaments to adorn the Temples of the Sun, and the Palaces of the Incas, and the Monaſteries of the Virgins, as we have already made appear, and ſhall hereafter have occaſion to prove more at large. They found out the Mines of quick-ſilver, but knew not the uſe of it, onely that it was hurtfull, and of a quality noxious to the Head, and for that reaſon prohibited the People from gathering or medling with it.

We ſay then, that Gold and Silver was a free Offering from the Subjects to their Prince, and never demanded by them in way of Tribute, or Duty: and in regard it was a cuſtome amongſt that People, never to appear before their Superiours with empty hands, for when nothing better offered, even a basket of dry or ripe fruit was acceptable: and that alſo it was accuſtomary for the Curacas, and Princes, who had ſovereign Authority over Subjects, to preſent themſelves before the Inca at the principal feaſts of the Year, which were dedicated to the Sun, ſuch as Raymi, and at other times when Triumphs were celebrated for great and ſignal Victories, or when a Prince and Heir was born, or his Head ſhorn, or that the Inca viſited the Provinces, and the like, the Curacas did then never preſume to appear before the Inca, and kiſs his Hands, without their Preſents of Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones, ſuch as the Indians, who were their Vaſſals, had at their leiſure times extracted from the Mines; for in regard that theſe things were not neceſſary for ſupport of humane Life, the acquiſition of them was ſcarce eſteemed worth their labour, and the employment onely appointed for their vacant hours; for when they knew that there was no other uſe for them, but onely for the adornment of their Temples, and Palaces of the Inca, they then eſteemed them worthy their trouble, for no other reaſon, than that they might appear with confidence before their Gods, who were the Sun and the Inca.

Moreover beſides ſuch rich Gifts as theſe, the Curacas did commonly preſent to the King Timber of the beſt and ſtrongeſt nature for his Buildings, with excellent Maſters, and the moſt able Artiſts and Workmen to erect them; for if there were any Perſons ingenious, or excellent in Arts, or Crafts, ſuch as Silver-ſmiths, Painters, Stone-cutters, Carpenters, or others, they were always preferred and recommended by the Curacas to the ſervice of the Inca; for indeed ſuch Perſons as theſe could find no Employment or Encouragement with the common People, every one of which had skill and art ſufficient for building his own poor Hutt or Cottage where he dwelt, and making his own Shoes and Garments; for though anciently the Community had the care of providing every Family with a Houſe, yet now, ſince every ſingle Perſon hath learnt that myſtery, and become a rare Architect, and can, with the aſſiſtence of a few Friends and Relations, be able to form his own Neſt and Habitation; the Art of Surveyors, and the Labour of Workmen is of little uſe to them, for being poor, and living onely with deſign to ſupply the neceſſities of humane Life, they have no need of thoſe ſuperfluities fluities which are neceſſary to ſupport the Magnificence and Pomp of great Perſonages.

Moreover they preſented to the Inca wild Beaſts, ſuch as Tygers, Lions and Bears, with other Creatures leſs fierce, ſuch as Drills, Monkies, Mountain-Cats, Deer, Parots, and other greater Birds, as Oſtritches, and another ſort of Bird called a Cuntur, which is the biggeſt of any in the world: Hereunto they ſometimes added Serpents which were produced in Antis; the biggeſt and largeſt of which they call Amaru, being twenty five or thirty foot in length, as alſo Toads of a monſtrous bigneſs, and Snakes that were very fierce. And from the Sea-coaſt they ſent Soils and Allagators, which they called Caymanes, and were ſome of them twenty five or thirty foot in length. In ſhort, there was no creature excellent in its kind either for ferocity, or bigneſs, or nimbleneſs, which they omitted to carry and preſent with their Offerings of Silver and Gold, that ſo by this way of Homage, and Duty, they might acknowledge him the ſupreme and univerſal Lord of all, and teſtify the zeal and affection they bore to his Service.

CHAP. VIII.

How this Tribute was conſerved, and laid up, and how it was expended, and in what Service.

WE are come now to enquire in what manner this Tribute was conſerved, in what it was expended, and what account was given of it: and herein it is to be obſerved, that there were three Treaſuries in the whole Kingdom, wherein they amaſſed and kept the Tributes, and publick Profits. In every Province whether it were great, or ſmall, there were always two Magazines, or Storehouſes; in one of which they laid up corn, and proviſions for ſupport of the Natives againſt years of ſcarcity, or famine; in the other, all the Profits and Benefits belonging to the Sun, and the Inca, were laid up: beſides which they had other ſmaller Store-houſes, built upon the King's High-way, about three or four Leagues one from the other, which the Spaniards make uſe of at preſent for Inns and Lodgings when they travell.

All the Eſtate of the Sun, and the Inca which lay within fifty Leagues about the City of Cozco, was all brought thither for maintenance, and ſupport of the Court, that ſo the Inca might not onely have a ſufficient plenty for himſelf and Family, but likewiſe to beſtow in Rewards and Preſents to his Captains and Curacas, and to entertain and treat them: But ſome part of the Revenue which belonged to the Sun, and which was within the aforeſaid limits of fifty Leagues, was ſeparated, and laid up apart for the common benefit of the People.

What Revenue was coming in from other places more remote, without the compaſs of the fifty Leagues, was laid up in the King's Store-houſes, which he had in every Province, and from thence it was tranſported to the places which were built on the common Road, for receiving Proviſions, Arms, Cloths, Shoes, and all neceſſaries for an Army, that ſo in all parts they might readily be ſupplied, whenſoever they marched unto any of the four quarters of the World, which the Indians called Tavantinſuyu. Theſe Store-houſes being thus, as we have ſaid, provided, were able to ſupply and furniſh an Army with whatſoever they needed; ſo that in their march they neither lay upon free quarter, nor burthened the People; nor might any Souldier rob or vex the Inhabitants upon pain of Death. Pedro de Cieça in the 60th. Chapter of his Book, ſpeaking of the great Roads, hath theſe Words. "The Incas had great and large Store-houſes, wherein they ſtowed and laid up "all their Ammunition and Proviſions of War, in which they were ſo carefull, "that they never failed to make due and large Proviſions, and in failure thereof

" the Officer encharged was ſeverely puniſhed; and conſequently the Army being " thus well provided, no perſon was permitted to break into the Fields or Houſes " of the Indians, though the damage were never ſo inconſiderable, under leſs than " a capital puniſhment. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça; and the reaſon of this ſeverity was grounded on the ſufficient maintenance which the Souldiers received, who were thus well provided for by the People, on condition that they might be ſecured from their violence and outrages; and thus as the Magazines in the Roads were emptied by the Souldiers in their March, ſo they were again repleniſhed, and ſupplied by the Provincial Stores. Auguſtin de Carate diſcourſing of the great Roads, or the King's High-Ways, (as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to mention more at large) doth in the 14th. Chapter of his firſt Book ſay: " That beſides theſe common Store-houſes on the Roads, Guaynacava gave command for building in all the mountainous Countries large and " capacious Houſes, able to receive him, and his Court, and all his Army, and " to be ſeated at the diſtance of a days march, one from the other. In the plains " alſo he built others of the like capacious Form, but thoſe were ſituated more " remote one from the other, being at eight or ten, or perhaps fifteen or twenty " Leagues aſunder, according as the Rivers or conveniences of Water happened; " and theſe Houſes were called Tombos, where the Indians laid up ſuch quantities " and ſtores of Arms, and other neceſſaries, for an Army, that every one of " them was ſufficient to cloath, and arme, and feed twenty or thirty thouſand " Men, with the Proviſions contained within it ſelf; and yet the Army, though " it was numerous, was yet well accoutred with all ſorts of Weapons, ſuch as " Pikes, Halberts, Clubs and Pole-Axes, made of Silver, and Copper, and " ſome of them of Gold, having ſharp points, and ſome of them hardened by " the fire, beſides Slings, and Darts thrown by hand. Thus far are the Words of Auguſtin Carate, touching the Proviſions lodged in the Roads for accomodation of the Army.

If the King were at any time put unto exceſſive charge in his Wars, ſo that his Revenue could not reach the expence, then in that caſe it was lawfull for the Inca, as univerſal Heir to his Father the Sun, to make uſe of his Riches, and Revenue, and that whenſoever the Wars were finiſhed, the overplus which remained of ſuch Proviſions were carefully laid up in the reſpective Store-houſes, for ſupport and maintenance of the People in Years of Famine and Scarcity; in which ſuch care was taken, that the Inca himſelf judged it an Employment fit to be ſuperviſed by his own particular regard and inſpection.

The Prieſts, in all parts of the Empire, were maintained at the charges of the Sun, that is, whilſt they were actually employed in the Service of the Temple, for they attended by Weeks, according to their turns; but when they were at home, and out of waiting, they then fed and maintained themſelves from the fruits of thoſe grounds, which were equally divided to them with other People; by which, and the like Parſimony, uſed in expending the Revenue of the Sun, his Stores were always great and plentifull, and ſufficient to aſſiſt, and ſuccour the Inca, as his neceſſities and urgencies did require.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

That the People were ſupplied with Clothing, and that no Beggars were allowed amongſt them.

AS by this good Order, and Method, the Souldiery was well provided with Clothing, ſo with the like care every two years a certain proportion of Wool was diſtributed to the Commonalty, and to the Curacas in general, wherewith to make Garments for themſelves, their Wives, and their Families; and it was the Office of the Decurions to ſee, and render an account to the Superiour Officers, how far this Wool was employed to the uſes, unto which it was deſigned. The Indians were generally very poor in Cattel, and the Curacas themſelves for the moſt part were Maſters of ſo few as were not ſufficient for ſupply of themſelves and their Families; whereas on the other ſide, the Sun, and the Inca, had ſuch vaſt Flocks and Herds, as were almoſt innumerable. The Indians report, that when the Spaniards came firſt in amongſt them, their flocks of Cattel were greater than their Paſtures could feed, and I have heard from my Father, and others who lived in his time, that the Spaniards made great Deſtruction of the Cattel, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion more largely to relate. In the hot Countries they gave them Cottons to ſpin for the clothing of themſelves and Families; ſo that every one having a ſufficiency of Food and Raiment, none could properly be termed poor, nor could any be forced to beg, becauſe his Neceſſities were ſupplied; it is true, that none could be called rich, if Riches be placed in affluence and abundance; for as none wanted, ſo noon had more than his Needs required. What we have declared at large, is confirmed by Acoſta in a few words, who in the 15th Chapter of his 6th Book, ſpeaking of Peru, hath this paſſage: " At the ſeaſons they ſhore their Cattel, and then divided unto every one ſuffici-
" ent for him to ſpin, and weave for his own, and the clothing of his Houſe and " Family, and how diligent he was in his work, and how well he complied " with his Task, was carefully inſpected by an Officer, appointed for that Affair:
" what Wool or Cotton remained after ſuch Diviſion, was laid up in the com" mon Storehouſes, which was performed with that good Husbandry, that they " were found full when the Spaniards entred their Countrey. And herein no
" thinking Man can without due reflexion admire and wonder at the Providence
" of this People, and their political Government; for though they had not been " refined with the pure Doctrine of the Chriſtian Religion, nor yet had been " taught the Rules of a Monaſtical Life, yet they had learned that point (which " we call perfection) how, and in what manner to provide all neceſſaries both
" for the King and his People, without appropriating any thing to a particular
" poſſeſſion: And thus Acoſta ends this 15th Chapter, which he entitles, The Revenue and Tribute of the Inca. In another Chapter following, diſcourſing there of the Offices held by the Indians, he touches many points which we have already declared, and which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of more at large hereafter, he hath farther theſe expreſs words. " The Indians of Peru had this Rule and
" Maxime amongſt them, that it was neceſſary to teach their Children ſo ſoon as " they were capable, thoſe works which were conducing to humane Life; for in " regard they had no Trades amongſt them, ſuch as Shoemakers, Weavers, and " the like, whoſe Profeſſion it was to make Shoes and Clothing for others, as " well as themſelves; but every one applyed himſelf to make and provide that
" of which he had need and occaſion; ſo that all knowing how to weave and " ſow, provided themſelves with Garments out of the Wool which the Inca di-" ſtributed to them. Every one knew how to plow, and manure his Land with" out putting himſelf to the charge of Labourers; every one was a Carpenter, " and Maſon, and was able to build his own Houſe, eſpecially the Women
" were the moſt ingenious and diligent of any; for being bred up, and educated

" in

" in hardſhip and toil, contributed much to the aſſiſtence of their Husbands in " all their labours. But thoſe Profeſſions and Arts which were not common, " and which did not ſo properly belong to the neceſſity of Humane Life, ſuch as " Silverſmiths, Painters, Potters, Boatmen, Accountants and Pipers, had their par- " ticular Maſters and Profeſſours; but the ordinary and neceſſary Works were " taught and practiſed in every Family, every one doing his own buſineſs, did not " hire, or pay another for it, but made his own Cloaths and Shoes, ſowed his " own Fields, and gathered in his own Harveſt: And this, as it was the ancient " cuſtome amongſt them, ſo it hath continued even to this day; wherein they " ſeem to have imitated the Lives of the Ancient Monks, as the Fathers of the " Church have delivered them to us. The truth is, they are a people neither " covetous, nor luxurious by nature; that, in reality, were the life they lead " a point of free-will, rather than neceſſity, or choſen for the ſake of Mortifica- " tion; certainly theſe people would be rarely well diſpoſed to receive the Doc- " trine of the Goſpel, which is an enemy to pride, and covetouſneſs, and luxu- " rious living, though the Preachers up of theſe Graces unto the Indians do not " always live according to thoſe Precepts which they deliver in their Pulpits. And then ſoon after he adds; " That it was an Eſtabliſhed Law amongſt them, " that no Man ſhould change the Habit and Faſhion of his Countrey, though he " altered his Habitation out of one Province into another; the obſervance of " which Rule, the Inca enjoined with great ſeverity as a matter of importance in " relation to the Government. Thus far are the words of Acoſta: To which I ſhall add, that the Indians wonder much to ſee the Spaniards ſo frequently change their Habits, and attribute it to their pride, preſumption, and wantonneſs of their humour.

In the Year 1560, when I departed from Peru, it was not the cuſtome for any to beg, or ask Alms; for where-ever I travelled in that Countrey, I never obſerved any Man or Woman to beg, unleſs it were an Old Woman which I knew at Cozco, called Iſabel; and ſhe neither had no great neceſſity, onely ſhe was delighted to Goſſip from houſe to houſe, and, like a Gypſie, with her Jeſts and Tricks, perſuaded the Neighbours to be kind to her. Howſoever, the Indians deteſted her way of living, and in token of their abhorrence thereof would reprove her with words, and then ſpit on the ground, which was a kind of reproach; and for that reaſon this Woman would never beg of the Indians, but onely of the Spaniards; and becauſe at that time, in my Countrey, there was no Money coined, they gave her Mayz, which was the chief thing ſhe deſired; and if ſhe found this come freely, ſhe would beg a little Fleſh, and then ſome of their Drink; and then with her Tricks and Jeſts ſhe would get ſome of their Cuca, which is that pretious Plant ſo much in eſteem amongſt the Indians, and which they commonly carry in their Mouths; and thus ſhe paſſed a merry and wanton life, but deteſtable to her Neighbours. Nor were the Incas, amongſt their other Charities, forgetfull of the conveniencies for Travellers, but in all the great Roads built Houſes, or Inns, for them, which they called Corpahuaci, where they were provided with Victuals, and other neceſſaries, for their Journies, out of the Royal Stores, which were laid up in every Province; and in caſe any Traveller fell ſick in the way, he was there attended, and care taken of him, in a better manner perhaps than at his own home: But the truth is, no perſon Travelled for his curioſity, or pleaſure, or buſineſs, but for the ſervice, and by order of the King, or his Curacas, when they had occaſion to diſpatch Meſſengers, ſuch as Captains for the War, or other Officers for conſervation of the Peace; and then theſe were well provided for, and treated with all conveniencies; whereas others who had not the pretence and paſs-port for their Travels, were taken up for Vagabonds, and puniſhed accordingly.

CHAP. X.

The Rule they obſerved in the Diviſion of their Flocks, and of other ſtrange Beaſts.

THE Flocks of Cattel which belonged to the Inca were ſo numerous, that for the better keeping an account of them, they ſeparated them by diſtinct Droves, according to their colours; for their Cattel are of Party-colours in thoſe Countries, as the Horſes are in Spain; and for every colour they have a propet word: Thoſe creatures which have great variety of colours, they call Murumuru, which the Spaniards by corruption call Moromoro. As for inſtance, ſo ſoon as a Lamb was Yean'd of a different colour to the Ewe which was her Dam, they preſently ſeparated it, and made it to aſſociate with the Flocks of the ſame colour; in which manner they eaſily kept an account of their Cattel by their Knots, which were always made of the ſame colour with that of their Cattel.

The Beaſts which carried their burthens were a ſort of Sheep, with a bunched back like Camels, but in every thing elſe had a likeneſs with our Sheep; and though it was common for the Indians to Lade their burthens on theſe creatures, yet the Inca never made uſe of them himſelf, unleſs it were in ſome caſe of neceſſity, or for the publick profit and uſe; ſuch as carrying Materials for building Fortreſſes, Royal Palaces or Bridges, or for making the High-ways, Allies and Water-works; theſe being publick and common concernments, admitted of no excuſe or exemption from them.

We have already mentioned that the Gold and Silver which was preſented by the Subjects to their Inca, was employed in Adorning the Temple of the Sun, and of the Royal Palaces; and herein we ſhall enlarge, when we come to ſpeak farther of the Houſe belonging to the Select Virgins.

All the ſtrange Birds and Beaſts, ſuch as Serpents of all ſorts and ſizes, Lizards, and other creeping things which the Curacas preſented, they kept in certain Provinces, which to this day have their Names from thoſe creatures: They alſo kept ſome of them in the Court, both for grandeur, and alſo to pleaſe the Indians, who eſteemed themſelves greatly obliged by the acceptance which the Inca did vouchſafe to make of them.

I remember that when I came from Cozco, there remained ſome Ruines of thoſe places where they kept theſe creatures, which they called Amarucancha; which is as much as to ſay, the Conſervatory of thoſe Serpents which were of the largeſt ſize, for Amaru ſignifies a great Serpent, on which place now the College of Jeſuits is erected: So likewiſe they called thoſe Dens where they kept the Lions, and Tygers, and Bears, Puma curcu and Pumap chupan; for Puma was their word for a Lion, one of which Dens was formerly at the foot of the Caſtle-hill, and the other juſt behind the Monaſtery of St. Dominick.

Their Aviary for the better Air, and chearfulneſs of the Birds, was placed without the City, which they called Surihualla, which ſignifies the Field of Oſtritches, which is about half a League Southward from Cozco, and was the Inheritance of my Tutor John de Alcobaça, and deſcended afterwards to his Son Diego de Alcobaça, who was a Prieſt and my School fellow.

Thoſe fierce creatures, ſuch as Tygers and Lions, Serpents and Toads of a prodigious bigneſs, ſerved not onely for oſtentation and the grandeur of the Court, but alſo were ſometimes made uſe of to puniſh and devour Malefactors, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak where we treat of thoſe Laws and Ordinances which were made againſt Offenders in Criminal matters.

And thus much ſhall ſerve for what we have to ſay concerning the Tribute which they gave to their Incas, and of the Manner and Occaſion for which it was expended. From the Papers of that curious and learned Father Blas Valera, I have made this following Extract, that ſo we may by his Authority confirm the truth of what we have related, touching the Beginnings, Customs, Laws and Government of this people.

And because he hath wrote on this subject with much perspicuity, order and elegancy of expression, I have thought fit to Adorn this History, and supply the defects of it by some of those Excellencies which I have copied from his Works.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Laws and Statutes which the Incas made for the good and benefit of their Subjects.

THat which now immediately follows concerning the Government of the Incas, we have for the better confirmation and authority of what we have already declared, Translated Verbatim out of the Elegant Latin of Blas Valera. "The Indians of Peru, saith he, began to lay some Foundations of a Political Government in the Reigns of the Inca, Manco Capac, and of the Inca Roca, who "was also one of their Kings; for before that time, in all preceding Ages, they "lived like Brutes, in all filthiness and bestiality, without order, rule, or any government: But from that time they began to educate their Children with some "mean rudiments of learning, and to enter into civil and mutual communication; they then also began to Cloath themselves, not onely with a respect to "modesty, but likewise for ornament; they then plowed and cultivated their "Fields with industry and labour, and therein afforded mutual assistence each to "other; they then constituted Judges, and kept Courts, they built Houses "both for private Dwellings and publick Meetings, with many other things "commendable, and worthy of praise. Those Laws and Statutes which their "Princes from the mere light of reason dictated and prescribed to them, they "readily embraced, and thereunto directed and conformed all their Actions in "that exact manner, that for my part I cannot but prefer these Incas of Peru, not "onely before the Inhabitants of China and Japan, and all those of the East-Indies; "but even before the Natural Gentiles of Asia, and the Natives of Greece: For if "it be well considered, the labour and industry which Numa Pompilius exercised in "framing and constituting Laws agreeable to the humour and disposition of the "Romans; and that Solon was an excellent Legislatour for the Athenians, and Licurgus for the Lacedemonians, is not much to be admired, because they were Men "expert, and knowing in all the points of Humane literature; which was a great "advantage, and availed them much in composing Laws and Customs proper and "necessary for those present days, and the happiness and welfare of future Ages. "But it is strange and wonderfull, that these poor Indians, who had none of those "helps nor advantages, should be able to lay such a solid foundation of excellent "Laws, which (excepting the Errour of their Idolatrous Worship) were truly "rational and comparable in every respect to the Constitutions of the most learned Statesmen, and which these constant Indians conserve with sacredness and "veneration unto this day: And which is most strange, that without letters or "writing, and onely by knots of thread of divers colours they should be able to "distinguish their Laws, and reade them with their true sense and signification; and so well by this invention to commit them to the knowledge of posterity, that since they were established by their first Kings, six hundred years "are fully elapsed, and yet are as faithfully and as lively conserved in the memory of that people, as if they had been Laws of later date. Such was their "Municipal Law, which treated of the particular advantage of every Nation, "and the Privileges and Immunities respective to every people. They had their "Agrarian Law, which determined and measured out the bounds and limits of

" Provinces, which was with ſingular diligence and rectitude obſerved; for they " had their ſworn Meaſurers, who meted out their Lands with Cords by Acres,
" which they called Tupu, whereby they made a juſt diviſion to the Neighbour" hood, aſſigning to every one his juſt ſhare and proportion. They had alſo that " which they called a Common Law, which, as they ſaid, reſpected every one
" (unleſs Old Men, and ſick, and Children, and infirm, which were exempted)
" but all others were obliged to labour in matters relating to the benefit of the " Common-wealth, ſuch as in the building of Temples, Palaces for the King, " and the great Lords, raiſing Bridges, making and mending High-ways, and o" ther matters of like nature. They had another Law, which they named the " Law of Brotherhood, which laid an obligation on the people to be aiding and
" aſſiſting one to the other, in plowing, and ſowing, and gathering in the Fruits,
" and in building Houſes one for the other, without pay, or expectation of re" ward. They had another Law, which they called Mitachanacuy, which was as " much as to ſay, a rotation, or a turn, or circulation of labour, which was no " more than that in all the work which was performed by publick aſſiſtence, the " like account ſhould be obſerved, and meaſures taken, as was in the diviſion of " the Lands, that ſo no Province, People, Lineage or Perſon, ſhould be obliged " to labour beyond their due proportion, but that their Lives ſhould have their " turns and times mixed with recreation and leiſures, as well as labours. They " had alſo a Sumptuary Law, which prohibited all kind of vanity and expence in
" Cloathing and Adornments of them with Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones;
" and eſpecially all profuſeneſs in banquets and delicacies in Diet were forbidden,
" onely the Neighbourhood were enjoined to Dine two or three times a Month
" together, in preſence of their Curacas, and then afterwards to exerciſe them-
" ſelves in feats of Arms, or in ſports and divertiſements, which was eſteemed a " probable means to reconcile Mens affections, and conſerve them in love and " friendſhip one with the other: And this Law was alſo made in favour to the " Shepherds, and other Field-labourers, that ſo they might taſt ſome pleaſures
" and recreations. They had alſo a Law in relation to thoſe whom they call " Poor; which was, That ſuch as were blind, dumb, lame, old, decrepit and lin" gering with any long or Chronical diſeaſe, ſo as that they were uncapable of " work, ſhould be cloathed and fed out of the King's Store. Likewiſe it was a " Law, that out of theſe Stores all Strangers and Travellers ſhould be provided;
" for whom alſo Inns and places of refreſhment were erected, which they called " Corpahuaci, which is as much as a Houſe of Hoſpitality in which Men had their " charge and expence defrayed by the Publick: And in this Law alſo it was Or" dained, that twice or thrice a Month they were to invite thoſe which, as before
" mentioned, are termed Poor unto their Meetings and publick Feaſts, that ſo
" their miſeries might receive ſome conſolation and diverſion by the common joy
" and ſociety. Another Law they called the Ordinance of good Husbandry, " which enjoined and required two things: Firſt, that no perſon ſhould remain
" idle, or be exempt from labour; for (as we have ſaid before) even Children
" of five years of Age were employed in ſomething agreeable to their capacities,
" nor were the lame and infirm altogether excuſed, but ſome work was given " them, which they were beſt able to perform; for idleneſs, which was puniſh-
" able with much diſhonour and infamy, was not indulged on any pretence but " what was of neceſſity, and unavoidable. And farther it was Ordained by this " Law, That the Indians ſhould dine and ſup with their Doors open, that ſo the " Officers and Miniſters of the Judges might have free and open acceſs to them
" at their pleaſure; for there were certain Officers appointed to viſit the Houſes
" of particular perſons, as well as the Temples, and publick Houſes, and Edifices, " whom they called Llactacamayu; and theſe were Monitors, or Viſitors, appointed
" to overſee, and make enquiry into the Houſes of particular perſons, obſerving
" the order, and regular care, and diligence which the Husband and Wife uſed in " their labour and families, and what obedience and reſpect the Children paid
" unto their Parents; the evidence and meaſures of which they took from the " neatneſs and politeneſs of their Attire, and from the cleanlineſs of their Uten-
" ſils and good Houſewifery in their Houſes; ſuch as they found in all things
" cleanly, they praiſed and commended in publick; and ſuch as were ſlovenly and " naſty, they puniſhed with ſtripes, whipping them on their Armes and Legs, or
" with ſuch other inflictiön as the Law required; by which care, and ſevere in-
" ſpection,

" ſpection, every one became laborious, and that induſtry produced ſuch abun" dance of all things neceſſary to humane Life; that thoſe things were given al-
" moſt for nothing, which now are to be purchaſed at exceſſive rates. What other " Laws, and moral Conſtitutions they obſerved, either relating to Men in a com" mon or a ſingle capacity, they were all regulated, and ſquared by the rule of " right Reaſon; and which may be known and collected from thoſe particulars,
" which we ſhall hereafter relate, concerning the Lives and Cuſtoms of this Peo" ple. And we ſhall hereafter, in the eight and ninth Chapters, ſpecifie the " cauſe and manner, why, and how they came to looſe theſe Laws and Cuſtoms,
" which were thus worthy and commendable; all which declined, and fell with " the Government of the Incas: And that the barbarity of the Indians is much " more ſavage, and their living much leſs political, and greater want of all things
" neceſſary in theſe days amongſt them, than was in the ancient times, when the " Incas bore the ſway and rule in thoſe Dominions.

CHAP. XII.

How they conquered and civilized their new Subjects.

THE Policy and Arts which the Incas uſed in their Conqueſts, and the manner and methods they purſued in civilizing the People, and reducing them to a courſe of moral Living, is very curious, and worthy to be obſerved. For from the firſt foundation, which their Kings laid of Government, which ſerved afterwards for an example, or pattern to their Succeſſours, their Maxime was, Never to make War on their Neighbours without juſt cauſe, or reaſon; ſo the Barbarity and Ignorance of the People ſeemed a good and lawfull motive, and next the Oppreſſion and Violence which the Neighbours uſed towards their Subjects, was another; but before they attempted on them by any acts of Hoſtility, they firſt ſent their ſummons three or four times, requiring their Obedience: After any Province was ſubdued, the firſt thing that the Inca did, was to take their principal Idol as an Hoſtage, and carry it to Cozco, where it was to remain in the Temple as a Captive, untill ſuch time as the People, being diſabuſed by the Vanity and Inability of their Gods, ſhould be reduced to a complyance with the Incas in their Worſhip and Adoration of the Sun. Howſoever they did not preſently overturn and demoliſh the ſtrange Gods of the Countrey ſo ſoon as they had ſubdued it; but rather out of reſpect to the Inhabitants, they tolerated for ſome time their Idols, untill that having inſtructed, and perſuaded them in a better Religion, as they thought, they might without their diſpleaſure, and perhaps with their conſent, deſtroy and ſuppreſs the God they had adored. Next they carried the principal Cacique of the Countrey, with all his Sons, to Cozco, there to careſs, and treat them with all kindneſs and humanity; by which occaſion they informing them of the Laws, Cuſtoms and propriety of their Speech, and inſtructing them in their ſuperſtitious Rites and Ceremonies, they became more eaſily reconciled to the Laws and Servitude of the Inca: After which the Curaca being reſtored to his Ancient Honour and Rule, was permitted to return unto his Subjects, who were commanded, as formerly, to obey him as their natural Prince and Lord. And that the conquered Nations might be reconciled with their Conquerours, and that the rancour and malice which lay on the Spirits of thoſe, who conceived themſelves injured, by acts of Violence and War, might be abated, and aſſuaged by gentle Lenitives, an Act of Oblivion was paſſed, and Banquets were prepared for feaſting of the new Subjects, together with the Conquerours of them, that ſo a perpetual Peace and Amity might be concluded by a coalition of their Minds, reconciled at theſe Feaſts; to which alſo the blind, the lame, and the infirm were admitted, that ſo they alſo might partake of the bounty and liberality of the Inca. At theſe Banquets they were entertained with the

Dances

Dances of the young Maidens, and activity of the Youth, and with the military Exercises of the Souldiery; besides which they presented them with gifts of Gold, and Silver, and Feathers, for the adornment of their Habits, at the times of their principal Festivals; and also they gave them Cloths, and other small curiosities, which they highly esteemed: so that those People, though never so barbarous and brutish at first, were yet made sensible of these kindnesses to such a degree, that they never afterwards so much as attempted to arise in Rebellion. And to take away all occasions of complaint from the Subjects of Aggreivances and Oppressions whatsoever; lest those Complaints should from words proceed to blows, and open violence; wherefore to prevent that, their Estates and Liberties were always conserved to them; onely they were required to be obedient to the Laws, Statutes, and ancient Institutions, which were published, and openly promulged amongst them, for unto these, and to the Worship of the Sun, their submission was required, and no Dispensation allowed in the case; and being obstinate, they were to be compelled by force; sometimes, where it was convenient, they transplanted Colonies from one place to another, but then they provided them with Lands, and Houses and Cattel, and Servants, and whatsoever was necessary and requisite for their livelihood; and into their places they transported perhaps some of the Citizens of Cozco, or others of approved Loyalty, which served for Guards and Garrisons, to keep the Neighbourhood in awe and subjection, and also to teach and instruct those Savages, and ignorant People in their Laws and Religion, together with the Tongue and Language of their Countrey.

All the other points of Government, and Injunctions imposed by the Inca Kings, were more easie and gentle than of any other Princes, who ruled the Nations of the New World; the which is not onely made manifest and apparent by their own Historical Knots, by which they committed the occurrences of past times unto memory, but are also approved and confirmed by the faithfull Commentaries of the Vice-King Don Francisco de Toledo, who having informed himself of the Custome and manners of every Province from the Indians themselves, made a Collection of them with his own hand-writing, and commanded his Visitors, Judges and Registers to transcribe them, Copies whereof are conserved unto this day in the publick Archives, and serve to evidence that Benignity and Gentleness, which the Kings of Peru in exercise of their Government used towards their Subjects: for as we have noted before, that excepting some particular matters, enjoined and imposed for the Defence and Security of the Empire; all other Laws, and Statutes had no other aspect, than what regarded the sole benefit, and interest of the Subjects; for every Man's private Estate and Patrimony had the same Protection, as that of the publick; no Souldiers were permitted to pillage, or plunder even those People whom they had subdued by force of Arms; but received and treated them, as if they were faithfull and true Servants: and for those who voluntarily submitted and surrendred themselves, they conferred in some short time Places and Offices of preferment, relating to civil or military Commands.

The Duty of Tribute which these Kings laid on their Subjects was so trivial, and inconsiderable, that when in the sequel of this History we shall come to treat of the particulars thereof, and wherein it consisted, it will seem ridiculous to the Reader; in return notwithstanding hereof, the Incas were not onely contented to bestow on their Subjects their Food and Rayment, but many other presents, which they bountifully conferred on the Curacas, and Great Men, extending also their largesses to the poor, and necessitous; as if they had been Stewards or Masters of Families, whose Office was to make Provision for others, rather than Kings, who bore the renowned Title of Capac Titu, which the Indians conferred upon them; Capac signifying as much as a Prince powerfull in Riches, and Titu is as much as Liberal, Magnanimous, a Demi-God, or Augustus. Hence proceeded that great Love and Affection which the Peruvians bore towards their Kings, that even to this day, though they are become Christians, they cannot forget the memory of them, but are ready on all occasions, when their present Oppressions grieve them, with sighs and groans to invoke their Names; and in reality they had much reason; for we do not reade in all the Histories of Asia, Africa, or Europe, that ever those Kings were so gratious to their Subjects, as these; or that they were so frank, or familiar with them, or so gentle and carefull managers of their Interest. And now, from what we have already said, and what we shall hereafter declare, the Reader may be able to collect, and understand what were the ancient Laws, Cuſtoms, and Statutes of the Indians of Peru, and how, and in what manner they lived; and that by the ſame accuſtomed Methods of Gentleneſs, we may believe, that theſe People may be beſt and moſt eaſily reduced unto the Chriſtian Religion.

CHAP. XIII.

How, and in what manner they inſtituted, and inveſted Officers in their reſpective Employments.

BLas Valera, in the proceſs of this Diſcourſe, hath one Chapter under this title, and alſo how the Overſeers of the labours of the People diſtributed to every one his reſpective task. How alſo they diſpenſed the Eſtate belonging to the publick, and to particular Perſons, and how alſo they proportioned and laid their Tributes.

cc The Inca having ſubdued any new Province, and carried the Idol God captive cc to Cozco, he then endeavoured to ſatisfie and appeaſe the minds of the Lords of cc the Countrey, and gain the good-will of the People; commanding that all Indians cc in common, as alſo their Prieſts and Sorcerers ſhould worſhip and adore the God cc Ticci Viracocha, under the title and denomination of Pachacamac, which is as much cc as the Almighty, or ſupreme God of Gods. The next command laid on them, cc was, That they ſhould acknowledge the Inca for their ſovereign Lord and King; cc and that the Caciques ſhould by their turns appear, and preſent their Perſons at the cc Court once every year, or every two years, according as the diſtance of the Province cc was remote from Cozco; by which means ſo great was the concourſe of people to cc that City, that it became the moſt populous part and place of the New World. cc Moreover it was ordained, that the Natives and Strangers which came to ſojourn cc in any Province, ſhould be numbred, and regiſtred according to their Age, Line- cc age, Offices, Eſtates and Qualities; all which being performed by help of their cc Threads of various colours, ſerved afterwards for a rule, whereby they regula- cc ted and proportioned their Tribute; and meaſured every thing which had rela- cc tion to the publick Intereſt. The next thing the Inca did after ſuch Conqueſt, cc was to nominate his Generals, and ſeveral Officers of the Army, ſuch as Colonels, cc Captains, Enſigns, Serjeants, and Corporals: Some of which commanded ten, cc ſome fifty Souldiers; but a Captain of the moſt inferiour degree was ſet over at cc leaſt an hundred, others commanded five hundred, others a thouſand; but the cc Major-Generals commanded four or five thouſand Men; a General was not called cc ſo, unleſs he were at the Head of ten thouſand Men, and then his Title was Ha- cc tun Apu, which was as much as Great Captain. Thoſe whom they called Curacas, cc were ſovereign Lords, ſuch as our Dukes, and Earls, and Marqueſſes, who being cc the Natural Lords of their People, ruled and preſided over them, both in the cc times of War and Peace. Theſe had power to make Laws, and tax the people cc for payment of their Tribute; and it was their duty alſo to provide, and to take cc care for their Subjects in hard times of want and neceſſity. The Captains of the cc higheſt, as well as thoſe of inferiour rank, though they were not capacitated to cc make Laws, did yet by right of Inheritance ſucceed into the Offices of their Pa- cc rents; their military Employments privileged and exempted them from the pay- cc ment of Tribute, being freed of all Taxes, and Impoſitions, and in caſe of want cc were to be ſupplied out of the Royal, and not out of the common Stores. How- cc ſoever the Officers of inferiour rank, ſuch as were the Chiefs of ten or fifty Men, cc were not freed of their Tribute, becauſe they were not of Noble Deſcent. The cc Generals of the Armies had power to make and commiſſionate Officers, and con- cc ſtitute them in their Employments, but being once ſo ſetled and eſtabliſhed, they could

cc could not take away their Commiſſions, or deveſt them of their Offices. The cc diligent and carefull diſcharge which the Decurions performed in their duty, ſuch cc as ſurveying the fields, overſeeing the true and lawfull diſpoſal of Inheritances, cc the Royal Houſes, and diſpenſing Food and Rayment to the Commonalty, was cc accepted in the place of their Tribute, and no other charge required at their hands. cc Under the great Miniſters other ſubordinate Officers were ſubſtituted in all mat- cc ters relating either to Government, or to the Tribute, it being eſteemed the beſt cc and moſt certain way to prevent cheats and frauds in Accounts. They had alſo cc Chief Shepherds, and ſervants that were under them, to whoſe care the Flocks cc were committed, which belonged both to the King, and to the Community, cc which they conſerved with that fidelity, that not a Lamb was miſſing, nor Paſtor cc Fido more faithfull to his charge, than theſe truſty Shepherds, whoſe chief dread cc and fear was of Wild-beaſts, which they watchfully chaſed away; but as for cc Thieves, there being none, they paſſed their time with the leſs fear. They had cc Guardians, and Surveyors of the Fields, and Poſſeſſions; they had alſo Stewards, cc Adminiſtrators, Judges and Viſitors, whoſe chief care and incumbency was to ſee cc that nothing ſhould be wanting, either to the People in common, or to any pri- cc vate perſon whatſoever; for in caſe any one did ſignifie his neceſſities to the De- cc curions, they were obliged immediately to make their needs known to the Cura- cc cas, and they to the Inca, who readily ſupplied their occaſions, it being his greateſt cc Glory to be eſteemed the Father of his Countrey, and the Guardian of his People. cc It was the Office of the Judges and Viſitors to ſee that the Men employed them- cc ſelves in their reſpective duties; and that the Women were good Houſewives, ta- cc king care of their Houſes, keeping their Rooms clean, and nurſing and educating cc their Children; and in ſhort, that every one buſied him or herſelf in ſpinning and cc weaving. That the young Women obeyed their Mothers and Miſtreſſes, and were cc diligent about the Affairs of their Houſes, and other works appertaining to their cc Sex. The aged and infirm were excuſed from all laborious works, and had no cc injunctions laid on them, but ſuch as tended to their own benefit, ſuch as gathering cc ſticks, and ſtraws, and louſing themſelves, being afterwards obliged to carry their cc Lice to the Chief of their Squadron, and ſo they took a diſcharge for their Tri- cc bute. The Employment for blind men was to cleanſe the Cottons of the Seeds, cc and foulneſs, and rub out the Mayz from the ſtalks, or Ears in which it grew. cc And beſides theſe principal Officers which reſpected the orderly Government of cc the Commonwealth, there were Heads, or Maſter-workmen ſet over the Silver- cc Smiths, and Goldſmiths, Carpenters, and Maſons and Jewellers; which Order cc and Rule, had it been continued, and confirmed by the Acts and Patents of the cc Emperour Charles the Fifth, with the ſame care and policy, as it was firſt eſta- cc bliſhed by the Incas, that People would at this day have been more flouriſhing, cc and conſiderable, and all things, both for eating and clothing, would have been cc more plentifull, and this happineſs of affairs would have been a good preparation cc to the preaching and admiſſion of the Goſpel. But now our negligence, and want cc of due care, hath been the cauſe of the decay and ruine of that People; of which cc the poor Indians were ſo ſenſible, that they often murmured, and complained of cc the preſent Government in all their private Cabals, and Meetings; but how they cc compared the particulars of theſe times with the Reigns of the Incas, we ſhall diſ- cc courſe more largely hereafter, in the 9th Chap. of our 2d Book, pag. 55. Thus far are the Words of Father Blas Valera. And this Authour proceeding farther, in his Diſcourſe, hath theſe words. cc Beſides what we have ſaid already, they cc had Officers ſet over the Countrey Labourers, over the Fowlers, over the Fiſher- cc men, who fiſhed either in the Sea, or in the Rivers; ſome alſo were ſet over the cc Weavers, Shoemakers, and over thoſe who hewed Timber for the Royal Palaces, cc and publick Edifices; alſo over thoſe Smiths, who made inſtruments of Copper, cc for ſeveral uſes. They had alſo Heads and Chiefs over the Mechanicks, who did cc all attend with great care and diligence to their Trades; ſo that it is ſtrange to cc conſider in theſe our days, that theſe People who were ſo fond, and tenacious of cc conſerving their ancient Cuſtoms and Practices, ſhould be ſo careleſs in conſerva- cc tion of their Arts, they being wholly diſuſed, and now loſt and forgotten amongſt cc them.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIV.

What the Rule and Account was which they observed in publick and private Estates.

" After the Inca had subdued a Province, he confirmed the Right of possession " to the Natives of it, and then constituted Governours over the people, and " Instructors who were to teach them the Doctrine and Ways of Religion, and to " compose all troubles and differences arising amongst them: For better dispatch " of which, it was ordered, that they should decipher and set down by their Knots, " a Plat, or Map, of all the Meadows, Mountains, Hills, Arable Grounds, Mines, " Salt-pans, Fountains, Lakes, Rivers, and Plantations of Cottons and Fruit-trees; " together with their Flocks which produced Wool, and Herds of other Cattel. " All which particulars, with many more, they ordered to be measured, and laid " down distinctly by themselves. As first a Scheme was drawn of the whole Pro- " vince; then how it was divided into its several people; and lastly, how it bor- " dered on all parts and quarters on its Neighbours; then the length and breadth " of it was measured, and notice taken of the quality of the Land, as what was " barren, and what part of it was fruitfull; the design of all which was, not in or- " der to apply any part or parcel thereof to the Estate, or benefit of the Inca; but " onely that a due knowledge and consideration being had of the fruitfulness or ste- " rility of the Land, sure and certain measures might be the better taken of what " every Countrey was able to provide and give towards their Tribute; and that " having made a just calculate of all things, they might be the better enabled to lay " a due proportion of those supplies which were required from them in times of " Pestilence, Famine, or other Calamities: And lastly, it was publickly promul- " ged, and made known to every Individual person, what Service the Inca, or the " Curacas, or the Commonwealth required at his hands: And lastly, it was Ordai- " ned, that according to such Models and Measures as were laid down of the Pro- " vince, and the situation of it, that Boundaries and Land-marks should be set up " for distinction and separation from the Frontiers belonging to the Neighbouring " Countries. And left in times to come there should happen out any mistakes or " confusion for want of due distinction, they gave new and proper Names to every " Mountain, Hill, Field, Meadow, Fountain, and all other particular places; and " if any of them had Names anciently given them, they confirmed them again, ad- " ding something new and more distinguishing; the which will be more remarka- " ble when we treat of that great veneration and respect which the Indians conserve " unto this day of several places. After this they divided and shared out the Land " by parcels to the people of the Province according to their proportions, ordering " them especially to be carefull, that these Lands thus measured, and laid out, and " bounded, should in no-wise be mixed or confounded with the Pasturage or Moun- " tains of other people, but that every one should know its own Land-marks and " Boundaries allotted. The Mines of Gold and Silver, whether anciently known, or " discovered of late times, were allowed to the Curacas to enjoy for themselves, " their kindred and servants; not for Treasure, for they contemned that, but onely " to Adorn their Cloaths and Vestments with which they were apparelled on Festi- " val-days, and with such a quantity as might serve for Cups and Vessels for the " Curaca to drink in, for he was stinted and limited to such a certain number of " them: besides these uses, they had little regard unto their Mines, but rather suf- " fered them to be forgotten and lost; which was the reason, that when the Spani- " ards came in, though the Artists and Labourers in other Crafts were very nume- " rous, yet in this alone few Founders, or skilfull in Melting Ore, were to be found. " Such as were employed in the King's Service were abundantly provided with all " Utensils and Instruments, together with Cloaths and Diet at the charge and ex- " pence of the King, or of the Lord. These Artists were obliged to work two " Months of the Year in Service of the Inca, which was in discharge of their Tri" bute, the remainder of the Year was their own, free, and might dispose of them" selves as they thought fit; this was a particular Trade and Mystery, and such as " laboured in it were called Smelters. That sort of Copper which they called An-

" ta, served them in the place of Iron, of which they made their Knives and Car" penters Tools, and the great Pins with which the Women tucked up their Cloths;
" and hereof they made great and large Plates, which served for Looking-glasses;
" and likewise of the same Metal they made all their Rakes and Hammers; so that " being of an Universal use to them, they preferred it before Gold or Silver, and " for that reason worked more in the Mines of Copper, than in the richer Mines
" of Gold or Silver.

" The Salt which they made, whether it were from their Salt Springs, or Sea-
" Water, as also Fish taken in the Seas, or Rivers, or Lakes and Fruit growing " from their Wild Trees, as also Cottons and fine Rushes were by Command of " the Inca deemed and judged to be the Common Estate of the people, and the " Goods of the Inhabitants in every Province, of which they had right and licence " to take and use as much as their occasions did require; but of those Trees which " any particular person had planted, the Fruit was peculiar, and appropriated onely
" to the use of him who planted them.

" The Corn which the Countries yielded for Bread, and those also which pro" duced other Grane, were by order of the Inca divided into three parts, and ap" plied to different uses. The first was for the Sun, his Priests and Ministers; the " second was for the King, and for the support and maintenance of his Governours
" and Officers, whom he dispatched and employed in foreign parts; and the third
" was for the Natives and Sojourners of the Provinces, which was equally divided
" according as the needs which every Family required. This was the division " which the Inca observed and proportioned in all parts of his Empire; so that " there was no other Tribute required of the Indians payable either to their King, " or their Lords or Governours, or to the Temple or Priests, or any person, or for " any other matter or thing whatsoever. What overplus remained of the King's " Provisions, were at the end of the Year transported to the Common Stores of " the people; and what overplus remained to the Sun, was distributed amongst " the poor, the lame, and the blind, and others who were in any manner disabled;
" but no distribution hereof was made, untill such time as the Sacrifices were " completed, which were many; and plentifull provision made for the Priests
" and Ministers of the Temple, who were almost innumerable.

CHAP.

CHAP. XV.

In what the Tribute was paid, and in what quantity, and what Laws were made in relation to the same.

" COming now to discourse of those Tributes which the Inca Kings of Peru ex" acted of their Subjects, they were so small and inconsiderable, that if we " duly reflect on the quality and quantity of the Matters required, we may boldly
" affirm, that the great Cæsars, who were styled August and Pious, were not to be " compared to these Incas, in respect of that protection and compassion they had to" wards their People; for indeed, if it be well considered, these Princes seemed " to have paid Toll and Tribute to their Vassals, rather than they unto their Kings, " whose care and business it was to lay out themselves for the good and welfare of " their people. The quantity of their Tribute being reduced to the Account and " Measures we make in these days, would be very inconsiderable; for the days
" work of the Labourers, and the value of the things in themselves, and the con" sumption which the Incas made of their Stores, being all duly calculated, it will " be found that many Indians did not pay the value of four Ryals of our Money.
" And lest this small Tribute should seem burthensome in the payment thereof, ei" ther to their Inca, or their Curaca, they expressed much joy and chearfulness when " they carried it into the Stores; having some consideration that the Tribute was
" but small, and yet greatly tended to the conservation and benefit of themselves " and the publick. Those Laws and Statutes which were made in favour of the " Tributaries, were so faithfully and inviolably conserved, that neither the Gover-" nours, nor Captains, nor Generals, nor the Inca himself had power to corrupt or " cancel them in prejudice of his Subjects. The which Laws are these which fol" low. The First and principal Law was this: That whosoever hath at any time
" been free, and exempt from Tribute, cannot at any time afterwards be obliged " to the payment thereof. Those that were free and privileged, were all those of " the Bloud-Royal, all Captains of high or low degree, even the very Centurions, " with their Children and Grandchildren; together with the Curacas, and all those
" of their Generation: Souldiers also actually employed in the War were excu" sed; and Young Men, untill they arrived at the Age of twenty five, were not " within the Order, because untill that time they were judged to be under the Tui" tion, or Pupillage of their Parents. Old Men of fifty years, and upwards, were " also exempted from Tribute; as likewise all Women, whether Virgins, or Wives, " or Widows: The sick and infirm, untill they had recovered their health, were " excused; and the blind, and lame, and deaf, and dumb, were employed in such " Tributary Work as they were capable of. The Second Law was, That all others, " unless Priests and Ministers attending on the Temple of the Sun, and the Select
" Virgins, were all without any limitation, or restriction, (except before excepted)
" obliged to payment of their Tribute. A Third Law was, That no Indian what" soever was obliged to pay his Tribute, or any part thereof, out of his own Stores
" or Estate, but onely by his Labour, or in discharge of his Office, or by the time
" which he employed in the publick Service of his King and Countrey; and here" in every Man was equal, the Rich being not farther charged than he that was " Poor: We call him Rich that had many Children and Servants, who assisted " him in his Work, and speedily to dispatch the task of Tribute which was impo" sed upon him; for a Man might be Rich in other things, and yet Poor in this " particular. A Fourth Law was, That no Man could be obliged to any other La" bour, but that which was properly his own, unless it were upon Tillage of Land,
" and in the Wars, for those were Matters of common concernment. A Fifth
" Law was, That no Nation, or Province, in payment of their Tribute, was ob" liged to any Contribution, but of that which was of the Growth of their own

" Countrey; for otherwiſe it would be an agreivance unto the people to be obli" ged to wander into foreign parts for fruits of different nature to them which " their ſoil did produce, The Sixth Law was, That all thoſe Officers and Maſter-
" workmen who were engaged in ſervice of the Inca, or the Curacas, were to be pro" vided at the charge of the Employers, with ſuch Tools and Inſtruments as their " Trade, and ſuch materials as their work required. As for example, he that " worked upon Metalls was to be provided with Gold, or Silver, or Copper, on " which he was to exerciſe his art and labour; the weaver was to be ſupplied with " Wool, or Cottons, the Painter with Colours, and ſo the like in other matters;
" ſo that the Artiſt was not obliged to beſtow more than his time and skill: and
" then at the end of two months, or three at moſt, he was diſmiſſed from his task, " and made free from his Labour, for the remaining part of the whole year: and in
" caſe any one, out of his own voluntary good-will and pleaſure, or out of a deſire to
" finiſh and perfect any part of his work, already begun, ſhould think fit to con" tinue his labour untill a longer time, then ſuch overplus of time was paſſed to his " credit, and diſcounted in the two months of the following Year, and notified, " and kept in memory by the help of their knots. The Seventh Law was, That " all thoſe Artiſts who laboured in any Trade or Myſtery, being in diſcharge of " their Tribute, were to be provided of all neceſſaries, either for Food or Rayment,
" and of Medicines in caſe of ſickneſs; and that not onely they, but alſo their " Wives and Children, and thoſe that came to their aſſiſtence were alſo to be main" tained with the like proviſions; but then the account was kept according to the " task impoſed, and not by the time; for if a Man could, with the help of his As-" ſiſtents, perform that in a week, which would require two months of his own
" ſingle work, he was judged to have complied with his obligation, and ſo diſchar-
" ged from his ſervice. And this ſhall ſerve to diſcover the errour of thoſe who al-
" ledge, that anciently the Mother, and Sons, and Daughters, paid their Tribute,
" the ſame being a miſtake, by not rightly diſtinguiſhing that from right and duty,
" which was onely performed by a voluntary aſſiſtence, which the Wives, and Chil" dren, and Servants, yielded to their Fathers and Maſters; for in caſe the Husband " of the Family were pleaſed to labour ſingly, and without other aſſiſtence, his " Wife, or Children, could not be forced to work; nor had the Judges or Decuri-
" ons any other power, than to correct and puniſh their idleneſs, in caſe they were
" negligent and remiſs in their own Affairs: So that in the time of the Incas, " thoſe perſons were onely accounted rich, who had a numerous Family of Children,
" able to work, and to be aſſiſtent to him, by whoſe help a quick riddance was " made of his task, whilſt others moiling and toiling ſingly for a long time at their " work, untill their Tribute was accompliſhed, often fell ſick, and fainted under " their burthen: Wherefore for eaſe and remedy herein, a Law was made, that the " rich Family having performed their own task, were to beſtow the labour of a day " or two on their fellows, which was very acceptable, and pleaſing to all the In- " dians.

CHAP. XVI.

The Order they uſed in impoſing and proportioning their Tribute; and how the Inca requited the Curacas in return of thoſe pretious things they gave him for Preſents.

"THE Eighth Law ordained and preſcribed the manner and rule how every "perſon was to be taxed for his proportion of Tribute, for equality and juſt "proportion was obſerved in all matters by them; and the manner was this: Up- "on a certain day appointed, the principal People of every Province, ſuch as their "Judges, Tax-gatherers, Accountants, and Keepers of their Knots in threads, aſ- "ſembled together, by help of which, and of their Pebles, which were in number "as many as the Inhabitants of the Province were, they made their Accounts ſo "exact, that I know not who are more to be commended, either thoſe who with- "out figures of Arithmetick were able by a quicker way, than our Accountants, to "make a ſpeedy or juſt reckoning, or the Governour and Miniſters, who eaſily ap- "prehended the method and reaſon of their Accounts, by ſuch obſcure and unin- "telligible ways to us.

"By theſe Knots they were informed of the work done by every Indian, what "Offices he had acted, what journies he had undertaken by order of his Curaca, or "Superiour, what Trade he had exerciſed, all which was placed to his Account, "in diſcharge of his Tribute. Then they readily made appear to the Judges and "Governours every thing diſtinctly by it ſelf, as how much Proviſion was laid up "in the Stores, and what was the quality of them, as Pepper, Cloths, Shoes, "Arms, and other things, which were matters of Tribute, together with the Gold, "Silver, pretious Stones, and Copper; and what thereof appertained to the Inca, "and what proportion unto the Sun. They alſo accounted for the Stores of every "Province; and farther the Law ordained, that every Inca, Governour of a Pro- "vince, ſhould keep a Copy of the Accounts or Tally in his own poſſeſſion, as a "means to avoid and prevent all fraud and cheats in the Miniſters. A Ninth Law "was, that what overplus remained of Tribute after the occaſions of the Inca were "ſupplied, were to be tranſported to the common Magazines of the Countrey, and "there lodged for common ſupport and maintenance of the Natives in the times of "ſcarcity and famine. As to Jewels, and pretious Stones, Gold, and Silver, Fea- "thers of Birds, with various Colours for Painting, and Miniature, with divers "other Curioſities, which the Curacas every year preſented to the Inca; they were "all taken, and diſpoſed of for adornment of the King, and his near Relations; and "then afterwards, in caſe any overplus remained, or that there was more than the "occaſions of the Royal Family required, they were in grace and favour to the Cap- "tains, and Lords, who preſented them, returned again to them; for though they "were the goods and product of their own Countrey, and that they could not make "uſe of them; yet being reſtored with ſuch obliging circumſtances from the Inca, "the favour and honour was highly eſteemed: from all which it is evident, that the "Incas enjoyed the ſmalleſt part of all the Tribute, and that the Taxes and Impoſi- "tions were more for the benefit of the People, than of the King. The Tenth "Law enumerated, and particularized the ſeveral Works and Employments which "were to be performed by way of Tribute, for ſervice of the King and Countrey; "as making and plaining the High-ways, building or repairing the Temples of the "Sun, and other Idolatrous Sanctuaries, erecting publick Houſes, as Store-houſes, "and places for the Tribunals of Juſtice, and ſeats for the Governours, making "Bridges, or taking the Employment of Meſſengers, whom they called Chaſqui, til- "ling the Grounds, and incloſing Orchards, feeding Flocks and Herds of Cattel, "watching the Poſſeſſions, and ſowed Lands, building Inns, and places of Hoſpi- "tality for Strangers and Travellers, and giving their attendance there for ſuccour,

" and help of ſuch as were in their journey. Moreover they had ſome farther charge " and duty laid upon them, for the common good and benefit, and which had re- " lation to the ſervice of the King, and of the Curacas, but in regard there were at " that time great numbers of Indians, which were obliged to take their turns in that " Office, the which was obſerved without partiality or favour to any, the time of " the trouble was ſo ſhort, that no perſon could be ſenſible of the inconvenience. " It was alſo farther provided by this Law, that care ſhould be taken for the amend- " ment of the High-ways, and that the Overſeers ſhould repair the Bridges, and " clear the Aqueducts and Chanels by which the Lands were watered, all which " being for the common good and advantage, was to be performed without any " charge or expence whatſoever.

Theſe were the principal Laws which had any relation to the Tribute; there were other Orders of leſs conſideration, which for brevity ſake we omit; thus far being the words of Blas Valera. And now I ſhould gladly demand of a certain Hiſtorian this one queſtion; Wherein did the ſeverity of thoſe Laws, relating to Tribute conſiſt? which he charges on the Incas; and indeed I would the more willingly be reſolved herein, becauſe I find that the Kings of Spain, of glorious memory, did afterwards confirm the ſame, which they would never have done, had they been blameable, and ſevere to that high degree which he pretends; and in this opinion Blas Valera concurs with me. And thus let us now return to the Prince Viracocha, whom we left embroiled in a thouſand difficulties to defend his own Reputation, and the Honour of his Anceſtours.

CHAP. XVII.

The Inca Viracocha receives intelligence of the approach of the Enemy, and of the Recruits and Succours coming to him.

THE noble Actions of the Inca Viracocha, do now call upon us to omit other Relations, and return to the Hiſtory of his Wars and Bravery. We left him towards the end of his Father's Reign at Muyna, from whence (as we ſaid) he returned to Cozco, rallying, and gathering in his way the People into a body, who were wandring, and diſperſed through the Fields and Countrey; and that when he departed from the City, he intended to march towards the Enemy with reſolution to dye with Honour, rather than live with Infamy, and baſely to behold his City made captive by the violence of Rebels, and the Temple of the Sun, and the Convent of the pure Virgins, and all that was eſteemed ſacred by them, prophaned and unhallowed by the inſolence of polluted Hands. Now we muſt know, that about half a League Northward from the City, there is a certain plain, where the Prince Viracocha appointed his general rendezvous; that the People both from Cozco, and other parts might there meet, and join in a Body, which being in a ſhort time aſſembled, formed an Army of about eight thouſand Men, who were all Incas, and reſolved to dye before the face of their Prince, and in defence of their Countrey. During this ſtay news came to the Camp, that the Enemy was within nine or ten Leagues of the City, having already paſſed the great River of Apurimac; but this ill news was the next day followed by a more comfortable Meſſage, which was, that from the parts of Contiſuyu an Army of twenty thouſand Men were marching for relief of the Prince, being compoſed of the Nations of Quechua, Cotapampa, Cotanera, Tmara, and other parts, bordering on the revolted Provinces, and that they were come near, and not many Leagues diſtant.

The

The Quechuas, who were the neareſt Neighbours to the Chancas, were the firſt that diſcovered the Conſpiracy, and in regard the urgency of the Affair admitted of no delay, nor time to adviſe the Inca, and receive his orders, they immediately complied with the preſent neceſſity, and putting all their People into arms, they marched directly towards the City, reſolving to evidence their Loyalty towards their King with the laſt drop of their Bloud. Theſe People were of thoſe, who in the time of the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, (as we have already declared) voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves to the Obedience of the Inca, and therefore being moved by a Principle of Love and Affection towards his Government, did readily give a teſtimony thereof, by the ſeaſonable Succours they brought to his ſervice; and alſo the ancient hatred they bore towards the Chancas was a farther incentive hereunto; for being jealous, and fearfull, that in caſe the Chancas ſhould prevail, they were in danger of falling again under their Tyranny, and the Yoke of that Servitude, from whence they had been lately reſcued by the power of the Incas; they took a reſolution to march with all expedition imaginable, that ſo they might arrive at the City before the Enemy could attempt it, and croſſing the neareſt way towards the Northward, the Enemy was not ſooner come, than they appeared alſo to bid them defiance.

The Prince Viracocha, and his People, were much ſurpriſed with the news of this unexpected Succour, admiring from whence it ſhould come; untill at length recollecting themſelves, they called to mind the Apparition of his Uncle Viracocha, who in a Dream promiſed his favour and aſſiſtence, at times of his greateſt Extremity, and that he being of his Bloud and Fleſh, would in all occaſions of neceſſity perform the Office of a faithfull Kinſman: from the remembrance hereof they certainly concluded, that theſe Forces and Recruits were effects and accompliſhments of this Promiſe, and were ſent in an extraordinary manner, as it were, from Heaven; the which being often mentioned by the Prince, and inculcated into his People, it took ſuch deep impreſſion in their minds, that being encouraged thereby, they reſolved with full aſſurance of Victory to meet the Enemy, and attack them within the Hills, and diſadvantageous Paſſes, which are between the River Apurimac and the Mountains of Villa-cunca, which being high and rugged, are not to be attempted without hazard and difficulty. Howſoever it was reſolved firſt to attend the arrival and conjunction of the Recruits with them, and that then afterwards they ſhould allow ſome day of repoſe and refreſhment to the Forces wearied with their long march, and ſhould likewiſe give time to the Enemy to diſlodge themſelves out of their advantageous poſts, and ſhew themſelves in a more equal field: It was likewiſe agreed by the Prince and his Council, that conſidering the increaſe of their Army, their beſt and wiſeſt courſe was to continue their Camp in their preſent ſtation, where they were not onely enabled to relieve the City, but alſo more eaſily ſupplied with Proviſions and Ammunition for their numerous Army: with this reſolution the Prince remained quietly expecting his additional ſuccours, which ſhortly after arrived, to the number of twelve thouſand Souldiers. The Prince received them with all the gratious Expreſſions of Thanks and Acknowledgments for their Loyalty towards the Inca, and rewarding the Captains and Curacas of each Nation, together with the Souldiery, with ſuch Gifts and Preſents, as then offered; he highly applauded their Loyalty; promiſing for the future ſome more ſignal rewards for ſuch eminent and ſeaſonable ſervices. The Curacas having performed their Complements and Reſpects towards the Inca Viracocha, acquainted him that about two days march off, were other five thouſand Men coming; which for haſte and expedition ſake they thought not fit to expect, but leave them to follow with what convenient ſpeed they were able. The Prince having returned them thanks for the aſſiſtence of both Armies, and conſulting with his Kindred in the caſe, gave orders to the Curacas, immediately to diſpatch an Expreſs to thoſe who were coming, adviſing them, that the Prince was encamped with his Army in the plains, and that they ſhould march towards certain hollows, and cloſe places in a mountain not far diſtant from thence, where they ſhould lie in ambuſh, expecting the Enemy, where, in caſe the Enemy ſhould offer Battel, he with his Forces would be ready to enter into the heat of the fight, and they might them ſally forth, and attacking one wing of them, might make the victory eaſie and ſecure; and in caſe they declined the engagement, they had ſtill performed the Office of good Souldiers, according to the Rule of Martial Diſcipline. Two days after theſe Recruits came, the Van-guard of the Enemy appeared on the top of the Mountain called Rimac-tampu; where having notice that the Inca lay encamped about five Leagues off, they made a halt, and passed the Word to the Rere, that both the Main Body and Rere-guard should hasten to come up and joyn with the Van of the Army. In this manner and order having marched the whole day, they came at length and joined at Sacsahuana, a place distant about three Leagues and a half from the Quarters of the Prince Viracocha; where afterwards that famous Battel was given between Gonçalo Piçarro, and de la Gasca.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Bloudy Battel which followed, and the Courage with which the Prince overcame his Enemies.

THE Prince Viracocha sent his Ambassadours to the Enemy then encamped at Sacsahuana, with offers of peace and friendship, promising to them Pardon, and an Act of Oblivion for all that was past. But the Chancas being well informed that the Inca Yahuar-huacac had left his City, and retired into some remote part; they were so encouraged thereby, that though they knew that the Prince his Son was in Arms, and in a posture to defend the City; yet they so slighted his Ambassadours, that they would not so much as hear them, or give them Audience; for being puft up with the vain opinion, that the Father being fled, the Son would speedily give place, promised to themselves an assurance of Victory, with these hopes; next day following they removed their Camp from Sacsahuana, and marched towards Cozco; and though they made what haste they were able; yet in regard they were to March in order of Battel, the night came on before they could arrive at the Prince's Camp, and therefore they pitched about half a League short of the Enemies Quarter: Notwithstanding which, the Inca Viracocha dispatched other Messengers to them with Tenders of Peace and Pardon; but the Chancas still continued obstinate, not vouchsafing other Answer, than with great scorn and disdain; saying, That to morrow it should be determined who deserved the Title of King, and in whose power it was to offer Peace, and Conditions of Pardon.

This Answer being given, both Armies remained the whole night upon their Guard, with Centinels set on each side; and in the morning, by break of day, the Squadrons Arming themselves, with great Noise and Shouts, with sound of Trumpets, and Timbrels, and Cornets, they began the on-set. The Inca Viracocha marching in the head of his Army, was he that threw the first Dart at the Enemy, with which the Battel began. The Chancas in hopes of Victory, of which they seemed to be assured, fought with great resolution: And the Incas, who did not despair neither of success, adventured to rescue the Life of their Prince, and revenge the affront which the Rebels offered. The Fight continued untill Noon, being maintained with equal Courage on both sides; the slaughter was great, and not as yet determined to which party the Victory inclined: At length the 5000 Indians which lay in Ambush made their sally, and with extraordinary resolution and shouts attacking the right Wing of the Enemy, began to give a turn to Fortune; for being fresh, they so prest the Chancas, that they were forced to give way, and retreat with great loss and slaughter: Howsoever, animating one the other, they engaged a second time, endeavouring to recover the Ground which they had lost, being enraged to meet that opposition which they never expected, and so much difficulty in attaining a Victory which they promised to themselves with so much ease and assurance.

After

After this ſecond onſet they fought two hours longer, the advantage ſtill continuing doubtfull and uncertain: At length the Chancas growing tired and weary, began to faint; and obſerving that freſh recruits continually re-inforced the Army of the Incas, the Chancas became diſcouraged, and deſperate of Victory: For thoſe people, who before were fled from the City with fear, and the Neighbouring Countries thereabouts, having received intelligence, that the Prince Viracocha was returned, and made head againſt the Enemy, in defence of the Temple of the Sun; they joined together into ſmall Bodies of fifty, and a hundred in a Company; and in ſuch Troops ruſhed into the Battel with more noiſe than numbers. The Incas obſerving theſe unexpected ſuccours to come in, cried out, that the Sun and the God Viracocha had converted the Rocks and Stones of the Countrey into Men, and had raiſed them up to fight in defence of his own cauſe and people; the which report took the eaſier impreſſion in the minds of that people; who being accuſtomed to the belief of ſuperſtitious Fables, were willing in this exigence to ſupport their courage with the power of a Miracle. The Chancas alſo, who were a people of the like ſuperſtitious fancy, giving ready credence to this rumour, were ſtrook and affrighted with a ſtrange amazement; and this belief ſo far dilated and radicated it ſelf afterwards in the minds of the ſimple people of the whole Kingdom, that it was accounted an Impiety, and a piece of Atheiſm and Prophaneneſs to diſtruſt, or queſtion, the truth of this report. Of which Geronimo Roman writing in his Treatiſe of the Weſt-Indies, and in the 11th Chapter of his ſecond Book, ſpeaking particularly of this Battel, hath theſe very words.

" It is certain, according to the report of all the Indians, who diſcourſe of that famous Battel, that the Inca remained Maſter of the Field, and won the day; and " they farther believe, that by a miraculous power of the Sun, the Stones of the " Field were Metamorphoſed, or transformed into Men, and aroſe up in Battel " againſt the Enemy; and that this was done in accompliſhment of that promiſe " which was given to the Valiant Pachacuti Inca Yupanqui; for, ſo alſo they give " this Title to the Prince Viracocha. Theſe are the Words of that curious Authour of the aforementioned Book, who in the ſaid Chapter touches many points in brief, of which we have recited ſome, and ſhall farther have occaſion to touch on others in the Sequel of this Hiſtory of the Kings of Peru. In like manner Acoſta mentions the Viſion which appeared to Viracocha, though there be ſome difference in the proper Names belonging to the Kings of that Age. And indeed both he and other Writers mention this Battel, as other matters, with ſuch brevity, that they ſeem almoſt to paſs it by, as a matter inconſiderable: And indeed, for the moſt part, all the Relations which the Spaniards give of the Indians are very intricate and confuſed; the which we may lawfully attribute to the little knowledge they had of their Language, and the loſs of thoſe Knots, which were the Monuments and Characters of their Hiſtory; howſoever, they deliver the ſubſtance of them without any regard either to time or order; but in what manner or method ſoever that they are wrote, I am yet pleaſed to recite the paſſages which they deliver, that ſo by their Authority I may be acquitted of the Scandal of writing Fables; for if they prove ſuch, they ought to be eſteemed the Fictions of my Parents, and ſuch as the Spaniards themſelves have heard, and perhaps believed, though not with ſuch Faith as I have done, who ſucked in thoſe Stories with my Milk, and received a deep impreſſion of them in the time of my tender Infancy.

This Acoſta farther proceeds in theſe words, which I have copied from the 21ſt Chapter of his ſixth Book. " Pachacuti Inca Yupanqui reigned 70 Years, and made " great Conqueſts; the principal cauſe and original of his ſucceſs was occaſioned " by his Elder Brother, who taking upon him the Government by conſent of his " Father, was overthrown in a Battel by the Chancas, who are a Nation which " inhabit in the Vally of Andaguaylas, which is about thirty Leagues diſtant from " Cozco, in the way to Lima: His Younger Brother Yupanqui taking advantage of " this diſgrace, feigned a report, that he being at a certain time penſive and melancholy in a ſolitary retirement, a ſtrange Apparition under the Name of Viracocha preſented it ſelf before him; complaining, that he being the Univerſal " Creatour, and Lord of all things, who had made Heaven, and the Sun, the " World, and Men, and placed them under his feet, and in ſubjection to him, " had not received that due reſpect and obedience which was owing to him; but " in lieu thereof, Mankind was become ſo blind as to divide their Service and

" Worſhip, and to ſhare a proportion of the veneration which was owing to " him the onely God, unto the Sun, to the Thunder, and other Creatures who " had no other Being, Vertue and Beauty, but ſuch as they received from him; " and that therefore he was now come to make known to him, that his Habita- " tion was in Heaven where he was Worſhipped under the Title of Viracocha Pa- " chayachachic, which ſignifies the Univerſal Creatour of all things. And that " they might be aſſured of the truth hereof, and that it was no Dream, or idle " fancy, he promiſed to raiſe him People and Armies by his Omnipotent power; " and that though the Chancas were numerous and victorious, yet he would ſend " him inviſible Troops, and ſuch as ſhould not be known from whence they came, " ſhould aid and ſuccour him againſt his Enemies. With this aſſurance and belief " he raiſed his Men, which flocked to him in thoſe Numbers, that he obtained " a Victory; and afterwards depoſing both his Father, and his Elder Brother, he " made himſelf Abſolute and Sovereign Prince of the Empire. From the time " of which Victory he Eſtabliſhed a Law, that Viracocha ſhould be Worſhipped " and Adored as the ſole and Supreme Lord of the Univerſe; and that the Ima- " ges of the Sun and Thunder ſhould bow before his Idol, and doe him reverence; " and from that time afterwards the Image of Viracocha was exalted above thoſe " of the Sun and the Thunder, and the other Minor Guacas, or Little Deities. " And though this Inca Yupanqui did aſſign, and ſet out Lands and Flocks for the " maintenance of the Sun and Thunder; yet he made no Eſtabliſhment for the " Viracocha, by reaſon that he being the Univerſal Lord, and Creatour of all, con- " tained All-ſufficiency within himſelf, having no need of ſupplies from the Crea- " tures which his Power had made.

" After this Battel was ended with Signal Victory over the Chancas, he decla- " red to his Souldiers, that it was not by their Force and Valour that their Ene- " mies were ſubdued, but it was by the Aid and Aſſiſtence of Numbers of Men " with great Beards, which the Viracocha had ſent to fight for them, and that they " were inviſible to all, but to himſelf: And that now their Work being finiſhed, " they were returned again to their former inviſible Beings, and Nature of Stones: " Howſoever, it ſeemed neither decent, nor convenient to omit due acknowledg- " ments, even to thoſe inſenſible Beings, which none but he could know; and " therefore going into the Mountains, he caſt up heaps of Stones, which he cul- " led and ſeparated with his own hands from the reſt, ſetting them up for Guacas, " or Demi-gods, commanding Adoration and Sacrifices to be offered to them, " calling them by the Name of Pururaucas, the which they carried with them to " the Wars with great devotion. And ſuch credit did this Fable gain in their " minds, that by force of this ſuperſtitious impreſſion, this Inca obtained many " great and ſignal Victories. Thus far are the Words of Acoſta, which agree in the ſubſtance with what we have before related; but as to what he alledges concern- ing the Image of Viracocha, that it was exalted above the Idol of the Sun; it was a novelty, and new manner of Worſhip introduced by the Indians, in compliance with the Spaniards: For it is a miſtake to conceive, that they apprehended any no- tion of the Name of God, with a peculiar reſpect of his Supreme and Omnipo- tent Eſſence, for they had no conceit of any but of two Deities, one was the inviſible and unknown, which was the Pachacamac; the other was the Sun, which was clear and apparent to the ſight of the Univerſe; but as to Viracocha, and other Incas, they eſteemed them as Children, and Off-ſpring of the Sun.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Gratuities which the Prince Inca Viracocha beſtowed on his Souldiers after the Victory.

THE Incas finding their Enemies to faint, and retreat, cried out the more violently, invocating the Name of Sutio Inca Viracocha, which was the Viſion that appeared to the Prince, and therewith ſtrenuouſly invaded the Enemy, ſubduing them with mere violence and dint of Sword; great numbers and heaps were ſlain, and thrown one on the other; the remainder turned their backs, and fled, not being able to make farther reſiſtence. The Prince having purſued the Enemy a-while, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and Command given to deſiſt from farther ſlaughter, the Victory being already evident and complete; and then the Prince in Perſon ran through the Plain where the Battel was fought, giving order to bury the dead, and to take care that the wounded and diſabled ſhould be cured: To the Priſoners he freely gave liberty and licence to return into their own Countries, proclaiming Mercy and Pardon unto all. The Battel continued for the ſpace of eight hours, being fought with ſuch courage and reſolution, that the Bloud did not onely Dye the Fields, but the ſtreams of it overflowed the Banks of a Brook which ran through the Plains; for which cauſe they gave the Name of Yahuar Pampa to that place, which ſignifies as much as the Field of Bloud. In this Fight there were thirty thouſand Indians ſlain, eight thouſand of which were of the ſide of the Incas, the reſt were ſuch as took part with the Rebels, conſiſting of ſeveral Nations of Chanca, viz. Hanchohuallu, Uramarca, Villca and Untunſulla, with others.

Hanchohuallu having received a ſlight wound, was carefully cured; and being taken Priſoner with two others of his chief Officers, were reſerved for the greater glory and oſtentation on the day of Triumph, which was afterwards with great Solemnity performed. But ſome few days after this Battel, an Uncle of the Prince with much gravity reproved the bold inſolence of thoſe Priſoners, for daring to raiſe themſelves up againſt the Family of the Sun; who, that they might appear invincible, the very Stones and Trees, by virtue of the Sun were transformed into Men, as was apparent in the laſt Battel, and would again be made manifeſt ſo often, as Enemies and Rebels ſhould dare to lift up their hands and armes againſt the Divine Race. Many other Stories and Fables he recounted in favour of the Incas; concluding as the ſum of all, that they were obliged in duty to render a thouſand thanks to the Sun for ſending his Gratious Children into the World, commanding them to uſe compaſſion and mercy, and to receive the Rebellious Indians unto pardon; for which reaſon the Prince did not onely confer upon them their Lives as a gift, but reſtore them alſo to their Eſtates and Dwellings, and their Curacas to their Dominion and Government, though the crimes they had committed deſerved no leſs than Death; conditionally, that for the future they behave themſelves as good Subjects, leſt by a ſecond offence they provoke the Sun to avenge the firſt, and cauſe the Earth to open its bowels, and ſwallow them alive. After this Lecture the Curacas with profound humility acknowledged the favour, promiſing all Loyalty, Duty and Obedience for the future.

After this Victory the Inca Viracocha immediately diſpatched away three Expreſſes; One of them was ſent to the Temple of the Sun, to inform him of the good news of this Victory, which by his aid and ſuccour they had obtained; for though they eſteemed the Sun for a God, yet in all reſpects they treated him as a Man, and as one who had need of intelligence and information of matters which ſucceeded; beſides which, they formed other groſs conceptions of him; as to drink to him; and that he might pledge them again on their Feſtival-days, they filled a Golden Cup with Liquour, which they ſet in a part of the Temple, which was moſt open to the Sun-beams; and what was exhaled by that heat, they judged to be drank up by the Sun; they alſo ſet meat for him to eat, and when any novelty occurred, they ſent him the advices of it by Meſſengers, and when they were victorious, they returned him Thanks for their Succeſſes. In purſuance of this ancient cuſtome the Prince Viracocha ſent advice to the Sun of this his Victory; and commanded the Prieſts, that having recalled thoſe others, which for fear were fled away, they ſhould join together in offering new Sacrifices, with Praiſes and Thankſgivings, to the Sun. Another Meſſenger he diſpatched to the Houſe of the Select Virgins, giving them to underſtand, that by means of their Prayers and Interceſſions, the Sun had beſtowed that Favour and Victory upon him. A third Meſſenger, whom they call Chaſqui, he diſpeeded to his Father the Inca, giving him the particulars of all the late Succeſſes, deſiring him to continue in the ſame ſtation where he was, untill he ſhould in perſon preſent himſelf before him.

CHAP. XX.

The Prince purſues his Conqueſt, returns to Cozco, ſees his Father, and diſpoſſeſſes him of his Empire.

HAving made theſe diſpatches, he ſelected ſix thouſand Souldiers to accompany him in the purſuit of his Enemies; the reſt of his Army he disbanded, giving them licence to return unto their own homes; the Body which he reſerved was commanded, beſides other inferiour Officers, by two Major-Generals, who were his Uncles; and with this Force two days after the Battel, he marched in the purſuit of his Enemies, not with intention to treat them ill, but to cure them of their fears, aſſuring them of pardon for their late Offence; ſo that as many as they overtook, in caſe they were wounded, he ordered them to be cured; and ſuch as were whole and ſound, he treated them with gentleneſs and kind uſage; ſending likewiſe Meſſengers to the reſpective Provinces and People, to aſſure them of the pardon and favour of the Inca, and that he was coming in perſon to give them farther teſtimonies thereof. Having by theſe pre-advices comforted and encouraged the people, he marched with great expedition, and being come to the Province of Antahuaylla, which belongs to the Chancas, all the Women and Children aſſembled together, and came forth to meet him, and carrying green branches in their hands, went crying, O thou undoubted Child of the Sun, who art the Lover and Favourer of the Poor, have compaſſion upon us, and pardon us.

The Prince received theſe people with grace and favour, telling them, that it was not they, but their Fathers, and Husbands, who were guilty of the crime; and that even them alſo he had pardoned for their actual Rebellion; and to aſſure them hereof, and confirm them in this belief, he was come in perſon to pronounce their pardon with his own mouth. He ordered likewiſe that they ſhould give them ſuch proviſions as their neceſſities required, treating them with all civility and affection imaginable, and that eſpecial care ſhould be taken of the Widows and Orphans of thoſe who were ſlain in the Battel of Yahuar Pampa.

In this manner he over-ran all the revolted Provinces, conſtituting his Governours with ſufficient Guards over them, and made ſuch expedition, that in a months time (as the Indians report, who count their Months by their Moons,) he finiſhed his march, and returned again to his City of Cozco. The Indians, as well thoſe who were loyal, as thoſe who had rebelled, were wonderfully ſurprized with this ſtrange gentleneſs of the Prince, whoſe Humour and Diſpoſition being ſowre and ſevere, promiſed nothing but Revenge and Deſtruction to the laſt drop of his Enemies bloud; but finding his Nature otherwiſe changed, they concluded that the command command of the Sun had altered his Diſpoſition, and reduced him to the natural temper of his Fore-fathers. But the truth is, that Ambition and thirſt of Honour which makes great changes in the minds of Men, had ſo miraculouſly operated on his rough and hard temper, that his Nature ſeemed entirely to be altered, and to have put on that gentle and ſweet humour, which was Royal and natural to his Family.

This being done, the Inca Viracocha made his entry into Cozco on foot, that he might appear more a Souldier than a King; he deſcended thither by the way of Caramenta, and in triumphant manner, being encompaſſed by his Souldiers, and on each hand ſupported by his two Uncles, that were Major-Generals, cauſing the priſoners to be conducted behind, with great joy and loud acclamations he was received into the City. The grave Incas aged, and ſtricken in years came forth to meet him, and with due reverence having ſaluted and adored him and acknowledged him for a true Child of the Sun, entred amongſt the ranks of the Souldiery, to partake of the glory of this Triumph; adding farther this complement to their Courtſhip, That they wiſhed themſelves youthfull again for no other reaſon, than that they might be Souldiers, and ſerve in the Wars under his fortunate and auſpicious Conduct. His Mother alſo Coya Mama Chic-ya, with her Women, and others nearly allied in Bloud to the Prince, being attended alſo with a multitude of Pallas, or Ladies, went forth, with Songs and Dancings, to meet and receive him; ſome embraced him, others wiped off the ſweat from his Brows, others ſwept the duſt from his Feet, ſtrewing the ways with Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs, in which joyfull and ſolemn manner the Prince firſt viſited the Temple of the Sun, in which making his entry on his bare Feet, according to their uſual cuſtome, he returned thanks for the Victory, which his Father the Sun had given him. Then he viſited the Select Virgins, Wives of the Sun; and after theſe two Offices were performed, he departed from the City to ſee his Father, who all this while conſerved himſelf within the Straits of Muyna, and in the ſame place where he had formerly left him.

The Inca Yahuar-Huacac received the Prince his Sun with all the expreſſions of joy and contentment imaginable, congratulating his Succeſs, and victorious Atchievements, but yet his Countenance appeared ſo melancholy and reſerved, that he ſeemed thereby to teſtifie more of Emulation and Envy, than of real Satisfaction; for the ſhame and confuſion he conceived in ſeeing his Son victorious ſeemed to upbraid his Cowardiſe; nor can it well be determined, whether the Envy of his Son's Honour, or the ſenſe he had for baſely forſaking the Temple of the Sun, or the fear of being depoſed for his mean and puſillanimous Behaviour, was moſt prevalent in his confuſed mind. But certain it is, that at this publick interview few words paſſed between them; what afterwards happened in private is not certainly known, but it is believed by the Indians, that the whole Diſcourſe was in reference to the Government, which of the two ſhould reign, and which appeared by the ſequel, it being reſolved between them, that the Father having forſaken and abandoned the City, was no more worthy to return unto it. For Ambition, and deſire of Government, is ſo prevalent in the minds of Princes, that they are willing to take any pretext to cover their aſpiring thoughts; and indeed this imputation of Cowardiſe ſeemed the more plauſible reaſon, in that it was ſeconded by the ſuffrages of the people, and the conſent of the Court; to which the Father condeſcended, being conſtrained thereunto by force, and by an abhorrence he naturally had to War, eſpecially to Civil Diſſentions. Upon which agreement the draught of a Palace was immediately deſigned, and intended to be built between the Straits of Muyna and Queſpicancha, where was an excellent Air, and pleaſant Situation, and eaſily improveable by Gardens, and Orchards, and all the Divertiſements of Hunting, Fiſhing, and other Royal Paſtimes; being much advantaged therein by the benefit of the River Yucay, into which many Streams and Brooks fall, on the Eaſt-quarter of the Houſe. The Foundation of this Houſe being laid, (ſome ruines of which do to this day remain) the Prince returned to Cozco, where he changed his yellow for the crimſon Wreath, and yet was contented that his Father ſhould ſtill conſerve his Royalty in the colour of his Ribbon, on condition that he renounced the ſubſtantial parts of Government; for proud and ambitious Men can endure punctilio's, and immaterial circumſtances in others, whilſt Power and Greatneſs is reſerved for themſelves. This Fabrick being completed, it was furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and ſuch attendance allowed, as was agreeable to the State and Magnificence of a King, ſo that Yahuar-huacac found no difference in his living, unleſs it were in being freed and eaſed from the Burthen of Government. In this ſolitary manner this poor King paſſed the remainder of his unhappy days, depoſed from his Kingdom, and confined to the Countrey, having exchanged his condition with his Son, who now lived and governed in the City, whilſt the Father lived an Exile in the fields, having his Converſation with Beaſts rather than Men.

This unhappy Fortune (as the Indians believe) was the effect of that direfull Omen of weeping bloud; but yet in their political reflexions on ſome paſſages, they concluded, that in caſe the Inca, in the time of the obſtinacy and perverſeneſs of his Son, had, inſtead of a confinement to a Countrey Life, given him a ſmall Doſe of that Poiſon which was in practice amongſt the Tyrants and Magicians of that Empire, he might eaſily have diverted that ſad Fate, which his Tears of Bloud portended. But others, better inclined to ſpeak favourably of the Prince, for though they could not wholly acquit him of Crime towards his Father, yet they moderated it in ſome manner, by alledging, that his Father's Fate might have been worſe, in caſe his Enemies had prevailed; for having forſaken the Protection of his City, and Empire, out of mere Cowardiſe, it was ſome Happineſs to have his Defaults repaired by the Valour of his Son, under whom the Succeſſion was ſecured, and his own Life ſpared and defended. Others, ſpeaking of the general Praiſe of their Kings, ſaid to this effect, That this unhappy Inca had no thought or imagination of Poiſon, for that all other his Predeceſſors having made it their buſineſs to prohibit the practice of it, and deſtroy the uſe of it in the World, he himſelf was ready to have checked any ſuch motion within his own Mind, in caſe either his Thoughts, or perſuaſion of others had ſuggeſted ſuch a remedy to him. Others herein applauded the Religion and Generoſity of the Incas, who ſcorned to act that which their own Decrees had made unlawfull; it being unſeemly, and beneath the Dignity of the Sun's Race, to allow that in themſelves, which they had made illegal in their Subjects.

Many ſuch Diſcourſes and Reflexions paſſed on this matter, according to every Man's particular fancy and opinion; with which we ſhall conclude our Hiſtory of Yahuar-Huacac, and not farther mention other particulars of his Life, leaving him at his Countrey retirement to die with obſcurity.

Of the word Viracocha, and why they called the Spaniards by that Name.

BUT to return now to the Prince, to whom they gave the Name of Viracocha, by reaſon that the Viſion which appeared to him in a Dream, ſo called himſelf. And in regard this Phantaſm was deſcribed by the Prince to appear with a long Beard, and Garments trailing on the ground, which was a much different habit to the faſhion of the Indians, who naturally have little Hair in their Faces, and by cuſtome wear Coats not reaching farther than their knees; ſo ſoon as they had a ſight of the firſt Spaniards that invaded Peru, and obſerved their long Beards and Garments which clothed all parts of their Bodies; and that their firſt Action was to take and kill Atahualpa, their Tyrant King, who not long before had murthered Huaſcar, the lawfull Heir and Succeſſour, and deſtroyed all thoſe of the Royal Bloud, which might endanger his Title to the Government, without any regard to Age or Sex, with many other Cruelties, which we ſhall recount in their due place. When, I ſay, they obſerved that the Spaniards revenged the Bloud of their Incas, and puniſhed the enormous Crimes, they called to mind the Apparition Viracocha, and comparing the puniſhment which he executed on the Chancas for their rebellion, with the Juſtice which the Spaniards performed on Atahualpa in revenge of the Murthers he committed on the Royal Family, they preſently concluded, that the God Viracocha was the Parent of the Spaniards, for which reaſon they received and welcomed them to their Countrey, and worſhipped and adored them with the Name of Viracocha; and hence it was, that the Conqueſt of Peru became ſo eaſie, that ſix Spaniards onely, of whom Hernando de Soto, and Pedro de Barco were two, adventured to travell from Caſſamarca to Cozco, which is a Journey of two hundred and thirty Leagues, by which they made a diſcovery of the Riches of that City, and other places; and to ſhew their great kindneſs and civility they carried them over the Countries in Chairs, or Sedans; giving them the Title of Incas, and Children of the Sun, in the ſame manner, as they did their own Kings. Now had the Spaniards taken the advantage of this credulity of the Indians, perſuading them, that the true God had ſent them, for their deliverance from the tyrannical Uſurpations of the Divel, which enſlaved them more than all the Cruelties of Atahualpa; and had preached the Holy Goſpel with that ſanctity and good example, which the innocence of that Doctrine requires, they had certainly made great Progreſſes in the advancement of Religion. But the Spaniſh Hiſtories report things in a different way of proceedings, to which, for the truth thereof, I refer the Reader, leſt being an Indian my ſelf, I ſhould ſeem partial in the relation: But this truth we may confidently aver, that though many were blameable, yet the greater number diſcharged the Office and Duty of good Chriſtians; howſoever amongſt a people ſo ignorant and ſimple, as theſe poor Gentiles, one ill man is able to doe more miſchief, than the endeavours of a hundred good Men are able to repair.

The Spaniſh Hiſtorians farther ſay, that the Indians gave this Name to the Spaniards, becauſe they came over the Sea, deriving Viracocha from the compoſition of two words, namely, Vira, which is vaſt, immenſe, and Cocha, which ſignifies the Sea or Ocean. But the Spaniards are much miſtaken in this compoſition, for though Cocha is truly the Name for the Sea, yet Vira ſignifies fatneſs; and is no other than the proper Name which that Apparition gave to it ſelf; the which I more confidently aver, becauſe that Language being natural to me, and that which I ſucked in and learned with my Mother's Milk, I may more reaſonably be allowed to be a Judge of the true Idioms of that Tongue, rather than Spaniards, who are Strangers and Aliens to that Countrey. But beſides what we have already mentioned, there may yet be another reaſon for it, which is, that the Indians gave them that Name

Name from the Cannon and Guns they uſed, which they taking to be Lightning and Thunder, believed them Gods, by whoſe hands they were uſed. Blas Valera interpreting this word, ſays, that it ſignifies a Deity, which comprehends the Will and Power of a God; not that the word doth properly ſignifie ſo much, but that it is a Name which the Indians found out to give to this Apparition; which they Worſhipped in the ſecond place to the Sun, and after that they Adored their Kings and Incas, as if they had been Gods.

It is diſputable whether the Inca Viracocha was more admired for his Victory, or for his Dream; but certain it is, that he was ſo reverenced for both, that they eſteemed him for a God, and adored him as one expreſly ſent from the Sun to ſave his Family, and the Divine Off-ſpring from utter ruine; and becauſe that by him the Imperial City, the Temple of the Sun, and the Convent of the Select Virgins were preſerved; he was afterwards Worſhipped with greater oſtentation and honour, than any other of his Ancient Progenitors. And though this Inca endeavoured to perſuade his Subjects to transfer the Honour which they gave to him, unto his Uncle, the Viſion which appeared to him; yet ſo far was this devotion infixed in their minds, that they could not be diverted from performing Divine Honours towards him, untill at length they compounded for their ſuperſtition, and agreed to impart and divide their Worſhip equally between them; and whereas they had both the ſame Name, they ſhould Adore them together under the ſame Title and Notion: And for this reaſon the Inca Viracocha (as we ſhall hereafter mention) erected a Temple in Honour and Memory of his Uncle Viracocha; in which alſo his own Fame was celebrated.

We may believe that the Devil, who is a cunning Sophiſter, did appear to the Prince either ſleeping or waking in that Figure; though the Indians confidently report that the Prince was waking, and that this Apparition preſented it ſelf to him as he lay repoſing himſelf under the ſhadow of a Rock: We may imagine alſo that this Enemy of Mankind played this trick to delude the World, and confirm the Authority of that Idolatrous ſuperſtition, which he had already planted in the minds of this people: the which ſeemed the moſt plauſible way that he could proceed; for that in regard a foundation was already laid of the Indian Empire, and that by the Conſtitutions of it, the Incas were to be the Lawgivers, and the Oracles of their Religion; and that they were to be believed, and eſteemed, and obeyed for Gods; whatſoever contributed to this end, and to augment the reputation and ſanctity of the Incas, was a point gained towards the advancement of this Gentiliſm; of which, though there go many Stories, yet none is recounted by them with that admiration, as this Apparition of Viracocha, who coming with the popular character of an Allye to the Sun, and Brother to the Incas: And having the good fortune to have his Dream confirmed with the ſucceſs of a Victory, carried ſo much force of belief with it, that on all occaſions afterwards of their diſtreſs, they had recourſe to his Temple, where the Oracle was conſulted, and directions taken for the management of their affairs. This is that imaginary God Viracocha, of which ſome Writers report, that the Indians eſteemed him for their principal God, to whom they were more devoted than to the Sun: But this is certainly a miſtake, and ſerved onely for a piece of flattery to the Spaniards, that they might believe they gave them the ſame Title and Name, as they did to their chiefeſt God: but in reality they Adored no God with ſuch devotion as they did the Sun, (unleſs it were the Pachacamac) which they called the unknown God: For as to the Spaniards, they gave them at firſt the Title of Children to the Sun, in ſuch manner as they did to the Apparition Viracocha.

CHAP. XXII.

The Inca Viracocha gives Order for Building a Temple in Memory of his Uncle, who appeared to him in a Vision.

THE Inca Viracocha, that he might the better perpetuate the Memory of his Dream, and keep the Honour of it up in the esteem of the people, commanded that a Temple should be erected in Honour of his Uncle, who appeared to him, and placed in the Countrey called Cacha, which is about sixteen Leagues distant from the City to the Southward: He ordered, that the Fabrick and Model of it should, as near as could be possible, imitate, or resemble the place where the Vision presented it self; which was like the open Field, without covering; joining unto which there was to be a little Chapel with the roof of Stone, resembling the hollow of the Rock, under which he reposed himself: The whole Fabrick was made of Stone rarely polished, as are all the Buildings of the Indians; it had four Doors corresponding to the four Quarters of the Heavens; three of them were shut, being rather Portals, than Gates, serving for Ornament more than Use. The Gate which looked Eastward, was that alone by which they entred, and by which they went out, being placed exactly in the middle; and because the Indians were not arrived to such Excellency in Architecture, as to lay the weight of their Building on Arched Work; they supplied that defect by strong and deep foundations of Stone Walls, which were more lasting than Timber, and for ever durable. These Walls were laid three Foot in thickness, and seven Foot distant each from the other, making twelve several Rows, or Isles; the top was not covered with Boards, but paved Stone, for about ten Foot in length, and half a Yard in thickness: At the Entrance to this Temple, turning to the right hand, they walked to the end of the first Isle; thence turning to the left, they went forward to the end of this Walk, and then faced again to the right, and so winding about again through the several rows; they came at length to the end of the twelfth Isle, where was a Stair-case, by which they ascended to the top of the Temple. At the Front of every Isle, on each hand, there was a Window, like a Port-hole, to let in the light; and below every Window there was a Nich made in the Wall for a seat, where the Porter might sit, without incumbring, or stopping, the passage. The Stair-case had two passages, one to go up, and the other to come down; that to go up fronted a top with the High Altar: The Floor above was paved with a kind of black Marble, rarely polished, that it looked like Jett, brought from some Quarry, far distant. In place of the High Altar there was a Chapel of about twelve Foot square, covered with the same sort of black Stone, in-laid in divers Figures, in form of Mosaick Work, which was the most excellent piece of Art in the whole Fabrick: Within this Chapel was the Image of the Apparition placed within the hollow of the Wall, as in a Tabernacle, with which two other Tabernacles were made to correspond on each side for ornament and better uniformity. The Walls of this Temple, from the top to the bottom, were but three Yards in height, without any Window, the Cornish of which on all sides, both within and without, was made of polished Stone; and within the Tabernacle of the Chapel was placed a Pedestal, on which an Image of Stone was erected, representing the Image of the Apparition, in such shape and figure as the Inca Viracocha had directed. This Image represented the figure of a Man, with a Beard of about a span long, his Cloaths reaching to his feet, not very wide, but something scanty, like a Cassock: About his Neck a strange kind of creature was chained, with Claws like a Lion, the Image holding one of the links of the Chain in his hand; all which was framed and engraven out of Stone: And lest the Workmen, who had never seen this Figure, ſhould miſtake any thing of giving it the due form; it is reported, that the Inca himſelf did oftentimes ſit, and ſhew himſelf to them in the ſame habit and figure, in which, he ſaid, the Apparition preſented it ſelf: Nor would he permit, that the Image of the God Viracocha ſhould be undervalued by any form, or other ſhape than that of a King, ſuch eſteem and ſuperſtition did they conceive of their Idol Gods.

This Statue did ſomething reſemble the Images we make of our Bleſſed Apoſtles, particularly that of St. Bartholomew, whom they paint with the Devil at his feet, as they did this Figure of Viracocha, with ſome unknown Beaſt couching beneath him. The Spaniards obſerving this Temple, and the form and faſhion of this Statue, will have it, that the Apoſtle St. Bartholomew came as far as Peru to Preach the Goſpel to theſe Gentiles, and that in Honour and Memory of him the Indians had erected this Temple and Image. And ſuch as were Natives of Cozco, and of the Mongrel breed between Spaniſh and Indian Bloud, have for above thirty years paſt Aſſociated themſelves into a Fraternity, or Community, into which they would not ſuffer any Spaniard to enter. Theſe upon their Solemn days are at great Expences, taking St. Bartholomew for their Apoſtle, and in deſpight of all contradiction, they will have it, that he came and preached in Peru, and for that reaſon will own no other than him for their Patron; which ſeemeth a ridiculous fancy to ſome Spaniards, who laughing at the bravery and fine Veſtments they produce on that day, tell them, that this Feſtival and Proceſſion is not deſigned in Honour of the Apoſtle, but of the Inca Viracocha.

But why the Inca Viracocha ſhould build this Temple in Cacha, rather than in Chita, where the Spirit appeared to him, or in Yahuarpampa, where the Victory was fought; the Indians cannot well aſſign any more probable and juſt reaſon for it, than the free will and pleaſure of the Inca, unleſs it were ſome ſecret and hidden cauſe, not revealed or made known to any. This Temple being of ſuch an odd and ſtrange Model, as we have declared, was demoliſhed by the Spaniards, as many other ſtately Fabricks in Peru have been deſtroyed by them; which in my opinion ought rather to have been conſerved and kept in good repair, that Ages to come might ſee and know the Grandeur and Valour of their Anceſtours, who were able by their good fortune and conduct to ſubdue a Nation which was capable to erect ſuch Buildings and Monuments of their Art and Wiſedom; but perhaps envy or ſcorn of that people might have moved the Spaniards to deſtroy their Works, not allowing them the Honour to be maintained in repair; and indeed the Dilapidation hath been ſo great, that ſcarce one Stone remains on another; the which deſtruction, Men of Curioſity, and Lovers of Antiquity, do much lament. But the reaſon which they give for it is, that they could not be perſuaded, but that much Treaſure lay buried under the Foundation of thoſe Buildings, which could not be diſcovered, but by a total ſubverſion of the Fabrick. The firſt thing demoliſhed in this Temple was the Statue, they having an opinion, that much Gold was buried under the Pedeſtal on which it was erected: other parts of the Temple they digged up, ſometimes in one place, and then in another, untill at length they defaced, or deſtroyed the whole Pile and Maſs of Building: Howſoever, the Image of Stone is ſtill in being unto this day, though much broken and battered by the Stones, which they threw at it.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of a famous Picture; and of the Reward which was given to those who assisted the Prince.

IN this our discourse concerning Viracocha, we must not omit to add how much joyed and pleased he was with the new Adoration and Worship which the Indians gave him; so that he did not think fit to terminate the Magnificence of his Royal Mind with the stately Structure of this Temple onely, but to extend his Acts and Monuments with greater glory to posterity; and to this purpose he caused an Emblem to be drawn, representing the low and mean spirit of his Father, and the generosity of his own mind, ordering it to be painted on one of those many Rocks, amongst which his Father absconded himself, when for fear of the Chancas, he abandoned and forsook his City. The Emblem was of two Birds, which the Indians call Cuntur, which are Fowl of such large spreading Wings, that they measure five Yards from the end of one Pinion, to the tip of the other: they are Birds of prey, and so very fierce, that Nature denied them Talons to their feet, giving them onely Claws, like those of a Hen; but their Beak is so strong and sharp, that with one nip they are able to tear out the Skin of a Bullock; and two of them are sufficient to kill an Ox, as if they were Wolves. They are of a browniſh colour, with white Spots, like Pyes. Two Birds of this sort he ordered to be painted, one of them with his Wings close clapped together, his Head shrung in, and drooping, like an affrighted Hen, which hides it self, with its Beak turned towards Collasuyu, and its Tail towards Cozco: the other Bird was on the contrary painted in a Rampant manner, with its Wings extended, hovering on the Wing, and ready to stoop at its Prey. The Indians say, that the first of these represented the Father in his timorous and dejected condition; and the other was the Emblem of Viracocha, under the covering of whose Wings the City and Empire was secured and defended.

This Picture, in the Year 1580, was in being, and very perfect; and in the Year 1595, I asked a certain Priest which was born there, and who came from Peru into Spain, if he had seen it, and in what condition it was? and he told me, that it was so defaced by Rain, and the weather, none taking care to preserve it, that it was scarce discernible what it was; the which was the fate and misfortune also of divers other Antiquities in that Countrey.

The Inca Viracocha having in this manner obtained a supreme and absolute Dominion over all his Subjects, being infinitely beloved, and reverenced, and adored by them as a God; his great Work at the beginning of his Reign, was to Establish his Dominions in perfect peace and tranquillity for the good and benefit of all his Subjects.

In order unto which, the first thing he did was to gratifie and reward all such with Favours and Honours who had served him in the late War, and taken Arms in his assistence against his Rebellious Subjects; and herein a more particular notice was taken of the Quechuas, who belonged to the Countries of Cotapampa, and Cotanera; for in regard that they had been very active in promoting the interest of the Inca, and unanimously arose in Arms for his Aid and Defence; he bestowed on them the privilege of wearing their Hair shorn, and their Heads bound with the Wreath, and of having their Ears boared after the manner of the Incas, though the holes of the Ears were not to be so wide as theirs, but proportioned to such a size as the first Inca, Manco Capac, had ordained.

To other Nations he bestowed Privileges of different Natures, as were most agreeable to their Countrey, and Conditions; and in fine, every one remaining entirely satisfied and contented, he visited his several Kingdoms, affording to his people the satisfaction of beholding his Person, which their Eyes so much longed to see; and of whom so many Wonders and Miracles were recounted, that nothing could come more desirable, and nothing more welcome than his Presence. Having in this manner spent some Years, he returned to Cozco, where by advice of his Council, he resolved to conquer those great Povinces, which are called, Caranca, Ullaca, Llipi and Chicha; the Subjection of which was omitted by his Father, who was diverted from that design by the jealousie and fear he conceived of this his Son, as we have already mentioned; but now in order to this Expedition, the Inca Viracocha commanded that thirty thousand Souldiers should be raised in Collasuyu, and Cuntisuyu, and put in a readiness against the next Spring; one of his Brothers, called Pahuac Mayta Inca, he made his General, or Commander in Chief; the Sirname of Pahuac (which signifies flying) was given him for his admirable swiftness, being nimble and active, beyond any Man in his time.

For the assistence of his Brother he ordained four Incas to be Counsellours, and Major-Generals; who departing from Cozco, collected their numbers and increased their Army in the way, as they marched. At length they arrived at the aforesaid Provinces, two of which, called Chica, and Ampara, adored the lofty top of a snowy Mountain for their God; for they admiring the Beauty and Height thereof, from whence those Streams proceeded which refreshed their Lands, and made their grounds fruitfull, they were easily persuaded in natural gratitude to own that for their Deity, from whence they received such benefit and blessing. In these proceedings they encountred some light Skirmishes with the Enemy, who rather designed to give a proof of their warlike Disposition, than fight in hopes of prevailing against the Incas, whose Reputation was exalted so high by the Valour and Atchievements of Viracocha; that their power seemed invincible, and not to be subdued by humane force. For this reason, these great Provinces submitted to the Dominion of the Incas yielding with more readiness, and with less danger, and loss of bloud than was expected from a people, esteemed numerous, and of a warlike Temper. Howsoever three years past in this expedition, before the Conquest was completed, and the Nations reduced to an absolute and entire submission.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the New Provinces, subdued by the Inca, and of the Chanels they made to water their Pastures.

THE Inca Pahuac Mayta, and his Uncle having concluded this War, and placed Governours and Officers to rule and instruct their new Subjects, they returned to Cozco, where they received from the Inca a hearty wellcome, being rewarded by him with such Honours and Favours, as their Services and Labours had deserved. And now it seemed as if the Inca Viracocha had extended his Territories to the utmost limits of the Universe, for to the Eastward they reached as far as the foot of the snowy Mountain; to the Westward they were bounded by the Sea; to the Southward they extended to the utmost parts of the Province of the Charcas, which are above two hundred Leagues distant from the City; so that on all these three Quarters there remained no farther Land to conquer; for on one side the Sea bounded their proceedings, and the Snows, and inaccessible places of the Mountains of Antis on the other; and to the Southward the Desarts and Sands between Peru, and the Kingdom of Chili, made the way impassable for the march of an Army. Howsoever the Desire of Rule, and the unsatiable thirst of Dominion moved the mind of this Inca to bend his forces towards the Northern Countries, which are in the Division of Chinchasuyu; and having having communicated his resolution to those of his Council, he appointed that an Army should be raised, intending himself in person to command it, with the assistence of six others, who were men of Valour and Experience. During the absence of Viracocha the City was governed by his Brother Pahuac-Mayta, whom he left Deputy in his place; and all things being provided, and in a readiness, the Army marched towards the parts of Chincasuyu, and came to the Province Antahuylla, which belongs to the Chancas, a people branded with the infamous Epithete of false, and treacherous, by reason of their Rebellion against the Inca, which imputation hath so closely cleaved to them even to this day, that scarce at any time are the Chancas mentioned without the addition of Auca, which is as much as false, or treacherous; this word also signifies a Tyrant, a breaker of his Faith, and every thing which denotes Falseness and Treachery: Moreover it may serve to express Contentions, and Battels, by which variety of significations, we may observe how copious and full this Language of Peru is, which comprehends such variety and diversity of senses in one word.

The poor Chancas conscious of their former crimes, feared greatly the approach of the Inca Virococha, lest he should now revenge their offence upon them; but then finding, contrary to all expectation, nothing but Mercy and Gentleness in their Prince, they presently quitted their Fears, receiving him with all the Demonstrations of Joy and Festivity, that an afflicted people was capable to express. And to confirm them in this good humour, he not onely treated them with gratious Words, but conferred on them Presents of Garments, and other curiosities. He also visited the several Provinces, taking care to provide what was wanting, and to amend that which was amiss; and then appointing a General rendezvous for the whole Army, he marched forwards to those Countries, which were not as yet reduced to Obedience. The first and neareſt Province, rich and populous, was Huaytara, a people warlike and mutinous, such as had shewed themselves in the Head and Van of the Rebels. But how stout soever they had been, so soon as the Inca Viracocha had sent them a summons by his Ambassadours, they with readiness submitted and obeyed, coming forth with all humility to receive and acknowledge him for their Lord; for as yet the Battel of Tahuar-pampa was fresh in their memory, and the success thereof confirmed them in a belief, that the Inca was invincible: this humble Submission met a like Generosity in the Inca, who received them with a gratious acceptance agreeable to their Humility, onely charging them to live quietly and in peace, as being most for the common good, and most acceptable to himself.

Thence he marched forwards to another Province called Pocra, known sometimes by the name of Huamanca; thence he proceeded to Asancaru, Parco, Picuy and Acos, all which chearfully submitted, esteeming it a great honour to remain under the Empire and Protection of the Inca, whose mighty Actions had acquired him Renown in all Quarters of that new World. And having thus gained this people to his power, he dispeeded his Army away, lest they should be burthensome to the Countrey, and then employed his Thoughts and Endeavours for securing his Government, and performing those matters which might conduce to the common Good and Welfare of the people; particularly he opened and made a Chanel of water, of about twelve Foot in depth, running for about one hundred and twenty Leagues in length: the source or head of it arose from certain Springs on the top of a high Mountain, between Parcu and Picuy, which was so plentifull, that at the very head of the Fountains they seemed to be Rivers. This Current of Water had its course through all the Countrey of the Rucanas, and served to water the Pasturage of those uninhabited Lands, which are about eighteen Leagues in breadth, watering almost the whole Countrey of Peru.

There is another Aqueduct much like this, which traverses the whole Province of Cuntisuyu, running above one hundred and fifty Leagues from South to North; its Head or Original is from the top of high Mountains, the which Waters falling into the Plains of the Quechuas, greatly refresh their Pasturage, when the heats of the Summer and Autumn have dried and burnt up the moisture of the Earth. There are many Streams of like nature, which run through divers parts of

of the Empire, which being conveyed by Aqueducts, at the charge and expenſe of the Incas, are works of Grandeur and Oſtentation, and which recommend the Magnificence of the Incas to all poſterity. For theſe Aqueducts may well be compared to the miraculous Fabricks which have been the works of mighty Princes, who have left their prodigious Monuments of Oſtentation to be admired by future Ages; for indeed we ought to conſider, that theſe Waters had their ſource and beginning from vaſt high Mountains, and were carried over craggy Rocks, and inacceſſible paſſages; and to make theſe ways plain, they had no help of Inſtruments forged of Steel or Iron, ſuch as Pick-axes, or Sledges, but ſerved themſelves onely of one ſtone to break another; nor were they acquainted with the invention of Arches, to convey their Water on the level from one precipice to the other; but traced round the Mountain, untill they found ways and paſſages at the ſame height and level with the Head of the Springs. The Ciſterns, or Conſervatories, which they made for theſe Waters at the top of the Mountain, were about twelve Foot deep; the paſſage was broken through the Rocks, and Chanels made of hewen Stone of about two yards long, and about a yard high; all which were well cemented together, and rammed in with earth, ſo hard, that no Water could paſs between to weaken or vent it ſelf by the holes of the Chanel.

This Current of Water, which paſſes through all the Diviſion of Cuntiſuyu, I have ſeen in the Province of Quechua, which is part of that Diviſion, and conſidered it as an extraordinary Work, and indeed ſurpaſſing the Deſcription and Report which hath been made of it: But the Spaniards, who were Aliens and Strangers, little regarded the convenience of theſe works, either to ſerve themſelves of the uſe of them, or keep them in repair, nor yet to take ſo much notice of them, as to mention them in their Hiſtories; but rather out of a ſcornfull and diſdaining humour, have ſuffered them to run unto ruine, beyond all recovery.

The ſame fate hath befallen the Aqueducts, which the Indians made for watering their Corn-lands, of which two thirds at leaſt are wholly deſtroyed, and none kept in repair, unleſs ſome few, which are ſo uſefull, that without them they cannot ſuſtain themſelves with Bread, nor with the neceſſary proviſions for Life. All which works are not ſo totally deſtroyed, but that there ſtill remain ſome ruines and appearances of them.

CHAP. XXV.

The Inca visits the remote parts of his Empire, and Ambassadours come thither to him, offering the Subjection, and Vassalage of their People.

THE Inca Viracocha having provided all things towards the work of this great Aqueduct, which was necessary for watering the Herbage of those Countries, he passed from the Province of Chinchasuyu, to Cuntisuyu, with intention to visit all the parts of his Empire. The first Provinces which offered in this Journey, belonged to Quechua, two of which being of greater note, than others, were Cotapampa, and Cotanera; to which the Inca made extraordinary demonstrations of Honour, out of respect to the Service they had done him, in his late War against the Chancas. Thence he travelled forwards through all the other Provinces of Cuntisuyu, as well the Mountainous Countries, as the Plains and Vallies, and Lands along the Seacost, that so no place or Region might complain of disfavour, or want of the Inca's presence, which was the most welcome and desirable object to them in the whole Universe.

In all the places where he came, he made strict inquisition concerning the behaviour of his Officers and Ministers, and in what manner they discharged their Duty and Trust; such as were found guilty of any neglect, or injustice, he punished with the utmost rigour and severity, saying, that those who had made use of the Royal Authority to pillage or oppress his Subjects, were more criminal than those common Robbers, who in contempt of the Imperial Ordinances and Laws, and by force of their own private power, invaded the Rights and Properties of the People. From Cuntisuyu he entred into the Provinces of Collasuyu, passing from one unto the other, as they offered in his way, all which he comforted with the Rays of his Favours, which he imparted in their respective degrees, as well to the Commonalty, as to the Curacas; and on the Sea-coast he journyed as far as to Taracapa.

During the stay which the Inca made in the Countrey of the Chancas, Ambassadours came to him from the Kingdom of Tucma, which the Spaniards call Tucuman, being distant about two hundred Leagues Southwest from the Chancas; addressing themselves unto him after this manner. "Most mighty "Prince, Capa Inca Viracocha, The Report of your famous Deeds, the Equity "and Justice of your Proceedings, the Excellency of your Laws, instituted for "the sole Benefit and Welfare of your Subjects, the Purity of your Religion, "Clemency and Mercy, and the wonderfull Miracles which your Father the Sun "hath performed in your favour, and for your assistence, hath reached the utmost "Confines of our Dominions, and is yet carried farther on the Wings of Fame; "the which Report hath made such impression on the Hearts of all the Curacas "of Tucman, that they have sent us hither to implore the powerfull Protection of "your sacred Empire, and that you would vouchsafe to own them for your people, and that as such you would appoint Incas of the Royal Bloud to preside "over them, who may not onely administer Justice to them, but likewise instruct "them in those Laws, and Customs, and Religion, which they are to observe; "in hopes and expectation of which, we do here in the name and behalf of all "our Kingdom, prostrate our selves before you, as the undoubted Off-spring and "Issue of the Sun, acknowledging you for our King, and Lord, and in testimony thereof, we do here offer our Persons, with the Fruit of our Lands, as Livery and Seisin, and in token and evidence that we surrender our Persons and "Lands into your possession. Having said thus much, they laid open their Presents of Garments, made of Cotton, Pots of excellent Honey, as also Corn, and divers sorts of Pulse; but as to Gold, or Silver, they produced none, being not of the Growth of their Countrey; and which the Spaniards, notwithſtanding the ſearch and purſuit which they made after it, have not diſcovered in thoſe Quarters.

The Ambaſſadours having made theſe Preſents, they proſtrated themſelves with profound reverence before the Inca, who received them with a gratious acceptance, according to his accuſtomed goodneſs; and in farther token of his favour, he commanded the Incas, who were his Kindred, to drink with them, which was the greateſt Honour he could confer. At this entertainment they were farther aſſured of the Good-will of the Inca, and how much he took this voluntary ſubmiſſion and reſignation of themſelves and Countrey in good part; in return whereunto, they aſſured them of all the kind treatment imaginable, and that the Inca diſtinguiſhed between thoſe, who out of good-will and affection, freely became his Subjects, and thoſe who by force of Arms were compelled to Obedience. Then they gave them for Preſents to their Curacas, Veſtments of ſuch ſort as were made for the Inca, woven by the hands of the Select Virgins, and which, for that reaſon, were accounted Divine and Sacred; and to the Ambaſſadours many other Preſents were made of different qualities. Then the Incas of the Royal Bloud were appointed, who were to inſtruct them in Religion, and preſide over them as Governours; that leaving their beſtial and brutiſh courſe of living, they might receive and obſerve the Laws and Ordinances of the Incas: And in company with theſe Miniſters, ſeveral Artiſts and Workmen were ſent, who were skilfull in making Aqueducts, and cultivating the Lands, that ſo by good husbandry the Eſtate of the Sun, and of the King, might be improved and increaſed.

The Ambaſſadours having been thus entertained for ſome days at the Court of the Inca, where they obſerved the good Order, and Rule, and Excellent Laws of his Government: They confeſſed, that ſuch Conſtitutions as thoſe could have no other Original than from the Sun, or ſomething Divine; and that their own Cuſtoms and Laws did partake of nothing but what was brutiſh, and without any Morality. And with this conſideration being made zealous for the Inca's Service and Glory, they expreſſed themſelves in this manner to the Inca: Sir, ſaid they, we are greatly ſenſible that the World is made happy by your Laws and Government; of which that every part may partake ſome ſhare and proportion, we are to make known unto you, that not far from our Countrey, to the South-Weſt from us, there lyes a Kingdom called Chili, which is very rich and populous; and though we our ſelves have had no Commerce, or correſpondence therewith, by reaſon of thoſe ſnowy Mountains, and inacceſſible Paſſages, which divide us from them; yet we have received by an undoubted Tradition from our Forefathers, that there is ſuch a Nation worthy the Employment of your Arms, and of your Dominion: The which we the more willingly diſcover, that ſo they alſo with us may Adore your Father the Sun, and enjoy the ſame common Benefits and Laws which are made and deſigned to civilize and improve the Nature of Mankind. The Inca having taken notice of this advice, ordered the Ambaſſadours to be diſpatched, that they might return again into their own Countrey.

Thence he proceeded forward on his progreſs through all the Provinces of Collaſuyu, diſperſing his Favours and Rewards to the Curacas and Captains, not neglecting the Commonalty, and people of low degree and condition; ſo that all ſorts, from the higheſt to the loweſt, received particular ſatisfaction and contentment from the preſence of the Inca: For ſo much had the Fame of his Divine Dream, and his Victory at Yahuarpampa, raiſed his Eſteem in the minds of the people, that they not onely received him with Joy and Acclamations, but paid him Divine Honours and Veneration, as if he had been ſome New God; though now by the Mercies of the true God they have quitted that Idolatry, and being diſabuſed, and rightly informed in Religion, they onely conſerve a gratefull Memory of that King, who was ſo fortunate and propitious to them both in War and Peace.

From Collaſuyu he paſſed into Antiſuyu, where the people being poor and mean, were not able to demonſtrate ſuch Oſtentation and Magnificence as others had done; howſoever, according to their degree and quality, they ſhewed as joyfull hearts, as their ſimplicity was capable to expreſs: In evidence of which, they erected Triumphal Arches in the way by which he was to paſs; the which being formed of Timber, they covered with Ruſhes, and crowned with Garlands, ſtrowing ing all the ways with Flowers, expreſſing the joyfulneſs of their hearts, after the cuſtome of their Countrey, and as was uſual at their greateſt Feſtivals. In theſe viſits the Inca ſpent three years, not omitting at the due ſeaſons to celebrate the Feaſts of the Sun, which they called Raymi, and Citua: And though they could not be performed with ſuch Solemnity as at Cozco, yet in compliance with their Religion, they expreſſed their Devotion with ſuch Rites and Ceremonies, as the circumſtances of time and place would admit.

And now having accompliſhed his Progreſs, he returned to the City, where his Preſence was greatly deſired, as the Protector and Defender of it, or rather as he who had laid a new foundation of an abandoned and ruined place: And therefore the Court and City aſſociated together with new Sonnets and Panegyricks, compoſed in his praiſe, to meet and conduct their Adored King to his place of Reſidence.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Valiant Hanco-huallu flies out of the Empire of the Incas.

THus, in the manner which we have declared, this Inca travelled twice through all Quarters of his Dominions; and when that in his ſecond Progreſs he paſſed through the Province of the Chichas, which is the moſt remote part of Peru to the Southward, News was brought him of the flight of the brave Hanco-huallu; at which he was greatly concerned, wondring at the reaſon, or cauſe, for ſuch a reſolution.

This Man, it ſeems, was King of the Chancas; and though for nine or ten Years he had proved the gentle Government of the Incas, who in revenge, or puniſhment, of his late offence, had not diminiſhed the leaſt point of his Power or Juriſdiction; but rather, on the contrary, treated him with due honour and reſpect; yet in regard that he and his Forefathers had reigned as abſolute Lords and Princes over many Nations, whom they had ſubdued by their Arms and Power; his generous ſpirit could not yield to any Subordination, or hold his Countrey in feud to a Superiour: He alſo envied the Quechuas for the Eſteem they had gained in the favour of the Inca, by the Services, which in the late War they had performed; and by whoſe means and aſſiſtence the Victory was wreſted from himſelf: Nor could he endure to behold that people which was Inferiour, and once truckled to him, to ſtand now in equality, and in competition with him for Honour and Power: the which unpleaſing imaginations ſo poſſeſſed his diſquiet mind, that contrary to the ſenſe and opinion of the Lords and Nobles of his Countrey, he reſolved to purchaſe his own Liberty, and abſolute Power, though with the loſs and reſignation of the Eſtate he poſſeſſed in his own Dominions. In order hereunto he imparted his Reſolutions to certain Indians, who were his Friends, and faithfull to his Intereſt; giving them to underſtand, that he could not ſupport a Subjection to the Will and Dominion of another; and therefore was reſolved to Abandon his Native Patrimony and Inheritance, to recover an Abſolute Sovereignty in remote parts, or dye in proſecution of it. This deſign of Hanco-huallu being rumoured abroad amongſt his people, it was agreed, that ſuch Men as inclined to his party, ſhould, with their Wives and Children, depart privately in ſmall Companies, leſt Numbers of People and Troops ſhould make a noiſe, and give jealouſie to the Inca; and that at length they ſhould aſſemble and meet at a general Rendezvous in ſome place beyond the Dominions of the Inca, where he himſelf would follow after them, and appear in the Head of them as their King and Leader. This ſeemed to be the moſt agreeable counſel, and beſt expedient to recover their Liberty; for that it were a folly, and raſhneſs, to endeavour it by force, or to ſet up their Power againſt the Puiſſance of the Inca: Nay, though ſuch a deſign ſhould ſeem feaſible, and practicable, yet conſidering the gentleneſs of the Inca, and with what kindneſs and humanity he had returned the Acts of Hoſtilities which they had offered him, it would ſeem a part of ingratitude and perfidiouſneſs, which could not enter into the Breaſt of a Generous Prince to riſe again in Arms againſt him: But then to recover their Liberty by a peaceable ſurrender of their Eſtates and Power, was not onely innocent and inoffenſive, but allowable alſo under the ſtricteſt circumſtances and obligations by which they were bound to the Inca, than whom there could not be a more benign, and more indulgent King in the whole Univerſe.

With theſe Arguments and Reaſons the brave Hanco-huallu prevailed on the minds of thoſe to whom he firſt communicated his deſign; and they whiſpering it one to the other, it became the common diſcourſe; and found ſuch a general approbation and concurrence, that the Chancas, who naturally loved their Lord and Sovereign, were eaſily perſuaded to run the fortune of their Prince; ſo that in a ſhort time they numbred 8000 fighting Men, which in a Body marched out of their Countrey, beſides Women and Children, under the Command and Conduct of the Valiant Hanco-huallu; the fame of whoſe Courage, and the fierceneſs of the Chancas, who were always reputed for a fighting and warlike Nation, ſtruck ſuch terrour in all places and regions through which they marched, that none durſt oppoſe, or interrupt them in their paſſage: The fear likewiſe of them cauſed the Inhabitants to furniſh them with Proviſions untill they came to the Provinces of Jarma and Pumpu, which are about 70 Leagues diſtant from their own Countrey. And though in this March they encountred certain inconſiderable Skirmiſhes, and could eaſily have overcome the Natives, and planted themſelves in their poſſeſſions; yet they ſeemed as yet to have too near a Neighbourhood with the Empire of the Inca, whoſe ambition might ſoon arrive them, and bring them under the ſame ſubjection from which they fled, and endeavoured to avoid: For which reaſon they marched forward, removing themſelves as far as it was poſſible from the reach of the Inca, at leaſt to ſuch a diſtance, as during his life, it was not probable that his Arms could extend. With this intention they travelled, bending on the right hand towards the great Mountains of Antis, with deſign to inhabit there, and people thoſe places which were moſt commodious for Humane life. Thoſe of this Nation of the Chancas report, that they removed 200 Leagues from their own Land, but at what place they entred, or what parts they peopled, it is not certain; onely that they entred by a great River, and planted their Colonies by the banks of a great Lake, where it is ſaid, they encreaſed in ſuch Riches, and performed ſuch mighty Acts, that they ſeem rather Romances, than Reports fit for a true Hiſtory. And though we may believe, or fanſie nothing too great for the Courage and Wiſedom of Hanco-huallu; yet his Actions not falling within the ſubject of our Hiſtory, we ſhall put a period to a Relation of them in this place, as impertinent and foreign to our preſent diſcourſe.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Colonies ſent to inhabit the Lands of Hanco-huallu; and the Deſcription of the Valley of Yucay.

THE Inca Viracocha was much ſurpriſed with the News, that Hanco-huallu was fled; and had abandoned his Countrey; which he would have prevented had he been pre-adviſed of his Intention; but ſince now there was no remedy, and that no cauſe was given to move or force his departure, the Inca was the leſs concerned, though the people were generally rejoyced at his Flight, to whom the Humour and haughty Diſpoſition of a Prince, like him, was never pleaſant. The News of the flight of Hanco-huallu, with all the particulars of it, being made known and confirmed; the Inca commanded his Brother Pahuac Mayta, whom he had left Governour at Cozco, with two others of his Council, to paſs with a conſiderable number of Souldiers, into the Countrey of the Chancas, there to ſee and inform themſelves of the true ſtate of that remaining people, whom they were to treat and careſs with all gentleneſs, giving them comfort and aſſurance of Protection; for that though their Prince was fled, yet they ſhould not want the care of the Inca, who was both more able to defend them, as alſo more mild and loving than their fierce Hanco-huallu.

Theſe Incas having viſited all the Provinces belonging to the Chancas, and diſpoſed them to a quiet and ſatisfied condition, they went to the two famous Fortreſſes of Hanco-huallu, built by his Anceſtours called Challcu marca, and Sura marca; Marca in that Language ſignifying a Caſtle or Fortreſs. In theſe places Hanco-huallu paſſed ſome days before his departure, which (as the Indians report) he was more troubled to leave, than all the other poſſeſſions he enjoyed in his Dominions. The diſturbance which the flight of Hanco-huallu had cauſed, and the conſternation in the minds of the People, being in ſome manner quieted and appeaſed; and all other matters of the Empire being well ordered and eſtabliſhed, the Inca returned again to Cozco to enjoy the fruits of Peace, and employ his time in the adminiſtration of Juſtice, and performance of matters beneficial to the wellfare of his Subjects; hoping that with time the fears and jealouſies which Hanco-huallu had raiſed, would blow over, and vaniſh. The firſt thing therefore that he did was to publiſh certain Laws, which in that conjuncture of Affairs were ſeaſonable and convenient, and which ſerved to prevent inſurrections of the like nature for the future. Next he ſent a Colony of about ten thouſand Perſons, under the Command of Incas, into the Countrey of the Chancas, to ſupply the places of thoſe who were ſlain in the Battel of Yahuar-pampu, and of thoſe who had deſerted their Countrey in company with Hanco-huallu. Then he appointed ſeveral ſumptuous Houſes to be built in all places of his Empire, particularly in the valley of Yucay, which is lower than Tampu. For this Valley is the moſt pleaſant and delightfull place in all Peru; having for that reaſon been choſen by all the Kings, ſince the time of Manco Capac, for their Garden, and place of Recreation; to which they often retired, to refreſh and divertiſe themſelves after the toils and labours which are incident to Government. The ſituation of it is about four Leagues diſtant North-eaſt from the City, in a moſt ſweet and healthfull Air, where the Climate is ſo temperate, that neither cold or heat are in exceſs; the Waters are excellent and cool, nor are the Flies or Gnats troubleſome, or any other inſect there poiſonous or vexatious. It is placed between two Mountains, that to the Eaſt is the ſnowy Mountain, an arme of which extends to the plain, and ſupplies it with continued ſtreams, from which they draw ſeveral Branches, and convey it by Chanels to water their Grounds. Though the middle of this Mountain be lofty, rugged and aſperous; yet at the foot and skirts of it are verdant Paſtures, and Lands abounding with Fruits: where alſo are all ſorts of Game, ſuch as Stags, and Fallow-Deer, the Huanacus and Vicunna, (which is a Mountain Goat, from whence they have the Bezar-ſtone,) as alſo Partridges, and all ſorts of other Fowl; and though the havock which the Spaniards have made hath deſtroyed all the Game in thoſe parts, yet in the place thereof they have planted Vines, and Fruit-trees, and Sugar-canes, which is the improvement they have made in that quarter. The other Mountain to the Weſt is not ſo high, or lofty, being not above a League in the aſcent. At the foot thereof runs the plentifull River of Yucay, deep, and not rapid, but paſſing with a ſmooth and gentle Current, and therefore abounds with great quantities of excellent fiſh, and is frequented with Hearns, Wild-Ducks, and all ſorts of Water-fowl. Thoſe that were ſick at Cozco, which is a cold and ſharp Air, and therefore not ſo proper for infirm Bodies uſually reſorted thither to recover their healths; ſo that there is now no Spaniard who lives at Cozco, and eſteemed a Man of an Eſtate, but who hath a Country-houſe, or ſome poſſeſſion in that Valley. This Inca Viracocha had a particular delight and affection for that place; and therefore built ſeveral Houſes there, both for oſtentation, and for pleaſure.

He enlarged the Temple of the Sun, both in the Building, and alſo in the number of Servants and Officers, endowing it with a Revenue agreeable to the Enlargement. And as all the Incas conceived a particular Veneration, and Devotion for that Temple, ſo Viracocha ſeemed more ſenſibly affected from his religious fervour to that Spirit which appeared to him.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Name which Viracocha gave to his Eldeſt Son; and his Prophecy concerning the Invaſion of the Spaniards.

WE have ſeen already by what hath preceded, in what manner Viracocha paſſed ſome years, and in what tranquillity and proſperity he governed his Empire. We are now to ſpeak of his Children and Family; his Eldeſt Son was born of Coya Mama Runtu, who was his Siſter, and true and lawfull Wife; he was at firſt called Titu Manco Capac, though afterwards by the laſt Will and Appointment of his Father, his Name was changed to Pachacutec, which ſignifies as much as one who ſubverts the World, or turns it upſide down; and though it was commonly taken in the worſt ſenſe, for ſome alteration from bad to worſe, yet it is ſaid he was ſo affected with this Word, that he was deſirous to have called himſelf by that Name; but in regard that the Name of Viracocha was ſo dilated over all Countries, and the Voices of the people ſo accuſtomed to it; that he could not aſſume that Appellation to himſelf, yet he was deſirous to communicate it to his Son, being, as he believed, a means to keep alive the memory of the Apparition, and the renowned Actions of his Father. Acoſta in the 20th Chap. of his 6th Book ſaith, "That the people were ſo much ſcandalized at the Name of Viracocha, "which this Inca took to himſelf, becauſe it was the proper name of God, that "he was forced to clear himſelf of this prophanation, by ſaying that the Spirit "which appeared to him in his Dream, had commanded him to take that Name "and Title upon himſelf: And that the Inca Pachacuti, who ſucceeded him, was "a great Souldier and Politician, having invented many ſuperſtitious rites, which "he introduced into the Worſhip of their Religion; which are the words with which Acoſta concludes that Chapter: All which is in confirmation of what I have ſaid, namely, that a Viſion appeared to him in his Dream; that he took the Name of that Apparition, and that afterwards he gave the Name of Pachacutec to the Son who ſucceeded him.

The

The Name of the Queen was Mama Runtu, which Word Runtu signifies an Egg, ſo called, becauſe of the whiteneſs of her Face being perhaps fairer than the Women commonly are of that Countrey.

The Indians report, that this Viracocha was the Authour of the Prophecy which foretold the Invaſion of the Spaniards, and was conſerved amongſt the Archives of the Kings of Peru: which was, " That at a certain period of Years after the " ſucceſſion of ſuch a number of Kings, there ſhould come a ſort of people from " far remote Countries, never ſeen, or known before in thoſe Regions, who ſhould " take away their Religion, and ſubvert their Empire. The ſubſtance of which Prophecy was contained in two ſuch obſcure Sentences, as were difficult to be explained or interpreted. The Indians ſay, that this Inca, after the ſucceſs and verification of his Dream, became the Oracle of Mankind; for that the Amautas, who were the Philoſophers of thoſe times, as alſo the High Prieſt, and the moſt Ancient Elders of the Temple of the Sun, who were the Magicians, that preſaged of things to come, did often interrogate him concerning his Dream, and of Comets ſeen in the Heavens, as alſo of Divinations by the flying and ſinging of Birds, and of ſeveral other ſuperſtitious Prognoſtications which they made from their Sacrifices, and Entrails of Beaſts; and to all the Reſponſes which Viracocha made to their Enquiries, they yielded entire Faith and Credence, eſteeming him the Oracle, and chief in Divination: What he delivered in this manner, was judged worthy to be conſerved by Tradition in the memory of their Kings onely; and that the knowledge of ſuch divine Revelations was not to be made common, or prophaned by the Diſcourſe of the People; for that it was not fit for them to be pre-acquainted with the times and ſeaſons, when their Idolatrous Worſhip ſhould have an end, and the Empire be overthrown, and the Divinity of the Incas queſtioned, and changed into the ſtate and common condition of humane kind. For which reaſon there was no farther mention made of this Prophecy, untill the time of Huayna Capac, who revealed it openly a little before his Death, as we ſhall hereafter declare more at large; though ſome Hiſtorians make but a ſhort tale of it, and ſay, that a God which the Indians worſhipped, called Ticci Viracocha, delivered this Prophecy. But for what I have delivered herein, I have the authority of an old Inca, whom I have often heard recount the Fables and Antiquities of their Kings in preſence of my Mother.

And in regard the coming of the Spaniards into Peru, and the Conqueſt of it by them; the deſtruction of their Idolatry, and the preaching of the Goſpel of Chriſt in thoſe parts, did correſpond with the Prophecy of Viracocha; the Indians did therefore give the Name of Viracocha to the Spaniards, fanſying them to be Sons of that imaginary God, whom he had purpoſely ſent (as we have already ſaid) to relieve the Incas from the Oppreſſion and Violence of the cruel Tyrant. Thus we have curſorily touched on this wonderfull Prophecy, which for many years had been revealed to the Inca-Kings; and which was afterwards accompliſhed in the Reigns of Huaſcar, and Atahualpa, which were great Grandchildren to the third Generation to this Inca Viracocha.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Death of Viracocha; and how the Authour ſaw his Body.

AT length the Inca Viracocha, in the Height of Majeſty, and Zenith of his Proſperity, ſubmitted to the common fate of Mankind; he was generally lamented, and bewailed by all the Empire, and adored afterwards as a Child of the Sun, to whom they offered Prayers and Sacrifices. He left to Pachacutec, his Eldeſt Son, the Inheritance, beſides whom he had many legitimate Sons and Daughters of the Royal Bloud, with others born to him by his Concubines: he conquered and reduced Eleven Provinces, four of which were to the South of Cozco, and ſeven towards the North. It is not certainly known to what age he lived, nor how long he reigned, though according to common report, he governed above fifty Years; and ſo he ſeemed to me to have been an ancient Man, when I ſaw his Body at Cozco, about the beginning of the Year 1570. which was the time when I was upon my departure for Spain; and then I remember, that going to take my leave of the Governour, or Chief Juſtice of the City, called Paul Ondegardo, a Native of Salamanca; amongſt other Favours which he did me, he was pleaſed to lead me into an inward room, and there tell me, that before I departed it would be convenient for me to have a ſight of ſome of my Relations, that ſo I might have another Story to tell of them in Spain; with that he ſhewed me five Bodies of Incas, three of Men, and two of Women; one of which the Indians report to have been the Body of Viracocha, which ſeemed to be very aged, the Hairs of the Head being as white as Snow: The ſecond they ſay was the Great Tupac Yupanqui, who was great Grandſon to Viracocha: The third was Huayna Capac, the Son of Tupac Yupanqui; and Grandſon of the Fourth Generation to Viracocha; the two laſt were Men with gray Hairs, yet did not ſeem ſo aged as Voracocha. One of the Women was ſaid to be the Body of the Queen Mama Runtu, Wife of Viracocha; the other of Coya Mama Occlo, Mother of Huayna Capac; and it is probable that they might be Husband and Wife, conſidering that the Bodies were laid and found ſo cloſe together; and what is more ſtrange, theſe Bodies were more entire than the Mummies, wanting neither Hair on the Head, nor Eye-brows, and even the very Eye-laſhes were viſible. They were clothed with the ſame ſort of Garments which they wore in their Life time; the Liſt or Wreath appeared about their Heads, which was all the Badg or Ornament they ſhewed of their Royal Dignity. The poſture they were in was ſitting, after the manner of the Indians, their Hands croſſed on their Breaſts, with the right hand upon the left, their Eyes caſt downwards looking towards the Earth. Acoſta it ſeems had ſeen one of theſe Bodies, of which diſcourſing in the 21ſt Chap. of his 6th Book, ſaith, "That it was ſo well con-
"ſerved by a certain ſort of bituminous matter, with which they embalmed it,
"that it ſeemed to be alive; the Eyes were ſo well counterfeited by a mixture of "Gold, that they ſeemed lively and natural. I muſt confeſs, that my want of Curioſity did not move me to make ſo narrow a ſcrutiny into this matter, as I ſhould have done, had I believed that I ſhould have had occaſion to write of them; for then I ſhould not onely have viewed and conſidered the Bodies themſelves more exactly, but alſo have made enquiry of the Natives concerning the manner and receipt of this way of embalming; which perhaps they might rather have imparted to me, who am a Native, and one of their Relations, than to the Spaniards, who are Strangers and Aliens to them, unleſs perhaps the Art and Secret is loſt amongſt them, as many other things are, of the like nature. For my part, I could not diſcover any thing of this bituminous matter, of which Acoſta ſpeaks, though certainly there muſt have been ſome excellent Secret, without which it was impoſſible to have conſerved Bodies, with their Fleſh ſo plump and full

as these were. This Acosta treating farther of these Bodies, in the 6th Chapter of his 5th Book, hath these Words which follow. " In the first place, saith he, " they had an Art to conserve the Bodies of their Kings, and Great Men, with- " out stinking or corruption, for the space of above two hundred Years; in which " manner the Bodies of the Inca-Kings were found at Cozco, erected in their Cha- " pels and Oratories, where they were adored; which the Marquess of Cannete, " when he was Vice-roy of the Indies, caused to be removed from thence, that he " might abolish the Idolatrous Worship, which they performed towards them, " and transported three or four of them to a place called the King's Town; which " appeared very strange and stupendious to the Spaniards, to see Bodies after so " many years so firm and sound as they were. These are the Words of Acosta, from whence I observe, that these Bodies had been removed to the King's Town almost twenty years before he had a sight of them; which being a hot and moist Air, was more apt to taint and corrupt Flesh, than the cold and dry Air of Cozco; and yet notwithstanding he saith, That twenty Years after their removal they were still firm and uncorrupt, as formerly, and appeared with such Life, that they wanted onely Speech to make them seem to be living. I am of opinion, that the way to conserve Bodies, is after they are dead to carry them to the Mountains of Snow, where being well dried, and congealed by the cold, and all humours con- sumed and digested; then afterwards to apply that bituminous matter, which may plump up the Flesh; and render it full and solid as the Living. But I onely ad- venture on this conjecture, from what I have seen the Indians doe, when they have carried a piece of raw Flesh into the cold Mountains, where after it hath been well dried by the Frost, they have kept it as long as they pleased with- out salt, or any other preservative; and this was the manner which the Incas used, for drying and keeping all the flesh Provisions which they carried for Food to maintain their Army. I remember that I once touched a finger of Huayna Capac, which seemed to me like a stick of wood; and so light were these Bodies, that an Indian could easily carry one of them in his Armes, or on his Shoulders, to the Houses of Spanish Gentlemen, who desired to see them. When they car- ried them through the Streets, they covered them with white Linen; and the Indians falling down on their knees before them, sighed, and wept, shewing them all the reverence imaginable; and some of the Spaniards also would take off their Caps, and uncover their Heads to them, as they passed, in testimony of the re- spect they bore to the Bodies of Kings; with which the Indians were so pleased, and overjoyed, that they knew not in what manner to express their thankfulness to them.

This is all that we have been able to deliver concerning the Actions of Viraco- cha in particular; the other Monuments and Sayings of this famous King are lost, for want of Letters and Learning to record them to posterity, and have incurred the Fate of many famous Men, whose glorious Exploits and Deeds have been buried in the Graves with them.

Onely Blas Valera reports one memorable Saying of this Viracocha, which being often repeated by him, was observed by three Incas, who kept it in remembrance; as also the Sayings of some other Kings, which we shall hereafter specifie. That which this Inca delivered, had reference to the education of Children, of which he was made the more sensible, by that Severity and Disfavour with which he was treated by his Father in the time of his Minority; his Saying was this, That Parents are oftentimes the cause of ruine to their Children, when either they educate them with such fondness, that they never cross them in their Wills, or desires, but suffer them to act and doe whatsoever they please, whereby they become so corrupt in the manners of their in- fancy, that Vice grows ripe with them at the Years of Manhood. Others, on the contrary, are so severe and cruel to their Children, that they break the tenderness of their Spirits, and affright them from learning, discouraging them in that manner by menaces and lectures of a supercilious Pedant, that their Wits are abased, and despair of attaining to knowledge and vertue. The way is to keep an indifferent mean between both, by which Youth becomes valiant and hardy in War, and wise and political in the time of Peace. With which Blas Valera concludes the Reign of this Inca Viracocha.

CHAP. I.

Of the Buildings, Ornament and Furniture of the Royal Palaces.

THE Services and Ornaments of the Royal Palaces belonging to the Kings of Peru, were agreeable to the Greatneſs, Riches and Majeſty of their Empire, with which alſo correſponded the Magnificence of their Court and Attendance; which, if well conſidered, might equal, if not exceed the State and Grandeur of all the Kings and Emperours of the Univerſe. As to their Houſes and Temples, Gardens and Baths, they were all built of Free Stone, rarely well poliſhed, and ſo well joined together, and ſo cloſe laid, that they admitted no kind of Cement; the truth is, if any were uſed, it was of that ſort of coloured Mortar which in their Language they call Llancac Allpa, which is a ſort of ſlimy Cement, made up like a Cream, which ſo united and cloſed the Stones together, that no ſeam or creviſe appeared between them; for which reaſon the Spaniards were of opinion, that they worked without Mortar; others ſaid, that they uſed Lime, but both are miſtakes; for the Indians of Peru neither knew the manner or uſe of Lime, Mortar, Tile or Brick.

In many of the Royal Palaces, and Temples of the Sun, they cloſed up the Seams of their Building with melted Gold, or Silver, or Lead. Pedro de Cieça, a Spaniſh Hiſtorian, ſaith, That for greater Magnificence they filled the joints between the Stones with Gold or Silver, which was afterwards the cauſe of the total deſtruction of thoſe Buildings; for the Spaniards having found theſe exteriour appearances of Gold, and ſome other heaps of Metall within, have for farther Diſcovery ſubverted the very Foundations of thoſe Edifices, in hopes of finding greater Treaſure, which otherwiſe were ſo firmly built, as might have continued for many Ages. Pedro de Cieça confirms the ſame at large, and ſaith farther, That the Temples of the Sun were plated with Gold, as alſo all the Royal Apartments. They alſo framed many Figures of Men and Women, of Birds of the Air, and Fiſhes of the Sea; likewiſe of fierce Animals, ſuch as Tygers, and Lions, and Bears, Foxes, Dogs and Cats, in ſhort, all Creatures whatſoever known amongſt them, they caſt and moulded into true and natural Figures, of the ſame ſhape and form of thoſe Creatures which they repreſented, placing them in corners or cones of the Walls, purpoſely made and fitted for them.

They counterfeited the Plants and Wall-flowers ſo well, that being on the Walls, they ſeemed to be Natural: The Creatures which were ſhaped on the Walls, ſuch as Lizards, Butter-flyes, Snakes and Serpents, ſome crawling up, and ſome down, were ſo artificially done, that they ſeemed Natural, and wanted nothing but Motion. The Inca commonly ſate on a Stool of Maſſie Gold, which they called Tiana, being about three quarters of a Yard high, without Armes or Back, and the ſeat ſomething hollow in the middle; this was ſet on a large ſquare Plate of Gold, which ſerved for a Pedeſtal to raiſe it. All the Veſſels which were for the ſervice of the Inca, both of the Kitchin, and of the Buttery, were all made of Gold or Silver; and theſe were in ſuch quantities, that every Houſe, or Palace, belonging to the Inca, was furniſhed in that manner with them, that there was no occaſion, when he Travelled, to remove them from one place to the other. In theſe Palaces alſo there were Magazines, or Granaries, made of Gold and Silver, which were fit to receive Corn, or Grane, but they were rather places of State and Magnificence, than of uſe.

The Inca had his Palace well furniſhed with Bedding, and ſo many changes of Apparel, that having worn a Suit twice, he gave it to his Kindred, or his Servants. Their Bed-cloaths were Blankets, like our Freezes made of Goats Wool, and ſo ſoft and fine, that amongſt other curioſities of that Countrey, they carried over ſome of the Blankets for the Beds of Philip the Second King of Spain: theſe Blankets ſerved them for Beds to lye on, as well as Coverings: But they would by no means be reconciled to Quilts, or be perſuaded to ſleep upon them; perhaps becauſe, that having ſeen them in the Chambers of the Spaniards, they ſeemed too effeminate and ſoft for Men, who made profeſſion of a more hardy life; and who had not created to themſelves ſo many ſuperfluous neceſſities as Men, who ranged both Sea and Land for Riches and Treaſure. They had no occaſion of Hangings for their Walls, which (as we have ſaid) they Adorned with Plates of Gold or Silver: The Diſhes of Meat provided for the Inca's Table, were many, becauſe many Incas of his Kindred were his frequent Gueſts, and his Servants were very numerous, being all to be fed at the charge and care of the Inca. The uſual hour of Eating, for all ſorts of people, was from eight, to nine in the Morning; in the Evening they ſupped by Day-light, making no more than theſe two Meals. In Drinking they were more intemperate; for though they did not Drink during the time of their Meal, yet afterwards, when they ſate to it, they drank commonly till Night. But this was a cuſtome amongſt the Rich, and Men of Eſtates, and not amongſt the Poor, whoſe poverty obliged them to a neceſſity of being abſtemious: And the common cuſtome and practice amongſt all in general, was to retire betimes to their repoſe, and to riſe early in the Morning to follow their Employments.

CHAP. II.

How all the Ornaments and Curioſities, which Beautified the Royal Palaces, were made of Gold and Silver.

ALL the Royal Palaces had their Gardens, and Orchards, and places of Pleaſure, wherein the Inca might delight, and divertiſe himſelf; and theſe Gardens were planted with Fruit-trees of the greateſt beauty, with Flowers, and Odoriferous Herbs, of all ſorts and kinds which that Climate did produce. In reſemblance of theſe they made Trees, and Flowers of Gold and Silver, and ſo imitated them to the life, that they ſeemed to be natural: ſome Trees appeared with their Fruit in the bloſſom, others full-grown, others ripe according to the ſeveral ſeaſons of the year; they counterfeited alſo the Mayz, or Stalk, of the Indian Wheat, with all its Grane and Spikes: Alſo the Flax with its Leaves and Roots as it grows in the Fields; and every Herb and Flower was a Copy to them, to frame the like in Gold and Silver.

They faſhioned likewiſe all ſorts of Beaſts and Birds in Gold and Silver; namely, Conies, Rats, Lizards, Serpents, Butterflyes, Foxes, Mountain Cats, for they had no tame Cats in their Houſes; and then they made Sparrows, and all ſorts of leſſer Birds, ſome flying, others perching on the Trees; in ſhort, no Creature, that was either Wild, or Domeſtick, but was made and repreſented by them according to its exact and natural ſhape.

In many Houſes they had great Ciſterns of Gold in which they bathed themſelves, with Cocks and Pipes of the ſame Metal for conveyance of the Water. And amongſt many other pieces of State and Magnificence, they had heaps, or ſtacks, of Faggots and Billets made of Gold and Silver, piled up in their Storehouſes, as if they had been there laid for ſervice of the Inca.

The greateſt part of theſe Riches, when the Spaniards came in, were thrown into Wells, and deep waters, by the Indians, who obſerving their Enemies to be covetous, and thirſty of Gold, out of Malice to them, concealed, or deſtroyed them in ſuch unrecoverable places, where they could never be again retrieved, that ſo the Memory and Tradition of the hidden treaſures might be deſignedly loſt to their poſterity, becauſe they thought it a Prophanation to have that Wealth and Subſtances which was Dedicated to their Kings, to be converted to the common benefit and uſe of Strangers. Whatſoever we have related concerning the Riches of the Incas, is confirmed by all the Hiſtorians who write of Peru, with a more enlarged report of the prodigious Treaſures. Thoſe Writers who treat of theſe matters moſt fully, are Pedro de Cieça de Leon, and Auguſtin de Carate, who was Accountant-General in thoſe parts; which latter, in the 14th Chapter of his firſt Book, hath theſe words: "Gold was a Metal of great eſteem amongſt "them, becauſe the principal Veſſels for ſervice of their Kings were made there-"of, and the Jewels of his Dignity and State were ſet in it: Likewiſe they "made Offerings of it in their Temples: And the King Yigaya made "a Chair of Gold, in which he ſate weighing twenty five Quilats, and which "was worth twenty five thouſand Ducats, and was the ſame which Don Franciſco "de Piçarro challenged for his own prize; becauſe it was agreed, at the time of "the Conqueſt, that beſides his own ſhare and proportion with the reſt, he might "claim that Jewel which he ſhould chuſe and eſteem of the greateſt value. "Guaynacava, at the Birth of his Eldeſt Son, made a Chain of Gold ſo big and "weighty, that 200 Indians having ſeized the Links of it to the Rings in their "Ears, were ſcarce able to raiſe it from the ground: And in memory of this joy "at his Birth, and of this great Chain, they gave him the Name of Guaſca, "which is as much as Chain, or Cable, with the Addition of Inca, which was "the Title of all belonging to the Royal Family. The which particular I purpoſely alledge in this place to confute the opinion of thoſe who living in Spain, and being ignorant of the affairs of the Indies, believed that the Indians had no eſteem of Gold, nor knew the value or price of it: Beſides which, they had Veſſels made of Gold wherein to lodge their Corn, alſo the Figures of Men, of Trees, and Plants, and Herbs made in Gold, as all Animals of what ſort ſoever: which are the Words of that famous Authour in his Hiſtory of Peru.

That rich Prize which fell to the lot of D. Franciſco Piçarro, was part of that which Atahualpa gave for his Ranſome, and which Piçarro juſtly claimed as his due by Military Right, being General of the Army: He might moreover challenge, by agreement, the beſt Jewel from the great heaps of Riches: And though there were others perhaps more valuable, ſuch as Jars, and Veſſels of Gold; yet in regard that this had been the Seat of a King, and the ſeizure of it preſaged the Dominion of the Spaniſh Monarchy, it ſeemed a prize more ſingular, and worthy the choice of Piçarro before any other of greater eſtimation. In the Life of Huayna Capac, who was the laſt of all the Incas, we ſhall ſpeak more at large of this Gold Chain, which was a thing incredible.

What Pedro de Cieça writes of the Riches of Peru, and how the Indians made them away, and concealed them, is that which he ſpecifies in the 21ſt Chapter of his Book, as follows: "If, ſays he, all that which was buried in Peru, and in "theſe Countries, were diſcovered, and brought to uſe and light, the value of it "would be ineſtimable, and all the poſſeſſions of the Spaniards inconſiderable in "compariſon of the hidden treaſures: For, ſays he, I being at Cozco, in preſence "of many Perſons of Quality, heard Paulo the Inca diſcourſing of this matter, "and ſaying, That if all the Treaſures which belonged to the Provinces and "Temples, which are now loſt, ſhould be again recovered and amaſſed toge-"ther, they would be ſo immenſe and great, that all the Riches which the Spa-"niards poſſeſs, would be no more in compariſon of them, than a drop of water "is to a whole Bucket: And to make the ſimilitude more clear; the Indians ta-"king a handfull of Grane from a whole meaſure, ſaid, Thus much the Chri-"ſtians have gained; and the remainder is lodged there, where neither we, nor "any elſe is able to aſſign: Whatſoever this Treaſure may have been, though "the Spaniards had not been Maſters of it, would certainly have been offered to "their Devils, and Temples, and Sepulchres of their Dead; for the Indians, who "neither purchaſe Lands, nor Houſes, nor Cities with it, nor eſteem it the ſinews "and nerves of War, do onely Adorn themſelves with it, being alive, and bury "it with them in their Graves, being dead: Howſoever, in my opinion, it was "our duty to have adviſed the Indians of theſe Errours, and to have made it our "buſineſs to inſtruct them in the knowledge of the Goſpel, and our Holy Faith, "rather than our profeſſion and whole concernment, to fill our Purſes, and en-"rich our Coffers: Theſe are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, in the 21ſt Chapter of his Book, which I have copied Verbatim from thence. This Inca, which was called Paulo, or by them Paullu, of whom all the Spaniſh Hiſtorians make mention, was one of the many Sons of Huayna Capac, being a Man of Courage, who took the King of Spain's ſide in his Wars againſt the Spaniards; at his Baptiſm he took the Name of Chriſtopher Paullu, to whom my Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega was Godfather, as alſo to his Brother Titu Aqui, who afterwards was Baptized by the Name of Philip, in reſpect to Philip the Second, then Prince of Spain; I was well acquainted with them both, as alſo with their Mother called Annas, though the two Sons died ſoon afterwards.

Lopez de Gomara writing of the Riches of the Kings of Peru, in the 122d Chapter of his Book, hath theſe very words: "All the Utenſils of Inca's Houſe, "Table and Kitchin, were all of Gold and Silver, at leaſt of Silver and Copper. "In the with-drawing Rooms and Antichambers, were Statues of Gold caſt in "the form of Giants, and the Figures of all kinds of Animals in a like large pro-"portion, as alſo Trees and Herbs, Fiſhes of the Sea, and freſh Waters of all "ſorts, which their Kingdom produced: they had alſo Ropes and Chains, Bas-"kets and Hampers of Gold and Silver, and Faggots of Gold, piled up in Stacks, "as if they were intended for fewel: In ſhort, there was no Figure of any Crea-"ture in the whole Kingdom, which they did not imitate, and repreſent in Gold: "They report alſo that the Incas had a Garden ſituated in an Iſland near to Puna, "where being deſirous to enjoy the Air of the Sea, they paſſed over to divertiſe, "and recreate themſelves; and therein were Trees, and Plants, and Flowers made

" all of Gold and Silver, with rare Art and Invention: On the other ſide of this " Iſland were vaſt heaps of Gold and Silver laid up, with intention to carry it " to Cozco, that it might be worked there; all which was loſt by the Death of " Guaſcar: For the Indians obſerving that the Spaniards thirſted after Gold, and " tranſported all into Spain, that they could ſeize, and lay their hands upon; they " made it away, and concealed as much of it as they were able. Thus far are the Words of Lopez de Gomara. As to the Garden, which he ſays, the Kings of Peru had near Puna, in which all Creatures were repreſented in Gold and Silver; he particularly ſpecifies that place, becauſe that when the Spaniards came in, it was the onely Garden which continued in its Beauty and Ornaments; for the Indians, in deſpight of their Enemies, deſtroyed all the reſt, and confounded the Riches of them in ſuch manner, as are never to be recovered; in which Relation this Authour, and all other Spaniſh Hiſtorians, do agree. That infinite treaſure of Gold and Silver, which, he ſays, was heaped up with intention to be carried to Cozco, and there worked, was the ſurpluſage of what remained, after all the Royal Palaces were furniſhed, and adorned in the manner we have before related. This may not ſeem incredible to thoſe who have accounted and obſerved thoſe vaſt and immenſe quantities of Gold and Silver, which have been tranſported from my Countrey into Spain, there having paſſed over the Bar of St. Lucar, in the Year 1595, in the ſpace of eight Months, onely five and thirty Millions in Gold and Silver.

CHAP. III.

Of the Servants of the Court, and thoſe who carried the King's Chair, or Sedan.

THE Servants deſtined for the Services of the Court were many in number, ſuch as Sweepers, Carriers of Water, and Cleavers of Wood, Cooks, Butlers, Porters, Keepers of the Ward-rope, and of the Jewels, Gardiners and Stewards of the Houſhold; in ſhort, there were as many Officers and Servants retained in this Court, as in the moſt magnificent and ſplendid Palaces of our Kings, or Emperours: But herein there was ſomething different from our Courts; for here particular Men had not the charge of an Office committed to them; but it was the care, or incumbence of two or three Provinces to provide ſufficient Men for every Office, ſuch as were faithfull, diligent and dexterous for the place; and ſuch a number of them, as that they might take their turns by Days, or Weeks, or Months, as often as they ſhould think fit to exchange them. This being part of the Tribute which was exacted from every Province, great care was taken in the choice of able Men; for that the default, or crime, of every particular perſon, reflected on the whole Province, who made themſelves anſwerable for his good behaviour, and were accordingly puniſhed with ſuch ſeverity, as all offences againſt the Royal Majeſty did require. And ſince we have ſpoken of Hewers of Wood, we muſt not underſtand, as if theſe were ſent into the Mountains to cut and fell Trees; but ſuch Timber or Wood as was brought by the Vaſſals in payment of their Tribute, was received by theſe Officers, and by them and their Aſſiſtants laid up, and ſtowed in the Houſes for that purpoſe: The like may we underſtand of all other Offices, wherein there was no ſervile labour appointed; it being a gentile employment to ſerve the Inca in ſuch capacity, and to be near his Royal Perſon, which was the greateſt honour and happineſs that any one could aſpire unto.

Thoſe who were qualified to be Servants and Officers in the Court, were people of the Neighbourhood, and parts adjacent, within five or ſix Leagues of the City

City of Cozco, and were the Generation or Children of thoſe Fathers whom the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, ſent abroad to inſtruct and reduce the wild Salvages of thoſe times to a Humane manner of living; and to whom, as a particular note and favour of diſtinction from the more rude and uncivilized Nations, he beſtowed the Honour and Title of Incas, with privilege to wear the Habit and Wreath belonging to the Royal Perſon. As we have declared at the beginning of this Hiſtory.

The Sedan-men that were appointed to carry the Inca in his Chair of Gold upon their Shoulders, were always choſen out of two Provinces, which have the ſame Name, and border one upon the other, being both called Rucana; but for diſtinction ſake, one was called Hatun Rucana, or Rucana Major: the Inhabitants thereof are a ſtrong, nervous people, healthy and well-complexioned, and about fifteen thouſand Inhabitants in number. Theſe people had a cuſtome to train up the Young Men at about twenty years of Age to carry Chairs ſteady, and without tottering or ſtumbling; for in caſe any Man ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to fall, or ſtumble, in carrying the Inca, the Chief or Cape of theſe Sedan-men was obliged to puniſh him with ſome notorious diſgrace, and caſhiere him from farther ſervice of the Inca; as is practiſed alſo in Spain; and as a certain Hiſtorian reports, the misfortune of ſuch a failure was puniſhed with Death. This Service was the Tribute which this people paid the Inca; who being many in number, took their turns, ſo that the attendance was the leſs grievous; and in regard it was a ſingular honour to carry the Inca's Perſon, his weight ſeemed no burthen; of which ſo much care was taken, that leſt by miſchance any of the Chair-men ſhould ſtumble, or fall, there were twenty four or twenty five Men attending on each ſide ready to catch the ſeat, and prevent the fall.

The Proviſion of Victuals for the Court, eſpecially of Fleſh, was very great, becauſe that all thoſe of the Royal Family reſiding in the City, were ſupplied out of the King's Kitchin: Howſoever, there was no great conſumption of Bread made of Mayz, becauſe no other proviſion was made thereof, than what was ſufficient for the immediate Attendants in the Family; for all Houſes and Families had their ſeparate Allowances of Bread laid up in their Store-houſes, as we have before mentioned. All ſorts of Game, ſuch as Deer, Stags, Wild Goats, and the like, were not ordinarily killed for common proviſion of the Court, or the Tables of the Curacas, or Lords, but were reſerved for Sports and Hunting, which they called Chacu; and the Fleſh, and Wool, and Skins of ſuch Game as was taken, was afterwards diſtributed amongſt the Poor and Rich: of which we ſhall treat in a particular Chapter.

The Drink ſpent in the Court of the Inca was great; for in regard that their courteſie was ſuch, as to make every one drink that came thither; whether they were Curacas, or Commoners, or came upon buſineſs, or on viſits, or compliments; there was no ſet or eſtabliſhed Allowance for it, but the entertainment was free without meaſure or account, and the quantity conſumed was almoſt incredible.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Halls, and Rooms of State, and other things belonging to the Court.

IN many of the King's Palaces were long and ſpatious Galleries, of about two hundred paces in length, and about fifty or ſixty in breadth, wherein they often danced and celebrated their Feaſts at thoſe ſeaſons of the year, when the Rains and bad weather incommoded them in the open Air. I remember that in Cozco I ſaw four of theſe Galleries, which when I was a Child, were ſtill in being, and not ruined: One of them was in Amarucancha Street, where Hernando Piçarro then lived, and is now the Jeſuits College: The other was in Caſſana Street, but now built and converted into Shops, the Rent of which belonged to my School-fellow John de Cillorico: Another was in Collcampata Alley, where the Inca Paullu, and his Son Don Carlos, who alſo was my School-fellow, had a Rent in Houſes: This Gallery was the leaſt of all the four, and the biggeſt was that of Caſſana, being capable to receive three thouſand perſons. It is wonderfull to conſider, where it was poſſible for them to find Timbers ſo long and ſquare, as were fit for the Roofs of ſuch Edifices. The fourth Gallery is now turned into the Cathedral Church. One thing is remarkable, that the Indians of Peru in building their Houſes, did never raiſe one Story above another, nor did they join one Room to another, but always left ſome ſpace or diſtance of one Chamber from the other, and perhaps a whole Court-Yard, or Quadrangle, between, unleſs ſometimes to their large Halls they built at the corners ſome Cloſets, or withdrawing Rooms, for better convenience; and in the Diviſions they made of their ſeveral Offices, they raiſed Walls of Apartment to keep them private one from the other. It is farther alſo obſervable, that when they had built the four Walls of Stone or Brick for a Houſe or Chamber, they erected Pillars, or Poſts, in the middle of it, for ſupport of the Roof; for they knew not how to croſs their Beams, or Rafters, or how to faſten them with Nails, or Wooden Pins, but laid their Timbers looſe upon the Walls, faſtning them onely to each other with Spart, or Cords made of Straw, or Ruſhes, as ſtrong as our Hempen Ropes. Theſe main Beams they croſſed with Rafters, faſtning them one to the other; on which they laid a covering of Straw ſo thick, that the Thatch was a Yard deep, extending its Eves above a Yard over the Walls, ſo as to be a Pend-houſe to them to preſerve them from the Rain. I remember that in the Vally of Yucay I once ſaw one of theſe large Rooms, which was about ſeventy Foot ſquare, covered in form of a Pyramid; the Spire of which was twelve Rod high, though the Walls were not above three, having two little Chambers on each ſide, This Building was not burnt by the Indians, when they made their general Inſurrection againſt the Spaniards; for though they deſtroyed many other Houſes of pleaſure in that Vally, the Ruines of which I have ſeen; yet they ſpared this Structure out of reſpect to their Incas, who had frequented this place, being a large and open Square, or Quadrangle, which ſerved for a wide and ſpatious Theatre whereon to repreſent their ſhows and ſports at the times of their principal Feſtivals.

Beſides the Walls of Stone, they made alſo Walls of Clay, which they formed in Caſes or Moulds, for that purpoſe, mixing the Clay with Straw for better binding. The Moulds they made as little, or as large as they pleaſed in meaſure, or proportion to the Wall; the ſhorteſt were about a Yard long, and about the ſixth part of a Yard broad, and of a like thickneſs; which, after they had well dried in the Sun, they laid them one upon another in order; and after that they had lain two or three Years under covering from the Sun, and the Water, ſo that they were fully dried; they then uſed them in their Buildings, as we do our Bricks, cementing them with the ſame Clay, well tempered, and mixed with Straw.

They

They knew not how to make Mud-Walls, nor did the Spaniards uſe other than Clay, in making their Sun-burnt Bricks. In caſe any of theſe great Houſes which we have mentioned ſhould by any accident have been burnt, they did not build again upon the ſame Walls; becauſe, as they ſaid, the Straw which ſtrengthened and bound the Clay, and made it firm, and ſolid, being conſumed by the fire, the Wall muſt neceſſarily be weakned, and the Clay become looſe, and unable to bear the weight of the roof and covering which was laid upon it; but this was but an erroneous conceit of theirs, for I have ſeen and obſerved ſeveral of the Walls of thoſe Houſes, which have been burnt, that have remained firm and ſolid as before.

So ſoon as the King happened to dye, they preſently locked the door of the Chamber where he did uſually ſleep, with all the Ornaments and Riches of Gold and Silver, which furniſhed it, or were found therein at the time of his death; and this Chamber was in this manner kept always locked, that none ſhould enter; for that place being ever afterwards eſteemed ſacred, was not to be prophaned by the Feet of any; onely the room was without-ſide kept and maintained in good repair. The like Ceremony was obſerved in the Chambers of all the other Royal Palaces, where the Inca had repoſed and ſlept, though it had been but the ſpace of one night, as he travelled, or in a journey where he paſſed: And then immediately they fell to building other Chambers for the living Succeſſour, in place of thoſe which had been ſhut up at the death of the late King.

All the Veſſels and Services of Gold and Silver, which belonged to the former Inca, ſuch as Cups, Jarres, or Goblets of Gold, in which he drank, as alſo all the Diſhes and Plates of his Kitchin, with Cloths, and Jewels, appertaining to his Perſon, were all buried and interred in the ſame Grave with him; which abſurdity proceeded from an opinion they had, that the Inca would have occaſion of ſuch Utenſils and Services in the next World. All the other Ornaments of Majeſty and State which belonged to the Chambers, Gardens, Baths, and the like, were the Inheritance of the Succeſſour, and converted to his uſe and Service.

All the Wood and Water which was conſumed in the Inca's Court at Cozco, was brought thither by the People of the four Diviſions, (called Tavantinſuyu) being the Inhabitants neareſt adjacent to the City, that is within fifteen or twenty Leagues about. The Water which they uſed for their beverage, (which in their Language they call Aca) was a ſort of heavy water, and ſomething brackiſh; and indeed they did not much deſire a ſweet and light Water, for they were of opinion it made them lean, and would not ſtick by the ribs, but eaſily corrupted in the Stomach; for this reaſon the Indians not being curious in their Waters, did not delight in fountains, or clear Springs; nor indeed was there any good Water near the City of Cozco. When my Father, after the War of Franciſco Hernandez Giron, in the Year 1555. and ---56. was Governour of the City, they then brought their Water from Ticatica, which water was excellent good, ariſing about a quarter of a League from the Town, to the chief Market-place; from whence, as I hear, they have now turned it by a Conduit pipe, to the Square of St. Franciſco; and inſtead thereof they have brought another Fountain to that place, of exquiſite Water, running with a plentifull ſtream.

CHAP. V.

Of the manner how they Interred their Kings; and that the Obſequies and Rites of Burial continued for the ſpace of a whole Year.

THE Rites of Burial which they performed for their Kings were ſolemn, and of long continuance. In the firſt place they embalmed their Bodies with ſuch rare Art, that (as we have ſaid before) in the year 1559. they were ſo firm and plump, that they ſeemed to be living Fleſh. Their Bowels were interred in a Temple, which was ſituated in the Countrey, called Tampu, upon the Banks of a River, below Yucay, about five Leagues diſtant from the City of Cozco, where were many ſtately Edifices of Stone. Of which Pedro de Cieça ſpeaking in the 94th Chapter of his Book, ſaith that it was reported for certain, how that in ſome places of the Palace, or Temple of the Sun, the Stones were joined or cramped with melted Gold, which with the cement they uſed, were well fixed and conſolidated together.

When the Inca, or ſome principal Curaca dyed, the Servants, who were his greateſt Favourites, and the Wives, that were the moſt beloved by him, did either kill themſelves, or offer themſelves to be buried alive in the Tomb of their Maſters, that ſo they might accompany them into the other World, and renew their immortal Services in the other Life, which, as their Religion taught them, was a corporeal, and not a ſpiritual Being; whereby it may appear, that what ſome Hiſtorians write relating to this matter, namely, that they killed the Servants after the death of their Maſters, is a miſtake; for that would have been a piece of Tyranny, and Inhumanity, above the capacity of humane Nature; for under this pretence one Man might lawfully kill another, and remove him out of the way who was hatefull to him, or ſtood in oppoſition to his Deſigns or Intereſt. The truth is, they needed no Law or compulſion to enforce them to follow the Fate of their Maſter; for when he was dead, his Servants crouded ſo faſt after him, deſiring death, that the Magiſtrates were forced ſometimes to interpoſe with their Authority, and perſuade them, that for the preſent their Maſter had no need of more attendance, but that in due time, when they naturally yielded to their own Mortality, it might then be ſeaſonable enough for them to repair to their Services and Offices in the other World.

The Bodies of their Kings, after they were embalmed, were ſeated before the Image of the Sun, in the Temple at Cozco, to whom they offered Sacrifices, as to Demons, or Men of Divine Race. For the firſt month after the death of the Inca, the whole City bewailed their loſs with loud cries and lamentations, and every Pariſh, or quarter of the Town, went out in their ſeveral Diviſions into the fields, carrying the Trophies of the Inca, his Banners, and Arms, and Garments, and whatſoever was to be buried in the grave with his Bowels; with their ſighs and lamentations they mentioned and repeated the mighty Acts that he had done in the Wars, and the good Acts of Charity and Beneficence that he had ſhewed to them and their Neighbourhood. After the end of the firſt month, they then commemorated the Death of their Inca, at the Full and New of the Moon, and ſo continued till the end of the firſt Year, when they concluded the ſolemnity with full pomp and ſtate, appointing Men and Women practiſed in the Art of Cries and Lamentations, who, like excellent Tragedians, acted their parts of ſorrow in the moſt formal and paſſionate manner imaginable, ſinging the Acts of the dead King in ſorrowfull Tones and Accents. What we have ſaid hitherto, was the part onely of the Commonalty, beſides which the Court and Nobility performed the Obſequies with as much difference to thoſe of the people, as there was of Eminence in their condition, and of Wealth and Politeneſs in the manner of their living.

What was practiſed in the City of this kind was alſo imitated in the Countries, the reſpective Curacas ſtirring up the people to demonſtrate by their outward geſtures and actions, their inward ſorrow and paſſion for the death of their Inca. With theſe Cries and Lamentations they went to viſit all the places within their Province, where at any time their Inca had pitched his Camp, or made his abode or reſidence, though but for a night; and there they all with loud Lamentations repeated the Favours, and Honours, and Benefits that he had performed for them in that place. And thus much ſhall ſerve to have ſaid touching the Funeral of the Incas, in imitation of which, ſomething of this nature was performed in honour of their Caciques, of which I remember to have ſeen ſome paſſages in the time of my infant Years; for in the Province of the Quechuas, I once ſaw a multitude of people gathered in a field, to lament the Death of a Cacique, carrying his Garments upon Poles, in faſhion of Banners, or Enſignes; my curioſity prompted me to ask them what all that noiſe and tumult meant; to which they anſwered me, that it was the Funeral Lamentation of Huamam-pallpa, for ſo they called the deceaſed Cacique.

CHAP. VI.

Of the General and Solemn Huntings which the Kings made in all parts of their Kingdom.

THE Kings of Peru enjoyed, with their other parts of Greatneſs and State, certain days appointed for Solemn and General Huntings, called in their Tongue Chacu. And herein it is to be obſerved, that all ſorts of Game were forbidden to be killed, unleſs Partridges, Pidgeons, Doves, or leſſer Birds, for the Service and Table onely of the Incas, who were Governours, or of the Curacas; nor was thus much permitted neither, but under a limited quantity, and by command and order alſo of the Juſtice.

This prohibition was obſerved under the ſame penalties that all other obſervances of their Law were enjoined, and herein they were rigorous, and ſevere, leſt Men betaking themſelves to the pleaſure of the Field, ſhould delight in a continued courſe of ſports, and ſo neglect the neceſſary proviſions and maintenance of their Families.

By which ſtrict reſtraint the Game both of Birds and Beaſts was ſo common, and in abundance, and tame, that they entred even into their Houſes; where though they could not kill them, yet howſoever they might affright and drive them out of their Fields and Paſtures; for that though the Inca was Maſter of the Game, yet he loved his Subjects better than to have them prejudiced by Laws which were made for the good, and not for the detriment of his People.

At a certain ſeaſon of the Year, after breeding-time was over, the Inca appointed a place for Hunting, where either his own pleaſure directed, or where was moſt convenient for his Affairs, either of War or Peace; and there he appointed 20 or 30000 Indians to encompaſs all that ſpace of Land, which was deſigned for the Hunt; half of whom taking to the Right-hand, and the other half to the Left, were to beat twenty or thirty Leagues round, by the ſides of Rivers, and Brooks, and through woody and mountainous places, whereſoever the limits and bounds of the chaſe did extend, but by no means were they to touch or encroach on other Lands, which were laid out for the Hunt of the following year. Thus they went beating and peeping into every buſh, and when they they ſaw or met any game, they hooped and hollowed to give notice thereof to their Companions, and ſo marched along till they came ſo to ſtraiten the beaſts on all ſides with a narrow compaſs, that they could come and take them up with their very hands.

What fierce Beaſts they encountred, as they beat the Woods and Mountains, ſuch as Lions, Bears, Foxes, Mountain-Cats, which they call Ozcollo, as alſo Serpents and venomous Creatures they killed before they came within the Field, or Circle of their Hunting. We make no mention here of Tygers, becauſe there were none in thoſe Countries, but onely in the vaſt and horrid Mountains of Antis. What number of Game they might kill at ſuch a Hunting, is uncertain, that happening according to the Countrey, and their fortune; for ſometimes they killed twenty, thirty or forty thouſand head of Beaſts, ſuch as Stags, Fallow Deer, the Huanacu which yields a ſort of courſe Wool, and the Vicuna, which is a Goat with very fine Wool; with many other Creatures, which afforded not onely profit, but ſport and paſtime in the taking of them. Such in thoſe times was the abundance of their Game; but now it is ſaid, that ſuch havock hath been made by the Guns which the Spaniards uſe, that there is ſcarce a Huanacus, or Vicuna to be found; but what are affrighted into the Mountains, and inacceſſible places, where no path or way can be made.

All the Game being thus ſurrounded and encompaſſed, they took up with their hands. The Female Deer, whether red or fallow, they ſuffered to eſcape, becauſe they had no Wool, but old and barren Does they killed: they let go alſo as many Males as were thought neceſſary to ſerve the Females, and all the reſt they killed, and divided their Fleſh amongſt the Commonalty, likewiſe having ſhorn the Huanacus and the Vicuna, they let them eſcape, keeping an exact account of all theſe wild Cattel, as if they had been tame Flocks, noting them in their Quipus, which is their Book of Regiſter, diſtinguiſhing the Males from their Females in exact and orderly manner. They likewiſe noted the Number of the Beaſts they killed, as well ſuch as were fierce and hurtfull, as thoſe that were tame and uſefull, that ſo knowing the direct Numbers that remained, they might the better ſee at their next Hunting ſeaſon, how their ſtock was multiplied and increaſed.

The courſe Wool of the Huanacus was diſtributed amongſt the common people; and that of the Vicuna, becauſe it was very fine, was reſerved for the Inca, who divided it alſo amongſt the Incas of his Kindred: For beſides them, no other upon pain of Death might preſume to wear it, unleſs in favour; ſome part thereof was given to a particular Curaca, who upon no other terms could pretend to that honour and privilege. The Fleſh of the Huanacus and Vicuna was diſtributed amongſt the common people, with whom the Curacas would vouchſafe to take ſome part, as alſo of the Veniſon; not that they wanted it, but to ſhew their compliance and familiarity with the people; and that they who laboured in the Hunting, did not ſcorn to receive their ſhare of the prey.

Theſe general and ſolemn Huntings were appointed every fourth Year in the reſpective Diviſions; for the Indians were of opinion, that in ſuch time the Wool of the Vicuna would be at its full growth, and that the wild Cattel would have time to increaſe; and would be leſs affrighted at the approach of Men, than if they were every year teaſed and hunted: Howſoever, they hunted in one place or other every year; but with ſuch method and order, that the Provinces being divided into four parts, each diviſion took its turn but once in four years.

In this orderly manner and method the Incas appointed the times of Hunting, as well for the pleaſure and delight, as for the profit of his people; it being an opinion amongſt them, that the Pachacamac, or the God and Creatour of all things, had commanded that the ſame care ſhould be taken of the wild, as of the tame Flocks; and that they were to deſtroy the hurtfull and devouring Beaſts, as they were to cut and root out noxious Weeds or Herbs out of their Corn, and Fields that were ſown. And ſince we obſerve the order which theſe Incas directed in their very Huntings, which they called Chacu; how can we doubt, but that theſe people maintained the like in matters of Government, and things of greater importance, and were not ſo brutiſh and ſalvage as the World hath figured them. It is farther to be noted, that the Bezar-ſtone brought from that Countrey, (in the goodneſs whereof there is great difference) was taken from ſome of thoſe wild cattel, which we have before mentioned.

According to the ſame form and method the Incas, who were Vice-Kings, practiſed and regulated their Huntings in their reſpective Provinces, at which they were for the moſt part perſonally preſent; not onely for pleaſure and recreation, but to inſpect and overſee the juſt and due diſtribution of the Veniſon taken in Hunting amongſt the common people; and ſee that thoſe alſo who were old, or ſick, or infirm, ſhould have their ſhare and juſt proportion.

Unleſs it were the Collas, the Commonalty in general were ſo poor in Cattel, that they ſeldom or never eat Fleſh, but what was diſpenſed to them by the Charity and Beneficence of their Curacas; unleſs ſometimes they killed a few tame Conies which they kept and fed in their Houſes, called by them Coy: So that the Inca, and the Curacas, took great care, that an equal diviſion ſhould be made amongſt the Commonalty of all the Veniſon which was taken in Hunting: the which Fleſh they cut out into large ſlices, (called Charqui) and then dried them in ſuch manner, that they were not ſubject to corrupt; and being abſtemious and frugal in their diet, their proviſion ſerved them for the whole year round, untill the next ſeaſon of Hunting returned again.

In dreſſing their Meat, they uſed all ſorts of Herbs, whether ſweet, or bitter, or ſower, or of any quality, but ſuch as were poiſonous or hurtfull: The bitter Herbs they did uſually boil in two or three ſeveral Waters, and then dried them in the Sun, and uſed them at thoſe ſeaſons when green were not to be procured. And ſo fond they were of green Herbs, that they would eat the Duck-weed which grows in Ponds; which after they had well waſhed and dried, they would eat in the ſeaſon; as alſo Herbs raw or crude, ſuch as Lettuce and Radiſhes, which were eſteemed ſubſtantial Diſhes, rather than Salads, or Sauces to provoke an appetite.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Poſts, and the Diſpatches which they carried.

THE Poſts, or Carriers, who were intruſted with the charge of carrying the King's Orders and Commands were called Chaſqui; and theſe alſo brought the News and Advices to the Court from the moſt remote Provinces: In ſettlement of which Poſts, they ordained and appointed four or ſix nimble Indian Boys to be laid at the end of every quarter of a League, and lodged under a Stall like that of our Centinels, to defend them from the Sun and Rain. Theſe had the charge of carrying the Meſſage from one Poſt to another, and to take their turns in running; and alſo of ſallying out to ſee or diſcover at a diſtance the coming of a Poſt, that ſo they might be ready to take his meſſage without loſs of time. And theſe Stalls, or Lodges, were raiſed ſomething high, and placed with that advantage, that they might be ſeen at a diſtance, and not farther than a quarter of a League one from the other; being ſo much as they ſaid, a Man may be able to run in full breath and ſtrength.

The word Chaſqui ſignifies changing, or giving, or taking, for they gave and received their Meſſages interchangeably one from the other. They were not called Cacha, for that ſignifies a Meſſenger, and, as they uſed it, an Ambaſſadour, whom they ſent to Sovereign Lords and Princes. The Advices which the Chaſqui carried were by word of mouth, for the Indians did not underſtand Letters: Wherefore the Meſſages were ordered, and diſpoſed in ſuch ſhort and conciſe words, as were eaſily apprehended and remembred. He that brought the Meſſage, before he came to the Lodge, cried loud, and called out as he ran to give warning of his coming, as our Poſts wind their Horn to give notice at the Stage of their near approach; and when he was come, he then delivered his Meſſage to the other Poſt-boy, repeating the words two or three times, untill he had rightly rightly underſtood them, and taken the words ſo perfectly, as to be guilty of no miſtake.

If there were any other Meſſages, they were committed to writing, and not to word of mouth: Writing, I mean, not ſuch as we deliver and expreſs in Letters, but in Knots made up in different threads of various colours, which ſerved for cyphers, which were well underſtood by the Inca and his Governours: For by theſe Knots and Colours of thread, they ſpecified what number of Souldiers, what Garments, what Proviſions, and what other neceſſaries were to be furniſhed, and put into a readineſs for the ſervice of the Army. Theſe knotted threads which the Indians called Quipu, were the Cyphers which they uſed in all their Advices, and the Figures in their Accounts: of which we ſhall treat more at large in the following Chapter. But as to theſe Chaſqui, or Poſt-boys, when at any time any extraordinary buſineſs was in action, they encreaſed them often to ten or twelve in number at every Stage. And to make theſe Poſts the more ready and quick; if at any time an extraordinary occaſion happened, they gave their Signal in the day-time to them by making a ſmoak, and in the night-time by the flame of a Beacon; which being diſcovered at a diſtance, it ſerved as a warning to every Stage to have their Poſts in a readineſs, and to watch night and day for the coming of this Meſſage. But theſe Beacons were never fired but on ſome great occaſion of Rebellion, or Inſurrection of a Province, that ſo the news of it might ſpeedily arrive at Court in the ſpace of two or three hours, though it happen five or ſix hundred Leagues from thence; the which ſerved to give an Allarum untill ſuch time as the particulars of the News arrived with greater certainty. And this was the Office and Uſe of the Chaſqui.

CHAP. VIII.

That they made their Reckonings and Accounts by Threads and Knots; and that the Accountants were Men of great faith and integrity.

Quipu ſignifies as much as Knots, and ſometimes Accounts; in ordering of which, the Indians Dyed their Threads with divers colours; ſome were of one colour onely, ſome of two, others of three, or more; which, with the mixed colours, were of divers and various ſignifications. Theſe ſtrings were twiſted of three or four Threads, and about three quarters of a Yard in length; all which they filed on another ſtring in faſhion of a Fringe. And by theſe colours they underſtood the number and meaning of every particular: By the yellow they ſignified Gold, by the white Silver, by the red Souldiers and Armies, and ſo of other things diſtinguiſhed by their colours.

But as for other things which could not be ſo diſtinguiſhed by Colours, they deſcribed them by their order and degrees of quality and goodneſs: For as we in Spain take every thing in their degrees of compariſon, ſo they having occaſion to mention Corn, do firſt nominate Wheat, then Barly, then Peaſe and Pulſe, &c. So when they gave an account of Arms; the firſt mentioned were the moſt Noble, ſuch as Lances, next Darts, then Bows and Arrows, Pole-axes and Hatchets, and ſo forward. So when they had occaſion to number the people and ſeveral Families: The firſt were Aged Men of ſeventy years and upwards, then Men of fifty, and ſo to ſeventy, then of forty; and ſo from ten to ten, untill they came to ſucking Children: The which Order alſo was kept in numbring their Women.

Then amongſt theſe groſſer ſtrings, there were others which were more ſhort, and ſlender adjoining to them; and theſe were Exceptions to the other more general neral Rules; for in the account made of Men and Women married, there was another ſtring annexed to it, which ſignified Widows, and Widowers of ſuch an age; all which accounts ſerved onely for one Year.

Theſe Knots expreſſed numbers in their ſeveral orders, as by units, tens, hundreds, thouſands, tens of thouſands, but ſeldom went ſo far as to hundreds of thouſands; but in caſe they ſhould have had occaſion to have ariſen to ſo great a number, no doubt but their Language, which is full and copious, would have found words ſufficient to expreſs that ſum, and the greateſt number to which Arithmetick could arrive. All which Accounts were made by Knots on ſtrings, one underneath the other, and knit on a cord, as the knots are on the Girdle of St. Francis.

At the top of the cord the greateſt number was placed, as the tens of thouſands, under that ſtood the thouſands, and laſt of all was the place of the units; all which were placed directly with exactneſs one under the other, as our good Accountants, well skilled in the Art of Cyphering, are uſed to ſet and place their figures. The Indians who kept the Quipus, or to whoſe charge the keeping of Accounts was committed, were called Quipumayu, and were eſteemed Men of good reputation, and choſen for that Service, on good aſſurance and proof of their fidelity and honeſty; and though the ſimplicity of thoſe people in that Age was without any mixture of malice, and that the ſtrictneſs of the government admitted no cheats, or frauds on any ſcore whatſoever; yet notwithſtanding great care was taken to chuſe Men for this work of approved Ability, and of a tried and experienced Faithfulneſs and Probity. For indeed Offices were never amongſt them choſen for favour, nor bought, or ſold, becauſe that Money was not current amongſt them; but it was Vertue and Merit onely which purchaſed a Truſt and Office: And though buying and ſelling was not known to them, yet it was ordinary for them to truck or barter their proviſions of Food one for the other; but nothing elſe either of Garments, Houſes, or Inheritance.

The Quipucamayus, or Accountants, being honeſt and faithfull, (as we have ſaid) ſerved in the nature of Regiſters, of which there were four at leaſt appointed for every Lineage, or People, how little ſoever it were; and in caſe the Countrey was great, they entertained twenty or thirty; for though one Accountant might have ſerved the turn, yet to avoid all miſtakes and frauds, they judged it requiſite to conſtitute many in an Office of ſuch importance.

CHAP. IX.

What it was that they ſet down and placed in their Accounts; and how they underſtood them.

ALL the Tribute that was yearly payable to the Inca, was paſſed to account, as alſo what every Family, according to their degrees, and qualities, were to pay. The people likewiſe which went to the War were numbred; and Bills of Mortality were kept of as many as dyed, and were born, or miſcarried by any accident; which were all noted in the months wherein they happened. In ſhort, they noted every thing that could fall under Numeration, as how many Battels or Skirmiſhes were fought, how many Ambaſſadours had been ſent to the Inca, and how many Anſwers the King had been pleaſed to return thereunto. But what the ſubſtance of thoſe Embaſſies was, or what were the particulars of the King's Diſcourſe, or what occurrences paſſed in way of Hiſtory, were too various to be expreſſed by the barrenneſs of their Knots, which ſerved onely for numbers, but not for words; wherefore to ſupply this defect they framed certain hiſtorical Hieroglyphicks, which ſerved for Monuments, in an obſcure manner, of what had had occurred in War and Peace; as alſo of Embaſſies from foreign Princes, and the ſeveral Negotiations with them; which Work was the Office of the Quipumayus, who made ſome ſhort and conciſe Memoir, leaving the reſt to the remembrance of the Age, who by tradition conſerved the ſame to ſucceeding Generations: And herein every Province was particularly attent, and carefull to conſerve the Hiſtory of its own Countrey; for on that, and on the Actions of their Anceſtours, they much eſteemed and valued themſelves. The Amautas, or Philoſophers, for a farther help to Hiſtory, did compoſe certain Novels, or Fables, mixed with true paſſages, which they made ſo familiar, and eaſie to the capacity of Children, and common People, that they attentively hearkened to them, and were ſo pleaſed with them, that recounting them one to the other in common Diſcourſe, and way of Converſation, they ſo inculcated them into the minds of the hearers, that the Tale becoming common, was transferred from one Generation to another. The Poets likewiſe, whom they call Haravicus, were great Conſervators of Hiſtory; for they in verſe, and in ſhort and compendious Sentences couched the Actions of their King, ſuch as the Embaſſies he received, the Anſwers he gave, the Battels he won, and the Triumphs he celebrated; and that wherein the Quipus, and the Amautas came ſhort, was all ſupplied by the fancy of Poets, whoſe Verſes ſerved for Sonnets, and Ballads, which they ſang at their Feſtivals, and on the days of Triumph. All which notwithſtanding were faint Repreſentations and imperfect Conſervatories of true Hiſtory, in compariſon of the Reports we deliver to faithfull Writings and Letters, which perpetuate the memory of Actions to all Ages. Howſoever we may here obſerve the ingenuity of that people, who aſſayed and offered at ſomething like our Letters, though it were by Knots, and Novels, and Hieroglyphicks, and Verſes; ſuch is the deſire of Mankind to perpetuate their Beings in the memory and minds of all Ages.

When any Curaca, or Noble Perſon, deſired to know, and be informed of things paſſed, and matters occurring in their Provinces, they preſently ſent to the Quipucamayus to be ſatisfied in their demands; and they, or their Under-Officers, who kept the Regiſters, making ſearch into their Knots and Cyphers, made ſuch Anſwers as appeared in their Regiſter.

By the ſame Rule, they anſwered the Enquiries made of Laws, and Rites, and Ceremonies, which were expreſſed by the colour of their Knots; and of what puniſhment was inflicted for ſuch and ſuch Crimes. By the ſame Rule alſo they were put in mind of the Sacrifices and Ceremonies which were to be performed at the ſeveral Feſtivals, celebrated in honour of the Sun; with what proviſion was made for Orphans, and Widows, and Poor, and Travellers, and of all other matters which were committed to the cuſtody of Tradition: For theſe ſeveral Knots ſerved to put them in mind of all particulars, which they deſired to have remembred; for as we by the number Ten remember the ten Commandments, and by other numbers call to mind the Sacraments, good Works, and Acts of Mercy, which we learn in our Catechiſm, ſo theſe Indians, by theſe Knots, and Strings, and Colours, remembred more perfectly what their Fathers had delivered to them by Tradition; which they regarded with reſpect and reverence due to the ſacred Conſervatories of that Law, and Idolatrous Religion, which they profeſſed; for without this help, having no Writings, they would certainly have been as ignorant of their own Hiſtory, as the Spaniards themſelves are, or any other Strangers, or Aliens. The knowledge which I had of their Quipus, and Knots, I gained by the means of ſome Indians, who ſerved my Father, and of certain Curacas, who came every Midſummer and Chriſtmas to the City, to pay their Tribute; and theſe Curacas deſired my Mother that ſhe would prevail with me faithfully to examine their Accounts, and read the Acquittances which the Spaniards had given them, for they were jealous of their actings, and repoſed much more confidence in me, than in them; which when I had peruſed, and read to them, they compared them with their Knots, and finding them to agree, they remained ſatisfied. And by this means I came to have ſome knowledge in their way of Accounts.

CHAP. X.

The Inca Pachacutec visits several parts of his Empire, and conquers the Nation of Huanca.

THE Inca Viracocha being dead, Pachacutec, his legitimate Son and Heir, succeeded in the Empire, and having solemnly performed the funeral Rites of his Father, he resided for three Years at his Court, attending to the due administration of his Government. Afterwards he took a progress into all parts of his Dominions, passing orderly from one Province to another; and though the presence of the Inca might seem of no moment, in regard the Lords, and Governours were so diligent, and faithfull to their trust, that the Inca, in all the way he travelled, received no complaints from the people of Aggrievances and Oppressions, laid illegally on them by their Rulers; for the frequent appearance of the Inca at certain times, did so overawe the Ministers, that they were fearfull to act any thing which was not permitted to them by Law or Equity. Moreover the appearance of the Inca personally before his Subjects, gave them the opportunity to prefer their Petitions, and offer their Complaints by way of immediate Address, which was much more beneficial to the Subjects, than to have their Aggrievances made known by a third hand, which by favour or friendship might disguise the laments, and make Injustices appear less than they were, to the prejudice of the Plaintiffs; and herein such care was taken, that never any people, who lived by the mere Light of Nature, and Law of Reason, did ever surpass the equitable proceedings of the Incas; which indifferency, and unbiassed judgment, gained them that love of their people, that even to this day, and to many future Ages, will their Memory be sweet and pretious. At the end of three Years this Inca returned again to his City, and left he should seem to spend all his time in Peace and Repose, he judged it convenient to attend at length unto military Exercises, and gain the Reputation of a Souldier by War, as well as of a civil and just Governour in the time of Peace; to this end he raised an Army of thirty thousand Men, with which together with his Brother Capac Yupanqui, a valiant Man, and worthy of that name, he marched through all the Division of Chinchasuyu, untill he came to Villca, which was the utmost extent on that side of their Conquests.

There he remained himself, whilst he sent his Brother with an Army well furnished with all provisions of War, into the Province called Sausa, which the Spaniards corruptly call Xauxa, which is a most pleasant Countrey, containing about thirty thousand inhabitants, all of the same Lineage and Name of Huanca. They boasted themselves to be descended from one Man, and one Woman, which they say had their Original from a Fountain; they were a sort of fierce and warlike people, fleaing those whom they took in the Wars, the Skins of which they filled with Ashes, and hanged them up in their Temples, for Trophies of their Victories; with the Skins of some they made Drums, being of opinion, that the sound of them would terrifie and affright their Enemies. These though they were a small people, yet had well strengthened and fortified themselves, for being all of one Nation, they united their Interests to encroach on the Lands and Territories of their Neighbours; and to make that good which they had acquired, they fortified themselves in such places of Defence, as were accustomary in those Countries.

In the times of their ancient Gentilism before they were reduced under the power of the Inca, they worshipped the Image of a Dog in their Temples, eating the Flesh of Dogs for the greatest rarity and delicacy in the World; so that it is believed their Appetite to Dogs-flesh was the original of their Devotion, which was so great to that Beast; that the most solemn Feasts and Entertainments were

ſerved with many Diſhes of Dogs-fleſh; and to demonſtrate their great reſpect to Dogs, they made a ſort of Trumpet with their Heads, which they ſounded for their moſt pleaſant Muſick, at times of their moſt ſolemn Feſtivals, and Dancings; and in their Wars they uſed the ſame to terrifie and affright their Enemies, for, ſaid they, our God cauſes theſe two different Effects by the ſame Inſtruments; in us it raiſes Joy and Delight, and in our Enemies Horrour and Conſternation: But all theſe Superſtitions and Errours were quitted, and rooted out by the better Inſtruction and Rudiments of the Inca; howſoever to indulge their humour ſo far as was warrantable, they permitted them in place of Dogs-heads to make their Trumpets with the Heads of Deer, or Stags, or any other Wild-beaſt, as they pleaſed, which afterwards they uſed at their Feſtivals and Balls, and times of rejoicing; and becauſe the Fleſh of Dogs was ſo extremely pleaſing and ſavoury to them, they gained the Sirname of Dog; that whenſoever Huanca was named, they added Sir-reverence the Dog. They had likewiſe another Idol, in figure and ſhape of a Man, which was an Oracle through which the Devil ſpake, and returned Anſwers to all Demands, which uttering nothing that was in contradiction or diſparagement to the Religion which the Incas profeſſed, was ſtill conſerved, and left undemoliſhed, though the Idol of the Dog was broken down and confounded.

This conſiderable Nation, and the moſt kindly affectionate to Dogs, the Inca Capac Yupanqui ſubdued by fair terms, and preſents, rather than by force; for this was always the Maſterpiece of the Incas, who made it their Profeſſion to take the Bodies of Men, by captivating firſt and alluring their Souls and Minds. All things paſſing in this manner ſmoothly with the Huancas, and every thing being ſettled in peace and quietneſs, the Inca divided their Nation into three Diviſions, the better to divide and ſuperſede the old Feuds and Diſputes amongſt them, ariſing about the Boundaries and Limits of their Land: The firſt Diviſion they called Sauſa, the ſecond Marca villca, and the third Llacſapallanca. The attire of their Heads was ordered not to be altered in the form and manner of it, but differenced onely for diſtinction ſake, by variety of colours. This Province, which anciently was called Huanca, was by the Spaniards, I know not for what reaſon, named Huanca villca, without conſidering that there is another Province, called Huanca villca, not far from Tumpiz, and three hundred Leagues diſtant one from the other: This latter is ſituate on the Sea-coaſt, and the former far within the Land; the which we here intimate to the Reader, that ſo he may know in the peruſal of this Hiſtory to diſtinguiſh one from the other, that when we ſhall come to relate many ſtrange occurrences in the Countrey of Huancavillca, he may not be confounded by miſtaking it for Huanca.

CHAP. XI.

Of other Provinces which the Inca ſubdued; of their Manners and Cuſtoms, and the ſeverity they uſed againſt thoſe who were guilty of Sodomy.

BY the ſame good policy the Inca Capac Yupanqui allured and invited ſeveral other Provinces to ſubmiſſion and Obedience, which extend themſelves on both hands of the common road; amongſt which the Provinces of principal note and conſideration were Tarma and Pumpu, which the Spaniards call Bombon, being very fertile Soils, and abounding with all ſorts of Fruit. Theſe being allured by fair Words, and Promiſes, gently ſubmitted to the affable and courteous treatment of Capac Yupanqui; howſoever theſe people being warlike, and fierce by Nature, did not entirely yield to the perſuaſions of their Enemies, but withſtood them in ſome Battels and Skirmiſhes, though the Defence they made was rendred more faint than was expected, by the Wheedles, and fine Words, and Gifts of the Inca.

The Inhabitants of theſe Provinces of Tarma and Pompu, and the borderers upon them, did in ſignal of Matrimony, ſeal the Agreement with a kiſs, the Bridegroom kiſſing the Bride on the Fore-head, or the Cheek. Widows could not marry within the Year, and ſhore the Hair of their Heads for a ſign of Mourning. The Men on their faſting days neither ate Fleſh, nor Pepper, nor Salt, nor accompanied with their Wives: Such as were Prieſts, or addicted themſelves much to religious Worſhip, faſted the whole Year in this kind of Abſtinence.

In this manner the Inca Capac Yupanqui reduced the Provinces of Tarma and Pompu, with many others, lying Eaſtward, near Antis; the Natives of which lived like Salvages, without Order, or Government, or Religion; and as Brutes, and Wild-beaſts, were diſperſed through the Woods and Mountains, killing one the other, as they caſually mnet, or encoutred, without knowing or aſſigning any cauſe or reaſon for their Slaughters; theſe Men lived in a ſtate of common War, becauſe they were ignorant of the uſefulneſs of Peace; and having no Lord or Ruler, had conſequently no Name, their Countrey being onely diſtinguiſhed by the Climate or Poſition of the Place under ſuch a degree, running thirty degrees North and South, and as many Eaſt and Weſt. Theſe were with great facility reduced to the Obedience of the Inca; for being a ſort of poor ſimple Animals, which were eaſily allured by the good was offered them, were willing to embrace the Religion and Manners which were taught them, and to ſuffer themſelves to be carried to any Place or Colony, where the Inca ſhould think fit to tranſport them. Of theſe People nothing offers farther, nor of any other Province worthy to be related, untill we come to the Countrey of Chucurpu, which was well peopled with a warlike Nation, barbarous and fierce in their Nature and manners; and as an evidence hereof, and in a conformity to this humour, they worſhipped a Tyger for their God.

The Fierceneſs and natural Bravery of this Nation made them to ſcorn all propoſals of Accommodation, and bid Defiance to their Enemies; ſo that Capac Yupanqui being put by his Art of gentle Iuſinuations, was forced to have recourſe to his Arms, and engaging in ſevetal Skirmiſhes, wherein above four thouſand Indians were ſlain, they at length yielded and ſubmitted themſelves to the invincible Proweſs and force of the Inca, which yet had not ſo great an influence over them, as had the gentle Temper and compaſſionate Bowels of the Inca; for they being ſenſible, that when it was in the hand of the Inca to have deſtroyed, and totally exterminated them, yet even then he uſed a tenderneſs towards them, offering them the conditions of an advantageous Peace; with a ſenſe of which being in part overcome, they aſſented to an Accommodation, receiving the Inca Pachacu- tec for their ſupreme Lord and Maſter, embracing his Laws and Cuſtoms, and forſaking their God the Tyger, they were ever after contented to adore the Sun, and live after the manner of his Followers and Worſhippers.

This fierce and reſolute people having received Conditions and Terms of Peace, and ſubmitted themſelves to the Obedience of the Inca, Capac Yupanqui, eſteemed his ſucceſs herein to be a great piece of his Art, and an Effect of his good Conduct, as well as of his Fortune; for had they perſiſted in that obſtinate reſolution of dying as one Man, the deſtruction and ſlaughter of this whole People, would have blaſted that good opinion which the World conceived of the Gentleneſs and Mercy of the Inca; and on the other ſide for the Inca, on conſideration of Compaſſion and good Nature, to have deſiſted from his Conqueſts, and left them free, would have argued Cowardiſe, or want of power to ſubdue them; ſo that uſing force, and fair terms, equally between theſe two extremes all matters were reconciled, and the Province of Chucurpu received into friendſhip: And ſo conſtituting Teachers to inſtruct them in Religion, and Governours to rule them according to Law; Garriſons and Souldiers were ſet over them, to conſtrain and continue them in their Obedience. Thence taking the right-hand from the great Road, with the ſame good Fortune and Conduct, he reduced two other Provinces, large and populous, the one was called Ancara, and the other Huayllas, in which, as in the others, he left Teachers, and Governours, and Souldiers, to keep them in Awe and Obedience. In the Province of Huayllas ſome accuſations were brought againſt certain Perſons, who ſecretly practiſed that abominable ſin of Sodomy; which wickedneſs having not been as yet known amongſt the Indians of the hilly Countries, though in the Plains it had ſome times been ſecretly practiſed, gave ſuch a general ſcandal to all that heard of it, that they deteſted the Society of the Huayllas, and in common Reproach and Deriſion of that Nation would commonly ſcoff at them, and ſay, Aſtaya Huayllas, which is as much, as faugh, be gone Huayllas, thou ſtinkeſt, and art loathſome; ſuch deteſtation had the Indians of this ſin, though it were acted in ſecret, and had already been ſeverely puniſhed by the Inca Capac Yupanqui; who having performed what we have related, and made ſufficient proviſion for ſecurity of his Conqueſts, which reached ſeventy Leagues in length North and South; and all the Plains in breadth to the foot of the ſnowy Mountain, he thought it convenient after three years, ſince the time he had departed from Cozco, to return again to the City, where his Brother Pachacutec received him with favour and kindneſs, commanding the People to rejoyce for the ſpace of a whole Moon, (for the Indians make the account of their Months by Moons) and to celebrate their feſtival with triumphal ſports for the victories obtained.

CHAP. XII.

Of their Edifices, and Laws, and new Conqueſts obtained by the Inca Pachacutec.

THE Holy-days or Feſtivals being over, the Officers of the Army, Curacas and common Souldiers, were rewarded according to their reſpective degrees and qualities, and merit of their valour; for the Actions of particular Perſons were taken notice of, and as every one ſignalized himſelf ſo was his Reward. Then did the Inca reſolve again after ſome few months to viſit his Dominions, which were always pleaſed and enlivened with the Bleſſing and Favour of his Preſence. In the more famous Provinces where he paſſed, he commanded rich and magnificent Temples to be erected, wherein the Indians might with the more awe and reverence adore the Sun; and likewiſe founded Houſes for the ſelect Virgins; for theſe two were always Neighbours, and where one was, the other was built by it. This great care which the Incas took to have their Subjects incited in their Devotion, was a farther endearment of them to their Kings; for it made them not onely religious, but gave them the privileges of Naturalization, and being Citizens of the City of Cozco. Beſides theſe Temples he built Fortreſſes and Caſtles on the Frontiers, and Royal Palaces in the Vallies, and in the places of beſt Air and moſt delightfull ſituation, and in thoſe parts which were in the common Road and way, at ſuch diſtances as were moſt convenient for the Incas to take up their Lodgings and Reſidence, when they travelled or marched with their Army: He alſo built Magazines, and Store-houſes in every Province, for the proviſion and maintenance of the People in years of Dearth and Famine.

He ordained many Laws and Statutes, indulging to every People and Nation their own ancient Cuſtoms, in ſuch things as did not contradict or interfere with the Religion eſtabliſhed, or oppoſe the rules of common honeſty; by which gentleneſs the people lived without Tyranny or Compulſion, not being ſenſible of any unpleaſant alteration, but ſuch as tended to their good and benefit, leading them from a beſtial to a rational and moral Life, which was the great deſign and intention of the Incas.

Having in this Viſit and Travails ſpent three Years, he returned again to Cozco; where having paſſed ſome Months in joy and feſtivals, he conſulted with his Brother, who was his chief Miniſter, and others of his Council, concerning the entire Conqueſt of the Provinces of Chinchaſuyu, for there were no other Countries on that ſide remaining to be ſubjected to their Dominion; for on the other quarter, towards Antiſuyu, bordering on the ſnowy Mountain, there was nothing diſcovered beſides Rocks, and Precipices, and inacceſſible places.

The Inca, Capac Yupanqui having ſo well acquitted himſelf with Prudence and Valour in his late Expedition, it was reſolved, that he ſhould again take upon himſelf the Command and Conduct of the Army; and that his Nephew, called Yupanqui, who was Prince, and Heir apparent, a Youth of about ſixteen Years old, ſhould accompany him in the War, it being the cuſtome for young Men of that Age, to take up their Arms, and make their firſt Campaign; according to the Ceremony practiſed in Huaracu; (as we ſhall hereafter more particularly Diſcourſe) that ſo they being initiated, and exerciſed in military Diſcipline, and Arts, might become experienced and valiant Captains in their more mature years. To this intent fifty thouſand Souldiers being levied, and put in a poſture of War, the Uncle and Nephew marched with the Van, which was one third of the Army towards the Province called Chucurpu, which was the ultimate extent of the Empire on that ſide.

Thence

Thence were the uſual Summons diſpatched to the Inhabitants of the Province called Pincu; who finding themſelves in no condition to reſiſt the power which marched againſt them; and being well informed of the happineſs of thoſe people, who became Vaſſals to the Inca; they readily accepted the Propoſitions of Peace, with this Complement, That they rejoiced to receive the Bleſſings of the Inca's protection, and to be numbred with thoſe Subjects who were under his Dominion and Empire. Thus the Incas entred that Province, from whence they ſent the like Summons to the Neighbouring Countries, of which Huaras, Piſcopampu, and Cunchucu were the chief. But theſe, inſtead of following the example of Pincu, unexpectedly took other counſels, and confederating one with the other, reſolved to join in the common defence; agreeing to ſend this Anſwer, That they would rather dye, than receive new Laws, new Cuſtoms, or a new Religion; for they were ſo well ſatisfied with thoſe Gods, which they and their Anceſtours had from all Ages ſerved and adored; that they had no need to change them for that ſpecious ſhew of Religion, by which the Inca had allured and deceived the Neighbouring Nations, and uſurped a Tyrannical Power and Dominion over them.

Having given this anſwer, and knowing themſelves unable to reſiſt the Inca in open Field, they retired to their ſtrong holds and faſt places, being reſolved to defend the narrow and difficult Paſſes; and to that end, with all diligence and care, they Victualled their Camp, making the beſt proviſions they were able againſt a long ſiege.

CHAP. XIII.

The Inca ſubdues the Rebellious Provinces by Famine, and Strategems of War.

THE General Capac Yupanqui received, without the leaſt ſurprize, this rude and obſtinate Anſwer from his ſalvage Enemies; for being a Perſon of great Prudence and Conſtancy, he had learned how to bear with the ſame equality, as well the good as unfortunate ſucceſſes, and not to be moved into paſſion by the wild and ſurly Anſwers of an untaught and immoral people. But not to deſpiſe the weakneſs of an Enemy, which was retired into their ſtrong Holds, he divided his Army into four Battalions, each of which conſiſted of ten thouſand Men, commanding them to march towards the Fortreſſes of the Enemy, but not to engage with them, but onely to beſiege and ſtraiten them in ſuch manner, that at length being almoſt famiſhed, they might be compelled to a voluntary ſurrender; and that he, with the Prince, would poſt himſelf in that advantageous ſtation, as to be ready on all occaſions, and emergencies, to adminiſter Succours where his aſſiſtence was required. And leſt the deſtruction which the Enemy had made of all proviſions, for ſuſtenance of an Army, ſhould occaſion great Famine, and ſcarcity of all things neceſſary, he commanded that the Neighbouring Provinces ſhould bring ſupplies, and adminiſter a quantity of all proviſions, double to that proportion which was ordinarily appointed.

In this manner Capac Yupanqui being well provided, a moſt cruel and deſperate War began with great Mortality on both ſides; for the Enemy defended themſelves and their ſtrong holds with much bravery and courage; and when they perceived the Incas cautious, and backward to attack them, they would then adventure to make their ſallies, every Party and Province of them endeavouring to outvye each other, and demonſtrate its Valour by ſome ſignal action.

The

The Incas all this while remained on the defenſive part, reſolving to ſtraiten the Enemy by Famine, and force them to a ſurrender by other inconveniencies of War; and when they found any of the Women, or Children, belonging to the Enemy wandring in the Fields and Countrey, which by reaſon of weakneſs, or ſickneſs, were not able to keep company with their friends and relations; the Incas took care of them, nouriſhed and careſſed them, fed them and cloathed them; giving them aſſurances, that their deſign was no other, than to better their condition by good and reaſonable Laws and Cuſtoms, and not to tyrannize over their Perſons or Liberties: And then afterwards they gave and permitted them free and ſafe paſſage into the quarters of the Enemy; and herein they acted with a kind of Military ſubtilty and policy, knowing that the numbers of uſeleſs people were cumberſome to an Army, and ſerved to increaſe their troubles and neceſſities; and that the cries of Wives and Children for bread and ſuſtenance would ſerve to affect the minds of the Husbands and Parents, and ſooner move them out of tenderneſs and compaſſion to them unto a ſurrender, than bow their fierce and ſtubborn ſpirits with fear, or dread of any miſery, or death which the Enemy could inflict.

This kindneſs towards the Women and Children was well taken by the Enemy, but yet did not ſo far affect them, as to ſoften their ſpirits, but rather ſeemed to enflame and harden them with greater obſtinacy and reſolution. Untill perſiſting in this manner for the ſpace of five or ſix Months, when Famine and Sickneſs began to rage amongſt them; they then caſting a compaſſionate eye on their Wives and Families, entertained thoſe thoughts for their ſakes of a ſurrender, to which otherwiſe neither fair promiſes could have allured them, nor Sword, nor Famine, nor Death it ſelf could have affrighted them. But now being mollified and worked into a more gentle temper, by common conſent of the Captains and Souldiers of the reſpective Forts, they diſpatched Ambaſſadours to the Incas, with inſtructions to ask pardon for the rebellion and offences committed, and to offer themſelves for the future to become Vaſſals, and obedient to the Empire of the Inca.

The Incas received this ſubmiſſion with their accuſtomed clemency and gentleneſs, treating them with the kindeſt words they were able to expreſs, exhorting them to return to their people and families; for that by being onely loyal and faithfull Subjects to the Inca, they would merit his favour, and cauſe him to forget their Rebellion, and paſs an Act of Oblivion for all that was paſt.

The Ambaſſadours highly ſatisfied with this Gratious Anſwer, returned to their people; who being over-joyed with this happy negotiation, received the good news with hearts now revived, having been lately dead, and benumbed with fear and deſpair: And in compliance with the Commands of the Incas, they immediately repaired to their homes and dwellings, where care was taken of them, and proviſions made for the firſt year wherewith to feed and ſuſtain them; and in regard, that during the time of War, there had neither been ſowing nor planting, ſo that all proviſions failed, there was occaſion to make uſe of that double proportion of Victuals, which Capac Yupanqui had providently appointed at the beginning of the War: Beſides which, ſuch Officers were ordained as were required for adminiſtration of Juſtice amongſt them, and to overſee the Revenue, and inſtruct them in matters of their Idolatrous Religion and Worſhip.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the good Curaca Huamachucu; and in what manner he was reduced.

THE Inca proceeding forward, after his Conqueſt arrived at the Confines of that Province, which was called Huamachucu, where lived a certain great Lord of the ſame Name, eſteemed for a Perſon of profound judgment and prudence; to him therefore he diſpatched his uſual Summons, offering terms of Peace and Friendſhip, provided that he would receive ſuch Laws, Cuſtoms and Religion, as ſhould advance and improve his Countrey to a more happy and bleſſed condition: For the Nation which he governed was a barbarous and cruel people, abominable in their manners and ſacrifices; Worſhipping Stocks and Stones, eſpecially ſuch as had brightneſs and luſtre with them: the Jaſpar was eſteemed a God, and all the pebles near banks of Rivers, which had any variety of colours, were eſteemed to have ſomething of Divinity in them, and therefore they carefully gathered them, laid them up in their Houſes, and Worſhipped them. Their Sacrifices were of Humane bloud, living in the Fields and Mountains, under ſheds, like brute beaſts, without rule or order. All this ſalvage manner of living, the good Huamachucu endeavoured to reform; but the fear he conceived of this wild people ſuppreſſed the deſires he had long entertained, untill he was encouraged by the meſſage ſent him from the Inca. And then being ready to put the conceptions he had formerly figured to himſelf of a Moral and Rational life into practice, did with a deep ſenſe of joy entertain the Meſſengers of the Inca, telling them how pleaſed he was, that the Dominion and Empire of their Maſter was extended to the Confines of his Province: For having heard ſuch an admirable report and deſcription of their Laws and Religion, he had long deſired the Government of the Inca, and to be enrolled in the number of his Vaſſals; but in regard he lived amidſt a barbarous people, and ſurrounded with Neighbours, who were Enemies to the Inca and his Empire, he durſt not adventure to ſhew his affection thereunto, or own the honour and obedience he ſecretly entertained towards the Perſon and Laws of the Inca: And that therefore ſince he had now means and opportunity to make his inclinations known, he beſeeched the Inca gratiouſly to receive theſe late demonſtrations of his duty, with the ſame favour and compaſſion as he had done to other Indians, who lived under the happy influence of his beneficence and direction.

The Prince Yupanqui, and the General his Uncle, being invited by theſe expreſſions of Huamachucu, marched into his Countrey; at the entrance into which, the Curaca met them, with ſuch Preſents as his Countrey afforded, offering them his People and Eſtate to ſerve them; and putting himſelf into an humble poſture before them, worſhipped them with ſuch devotion, as was due to the Children and Off-ſpring of the Sun. The General received him with his accuſtomary favour and clemency, returning him thanks for his affection and good-will; and the Prince beſtowed ſeveral Garments on him and his relations, and his companions with him, of ſuch ſort and fineneſs, as were worn by himſelf and his Father; aſſuring him of the great eſteem which the Inca had for his Perſon, in conſideration of the ſervice he had done him by that voluntary and free ſurrender; the which was made good by the Inca Pachacutec, who conceiving a particular kindneſs and affection for this Huamachucu and his Family, enobled them afterwards with Titles of Honour and Dignity.

The Ceremonies and Rejoicings at this Reception being paſt, the great Curaca Huamachucu deſired the General, that he would be pleaſed to modelize and reform with all expedition the corrupt and ſalvage manners of his State, and to beſtow upon them other Cuſtoms and Religion in place of thoſe beſtial and ridiculous practices which were obſerved amongſt them; for they being now his Vaſſals, he might exerciſe an abſolute and deſpotical Power over them, they being ready to hear and receive all the Commands and Rules which the Sun and his Children ſhould enjoin them. According to theſe deſires the Inca in the firſt place commanded that the people, who were diſperſed through the Countries under ſheds and trees, ſhould be gathered into a Political ſociety, and live like Citizens in friendſhip and amity together, in a Town regularly built with Streets, and ſituate in ſuch a Countrey as was both fruitfull and pleaſant. Then he commanded that Proclamation ſhould be made, that they ſhould own and worſhip no other God but the Sun, and that the pebles and ſhining ſtones which they kept in their houſes for divine Worſhip ſhould be thrown into the ſtreets; and for better government and inſtruction of this people, Governours and Teachers were appointed and ſet over them.

CHAP. XV.

The People of Caſſamarca make ſome reſiſtence, but are at length ſubdued.

ALL theſe things being performed and eſtabliſhed according to the deſire of Huamachucu, the Incas proceeded forward in their Conqueſts; and being arrived on the Confines of Caſſamarca, (which was a place famous for the impriſonment of Atahualpa) being a rich and fruitfull Province, and the people ſtout and warlike; they diſpatched their uſual Summons by a Herald, requiring them to yield themſelves on terms of peace and friendſhip.

The people of Caſſamarca having long obſerved the progreſs of the Incas, and the motion which their Arms had made towards them, had already provided for a War, having poſſeſſed the ſtrong Holds and Paſſes of the Countrey, and furniſhed them with Victuals, and Ammunition of War; and in confidence of ſuch ſecurity, returned a proud anſwer of defiance to the Incas, giving them to underſtand, that they would neither accept of new Gods, nor new Laws; nor a Stranger, or Foreigner, for their King; but would adhere to thoſe ancient Statutes and Religion, which were known to them and their Anceſtours; and rather than relinquiſh them, to embrace Novelties, they were reſolved to dye, and undergo all the miſeries which a cruel and enraged Conquerour could inflict. With this Anſwer Yupanqui being provoked, entred boldly into the Confines of Caſſamarca, where the Natives, like a brave and hardy people, manfully oppoſed themſelves againſt him in all dangerous and difficult paſſes, being reſolved to dye or overcome. The Inca, though unwilling to engage, out of a deſire he had to ſpare the effuſion of bloud, was yet forced ſometimes to fight, that he might gain poſſeſſion of the moſt difficult paſſes; in defence of which, the Enemy combating with all their might, many were ſlain on one ſide and the other; nor did they ſometimes refuſe Battel in the open Field; but in regard the Conduct and Numbers of the Inca was more excellent and great, than that of the Enemy, they were forced to retreat into the Mountains, and Rocks, and faſt places; from whence making oftentimes their Sallies, great ſlaughters did enſue. Thus was the War continued for the ſpace of four Months, becauſe the Incas were unwilling to take advantages entirely to deſtroy them, but rather to ſuffer, and weary them out, untill their fury and mettle began to abate: During all which time, the Incas uſed their accuſtomary lenitives, endeavouring to win them with all fair and mild treatment; for as many as they took in War, they releaſed; ſuch as were wounded, they healed and cured, and then ſent them away; aſſuring them, that ſo often as they took them, they would uſe them with the ſame compaſſion, being never wearied with with doing good; for that was the profeſſion of the Incas, and was their method to overcome by Mildneſs and Beneficence, rather than by Tyranny and Oppreſſion; the Women and Children which they found in the Mountains and Caves, after they had fed them, and treated them with reſpect, and gentle terms, they ſent away, that ſo they might relate the courteſies they had received, and perſuade their Fathers and Husbands not to perſiſt longer in their Oppoſition and Rebellion againſt the invincible Family of the Sun.

Theſe and ſuch like Inſtances of kindneſs being frequently repeated during the whole courſe of the War, began to operate on the rude and fierce diſpoſition of this People, whoſe hard and obdurate temper being a little ſoftened, it was obvious and plain to them, that it could be no unhappy condition to fall into the hands of ſuch, who being incited by a thouſand provocations to deſtroy them, did not onely ſeek ways to preſerve and keep them from utter ruine, but how alſo to beſtow benefits, and even alſo againſt their own Will to ſhew them mercy. They conſidered alſo that the power of the Inca did daily increaſe, as theirs did diminiſh, and that Famine and the Sword were evils inevitable. Wherefore conſulting with their Curacas upon theſe difficulties, they concluded and agreed to receive the conditions offered them by the Inca, rather than periſh out of an obſtinate and perverſe humour. Upon this reſolution they diſpatched their Ambaſſadours to the Inca, confeſſing the Faults and Errours they were guilty of, in ſo long oppoſing and trying the Patience of the Incas, whoſe Generoſity could not be parallelled by any of humane Race; and therefore confeſſing them to be of the lucid family of the Sun, they with all humility begged to be received into the number of their Vaſſals; and that both the Prince, and the General his Uncle, would be pleaſed to intercede with the Majeſty of the Imperial Inca in their behalf, that ſo he would condeſcend and vouchſafe to own and receive them for his Subjects.

Scarce were theſe Ambaſſadours come into the preſence of the Inca, before the Curaca Caſſamarca, and his Nobles reſolved to go themſelves, and perſonally demand Pardon for their Offences; and accordingly appearing before the General, they proſtrated themſelves after the moſt humble faſhion of their Countrey, repeating in ſubſtance the ſame words which their Ambaſſadours had uttered. The Inca Capac Yupanqui gratiouſly accepted this Addreſs, encouraging them with great aſſurances of the Inca's Pardon and Favour; and that he would be as kind and tender of them, as he was of his other Subjects; and for the oppoſition they had already made, and the acts of Hoſtility committed during the time of War, they ſhould never more be called to remembrance, provided that they continued obedient, and by their Services and Duty performed and endeavoured to deſerve thoſe benefits which the Sun had encharged unto his Children to communicate unto ſuch who willingly and without compulſion yielded themſelves and their people faithfull and loyal Subjects to the Inca, which being ſaid, the Curaca and his followers bowed themſelves, and worſhipped, ſaying, that their Generoſity and Heroick Actions deſervedly entitled them to an univerſal Dominion over all others, and gave a clear evidence of their undoubted Deſcent from the Sun, and Extraction from ſomething elſe than humane Race. After which they were diſmiſſed, and returned to their own Habitations.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Conqueſt of Yauyu; and of the Triumph celebrated in honour of the Uncle and Nephew.

THE General was much pleaſed with this Conqueſt, and conſidering the fruitfulneſs of the Soil, and pleaſant ſituation, he eſteemed it the beſt Flower he could add to his Brother's Crown, and therefore moſt worthy to be improved; to which end, he directed that the ſcattered Cottages, ſhould be reduced into a Town, in which the people might live in a more comfortable and political Society. That a Temple ſhould be erected to the Sun, and a Houſe for the ſelect Virgins, the which were afterwards ſo well endowed, and adorned by the Magnificence of ſucceeding Princes, that they became the moſt renowned and famous Edifices of all Peru. Moreover Teachers were appointed to inſtruct them in the Rules of their Idolatrous Worſhip, and Governours, and Magiſtrates ſet over them to precide in civil matters; Officers were alſo ordained to gather the fruits belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca; beſides Engineers, and Workmen for making Aqueducts, and draining Lands; and laſtly, Guards were quartered in their Countrey, to ſecure the Peace, and conſerve them in Obedience.

All which being performed and eſtabliſhed; they reſolved to return to Cozco; but by the way to ſpend a little time in reducing a corner of Land, which they had left behind, for which being out of the way, they had not touched at it in their march outward. This Province was called Yauyu, the Countrey was mountainous, and rocky, and the people warlike; howſoever it being concluded that twelve thouſand Men were ſufficient for this Atchievement, the reſt of the Army was diſmiſſed, that they might not be haraſſed and wearied with unneceſſary Marches. Being arrived on the Confines of this Province, the uſual ſummons were diſpatched, offering them terms either of War or Peace.

The Yauytines entred into conſultation upon the matter of theſe ſummons, and in debate thereupon divers opinions aroſe; ſome were ſtout and obſtinate, and were ready to dye in defence of their Gods, and their ancient Cuſtomes; but others, of more cool and prudent temper, refuted the raſhneſs, and folly of ſuch reſolution, conſidering that they were already ſurrounded by a puiſſant Enemy, whom other greater Provinces than theirs were not able to reſiſt, nor their Gods to defend them. That the Clemency and Wiſedom of the Incas was amiable, and ſuch as ought to move them to deſire, and embrace rather than decline their Government: With which conſideration they unanimouſly concluded on a ſurrender, the contrary courſe threatning nothing but entire ruine and deſolation; ſo that this more moderate counſel prevailing, they unanimouſly received the Incas with ſolemn Feſtivals and Rejoicings; and the Incas in return veſted their Curacas, and Nobles, with Garments of the fineſt ſort, called Compi, and the Commonalty with Avaſca, which was of a courſer thread, all concluding to the general ſatisfaction of that people, who were overjoyed and proud to become the Subjects of ſo gratious, and powerfull a King. Officers and Governours being here appointed and eſtabliſhed, according to the uſual Stile and Cuſtome; the Incas returned to Cozco, whence the Inca Pachacutec went out to meet his Son and Brother, and conduct them to the City; commanding that they ſhould be carried in triumphal Chairs on the Shoulders of ſome People belonging to the late conquered Provinces, and received with all the joy, and feſtivity, which was due to the ſolemnity of that day.

The ſeveral Nations which lived in the City, and the Curacas which preſided over them, did every one in their ſeveral orders, with different inſtruments of Drums, and Trumpets, and Cornets, preſent themſelves after the faſhion of their Countrey, Countrey, chanting out the Songs which they had compoſed in honour and praiſe of the mighty and excellent Actions performed by the General Capac Yupanqui, and his Nephew the Prince, by whoſe happy beginnings his Father conceived entire ſatisfaction and hopes, that he would one day anſwer the deſires and expectations of his Subjects. After the Citizens the Souldiers followed in their ranks and orders, according to their Companies and Diviſions; ſinging alſo the Songs which they had compoſed in praiſe of the Heroick Actions of their Incas, making their Valour, and Conduct, and Excellencies, the ſubject of their Sonnets, adjoining thereunto Panegyricks in commendation of their Piety, Charity, Liberality and Magnificence towards their Captains and Souldiers, filling up the burthen of their Songs with the Names of the Uncle and Nephew, adding Titles unto them, and Dignities which their Vertues and brave Actions had acquired. After the Souldiers followed the Incas of the Bloud, all armed with the ſame ſort of Weapons, as well thoſe who had remained at home, as thoſe who had been at the War; all being equally to ſhare in the Booty and Honour; the Merits of thoſe who had preſided over the Civil Government at home, being no leſs eſteemed than the hazards and labours of thoſe who adventured abroad.

Amidſt the Incas was the General and his Nephew ſurrounded, and after them came the Inca Pachacutec, mounted on his Chair of Gold, in which order they proceeded to the ſacred Limits and Verge of the Temple, where the Incas alighting, took off their Shoes, and all, excepting the Inca, who was Emperour, walked barefoot to the Gate of the Temple; at which place alſo the Inca himſelf with bare feet, attended onely by Incas, entred in and worſhipped; and having given thanks for the Victories obtained, they all returned to the publick Marketplace, where they celebrated the Feſtival, with Songs and Dances, with Eating and Drinking, which was their beſt entertainment on thoſe days of merriment. In their Dancings they obſerved this order to avoid confuſion. That every Nation according to their Seniority and Place took their turns in Dancing after the mode and faſhion of their Countrey, whilſt their Servants beat the Drums, and other Inſtruments, joining in the Chorus at the end of every period. Thoſe who had performed their Dances drank one to another, and then aroſe and danced again, in ſuch manner, as this paſtime interchangeably continued for the whole day. And in this manner was the Ceremony and ſolemnity of their Triumphs obſerved, for the ſpace of a whole month; which we have here deſcribed more particularly on occaſion of the Victories which Capac Yupanqui had obtained; being then ſolemnized with the moſt order and magnificence.

CHAP. XVII.

Two Vallies are ſubdued: with the proud and inſolent Anſwer of Chinca.

After the Feſtivals were finiſhed, the Incas paſſed three years in peace and repoſe; dedicating their time to the adminiſtration of Juſtice and adornment of the Empire, improving the Provinces with Fountains and Aqueducts, and ſtately Edifices. After ſuch time that the Souldiers had taken their repoſe, another War was agreed and concluded to be carried on towards the Plains, or Low-Countries, not having on that ſide extended the borders of the Empire, farther than to Nanaſca; for this deſign thirty thouſand Men were deſigned to be raiſed, and immediately to be diſpeeded for this Conqueſt; and in regard theſe Vallies were very unhealthfull, and ſickly for the camp; it was reſolved at a Council of War, that another Army of thirty thouſand Men ſhould be raiſed, which every two months was to relieve the other, and ſo interchangeably take their turns and hazards in that unwholſome Air, which to the Natives themſelves was almoſt peſtilential.

The Armies being raiſed, the Inca Pachacutec commanded, that thirty thouſand Men ſhould quarter in the neighbouring parts, ſo as to be ready for the Invaſion, and relief of the Guards at the times appointed; and with the firſt Army he, with his Son the Prince, and Brother Yupanqui proceeded by ſhort marches to the Provinces called Rucana, and Hatum-rucana, reſolving there to fix his Court, as the moſt convenient place near the confines, whence at all times he might be in a readineſs to give the Succours which the War required, and apply thoſe arts which were agreeable to Peace. In the mean time the Incas, who were his Son and Brother, proceeded towards Nanaſca, and being arrived there, they diſpatched their uſual Summons to the People, who live in the Valley of Yca, lying northward from Nanaſca. The Natives deſired time to communicate, and conſider together concerning the Propoſals offered them, who after they had held a conſultation which admitted of ſome debate; they reſolved to receive the Inca for their Lord and Maſter, being thereunto the rather moved from the report they had heard of the gentle Government of the Incas, and which they had already, by reaſon of the Neighbourhood with Nanaſca, in part known and tried. By this Example the Natives likewiſe of the Valley of Piſco ſubmitted, though their ill Neighbours of the Valley of Chicha endeavoured to corrupt and alienate their Minds from Obedience to the Inca, by promiſes to enter into a League and mutual Confederacy with them; but they being ſenſible that their united ſtrength was not able to defend them from the prevailing power of the Inca, reſolved to take the ſecure, and ſaving courſe of Submiſſion, and accept the Laws, Cuſtoms, and Religion of the Incas, promiſing to adore the Sun, and eſteem all other Gods vain and Idolatrous, but ſuch onely as the Incas ſhould impoſe upon them.

This Vale of Yca, is a fertile and fruitfull ſoil, as are all thoſe other low Lands and Vallies, and therefore eſteemed worthy to be improved by the Power and Induſtry of their Kings, in order whereunto they erected a fair Aqueduct, whereby the waters were conveyed from the higheſt part of the Mountains by a plentifull ſtream; the which naturally running from the Eaſt, they with art turned to the Weſt, by bringing the Current to fall into a Chanel which received the Rains in the Winter, which being dried up in the Summer, all thoſe Plains became burnt, and ſcorched up for want of moiſture, which was afterwards ſupplied by the great convenience and benefit of theſe new Waters; ſo that their Tillage and Lands were improved thereby, that ever after the People lived with great eaſe and abundance; which when the conquered Indians, and thoſe not as yet ſubdued, had ſeen and proved, they became Admirers of the Incan-Empire, and deſirous to be numbred with the Subjects to it, that ſo they might lay claim to a ſhare of

thoſe bleſſings, which the vigilance and ingenuity of the Inca beſtowed on his Vaſſals.

It is here to be noted, that the Indians, who inhabited along the Coaſt for the ſpace of almoſt 500 Leagues, extending from Trugillo to Tarapaca, which is the utmoſt border North and South of Peru, generally adored and worſhipped the Sea for God, (unleſs it were ſome petty Idol, or diminutive God, which was peculiar to the Province) by reaſon that the Sea fed and ſuſtained them with Fiſh for their nouriſhment, and threw up vaſt quantities of Pilchards, with the Heads of which they dunged their Lands, (as we have ſaid before) by reaſon of which benefits they gave it the Name of Mamacocha, or Mother-ſea. They likewiſe adored the Whale for its vaſt bulk and bigneſs; and ſome Provinces adored this, and others that ſort of Fiſh, as they were moſt plentifull, and yielded moſt benefit to the Natives. This was, in ſhort, the Idolatrous Religion of the Yuncas before the times of the Incas, or that they came to have Rule and Dominion over them.

The Vallies of Yca and Piſco being thus reduced, the Incas diſpatched their Summons to the great and powerfull Valley of Chincha, (ſo called from Chinchaſuyu, which is one of the four quarters into which the Incas divided their Empire) requiring them either to pay their Obedience to the Inca Pachacutec, who was a Child of the Sun, or otherwiſe to prepare themſelves for War, and defend their Cauſe and Countrey with their Arms: But the people of Chincha confiding in their Numbers, and puffed up with an opinion of their bravery, and skill in War, returned an anſwer of Defiance; that they would neither receive the Sun for their God, nor the Inca for their King; that the Sea was the Deity, which they had moſt reaſon to Adore, in regard it ſupplied them with Fiſh for their nouriſhment, and was in other particulars and inſtances the moſt uſefull and beneficial; whenas the Sun on the other ſide ſcorched their Countrey, and parched and tormented their Bodies; ſo that they wiſhed rather to live remote from him, than to be troubled with the inconveniences of his Neighbourhood; that perhaps he might be a more proper God for thoſe who inhabit the cold Climates under the frozen Zones; but as to themſelves, his Rays and Preſence were offenſive. That as to the King, they had a Natural Prince of their own, whom they loved, and would not part with for all the race and lineage of the Sun; and for their Arms, they were always ready to be employed againſt thoſe who provoked their Paſſion, or infringed their Liberty, or invaded their Countrey or deſpiſed their Gods; the chief and principal of which was called Chincha Camac, who was the Maker and Conſervator of Chinca, a God ſo powerfull, that the Incas would doe well to conſider how they provoked or injured the King of Chincha, who was ſupported by the Providence of that powerfull God. The Natives of this Countrey do likewiſe much avail themſelves on a Tradition, that their Forefathers came from a far Countrey, (though they do not ſay whence) under the Conduct of a valiant and religious General, by force of whoſe Arms they conquered that Countrey, by deſtroying all the people, which were the natural Inhabitants of it not ſuffering one of them to ſurvive, becauſe they were a vile and brutiſh Race; beſides many other brave Actions, which they recount of their Fore-fathers.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Obſtinacy which the People of Chincha ſhewed; and how they were at length reduced.

THE Incas, heated with the diſdain of this Anſwer, proceeded towards Chincha, and the Curaca, or Lord, called by the ſame Name, with a conſiderable band of Men as readily marched to encounter them, and skirmiſhed with them in the Valley; but the Sand and Duſt was ſo great, that the Armies could not remain long engaged; wherefore the Yuncas retreated to take poſſeſſion of a Paſs, at the entrance to which, though they oppoſed the Incas, yet ſo faint was the reſiſtence which they made, that they gave ground and admiſſion to the Enemy to lodge, and take up their quarters within the place which they endeavoured to defend: All which was performed with ſignal courage, and with bloud and wounds on both ſides; the Yuncas labouring to defend their Countrey, and the Incas to enlarge and advance their Dominion.

During theſe many days of Skirmiſhes and Defiance, the Incas did not omit their invitations and perſuaſions to prefer terms of Peace, before the cruelties and extremities of War; but all to little purpoſe, for the Yuncas continuing obſtinate in their reſolutions, and being of opinion that the heat of the Sun would at length conſtrain the Enemy, accuſtomed to a more moderate climate, to relinquiſh their deſign; refuſed all propoſitions of Peace, rather ſhewing themſelves every day more averſe and rebellious on confidence of theſe hopes and expectations: Notwithſtanding which, the Incas ſtill maintaining the ancient principles, and conſtant practice of gentleneſs and moderation, did not take the advantage they might have done on many occaſions, to the deſtruction of their Enemies; but rather endeavoured to weary them out, and by long patience work them into a more pliable temper; for continuation of which, at the end of two Months, the Army which was appointed to relieve the other, was commanded with all diligence to march, and take the place of thoſe who had preceded them, before the heat of the Countrey had produced Calentures amongſt them, or any other diſeaſes incident to the bodies of Men unaccuſtomed to exceſs of heat.

The Officers haſtning the March of the Army, with all expedition poſſible they arrived in a few days at Chincha, where the General Yupanqui ſtayed to receive them, and diſmiſs the former Army, which he ordered to be lodged and quartered in ſuch Neighbouring places, as to be near and ready to relieve the Guards another time, if the obſtinacy of the Enemy ſhould protract and delay the accompliſhment of their ſubjection. The Prince departed with the Army which was relieved, for better ſecurity and conſervation of his health.

The War being renewed by exchange of Forces, the General beſieged and ſtraitned them, as cloſe as he was able, deſtroying their Harveſt and Fruits, and hindering all Proviſions from coming to their Camp: He alſo cut off their Chanels of Water, ſo that they could not refreſh their Fruits and Plantations; every thing being burnt, and ſcorched up, but what they had already reaped, and gathered in; and this was the greateſt miſery that afflicted the Yuncas, whoſe Countrey being exceeding hot, was not capable to produce any Fruit but what was watered every three or four Days.

The Yuncas grew now more ſenſible of their loſt condition, for finding their ſtreams of Water to be cut off, and themſelves ſtraitned in the narrowneſs of their quarters; and being diſappointed of the hope and expectation they once conceived, that the Heat of the Countrey, and the ill Air, would conſtrain the Incas to quit and abandon it; and, on the contrary, perceiving the policy of their Government, that by relieving and exchanging their Guards, they were enabled to continue the War, they began to abate ſomething of their pride and confidence; but were not as yet ſo humbled, as readily to ſubmit without trying the utmoſt extreextremity: For in this posture of War they persisted for the space of two Months longer, refusing all proposals of Peace, though tendred to them every eight Days by the Incas; and opposing them with Arms in their hands, in despight of Famine, and Sword, and all the inconveniences of War; imploring in the mean time with earnest devotion, and vows, the assistence of their God Chincha Camac; to whom the Women especially directed their prayers, and with tears and sacrifices begged his protection and deliverance of them.

It is observable that the Indians of this famous Valley of Chincha adored an Idol, which they called Chincha Camac, fashioned after the form of Pachacamac, or the unknown God, whom (as we have said before) the Incas spiritually, or mentally, adored: for they taking notice, that the Inhabitants of the Neighbouring Valley had erected an Idol, named Pachacamac, which signifies the Sustainer of the Universe, and dedicated a Temple to it; did after their example mould another Idol after similitude of the former, giving it the Name of Chinchacamac, or the Sustainer, or Protector of Chincha; for the other denomination being Universal, seemed in their fancy, of such a vast extent, that the God, who had so great an employment, as the care and conservation of the Universe, could not be at leisure to defend them, or think so narrow a corner, as Chincha, worthy his trouble or concernment; wherefore that they might gain a more peculiar Deity, and such as they might appropriate to themselves, they figured a Chincha camac, or a Domestick God, by whose favour and power they promised to themselves succour and deliverance from their Enemies.

The Incas all this while patiently endured the teadiousness of this War, and the obstinacy of their Enemies, who could not as yet provoke them to destroy them utterly, though policy of War and necessity compelled them to straiten, and distress them as far as they were able. At length Capac Yupanqui having observed the obstinate resolution of the Enemy, and that he lost both time and reputation by a teadious attendance on their pertinacious humour; and considering that this gentleness and mercy towards the Enemy, might be converted into a cruelty towards his own Subjects, in case that long delays, and protraction of time, should produce a sickness in the Camp, as was much to be feared from the violent Heats, and unwholsome Air: Wherefore to avoid, and prevent this danger, he dispatched a Messenger to them; acquainting them in express terms, that having already complied with the compassionate and tender Instructions of his Brother the Inca, by his long forbearance of them; he sent now to let them know, that he gave them eight days to yield, and surrender themselves; in which space of time, in case they submitted, they should then be pardoned, and received to mercy; and if they refused, that they should no longer expect compassion, or quarter, for that he was resolved to put them all to the Sword, and people their Countrey again with a new Colony and Nation more wise and obedient to the Inca: which message being delivered, he ordered the Heralds to return without attending for an answer.

The Yuncas being terrified with this positive message, apprehended that the just rage of the Incas might reasonably transport them to an execution thereof; for that the Incas having received such bad returns for all the pity and gentleness they had shewn towards them, no other forbearance could be now expected; and consulting their present state of famine, and want, and other incommodities of War, they took a resolution to send their Ambassadours to the Inca to implore his pardon, and that he would vouchsafe to receive them for his Subjects, promising to exchange the rebellion and obstinacy they had used, into a faithfull and loyal Obedience to the Inca; the day following the Curaca, accompanied with his Kindred and Nobles, went to kiss the hands of the Inca, and personally make tender of their Duty and Obedience.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Ancient Conqueſts, and vain Rodomontadoes, of the Chinchas.

THE Inca much ſatisfied with this ſubmiſſion, congratulated with the Curaca Chincha the happineſs of the enſuing Peace, whereby an end was put to the miſeries of a bloudy War, which was deſtructive to his people: And ſpeaking kindly to this great Commander of the Yuncas, aſſured him of pardon from his Brother the Emperour; and becauſe he perceived him to be much dejected and afflicted for his fault, he encouraged him with many kind and obliging expreſſions, telling him, that the King his Brother was a gratious and merciſull Prince, who never recalled to memory the enmity ſhewn him at firſt, provided that having once ſubmitted, and acknowledged him for their Lord, they did never afterwards return to their rebellion: And as an evidence of favour and acceptance, he commanded, that Veſtments ſhould be given them of the fineſt ſort; and ſo all concluded in a mutual ſatisfaction.

Theſe Indians of Chincha boaſt much of this reſiſtence they had made againſt the Incas, pretending that they repelled them twice, becauſe they reckoned the exchange of the firſt Army with the ſecond to be a kind of retreat. They report alſo, that the Incas were many years before they could conquer them, and that at length they ſubmitted upon conditions and promiſes; and that they were won rather by gifts and preſents, than ſubdued by force of Arms. Thus was the mild uſage and treatment which the Incas ſhewed to them, interpreted for a ſign of their own Valour and Courage; whenas, in reality, the power of the Incas was ſo great in thoſe days, that they could with facility have ſubdued them, had they in earneſt applied their Strength, and Military Art, in that Conqueſt: but Men have liberty to talk of the Mighty Actions of former times, and of their Anceſtours, without offence to any in the preſent Age.

They report farther of themſelves, that before they were Subjects to the Inca, they were of that power, and Martial diſpoſition, that they made frequent Incurſions into the Neighbouring Countries, from whence they carried Spoils and Trophies of Victory; that they were ſo dreadfull to thoſe who inhabited the Mountains, that thoſe people, for fear of them, deſerted their Countrey, and that they often came as far as the Province of Colla. All which appears to be falſe, becauſe theſe Yuncas are naturally a ſluggiſh and dull Nation, and not given to labour, or travel, and therefore it is not probable, that they would undertake a March of almoſt 200 Leagues, through greater Provinces, and more populous than their own. And that which makes this report ſtill more improbable is, That the Yuncas, being (as we have ſaid) born in a very hot Countrey, where it never Rains, and where conſequently the noiſe of Thunder is never heard; are ſo affrighted with the ſound, and claps of it, ſo often as they enter into the Hilly-Countries, that with conſternation and terrour they return into their own Climate; and therefore it is not credible they ſhould adventure into Mountains where the voice of Thunder is often heard, and which their ignorance made ſo horrible and affrighting to them.

Whilſt Yupanqui employed himſelf in Eſtabliſhing the Government of Chincha, and putting all things into the beſt order and poſture he was able; he gave intelligence to his Brother of the ſucceſs of his proceedings, deſiring him to relieve the Army, which remained then on Duty; by exchange for another, that ſo he might proceed in the entire conqueſt of the Yuncas. And whilſt he was thus ſetling the Government in Chincha, and impoſing new Laws and Cuſtoms on them; Informations were brought him againſt certain perſons guilty of Sodomy, to which ſin that Countrey was much addicted: All which he took, and condemned, and burned alive; commanding their Houſes to be thrown down, their Inheritances to be deſtroyed, their their Trees rooted up, that ſo no ſteps or marks might appear of any thing which had been built, or planted by the hands of Sodomites, and that their memory, as well as their actions, might be aboliſhed; with them they deſtroyed both their Wives and Children, which ſeverity, though it may ſeem unjuſt, was yet an evidence of that abhorrence which the Incas conceived againſt this unnatural Crime.

Some time after this Conqueſt the Incan-Kings honoured, and enobled this valley of Chincha, with a famous Temple dedicated to the Sun, with a Houſe alſo for the Select Virgins; it contained about thirty thouſand ſouls, being one of the moſt pleaſant and delightfull Vallies of Peru. The Actions and Exploits of the Inca Pachacutec were many and various, though his Conqueſts for the moſt part were performed in the ſame manner; wherefore to divert the Reader with ſome varieties, we ſhall now intermix our Diſcourſe with two principal Feſtivals which the Incas celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnities, and then we ſhall return again to the Life and Atchievements of this King.

CHAP. XX.

Of the principal Feſtival of the Sun; and in what manner they prepared themſelves for the Celebration of it.

THE principal Feſtival was called Raymi, which ſounds, or at leaſts ſignifies as much with them as Paſcha, (which with us in Engliſh is Eaſter) amongſt the four Feſtivals, celebrated by the Incas in the City of Cozco, which was the Metropolis of their Religion, (as Rome is to us) none was obſerved with that ſolemnity, as this which they called Yntip Raymi, held in the month of June, in honour of the Sun, ſoon after the Summer Solſtice; and if they attributed this name of Raymi to any other Feaſt, it was in reference, or as it depended on this chief Feſtival.

This Solemnity was performed to the Sun, under Notion of the Supreme, Sole and Univerſal God, by virtue of whoſe Heat and Light all living Creatures were generated and ſuſtained. At which alſo they commemorated their firſt Father Inca Manco Capac, and Coya Mama Occlo, his Wife and Siſter, owning and acknowledging them to be deſcended from the Sun, and ſent by him into the World for the common benefit of Mankind. For which important Reaſons this Feſtival being eſteemed the moſt ſolemn, all the principal Captains and Commanders of the Army, and Curacas or Lords of Provinces, aſſembled themſelves at Cozco to celebrate this Feaſt; not that it was of Precept or Injunction, but out of mere Devotion to the Sun, and reſpect to the Inca. In caſe any Curaca or Officer were hindred by Age, or Infirmity, or by any diſtant Employment in ſervice of the Inca, he then ſent his Son, or his Brother, or ſome other Relation, to aſſiſt at this Function in his Name and Place; nor did the Inca eſteem himſelf excuſed from this perſonal attendance, unleſs the War, or remote Viſits of his Kingdoms obliged him to be abſent.

At the firſt Ceremonies the King, as High-Prieſt, did always adminiſter; for though there was another High-Prieſt, of the ſame legitimate Bloud, being a Brother or Uncle of the Inca, to whom it properly belonged at other times to officiate; yet this being the chief of all the Feſtivals, was ever graced and honoured by the adminiſtration of the Inca, who was the firſt and eldeſt Child of the Sun.

The Curacas were habited and dreſſed at this time in the fineſt Cloths and gayeties that they could bring; ſome wore Garments plated with Gold and Silver, adorning themſelves with Garlands, or Crowns of Gold, platted over their Wreaths; ſome of them appeared in Lions Skins, having their Heads and Bodies covered with them, and theſe were ſuch, who boaſted themſelves to be deſcended from that generous Creature.

Such as had a great esteem and veneration for that Fowl which they call Cuntur, so as to fansie the Original of their first Parents to be descended from it, appeared in fashion of Angels, with the Wings of that Bird, which they say are so large, that some of them being killed by the Spaniards, have measured fourteen or fifteen Foot from the point of one pinion to the other.

Others appeared in antick Shapes, with horrid Vizards, and these were Yuncas, who, to make themselves the more ridiculous, entred with Grimaces, making mouths, and turning themselves into a thousand fantastical gestures, like Fools, or Madmen; carrying instruments in their hands, agreeable to their postures, such as Flutes, and ill-tuned Cymbols, without Musick or Harmony, which served to make up their wild Masquerade.

The Curacas, according to their qualities, carried the Ensigns of their respective Countries; some bore the Weapons which they used in War, such as Bows and Arrows, others Launces, and Darts, and Slings, and Pole-axes to be managed with one hand, and Halberts which they weilded with both; in their Colours and Ensigns the Actions and Stories of their Valour, which they had acted in the Service of the Sun, and Inca were painted and designed: in short, every Curaca came behabited in the best manner that he was able, and attended with his best Equipage, every one endeavouring to outdoe his Neighbour, or Companion, in something that was fine and extraordinary.

Fasting was the general preparation and introduction to the Raymi, or Festival of the Sun, which was so rigorous, that it continued for the space of three days; during which time they ate nothing, but a little white Mayz unbaked, with a few herbs called Chucam, and drank nothing but water; no fire was kindled in the whole City, during this solemn fast, nor was it lawfull for any Man to accompany with his Wife. The Fast being ended, upon the Eve or Vigil thereof the Incas, who were Priests, and appointed to offer the Sacrifice, were employed in preparing the Sheep, and Lambs, and Drinks, which the day following were to be offered to the Sun; all which were provided according to the number of the people which came to the Festival, in regard, that not onely the Curacas, and their Deputies, but the common People, and their Servants, were to partake of the Benefit and Blessings of these Sacrifices.

The Virgins, or Wives of the Sun, were employed on the Eve in kneading great quantities of Dough, made of Mayz, which they call Canco, which they fashioned into round Cakes about the bigness of our Apples. For it is observable, that the Indians never eat their Mayz kneaded into Bread, but at this Feast, and at the other which they call Citua; nor do they eat this Bread at their Meals, but onely two or three mouthfulls at the beginning; for that which they ordinarily use for Bread is Cara, which they either parch, or boil before they eat it.

The Flower of this sort of Bread which the Inca and those of the Royal Family did eat, was grinded, and kneaded by the select Virgins, who were Wives of the Sun, and who likewise dressed all the other Dishes which were provided for this Festival; so that the Sun rather seemed to entertain his Family, than his Children to bestow a Treat or Banquet upon him: But as to the common sort, great numbers of other Women were set at work to make Bread, and dress Victuals for them; in making this common Bread great care was taken to have it of the best Flower, and such as was pure, and without mixture, being esteemed sacred, and such as was not to be eaten, but onely at this Festival, which was the principal of all their Feasts.

CHAP. XXI.

How having adored the Sun, they went in Proceſſion to his Temple, and ſacrificed a Lamb to him.

ALL things being well prepared, and diſpoſed on the Eve, the Feaſt being come, the Inca, accompanied with his Brethren, and every one ranked in his place and order, according to his Quality and Age, went in proceſſion by break of day into the Market-place of the City, which they call Haucaypata, where remaining bare-foot, they looked attentively toward the Eaſt in expectation of the Sun's Riſing; when ſo ſoon as they ſaw him appear, they all immediately, caſting themſelves down on their breeches, (which is as much as with us on our knees) adored and worſhipped him, and with open Armes and Hands lifted up, putting them before their Mouths, threw empty Kiſſes into the Air, and ſo worſhipped with profound reverence, acknowledging the Sun for their God, and their natural Father.

The Curacas, which were not of the Bloud Royal, aſſembled in a ſeparate Company in another place called Cuſſipata, where they performed the ſame Ceremonies with the Incas. Then the King raiſing himſelf on his Feet, whilſt the others remained ſitting, he took two great Cups of Gold, which they call Aquilla, into his Hands, filled with that Drink which is their chief Beverage; and then in the name and ſtead of his Father the Sun, (being eſteemed the firſt-born) he lifted up the Bowl, which he held in his Right-hand, and invited the Inca, being himſelf, and all his Relations, to the Feſtival, to pledge him in that Liquour; for this Ceremony of drinking one to another, is the moſt familiar inſtance can be given of Friendſhip and Good-will.

Having performed this Ceremony of Invitation, he poured the Drink which was in his Right-hand Bowl into a golden Jarr, dedicated to the Sun; from which the Liquour ran into a ſmooth Chanel, made of Stone, which reached from the Market-place to the Temple, as if the Sun himſelf had drank it. Then the Inca drank of the Bowl which he held in his Left-hand, pledging the Sun, giving to every Inca ſome part thereof, in a ſmall Cup of Gold, or Silver, which every one had ready to receive it; ſo that by little and little they had drained the great Bowl; the Liquour of which being ſanctified by the hand of the Sun, or the Inca, was eſteemed of Virtue and Bleſſings to all thoſe who communicated of it; and of which all thoſe of the Royal Family received. The Curacas drank of another Cup, though of the ſame ſort of Liquour, prepared by the Wives of the Sun; which was not eſteemed ſo holy and ſacred as that which was conſecrated by the Inca himſelf.

This Ceremony being performed, which was but an Antepaſt to what they had afterwards to drink, they proceeded all in their order to the Temple of the Sun; and being about two hundred paces from the door, they all (except the King) pulled off their Shoes, and walked to the Gate of the Temple. Then the Inca, and all his Kindred, entred in, and performed, as legitimate Children, their Obeiſance and Adoration to the Image of the Sun; whilſt the Curacas, as unworthy of ſo great a Privilege, attended without in the great Court, which was before the Gate of the Temple.

Then the Inca offered with his own hand thoſe Veſſels of Gold with which he had performed this Ceremony; and the other Incas delivered theirs into the hands of the Prieſts, who were Incas and particularly nominated and dedicated to the Sun; for it was not lawfull for any Inca to officiate at this holy Service, who was a Secular, or not ordained to this ſacred Function. When the Prieſts had thus received the Chalices from the Incas, they went afterwards to the Gate, to take others from the hands of the Curacas, every one of which proceeded in their order, according to ſeniority, or priority of time, in which they had become Subjects of the Empire, and ſo conſigned into the hands of the Prieſts their Veſſels of Gold and Silver, with all ſorts of Animals, ſuch as Sheep, Lambs, Lizards, Toads, Serpents, Foxes, Lions and Tygers, &c. all rarely well caſt, and moulded in Gold and Silver, which they preſented for their Offerings to the Sun, every one in ſome ſmall quantity according to their Abilities.

The Offertory being made, every one returned to his place, and then the Incas who were Prieſts came with great droves of Lambs, Ewes and Rams of divers colours; for the Flocks of thoſe Countries have as much variety in their colours as the Horſes have in Spain; all which Cattle were the proper Goods and Eſtate of the Sun; out of which they choſe a black Lamb, for that colour was preferred before all others, as moſt proper for Sacrifice, and moſt pleaſing to Divinity; for they ſaid, that brown Cattel were of the like colour, as well within as without, and that the white, though white over all their Bodies, had yet ſome black ſpots on the tip of their Snouts, or Noſes, which was eſteemed a defect, and therefore leſs fit for unſpotted Sacrifices; for which reaſon the Kings moſt commonly were clothed in black, their mourning being a kind of yellowiſh, and ſpotted colour.

From the firſt Sacrifice of the black Lamb, they made their Prognoſtications, and Divinations of matters relating to the Feaſt; likewiſe in all matters of importance, relating to Peace or War, they took their Omens and Signs from the Sacrifices of Lambs, ſearching into their Heart and Lungs; and thence divined from the colour and clearneſs of them, whether their Offerings were acceptable to the Sun, or not; whether the day of battel were to be ſucceſsfull and victorious; and whether the Year were to be fruitfull: Howſoever they did not always conſult the entrails of Lambs; but in ſome matters they opened the Bowels of a Ram, in others of a barren Ewe; for it is obſervable, that they never killed a breeding Ewe, but ſuch onely as were barren, or by age unfit for Procreation. When they killed a Lamb, or Sheep, they turned his Head towards the Eaſt, and without tying his Legs, either before or behind, three or four Indians held him faſt; and laying him down, the Prieſt opened his left ſide, into which thruſting his Hand, he tore from thence his Heart, and Lungs, and all his vitals, not cutting them, but tearing them out whole with his hand, from the very upper parts of the Throat and Palate, to the lowermoſt Entrails, great care being taken that all the Veſſels ſhould be kept entire, and united with the ſame connexion that they had in the Body.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Divinations made from theſe Sacrifices, and the Fire with which they were conſumed.

THE moſt happy Omen of all they held to be the throbs and palpitations of the Lungs, which if they ſtill moved, and continued living when they were firſt drawn from the Body, they then eſteemed the Omen certainly good, and could diſpence with other leſs promiſing Symptoms, for that this had a ſuperiour and an over-ruling power over all other unlucky appearances. Then they drew out the Guts, and blowing them up with Wind, they tied the neck very hard and cloſe, and they preſſed them on each ſide with their Hands, obſerving by which way the Wind found its eaſieſt paſſage into the Veins and Lungs, which the more they ſwelled, and became replete with Wind, the better was the Omen accounted. There were many other particulars obſerved by them, which I have forgotten, but theſe which I have before mentioned I am well aſſured of, having noted them in my Journals, and remember, that when I was a Youth, I ſaw them twice performed by certain old Indians, not as yet baptiſed; I do not mean the Sacrifice of Raymi, for that was aboliſhed long before I was born; onely the ſuperſtitious inſpection into the Entrails of Lambs, and Sheep, in order to Divination; and the Sacrifices of them after ſuch inſpection was ſtill continued in my time, the which Sacrifices were offered after the manner of thoſe at the principal Feaſts. It was held for a very bad Omen if the Lamb, or Sheep, after they had opened his ſide, proved ſo ſtrong as to be able by ſtrugling to get the Maſtery of them which held him, and to ſtand upon his Feet. It was alſo eſteemed for a bad Omen, if in drawing out the Entrails the mouth of the Small-guts broke off from the Ligatures of the Stomach, ſo as not to come out whole and entire. It was alſo a bad Omen for the Lungs to come forth bruiſed, or broken, or the Heart wounded; beſides other things, as I have ſaid, which I neither noted, nor made enquiry of, onely theſe I remember, being told me by certain Indians, whom I found offering theſe Sacrifices; and indeed they were willing to be free with me, and reſolve me in any thing I asked them concerning their good or bad Omens; for I being then but a Youth, they entertained no jealouſie or ſuſpicion of me. But to return to the Solemnity of the Feſtival of Raymi, we farther ſay, If the Sacrifice of the Lamb declared not that fortunate Omen which was deſired, then they made trial of another with a Ram, and if that neither promiſed fair or happy Tidings, then they conſulted the Bowels of a barren Ewe, and if that alſo did not foretell ſomething more hopefull, they then proceeded in their Sacrifices and Solemnities of the Feaſt, with Sorrow and Mourning, ſaying, that the Sun their Father was for ſome Crime, or Omiſſion in his Service, angry and diſpleaſed with them, and therefore in vengeance thereof, expected the puniſhment of War or Famine, or ſome other Judgment; but then when the Omens were happy and ſmiling, they rejoiced with high contentment, being full of hopes and expectations of fortunate ſucceſſes.

This Sacrifice of the firſt Lamb, from whence they made their Divinations, being offered; great droves of Lambs and Sheep were brought afterwards for the common Sacrifice; but then they did not open their ſides, being alive, as they did the firſt, but after the uſual manner they fairly cut their Throats, and flead them; the Bloud they ſaved, and with it offered the Heart unto the Sun, burning the Body altogether, untill the whole Lamb was conſumed, and converted into Aſhes.

The Fire for that Sacrifice was to be new, and then kindled (as they called it) from the hand of the Sun; to allight this Fire they made uſe of a great Bracelet, worn by the High Prieſt, which they called Chipana, being after the faſhion of thoſe which the Incas commonly put on the Wriſt of their Left-hand; this being greater greater than ordinary, was held over a Cylinder of the bigneſs of a half Orange, bright and well poliſhed, which uniting the Rays of the Sun in one point, caſt ſuch a reflexion into the Cylinder, as eaſily ſet fire to the Cotton, which being finely combined, was put into it, and readily received the flame: With this fire alighted from the Sun, they burnt their Sacrifices, and dreſſed all their Meat for that days proviſion; of this fire they carried ſome into the Temple of the Sun, and ſome to the Convent of the Select Virgins, to be there conſerved for the ſpace of the following Year; being eſteemed a moſt unhappy Omen, in caſe it ſhould by any accident have been extinguiſhed. If on the Vigil or Day before the Feſtival, which is the time when they prepared all things in a readineſs for the Sacrifice, the weather ſhould have proved cloudy, ſo that the Sun did not appear, then for kindling this Fire they made uſe of two round pieces of a hard ſort of Wood, being about the bigneſs of the middle finger, and about half a yard long, called Yaca, which being rubbed hard together, produced a Flame, and with theſe the Indians ſtruck fire, as we do with a Steel and Flint, when they travelled, and paſſed through deſart and unpeopled Countries, and I have frequently ſeen the Shepherds make uſe of the ſame.

Howſoever it was accounted a bad Omen to be enforced on that day to have recourſe unto that inſtrument; for in regard the Sun did then hide his face from them, it argued his diſpleaſure and anger for ſome offence committed. All the fleſh which was prepared for that Sacrifice, was dreſſed in the publick Market-place, and there divided amongſt the Gueſts which came to the Feaſt, and diſtributed firſt to the Incas, then to the Curacas, and afterwards to the Commonalty, according to the ſeveral Orders and Degrees. The firſt Diſh, or Courſe, ſerved in at this ſolemn Banquet, was that ſort of Bread which they called Cancu; then they brought in ſeveral varieties of Meats, without Drink, it being the cuſtome over all Peru, not to drink at the time of their Meals.

From what we have ſaid concerning the Indians ſipping from the Bowl or Cup, offered them by the hand of the Prieſt, the Spaniards raiſed a report, that the Indians communicated in the ſame manner as do the Chriſtians; but having plainly delivered the matter of Fact, we ſhall leave the ſimilitude, or compariſon, to every Man's fancy.

The Dinner, or Banquet of Meats being over, great quantities of Drink were brought in, in which the Indians were notoriouſly addicted to exceed, though by the Mercies of God, they are ſo well reformed from that Vice, by example of that Temperance and Sobriety which they obſerved in the Spaniards, that it is now a ſtrange thing to ſee an Indian drunk, the Vice being generally become deteſtable, and eſteemed infamous; ſo that had the like good example been ſhewn in other things to this People, as hath been in this, it might have produced the ſame good effect, and ſignalized the Spaniards for true Apoſtolical Preachers of the Goſpel.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Order in which they drank one to the other.

THE Inca being ſeated on his Chair of Maſſie Gold, raiſed on a Pedeſtal of the ſame metal, he ſent a Meſſage to his Kindred called Hanan Cozco, and Hurin Cozco, that they ſhould in his name drink a Health to thoſe Indians, who were the moſt famous and renowned in their reſpective Nations. Firſt they nominated the Captains, who had ſignalized their valour in the War, being for their Martial Exploits, preferred before the Curacas; and in caſe a Curaca, who was a Lord over ſome Vaſſals, had merited alſo the honour of a Captain, they called and mentioned him with both Titles. In the next place the Inca ſent to invite unto drinking, the Curacas who lived in the parts adjacent, near to Cozco, being ſuch as had been reduced by the firſt Inca Manco Capac, and for that reaſon having the privilege of being called Incas, they were preferred in the next place to the Incas of the Royal Bloud, and before all other Nations; for it was a Maxime amongſt thoſe Kings never to alter or diminiſh thoſe Titles of Honour or Priviledges which their Anceſtours had beſtowed as favours on their Subjects, but were rather willing to confirm and enlarge them.

Now their form and manner of Drinking one to another, was this; all the Indians generally (according to their condition and quality) had and do ſtill keep a couple of Cups to drink in, equally matched, being of the ſame ſize and ſhape, and of the ſame Metal, either of Gold, Silver, or Wood, that ſo every Man might drink alike, and have his equal proportion one with the other. He that invited to the Drink, held up his two Cups in each hand, and then gave to him whom he invited the Cup which was in his Right-hand, in caſe he were of greater Quality, and if he were of inferiour Degree, then that in his Left, and then both drank at the ſame time; and afterwards receiving his Cup again, he returned to his place; though commonly at theſe Feaſts the Perſon inviting was greater than the Perſon invited, ſo that the Invitation was an evidence of grace and favour of the Superiour to his Inferiour; though from this Cuſtome afterwards it came, that when the Inferiour invited the Superiour, it was by way of acknowledgment of his Service and Vaſſalage.

In obſervance of this common Cuſtome of Invitation, the Incas, who carried the Drink from the King, ſaid to the Perſon invited, The Capa Inca hath ſent me to invite you to drinking, and I am come to drink with you in his name. Whereupon the Captain, or Curaca, took the Cup into his Hands, and lifting up his Eyes unto the Sun, as if he would return him thanks for the great Favour he received from his Off-ſpring; and then having taken the Draught with ſilence, returned back the Cup, making ſigns of profound Reverence and Adoration with his Hands, and kiſſing the Air with his Lips.

But it is to be noted, that the Inca did never ſend Invitations of drinking to all the Curacas in general, but to ſome particular perſons of them, who were famous, and had a great intereſt with their People, and well beloved by the Commonalty, and were Men zealous of the publick good; for this matter of publick good was the great concernment to which the Inca, the Curacas, and all the Miniſters of War and Peace bended their chief aim and ſtudies. To other Curacas the Incas who carried the Cups drank in their own, and not in the name of the Inca, with which the Curacas were abundantly ſatisfied, acknowledging it an Honour ſufficient for them to drink with one who was of the Family, and allied to the Sun, as well as the King himſelf.

The firſt Ceremony of Drinking being finiſhed, then immediately the Captains and Curacas of the ſeveral Nations made their Invitations in the ſame manner and order as they had been themſelves invited; ſome making their immediate Addreſs dreſs to the King, and others to the Incas, in return to their late Complement. When they approached the Inca, it was with deep ſilence, and humble proſtration; and the Inca received them with great Courteſie, and gratious Countenance; and in regard he was to pledge them all, he took the Cup from every Man's hand, touching it with his Lips; though he drank more plentifully out of the Bowl of thoſe to whoſe Dignity and Quality he bore ſome particular reſpect; what remained at the bottom of the Cup, the Inca commanded his Servants, who were alſo Incas by privilege, to drink of the remainder, which being done, the Cups were again returned to the Owners.

Theſe Cups having touched the Hands and Lips of the Capa Inca, were ever afterwards conſerved as ſacred Reliques, and held in great Veneration, never afterwards being applied to common uſes, but ſeparated, as were their Idols, for Worſhip and Adoration; for in reality ſuch was the interiour Devotion which they conceived towards their Kings, that we cannot expreſs the Love and Veneration which theſe poor Indians entertained of every thing which had relation to them.

In this manner the Healths being gone about, and every one pledged, they all returned orderly to their places; and then the Dances and Songs began; all Nations preſenting themſelves reſpectively in their Maſquerades, and Colours, and antick Poſtures, according to the faſhion of their Countrey; during all which the drinking ſtill went on, the Incas inviting each other, as alſo the Captains and Curacas entertaining their Friends, and Acquaintance, and ſuch as were Neighbours and Relations in their ſeveral Countries.

Thus were nine days ſpent in the ſolemn celebration of this Feaſt of Raymi, where was plenty of Meat and Drink (as we have ſaid) accompanied with all kinds of Mirth and Jollity; though the firſt day onely was appointed for Sacrifices, and for inſpection into the Entrails of Beaſts, from whence they made their Divinations of future Events. After the nine days were over, the Curacas taking their leave of the King, returned to their reſpective Countries, having received entire ſatisfaction in the ſolemn performance of the principal Feaſt, which they dedicated to their God the Sun. When the King was employed in the War, or was far remote in viſitations of foreign Countries, he always obſerved the ſolemn Celebration of this Feſtival, in that place, where his occaſions had drawn him, though not with the pomp and magnificence, as it was performed at Cozco; where in the abſence of the King, the Governour and High-Prieſt, who were always Incas of the Bloud, took care to celebrate the Feſtival, at which the Curacas, or their Deputies did appear for them, with a great concourſe of people from the adjacent Provinces.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIV.

In what manner the Incas took their Degrees of Chivalry, and what Examination they paſſed.

THis word Huaracu is of the true Peruvian Language, and ſignifies as much as to arm a Cavalier; meaning no other thing than thoſe Badges of Honour and Banners which they gave to the young Men of the Royal Bloud, whereby they received their firſt admiſſion into the War, and were capacitated to take their Degrees and places of Dignity; without theſe atteſtations given to theſe young Men, they could pretend to no Place, or Degree, in Civil or Martial Affairs; and farther to capacitate them thereunto they were to be Batchelours, or ſingle Men, according to the Books and Rules of Chivalry. Now to qualifie them farther to receive theſe Honours, they were (as we ſhall more amply diſcourſe hereafter) to paſs a moſt ſevere and rigorous Novitiate, which was an examination of all the Toils, Labours and Hardſhips incident to War, and which became a Souldier to undergo in proſperous or adverſe Fortune. For the better underſtanding of which, it will be neceſſary to recite all the particulars performed at this Feſtival; which, conſidering the barbarity of this People, is extraordinary, and admirable, and which might be owned by ſuch as are expert, and far advanced in the Art of Military Diſcipline. At this Feſtival the Common People demonſtrated great Joy, and the Incas both old and young received the Honours due to their Merit and Condition; the old Men were pleaſed to have their valiant and noble acts recited, and young Men to be thought worthy of being admitted and enrolled in the Liſts of Chivalry; and becauſe the Honour or Diſhonour of this Teſt, which the Novices underwent in their Examination, was derived to all their Parentage, and Kindred; the clear and handſome approbation which every one received, became the concernment of the whole Family of the Incas, though they were more particularly intereſted in the Reputation of ſuch who were of the limpid and lawfull Bloud.

Every Year, or two, more or leſs, according as it was judged convenient, the young Incas, of ſixteen Years and upwards, were admitted to this military probation; and no others, though Sons of the greateſt Lords, and Curacas: Their Cuſtome was to educate them in a certain Houſe properly conſtituted for theſe military Exerciſes, built within the precincts of Collcampata, which I remember once to have ſeen, when they celebrated ſome part of theſe Ceremonies in it, but fell ſo ſhort of the greatneſs of the ancient Exerciſes, that they may be rather called ſhadows, or repreſentations, than real performances of them. The Maſters or Inſtructers of the Novices in this Houſe were ancient Incas, who were well experienced in the Arts of War and Peace; and theſe were thoſe who made trial of them in theſe following particulars; and in others which I have now forgotten. One of the trials they made of them, was, how they were able to endure a faſt of ſix days, onely with ſome few handfulls of unbaked Cara, which is a ſort of their Wheat, and with no other Drink than a ſmall Jarr of Water, and without any thing elſe, either Salt or Vchu, which is the red Spaniſh Pepper, yielding ſuch a pleaſing ſort of taſte to them, that it made every thing to reliſh, and for that reaſon it was forbidden to the Novices in their faſtings.

This ſevere Faſt was never enjoined to any above three days, but onely to the Novitiates, who were to be proved to the utmoſt extremity, whether they were able to ſuffer Hunger, and Thirſt, in the Wars, in caſe any accident ſhould neceſſitate them thereunto; but then another Faſt, leſs rigorous than this, the Fathers, Brothers, and near Relations to the Novitiates impoſed on themſelves, which they ſolemnly obſerved, ſupplicating their Father the Sun, that he would vouchſafe to beſtow on his Children, who were now Probationers, force and ſtrength to undergo their task, and acquit themſelves with honour; for ſuch as were not able to ſuſtain ſuch hardſhips as theſe, they rejected, as not worthy to be admitted into the number of Novitiates. The Faſt being performed, and that they were refreſhed and ſtrengthened again with their uſual nouriſhment; then trial was made of their natural nimbleneſs, and activity of Body in running, from the Mountain called Huanacauri, which was eſteemed ſacred by them, to the Caſtle of the City, being about a League and a half; at the end of which race a ſignal was ſet up, where he that firſt arrived, was elected Captain over all the reſt. Nor did all the others loſe their Honour hereby, for the ſecond, third, unto the tenth, acquired reputation; but thoſe who fainted in the courſe, and were not able to hold out, were noted for ſluggards and Cowards, and pitifull perſons; and therefore their Parents and Relations, would intercept them in the way as they ran, encouraging them to ſtrain and force themſelves all they were able, telling them, that they had better dye, and break their hearts in the Race, than come off with Infamy and Diſhonour.

Another day theſe Novitiates were to be divided into two equal parts; one half was to garriſon and maintain the Fortreſs, and the other half was to aſſault and ſtorm it; and having thus fought and contended a whole day, then the day following they changed their ſtations, and thoſe who had before defended the Fortreſs, were now to aſſault it; ſo that trials were made in every reſpect of their Strength and Agility of Body, and of their Art and Conduct in War. In theſe Skirmiſhes, though they fought with blunted Arms, yet ſo much was the heat with which both ſides contended for their Reputation, that many were wounded, and oftentimes ſome killed in earneſt.

CHAP. XXV.

That theſe Novitiates were to know how to make their own Arms and Shoes.

HAving performed theſe Exerciſes, they were in the next place to wreſtle one with the other, being matched according to their age, and proportion of Body; then they were to leap, and throw the Stone, the Launce, and Dart, and other Weapons, which were thrown by hand; then they ſhot at Butts with Bow and Arrows, to try their dexterity in Archery; then they tried who could throw fartheſt againſt the Walls of the Fortreſs, for proof of the ſtrength and exerciſe of their Armes; in like manner they threw at marks with their Slings, and managed all ſorts of Arms which they uſed in War; then they tried their vigilance and watchfulneſs, how well they were able to endure the want of Sleep, ſetting them on the Centinel for ten or twelve nights together; and in caſe any one was found ſleeping on the Guard, he was ſeverely reproached, as unworthy to take any Degree of military Order. They tried alſo how hardy they were in their Fleſh, and how able to endure and ſuffer Wounds, which they made with the ſharp points of Rods in their Arms and Legs, and other parts, which according to the Habit and Faſhion of Peru, were commonly naked; they obſerved when thoſe Wounds were made, with what courage they received them, whether they changed their countenance, or ſhrunk up their Legs or Arms; for unleſs they ſeemed inſenſible of the ſmart, they were rejected as nice, and effeminate, and their Fleſh not hardy, nor enduring the Blows and wounds of an Enemy.

Sometimes they placed them in a narrow Trench, where a Fencing-maſter with a club wielded with both hands, or a Quarter-ſtaff, which the Indians call Macana, came to them, or with a half Pike, which they call Chuqui, which they brandiſhed and flouriſhed before their Eyes and Faces, making offers at their Legs and Heads, at which if they unluckily ſeemed to wink, or ſhrink away, as if they feared the blow, blow, they were rejected, and not ſuffered to paſs the Muſter, ſaying, that ſuch as were fearfull of receiving blows, which were practiſed in Exerciſe onely, without deſign of hurt, would be much more timorous when they appeared before the face of an Enemy, from whom they could expect nothing but Death, or Wounds without favour or mercy; ſo that none were approved, but ſuch as were unſhaken, and were Bullies as immovable as the Rock it ſelf.

Moreover and beſides all this, they were to have learned the Trade of making with their own hands all ſorts of offenſive Arms, which were uſed in the War, at leaſt, ſuch as were moſt common, and which were made without the help of a forge, or art of a Smith; ſuch as Bows and Arrows, and Launces, which were ſharpened and pointed without Iron; and Slings which were made of Hemp or Flax; of all which Arms they were to make uſe, as occaſion required: As to defenſive Arms they made uſe of none, unleſs they were ſhields, or Targets, which they called Hualcanca. Theſe Targets they were obliged to make with their own hands, at leaſt to know how to make them; as alſo their Shoes, which they call Uſuta, which is a Sole of Leather tied about the Foot with packthread, ſuch as ſome wear in Spain, and are like the Sandals of the Franciſcan Friars.

The ſtrings which they uſed for theſe Shoes were made of Wool twiſted with a Spindle, which they held in one Hand, and the Thread in the other, the ſtring was made as thick as the middle finger, and broad, that it might not hurt or gaul the Foot, half a yard whereof for each Foot was ſufficient, which may ſerve to confute the Words of a Spaniſh Hiſtorian, who, writing of the Indians, ſays that they wove they knew not how, nor for whom; but we may pardon this falſe Relation, ſo much to the Diſreputation of the Indians, which alſo is not altogether without ſome reflexion on the Spaniards themſelves; for ſuch Men as theſe being Strangers, and not verſed in the Cuſtoms of that Countrey, take up at hazard any Report which Men out of Ignorance or Intereſt deliver to them. Onely this Opinion I would have the World to entertain of theſe Indians, that of all the Gentiles in the World, there never was any Nation more manly, and which valued themſelves more on the account of Hardineſs and Bravery, in deteſtation of all ſorts of effeminacy, than did the Incas; for they being generally puffed up, and exalted with the lofty thoughts of Alliance to the Sun, were Heroick to an high Degree, and aſpiring to greater matters than thoſe which fall within the ſphere and compaſs of their management.

This manner of ſpinning Wool they called Milluy, which ſignifies as much as to ſpin Wool for making ſtrings to tie Shoes, or Ropes for carriages or Burthens; the which work was the proper buſineſs of Men, the Women had another ſort of Spinning, which they called Buhca, which ſignifies as much as to ſpin with a Diſtaff, and is that Word which is onely applied to the Work of Women; which different Expreſſions and Proprieties of Speech I have denoted, for ſatisfaction of ſuch as are curious in this Language, for want of which knowledge in the propriety of Words belonging to that Speech, many Spaniards who have writ Hiſtories of Peru, and diſperſed them in Spain, have been guilty of groſs miſtakes, having charged the Incas with many Cuſtoms and Practices never known, or in uſe amongſt them. But to return again to our purpoſe: We ſay, that the Novitiates were obliged to learn the Trade of making their own Arms and Shoes, ſo as to be able to provide themſelves with ſuch neceſſaries at any time, when the urgency of War, or any other emergent accident conſtrained them to have recourſe to their own Art and Induſtry.

CHAP. XXVI.

That the Prince himſelf underwent the rigour of Approbation, and that they dealt more ſeverely with him than with others.

DUring the time of Probation one of the Captains, or Maſters of theſe Ceremonies, did every day make a Speech to the Novitiates, putting them in mind of their lofty Lineage, and deſcendency from the Sun, repeating the noble and heroick Actions performed and atchieved by their Kings, and other famous Princes of the Royal Bloud; and that according to their Examples they ought to ſignalize their Vertue and Valour, towards the enlargement of their Dominions, and with generous Conſtancy and Patience exert all the faculties of Heroick Souls. Moreover they recommended to them Clemency, Piety, and Gentleneſs towards the poor, Impartiality in their Juſtice, and to ſee that none did Wrong without due puniſhment, to be liberal and magnificent, as became the bright Sons of ſo glorious a Father: and in ſum, they inſtructed them in all thoſe Lectures of Morality unto which their Philoſophy had as yet attained, ever inculcating the remembrance of their more than Humane Race, and of their Deſcent from the Celeſtial Region. They made them alſo ſleep on the ground, walk bare-foot, exerciſing them in all other points of hardſhip which was incident to a Souldier's Life. Nor was the Prince, who was the Eldeſt Son, and Heir to the Inca, exempted from theſe Exerciſes of Probation, or treated with leſs rigour or ſeverity than the others, unleſs perhaps the greatneſs of his Birth might excuſe him from the labour and fatigue of the Race, which being run by others, the Flag, which became the prize and reward of the moſt ſwift, was by him laid at the Feet of the Prince, as his undoubted right, to whom alſo the Inheritance of the Kingdom appertained; but as to all other Exerciſes, ſuch as Faſtings, military Diſcipline, making his own Arms, and Shoes, ſleeping on the ground, eating and faring hardly, and marching bare-foot, they were required of him, as the moſt neceſſary qualities belonging to a Prince, who being exalted above all others in the ſublime Station of his Power and Sovereignty, was alſo to excell others in his Vertues and Abilities, both of Body and Mind: For in caſe at any time their Princes ſhould be reduced to an equality of Fortune, it would not become the Royalty of their Perſons to be leſs worth than other Men, or leſs able to contend with the croſs accidents of an adverſe condition; for as they had the advantage of others, both in Proſperity and Adverſity, ſo ought they to be endued with predominant Vertues (eſpecially ſuch as are warlike) above the ordinary capacity and ſcantling of the multitude.

By virtue of ſuch Excellencies as theſe, they were of Opinion, that the Prince deſerved the Inheritance, and claimed it on a better Title, than of being born Heir to his Father. They were of opinion alſo, that it was neceſſary for Kings and Princes to have tried and experienced in their own Perſons the Labours and Difficulties of War, that ſo they might be more ſenſible, and better able to judge of the merits, and gratifie the hazards of their Souldiers. During all this time of Approbation, which continued for the ſpace of one New Moon to another, the Prince went habited in the moſt poor and mean Clothing that can be imagined, being all made up with rags and patches; with which he was not aſhamed to appear in publick, ſo often as his occaſions required: And this was done with this farther intent, that when he ſhould behold himſelf on the Throne of his Majeſty, he ſhould look down from thence with a compaſſionate Eye on the poor, in remembrance that he himſelf was once one of that number, and on that ſcore endearing his Perſon to them with Friendſhip and Charity he might duly claim the Title of Huachacuyac, which ſignifies a Lover of the Poor. Theſe Exerciſes of Probation Probation being paſt, they were declared worthy of being dignified by the Inca, and to be entitled true and legitimate Children of the Sun. Then came the Mothers and Siſters of theſe young Men, bringing them Uſutas, or Sandals of Packthread, which they put on their Feet, in teſtimony that they had paſſed and overcome all the ſevere methods of military Exerciſes.

CHAP. XXVII.

That the Inca conferred onely the chief and principal Mark of Dignity; and that one of his Kindred conferred the reſt.

THeſe Ceremonies being performed, notice was given thereof unto the Inca, who being attended with the grave Seniours of his Royal Family, came to the Novitiates, and in a ſhort Oration, acquainted them, that they were not to reſt in the bare Formalities of Chivalry, and Marks of the Royal Bloud; onely to ſatisfie their light humour with the vanity of empty Honour; but to emulate the Vertues of their Anceſtours in their Juſtice to all, and Mercy to the poor; and that being the true and undoubted Progeny of the Sun, they ought to imitate their Father, ſhining with the ſplendour of good Works, which tended to the common benefit of all his Vaſſals, which was the ſole Deſign and Errant for which they were made, and ſent from Heaven to inhabit the Earth. Then the Novitiates came one by one to the King, and preſenting themſelves before him on their Knees, they received from his hand the firſt Mark and Signal of Royal Dignity, which was to have their Ears bored, and pierced by him in the ſoft part of the Ear, with a large Nail of Gold, leaving it in the holes both for cure of the Wound, as alſo to widen the Orifice, and ſtretch the Ear, being often extended to an incredible bigneſs.

The Novitiates, in recompence for this favour, kiſſed the Hand of the Inca, and every one in his turn having received the order, aroſe from his Knees from before the other Inca; who was Brother, or Uncle, to the Inca, and the Perſon next in Authority to him; who having looſed their Uſutas of unſpun hemp, ſhod them with Sandals of Woollen Manufactory, of the moſt gentile and faſhionable ſort, after the manner of the King, and the Incas, that in token of Approbation, and having paſſed examination, were found and eſteemed worthy. This Ceremony of putting on the Shoes, did ſomething reſemble the practice of buckling the ſpurs on the heels of Knights of the military Order in Spain; which being done they kiſſed them on the right Shoulder, ſaying, That Child of the Sun, who hath given theſe evidences of his Merits, deſerves to be kiſſed: For the ſame Word which with them ſignifies Kiſſes, ſignifies alſo Adoration, Honour and Courteſie. This Ceremony being paſt, the Novitiate was introduced into a round Chamber, adorned with Hangings, where the ancient Incas veſted him with the Habit agreeable to his Order, which, untill that time, it was not lawfull to put on. This Veſtment was made with three corners, two of which hung down at length, to cover the Privy-parts, being girt about the Waſt with a Twiſt of the Thickneſs of a finger; the other part behind was girt or laced about the Thighs, ſo that though all the other Garments were ſtripped off, yet this habit would remain a ſufficient and decent covering for the Body.

But the chief and principal Mark of this Order was the boring of the Ears, which, as it was a Badge of Royalty, ſo this of the Veſtment was of Chivalry: the Ceremony of the Woollen Shoes was a Novelty introduced, ſignifying the Wearineſs of the Novitiate after his Labours, and were beſtowed by way of refreſhment freſhment rather than as any eſſential Ceremony belonging to the Order. From this word Huaracu, which fully expreſſes all the Solemnity of this Feſtival, the word Huara is derived, which ſignifies a Cloth or Veſtment, and implicitely denotes, that that Perſon who deſerves ſuch Habit, hath a lawfull Title of pretence to all thoſe Dignities, Honours, and Royalties, which may be acquired, either by War or Peace. Moreover they placed on the Head of theſe Novitiates Garlands of two ſeveral ſorts of Flowers; one was of that which they call Cantut, being of a very beautifull form, and of various Colours, ſuch as yellow, murry, red, and others, all being very lively and chearfull. The other ſort of Flower was called Chihuayhua, being of a deep incarnation, not unlike the Gilliflowers of Spain. Theſe two ſorts of Flowers were appropriated onely to thoſe of the Royal Family; it not being lawfull for the Commonalty, nor for any Curaca, how great ſoever he were, to wear that ſort of Flower. Moreover they wore upon their Heads the Leaf of an Herb called Vinay Huayna, which ſignifies youthfull, being very verdant and green, and bearing a Leaf like that of the Lilly; it conſerves it ſelf freſh for a long time, and though it be withered, yet it continues its colour.

All the Badges of Chivalry and Honour, ſuch as the Flowers and Leaves before mentioned, and other things, were conferred alike on all Novitiates, as well as on the Heir apparent; who was differenced from them onely in the Wreath which bound his Temples, which was four fingers broad, not round, as the Spaniards imagine it, but like a Fringe, made of Wool; for the Indians had no Silk in their Countrey; the colour was of a pale yellow, like a Lemon-colour. This diſtinction was not worn by the Prince, untill he had paſſed his time of Approbation, and then it was his ſingle and peculiar Badge of Honour, not being allowed to any other, no not to his own Brother.

The laſt Royal diſtinction they gave unto the Prince, was a kind of Pole-ax, with a Handle of about a yard long, which they called Champi. This Iron had an edge like a ſword on one ſide, and the point of a Diamond on the other, being like a Parteſan, onely that it wanted a point. When this Weapon was put into his Hand, they ſaid Aucacunapac, which is a Noun of the Dative Caſe, and ſignifies for Tyrants, for Traytors, for cruel Perſons, for falſe Breakers of their Faith, for this and much more this word Auca ſignifies; theſe Arms which were put into his Hands, ſerved for an Embleme of Juſtice, with which he was to puniſh Offenders: the other particulars of Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs, ſignified Clemency, Piety, Gentleneſs, and other Vertues and Royal Endowments of a Prince, which he ought to make uſe of towards his faithfull and loyal Subjects. For as his Father the Sun had cauſed thoſe Flowers to grow in the Fields for the contentment and pleaſure of Mankind; ſo likewiſe ought a Prince to cultivate the Flowers of Vertue in his Mind, that ſo he might juſtly claim the Title of Lover of the Poor, and that under that character and notion his Name might ſmell ſweet, and be pretious in the World.

The Officers of Chivalry having in the preſence of the Inca made and concluded this Diſcourſe unto the Prince; then immediately the Uncles and Brothers of the Prince preſenting themſelves on their Knees before him, adored and reverenced him for the true and undoubted Child of the Sun, and Heir of the Inca. The which Ceremony ſeems a kind of Inſtalment of the Prince, and Admiſſion to the hereditary Succeſſion of the Empire; which being done, they bound his Temples with the yellowiſh Wreath. And thus the Feaſt of the Novitiates, admitted into the Order of Chivalry, concluded.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Distinctions which the Kings, and the other Incas, and the Masters of Novitiates wore.

THE King wore the same sort of Wreath about his Temples, but of a different colour, being red, besides which the Inca carried another more peculiar distinction, proper to himself, which was the two pinion Feathers of the Bird called Corequenque; the which are streaked white and black, and as large as the Wings of a Falcon, or long-winged Hawk; they were to be fellows of the same Bird, as I once remember to have seen them planted on the Head of Inca Sayri Tupac. The Birds which have these Feathers are found onely in the Desart of Villcanuta, being about thirty Leagues distant from the City of Cozco, situate near a little Lake, lying at the foot of the inaccessible snowy Mountain. Those that are acquainted with that sort of Fowl say, that never above two of them, namely a Male and Female, are seen together; but whence they come, or where they are bred, is not known: besides which place, the Indians say, that none are seen in any other part of Peru, though there are other Lakes, and snowy Mountains, and Desarts, besides that of Villcanuta: perhaps this Bird may be like the Phenix, which none having seen, we may fansie it after the form and colour of this Bird.

Now in regard that these Birds were singular in the World, and that none besides them were ever seen before, nor since, the Incas esteemed them such a rarity, as did not become any besides the Royal Head; for these Birds, for the singularity of them, resembling (as they said) their two original Parents, Man and Woman, which descended from Heaven, served to continue the memory of them, and therefore as their Feathers were sacred, so they were the peculiar note and mark of the Imperial Dignity: For my part, I am of opinion that there are many other Birds of the same species with these; and that though I will not deny but that there may be a Phenix in the World, yet that this Bird is not of that kind is most probable; howsoever the Indians may maintain what opinion they please, and in devotion to their Fore-fathers, may fansie them like these Creatures which are rare, and esteemed sacred. It is certain that the Feathers of these Birds were highly esteemed of in those days, though they are more common now, being worn by many, who falsly pretend to a descent from the Royal Bloud of the Incas, though in reality the Race of those Princes is almost totally extinct, for in regard the example of foreign fashions hath confounded the true distinctions on the Head, by which the quality of every Person was known, so it gave a confidence to many to usurp this Royal Mark, and pretend to Princely Descent, every one almost assuming the Title of an Inca, or a Pallas.

These Feathers were planted over the coloured Wreath which bound their Temples, the pique Feathers pointing upwards, removed at a little distance one from the other, as they were naturally spread. Having these Feathers on their Heads, they carried great respect for all sorts of Birds and Fowl, so that they took care how they affrighted or chased them away. Every new Inca that succeeded to the Empire, procured new Feathers; for that the former belonged to the King deceased, who being embalmed, conserved all his Ensigns of Regality, of which these Feathers were an especial mark. Such was the Majesty of this Bird Corequenque, and such was the Reverence and Respect which the Incas expressed towards it; which though the matter it self be of little importance to the People of Spain, yet the knowledge thereof may be pertinent to such, as have the curiosity to be acquainted with the Customs and practices of the Incan-Kings. But to return again to our Novitiates: So soon as they had received these Marks of Chivalry, they were conducted to the principal place of the City, where a general Festival was publickly solemnized for many days with Songs and Dances, in honour and triumph for their Victories; the like also was more privately celebrated in the Families of their Parents and near Relations; who boasted and rejoiced much in the proficiency of their Sons, challenging to themselves a share in their commendations; for they having instructed them in martial Exercises, how to manage their Arms, and make their Shoes, and educated them with hardship remote from effeminacy and softness, did justly triumph and glory, that having performed their duty towards their Sons, in their Childhood, had now accomplished them with Abilities to serve their Countrey either in War or Peace.

CHAP. XXIX.

How Chuquimancu, a Lord of four Vallies, yielded himself.

BUT to return again now to the Reign and Conquests of the Inca Pachacutec, we are to understand, that the General Capac Yupanqui having subdued and conquered the great Curaca Chincha, sent to the King his Brother for a new Army, whereby he might be enabled to overcome those Vallies, or Plain Countries which presented themselves before him. The Inca with all readiness supplied him with new Forces, commanded by good Officers, providing them with all sorts of Victuals and Ammunition, agreeable to the greatness of the Enterprise. The new Army being come, with which also the Prince Yupanqui returned, being very desirous to exercise and signalize himself in the War; the General of Chincha boldly proceeded out of his Quarters, and posted himself in the pleasant Valley of Runahuanac; which is as much as the People's Terrour, because in the River which runs through that Valley many people had been drowned, who supposing the Water to be as shallow in the Winter as in the Summer, rather than go a League about by way of the Bridge, have foolishly adventured to wade over it; but the Chanel being deep, and the Current rapid, have most miserably perished in the Waters. But the Spanish Historians give this Valley, and the River, the name of Lunaguana, by corruption of three Letters of this Word; one Writer says, that the Word Guano signifies mudd, or dung, because it affords good Sullage, and great improvement for their arable Lands; but this Letter G. ought to be H. so that the true word is Huano, for the Peruvian Tongue doth not admit of the Letter G. which word Huano signifies dreadfull; by this particular, and many other instances that we could give, it is very apparent how little the Spaniards understood that Language; and what gross mistakes also the Mongrels, or those that are mixed of Spanish and Indian Bloud, did likewise make; for they taking the accent in part from their Fathers, both in speaking and writing are often guilty of strange corruptions; which when I have observed, I have endeavoured to correct amongst them, but to little purpose, considering how prevalent conversation is, and the communication of a people to whom they are subdued, and become Vassals.

In those days this Plain of Runahuanac was greatly peopled, as also another Low-Countrey lying to the Northward of it called Huarcu, which contained thirty thousand Inhabitants; in like manner also Chincha was inhabited, and other Countries situated North and South of it; but now there are not two thousand Inhabitants reputed to be there in all, and some lie wholly desolate, unless they be some few Spaniards who have taken up their dwellings in those parts.

Having already related the Conquest of Yuncas, we are now to take notice, that the Plain of Runahuanac with three others to the Northward of it called Huarca, Malla, Chillca, were all in subjection to a great Lord called Chuquimancu, who having several of these Provinces under his Jurisdiction presumed to give himself the Title of King, and by reason of his Power claimed an Authority and Dominion over over others, who were not really, and duly his Subjects. This King (for ſo we may term him) hearing that the Incas marched againſt him, joined what forces he was able to make, and boldly attempted to meet, and give a ſtop to the Enemy at the paſs of the River; where after ſeveral Skirmiſhes, wherein many were ſlain on each ſide, the Inca at length paſſed the River by help of ſome flat botomed Boats, and Floats, which he had made for that purpoſe. Nor did the Yuncas make all the reſiſtence they were able, in regard their King Chuquimancu declared his Deſign of retreating to the Valley of Huarcu, which, as he falſly ſuppoſed, was the moſt advantageous Poſt; but being unskilfull in the Art of War, he was deceived in his meaſures, as will hereafter appear; for the Incas having well encamped their Army, made their benefit of this ill Counſel, and in leſs than a months time gained all the delightfull and pleaſant Valley of Huarcu.

The Inca, for ſecurity of his Arrear, and for Convoy to his Proviſions, having left a ſufficient force in Runahuanac, marched forward into Huarcu, where a cruel and bloudy War began, for Chuquimancu having gathered all his Forces into a Body, to the number of twenty thouſand Men, pretended with good Conduct and Strategems of War to defend his people, and gain the reputation of a renowned Captain. On the other ſide the Incas uſed all their Arts to ſubdue them with the leaſt effuſion of Bloud that was poſſible; though in this War eight months time paſſed, with many bloudy Skirmiſhes, not to be avoided, during which time the Incas relieved their Armies with three, ſome ſay four exchanges of their forces, and that the Enemy might deſpair of wearying them out, and conſtrain them at length to remove their Camp; they gave them ſure evidences of their reſolution to continue in that ſtation untill their ſurrender; for as a token that they lived at eaſe, with all the conveniences of the City, they called the Quarter of the Inca Cozco; and to the parts about it, where the Army was lodged they gave the name of the principal ſtreets. Pedro de Cieça ſays, that this War continued above four years, and that the Inca in that time founded a new City, which he called by the name of Cozco; but this Relation he pretends to have received from the Yuncas themſelves, who out of vain glory might be apt to magnifie the greatneſs of their Actions: But the truth is, the four years were no other than a relieving of the Army four times, and the Foundation of a City was no other than the denomination of Cozco given to the Camp.

By this time the Yuncas began to be ſenſible of Hunger and Famine, which is the moſt cruel Enemy, and that which abates and brings low the heat and reſolution of the moſt proud and haughty Spirits; but ſome time before that extreme Famine diſtreſſed them, the Natives of Runahuanac had inſtantly petitioned their King Chuquimancu to ſubmit to the Incas, before it was too late, and before their obſtinacy had exaſperated the mind of the Incas to give away their Houſes, Lands and Inheritances to their Neighbours of Chincha, who were their mortal Enemies: The people being apprehenſive of theſe matters, and finding their King obſtinate in his reſiſtence, privately with-drew, and fled from the Camp, giving private intelligence to the Inca of the condition and want in the Enemies Army.

Chuquimancu growing now ſenſible of his Weakneſs and Diſtreſs, and fearing to be wholly abandoned by his people, and at length to fall without any conditions into the hands of the Incas, began to ſhew himſelf inclinable to hearken to propoſals of Peace; whereupon calling a Council, they reſolved to go in Perſon, and without Mediation of Ambaſſadours, to humble themſelves before the Incas; and accordingly they proceeded to the Royal Quarters, where caſting themſelves on their knees, they begged Mercy and Pardon for their Offences, declaring their readineſs to acknowledge themſelves Vaſſals to the Inca, ſince it was the pleaſure and determination of the Sun his Father to make him ſupreme Lord and Sovereign of the Univerſe.

The Incas, both Uncle and Nephew, courteouſly received them, according to their uſual Grace and Favour, aſſuring them of pardon, and having veſted them with ſuch Garments as were accuſtomary, diſpatched them with contentment, and licence to return unto their own homes.

The Natives of theſe four Provinces, like thoſe of Chincha, make great boaſtings of the wonderfull Proweſs and Valour of their Anceſtours, whom the Incas were not able to ſubdue in leſs than four years War; beſides many other Stories of their mighty Deeds, which we omit, becauſe they are not pertinent to our Hiſtory.

Howſoever this is certain, that the Incas eſteemed it ſo great a work to have conquered the King Chuquimancu, that as a Trophy of their Victory, and in perpetual remembrance of the valiant Actions performed in this War, both by their own people, and by the Yuncas in their own defence, they built a Fortreſs in the Valley of Huarcu, which, though it were of little compaſs, yet it was a wonderfull and rare Work for that people, being made with due Symmetry, and according to the Rules of Fortification; and for that Reaſon, and for the ſituation of the place, being built on the Sea ſhore, it ought to be permitted to remain for an ancient piece of antiquity; and indeed the work was ſo ſtrong and durable, as may laſt for many ages without any repair; for when I paſſed by it in the Year 1560, it ſtill ſhewed what it had been, and which neither I nor any other could behold, without ſome reſenting thoughts of this unconſtant and tranſitory World.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the Vallies of Pachacamac and Rimac; and of their Idols.

THE King Chuquimancu being thus ſubdued, and the Government eſtabliſhed in his Countrey, according to the Laws, Rites and Cuſtoms practiſed and obſerved by the Subjects of the Inca. They paſſed forwards in farther purſuance of their Conqueſts, over the Vallies of Pachacamac, Rimac, Chancay and Huaman, (which the Spaniards call the Baranca, or Breach of Earth between two Hills,) all which four were under the Command and Dominion of a powerfull Ruler, called Cuyſmancu, who alſo had the vanity to take upon himſelf the Title of King; and though amongſt the Indians they have not a word properly to expreſs the name of King, yet the term of Hatun Apu, which is as much as a great Lord, hath ſome affinity with that ſignification: And as to theſe Vallies of Pachacamac and Rimac, which I ſhall ſay once for all, that the Spaniards, by corruption of the laſt Word, give it the name of Lima, by which it is known to this day.

Now as we have ſaid before, ſo we muſt ſay again, and as all the Spaniſh Hiſtorians write, That the Kings of Peru did by the mere light of natural Reaſon attain to the knowledge of one God, the Maker of all things, whom they called Pachacamac, and Suſtainer of the Univerſe; the which Doctrine was more ancient than the time of the Incas, and which was diſperſed through all their Kingdoms, both before and after their Conqueſts. They farther affirmed, that he was inviſible, and becauſe he would not ſuffer himſelf to be ſeen, for that reaſon they did not build Temples to him, nor offer him Sacrifices, as they did to the Sun, but onely adored him interiourly with profound Veneration in their Hearts, as may appear by their outward geſtures, of bowing their Heads, lifting up their eyes, and opening their Arms whenſoever his ſacred Name came to be mentioned. This Doctrine (as we have ſaid) was everywhere dilated; for ſo ſoon as any people was ſubjected to the Inca, this Principle was inſtilled, in caſe it had not taken place and root before: But thoſe who had chiefly admitted and received this Doctrine before the times of the Incas, were the Anceſtours of this King Cuyſmancu, who having built a Temple to Pachacamac, did afterwards give the ſame Name to the Valley where it was erected; which in thoſe days was of the greateſt Fame and Renown of any in that Coaſt. In this Temple the Yuncas placed their Idols, which were the Figures of divers ſorts of Fiſh; and amongſt them they had alſo introduced the Image of a Shee-fox.

This

This Temple of Pachacamac, which was the onely place ſo dedicated in all Peru, was very magnificent both for the ſtructure, and for the ſervices performed there; for the Yuncas offered many Sacrifices of Beaſts, and other things; not exempting the Bloud of Men, Women and Children, which they killed at their principal Feſtivals, being practiſed alſo in many other Provinces, untill reformed by the Government of the Incas; and this ſhall ſerve at preſent to have ſpoken of Pachacamac, intending to touch farther thereupon, as we ſhall have occaſion in the occurrences of this Hiſtory.

The Valley of Rimac lies four Leagues to the Northward from Pachacamac; Rimac ſignifies ſomething which ſpeaks, having its name from a certain Idol, of the Figure of a Man, which ſpake, and anſwered queſtions, like the Oracle of Apollo at Delphos, and ſeveral others in the World, by which the Devil deluded the people in times of the ancient Gentiliſm. This Idol was ſeated in a moſt ſumptuous Temple, though not ſo magnificent as that of Pachacamac, to which the Great Lords of Peru either went in Perſon, or enquired by their Ambaſſadours, of all important Affairs relating to their Provinces. The Yuncas held this Idol in great Veneration, as likewiſe did the Incas, after they had ſubdued that pleaſant Valley where the Spaniards founded that City which they call the King's City, or King's-Town, having had its firſt Foundation begun on that day which we celebrate in remembrance of our Saviour's firſt manifeſting himſelf to the Gentiles; ſo that Rimac and Lima, or the King's-Town, is all one, bearing Three Crowns, with a Star, for its Arms.

The Spaniſh Hiſtorians confound the Temple of Rimac with Pachacamac, ſaying that the Idol of Pachacamac was the ſpeaking Oracle; but this is but one of thoſe many miſtakes of which, for want of knowledge in the propriety of that Tongue, they have been guilty; and indeed the neighboured of thoſe Vallies, and vicinity of one of them to the other, being not above four Leagues diſtant, may make their Errour the more tolerable. And thus much ſhall ſerve to ſhew that the ſpeaking Idol was Rimac, and not Pachacamac; with which let us return to our former purpoſe.

Before the General Capac Yupanqui arrived with his Army at the Valley of Pachacamac, he diſpatched after his uſual Cuſtome, his Summons to the King Cuyſmancu, requiring him to yield Obedience to the Inca Pachacutec, and that he ſhould prepare to acknowledge and receive him for his ſupreme Lord and Sovereign, and to obſerve his Laws and Cuſtoms, and that renouncing all other Gods and Idols, they ſhould adore the Sun for the chief and principal God: Theſe were the conditions which he offered to him, which if he refuſed to accept, he was reſolved to make War upon him, and conſtrain him thereunto, either by fair means or foul, by gentle perſuaſions, or ruder arguments of the Sword.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Answer demanded of Cuysmancu to these Summons; and of what Capitulations were made with him.

THE late successes of the Inca in the neighbouring Countries, had sufficiently allarmed this great Prince Cuysmancu, and warned him to provide for a War, and for his own defence; wherefore having gathered his Army, in presence of the Captains and Souldiers he received the Summons of the Inca; for answer whereunto he replied, That neither he nor his people stood in need of other Prince or Ruler besides himself, that the Laws and Customs which they observed were descended and derived to them from their Fore-fathers, which they found so good and laudable, that they could not resolve to forsake them to embrace Manners and a Religion wholly strange and foreign to them; that amongst other Gods they adored the Pachacamac, who was the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe, and for that reason must be greater than the Sun; that they had built a Temple wherein they sacrificed unto him of the best of their Substance, and offered the Bloud of their Men, Women and Children to him, esteeming nothing too dear whereby they might testifie the great Reverence and Veneration they had for him, which was so profound and dreadfull, that they durst not behold his Image in the Face, but approached to him at his hinder parts, as also did the Priests, who durst not so much as lift up their Eyes to behold him; that they had another God called Rimac, whom also they adored, who was more familiar with them, and discoursed and talked with them, and gave them Counsel in their most difficult Affairs; that they worshipped also a Fox for his Craft and Subtilty, and the Mamacocha, or Mother-Sea, because it provided them with Fish for their nourishment; all which were a sufficient number of Gods for their protection and use; but as to the Sun, they never had heard any great report of him for a God, or that any had heard him speak like Rimac; nor had they need of much more heat than what was natural to the Climate of their Countrey, and therefore they desired the Inca to grant them Liberty of Conscience, and Freedom in their way of Worship, for that they did not find any great need they had either of the Inca's Government, or his Religion.

The Incas were so well satisfied to understand that the Yuncas conceived much Devotion for the Pachacamac, whom they inwardly and mentally adored in their Hearts, that they proposed to reduce them without War, and overcome them with persuasions, reasonings and gentle promises and allurements, reserving the force of Arms and compulsion for the last and ultimate Remedy.

With this Intention the Incas proceeded into the Valley of Pachacamac, where they were encountred by the King Cuysmancu with a strong Band of Men, resolved to defend their Countrey: Whereupon the General Yupanqui dispatched a Messenger to them, advising them not to engage in Battel, untill such time as they had passed a Conference together, touching the Honour and Worship of their Gods: For that besides the Sun, whom they adored, they thought fit to acquaint them, that they conceived a great Devotion for the Pachacamac, to whom though they had erected no Temples, nor offered Sacrifices, because he was invisible, and incomprehensible, and above their Conceptions, yet they inwardly worshipped him in their Hearts, and conceived so great an Awe and Reverence for him, that they durst not take his Name in vain, or pronounce it with their Mouths, without profound and humble Adoration; wherefore since they worshipped the same God, and were of the same Religion, there was no ground or foundation of Quarrel; but Reason rather perswaded, that they should live in Friendship and Amity together. Moreover the Incas, besides this Devotion which they paid to Pachacamac, whom they held to be the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe; they

they had a farther Honour to the ſacred Oracle of Rimac, which the Yuncas alſo adored; and therefore ſince the Incas condeſcended ſo far to them, as to worſhip their Idol of Rimac, they ought alſo to correſpond with the like Brotherly kindneſs, and comply with them in the religious Worſhip of the Sun, who was a viſible God, and whoſe Beauty and Splendour deſerved Veneration, and whoſe Benefits beſtowed on Mankind, did merit the grateſull acknowledgment of all Creatures, being much more to be preferred before the Deity of a Fox, or other low and inſignificant Animals of Sea and Land, to which they paid Divine Honours. Wherefore now by way of friendly Accommodation they propoſed to them to acknowledge the Inca his Brother for their Lord and Sovereign, and to obey him as a true born Child of the Sun, being eſteemed for ſuch, and a God upon Earth, the which he evidenced and proved by his impartial Juſtice diſpenſed to all by his Clemency and Piety, by his Gentleneſs, and by the Excellencies of his Laws and Government, which were ſo eaſie and beneficial, as rendred him amiable, and deſired by many Nations, who upon the Report of his Vertues, and rare qualifications of his Majeſty, have voluntarily deſired to be admitted, and came from remote Countries to liſt themſelves in the Roll of his Subjects; wherefore ſince the Inca hath been pleaſed to ſpare them theſe pains, and come and offer them in their own Countrey ſo much felicity, there was no reaſon they ſhould neglect or refuſe ſo pretious a Bleſſing, becauſe it was free: Wherefore they entreated them again to conſider, without prejudice or paſſion, of theſe Offers, and not conſtrain the Inca to impoſe that on them by rude and forcible terms, which he deſired gently to inſtill into them with the moſt ſoft perſuaſions imaginable, and not be forced to have recourſe unto his Arms, againſt which no humane power was capable to make reſiſtence.

The King Cuyſmancu and his Subjects lent a favourable Ear to all theſe Diſcourſes, and having obtained a Truce for ſome days, at length by the Induſtry and Prudence of the Incas, a Peace was concluded on theſe following Conditions:

That the Yuncas ſhould adore the Sun and the Incas; that they ſhould build a Temple apart to Pachacamac, where they might ſacrifice, and make him any Offerings they pleaſed, provided they were not of the Bloud of Mankind; it being againſt the Law, and light of Nature, for one Man to murther another, or kill him for a Sacrifice to his God: Wherefore that Cuſtome was wholly to be aboliſhed. That all the Idols in the Temple of Pachacamac ſhould be ejected thence, it being neither reaſonable, nor decent to entertain mean and petty Deities in the Temple of that Great God, who is the Maker and Suſtainer of the Univerſe; and who being inviſible, ought inviſibly to be worſhipped; and for that reaſon, that no Image or Repreſentation of him ſhould be erected in his Temple, where it had not pleaſed himſelf to diſcover his Shape and Form, or to evidence his Beauty in that manner as the Sun daily appears unto us. That for the better Ornament and Fame of this Valley of Pachacamac, a Monaſtery of Select Virgins ſhould be founded there, with a Temple dedicated to the Sun, both which gave a great Reputation to this Valley, becauſe it reſembled the City of Cozco in that matter which made the City it ſelf illuſtrious and ſacred. That the King Cuyſmancu ſhould ſtill remain Prince in his own Dominions, and the Curacas continue with their Authority, onely that they ſhould acknowledge Obedience to the Inca, as their Supreme, and obſerve his Laws and Cuſtoms. And finally, That the Incas ſhould bear all Reverence and Reſpect to the Oracle of Rimac, and ſhould command all their People and Subjects to doe the like.

Upon theſe Terms and Conditions a Peace was concluded between the General Capac Yupanqui and the King Cuyſmancu, to whom he gave a Memorial of all the Laws and Cuſtoms which the Inca commanded him to obſerve; together with theſe Conſtitutions, which relate to the Tribute payable to the Sun, and Inca; all which ſeeming to be juſt and honeſt, the King received them with much alacrity. All which matters and things being orderly ordained, and eſtabliſhed, and Officers, with a ſufficient Guard, being placed for better ſecurity of the Countrey, the General with his Nephew returned to Cozco, to render the Inca an Account of their Succeſſes, and Subjection of the Yuncas. And that the Inca might have the Acquaintance of the Cuyſmancu, and own him for his Confederate and Allie, rather than his Vaſſal, he was invited to accompany the General to Cozco; with with which Cuyſmancu was greatly pleaſed, having not onely the opportunity hereby to ſatisfie his curioſity in the ſight of that famous City, but to receive the honour of kiſſing the hands of the Inca.

The Inca Pachacutec, who at the beginning of this War, had ſeated himſelf in the Province of Rucana, was now upon the news of his Brother's good Succeſs returned back to Cozco, from whence he went to meet his Brother, and Son, welcoming them home with all the Joy and Triumph he was able; and having received Cuyſmancu with obliging Terms, and encouraging expreſſions, he commanded that he ſhould take his place in this ſolemnity amongſt the Incas of the Royal Bloud, of which Cuyſmancu was not more proud, than envied by his Curacas.

This Triumph being ſolemnized, the Inca gratified Cuyſmancu with many Honours, and diſpatched him to his own Countrey laden with his Favours; as he likewiſe did to the other Curacas, who accompanied him, and all returned greatly ſatisfied, proclaiming the Inca for the true Child of the Sun, and to be adored, and ſerved in all parts of the Univerſe. It is very obſervable: That ſo ſoon as the Devil ſaw, that the Inca was become Maſter of the Valley of Pachacamac, and that the Temple there was deſpoiled of all the little Images and Idols, which poſſeſſed it, he preſently contrived to make it a Habitation for himſelf, and to be there worſhipped for the unknown God; that he might vent his Lies and Deceits in all Shapes and forms, and ſet them to ſale with beſt advantage. To which end he whiſpered into the Ears of the moſt eminent Prieſts from all the corners of the Temple, telling them, that ſince the Temple was now freed of the falſe Idols which polluted it, he was ready to give anſwer to all the Queſtions and Demands which ſhould be enquired of him; not that he would attend to the frivolous and impertinent Queries of the common People, but onely to ſuch as ſhould be put to him by their Incas, and Princes, who were deſirous to be reſolved in matters of great importance, relating to the Government, and alterations of State and Religion. And that the common People alſo might not want a Director, he was pleaſed to commit the care of thoſe Reſolves to his Servant the Oracle Rimac, whom he had inſpired with Wiſedom to anſwer all their Enquiries. From which time it became a Cuſtome to conſult all matters of State with the Oracle Pachacamac, and to make common and vulgar Enquiries at Rimac; which becauſe they were many, and that this Oracle was ever ſolicited with a multitude of Demands, he was called the prating Oracle; for being obliged to anſwer all, it was neceſſary for him to talk much; the which paſſage Blas Valera touches briefly in his Hiſtory.

And now at length the Inca Pachacutec thought it convenient to deſiſt for ſome years from farther progreſs in his Conqueſts over the new Provinces, by which time of Peace his Armies would be able to recover and refreſh themſelves, and he having leiſure thereby to attend his Civil Government, might alſo have means to enoble his Kingdoms with magnificent Edifices, Laws, and Rites, and Ceremonies, agreeable to the new Reformation he was making in Religion, that ſo his Actions might correſpond with the ſignification of his Name, and his Fame eternized for a great and wiſe King in Government, for a ſanctified High-Prieſt in Religion, and for a great Captain in War; and indeed the truth is, he gained more Provinces than any of his Fore-fathers, and enriched the Temple more than any particular Inca before him; for he plated all the Walls with Leaves of Gold, both of the Temple, and Chambers and Cloiſters about it. In that place where formerly was the Image of the Sun, is now the Altar of the Bleſſed Sacrament; and thoſe Cloiſters ſerve now for Proceſſions at the times of Feſtivals; that Fabrick being now the Convent of St. Dominick: For which happy Alteration may the bleſſed Name of the Eternal Majeſty be for ever praiſed and exalted.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the Conqueſt over the King Chimu, and the cruel War againſt him.

AT the end of ſix years the Inca Pachacutec finding his Kingdoms rich and happy by the advantages of ſo long a Peace, commanded an Army of thirty thouſand Men to be raiſed to ſubdue thoſe Vallies which lie along the Coaſt of Caſſamarca, and which were the confines of his Empire, on the ſide, or at the foot of the high Mountain.

The Army being raiſed, was commanded by four Major Generals under his Son, the Prince Yupanqui, for he having been exerciſed for ſome years under the Inſtructions and Example of that famous Commander his Uncle, was now become ſo good a Proficient in War, that he was capable to conduct and lead an Army on the moſt difficult and hazardous Deſign. And for Yupanqui, Brother to the Inca, and whom he juſtly called his Right hand, he deſired to ſtay, and keep company with him, that ſo he might reſt, and take repoſe after his many and great labours; in reward of which, and for his Royal Vertues, he beſtowed upon him the Name and Title of his Lieutenant General, and ſecond Perſon in all matters and cauſes relating to War and Peace, with abſolute Power and Command in all parts of his Empire.

The Army being in a readineſs, the Prince marched with a Detachment of about ten thouſand Men by way of the Mountain, untill he came to the Province of Yauyu, which lies overagainſt the City of the Kings, or Kings-town, where he made ſome ſtay, untill the reſt of his Army was come up to him; with which being joined, he marched to Rimac, where the prating Oracle had its Temple. To this Prince Yupanqui the Indians attribute the honour of being the firſt who made Diſcovery of the South-Sea, and ſubdued many Provinces in thoſe parts, as will appear more at large in the Hiſtory of his Life. The Prince being in thoſe parts, was met by the Curaca of Pachacamac, called Cuyſmancu, and of Runahuanac, named Chuquimancu, who with their Souldiers received him with much Honour, and with intention to ſerve him in the War; and the Prince on the other ſide gratified them with demonſtrations of his uſual Favours and Bounty. From the Valley of Rimac they went to viſit the Temple of Pachacamac, where they entred with a profound ſilence, without vocal Prayer or Sacrifice, onely with ſigns of mental Devotion, as we have before expreſſed. Thence he made his Viſit to the Temple of the Sun, where he offered many Sacrifices, and other gifts both of Gold and Silver. And to pleaſe the Yuncas he viſited the Idol Rimac, and in compliance with the late Capitulations between the Inca and them, he commanded many Sacrifices to be offered, and enquiry to be made of that Oracle concerning the ſucceſs of that expedition; to which having received anſwer that the deſign ſhould be proſperous, he marched forward to that Valley which the Indians called Huaman, and named now by the Spaniards the Barranca; from whence he ſent his uſual Summons to a certain Lord called Chimu, who commanded all the Vallies reaching from the Barranca to the City Truxillo, and are many in number; but the chief and moſt principal of them are five, namely Parmunca, Hualmi, Santa, Huanapu and Chimu, which is the Countrey in which Truxillo is ſituated, and are all five moſt pleaſant and fruitfull Vallies, and well peopled; the Prince giving himſelf the Title of the powerfull Chimu from the name of that Province where he kept his Court. He alſo took on himſelf the Title of King, being feared and honoured by all his Neighbours, who bordered on his Countrey, that is to the Eaſt, North and South; for to the Weſt he was confined by the Sea.

This great and powerfull Chimu having received theſe Summons, gave a quick Anſwer, That he was ready with his Weapons in his Hands to defend his Countrey, Laws and Liberties; that he would not know, nor receive new Gods; and that that the Inca ſhould take this for a poſitive Anſwer, without ſeeking farther Reſolution or Query in the caſe. Upon this Anſwer the Prince Yupanqui marched as far as the Valley Parmunca, where he expected to meet and engage with his Enemy, and had not long attended before they appeared with a ſtrong band of Souldiers, who readily made trial of the Force and Valour of the Incas; the Fight was ſharp and long, in defence of a Paſs, which, notwithſtanding the reſiſtence made by them, the Incas poſſeſſed, and lodged themſelves in it, many being ſlain and wounded on both ſides.

At length the Prince obſerving the reſolution with which theſe Yuncas defended themſelves, and that this confidence proceeded from a contempt of his ſmall numbers, ſent unto his Father an account of all his proceedings, deſiring him to ſupply him with a recruit of twenty thouſand Men, not that he would relieve his Army, as he had formerly done, and thereby give time and breath to the Enemy, but that he might be enabled to fall upon them with a double force.

Theſe Advices being diſpatched to the Inca, the Prince cloſely attended to all the advantages of War, in which he found himſelf much aſſiſted by the two Curacas of Pachacamac, and Runahuanac, who having formerly been mortal Enemies to Chimu on the old Quarrels about their Confines, and Paſturage, making one the other Slaves and Vaſſals, did with great animoſity and malice take this opportunity in conjunction with the Inca, to vent their malice, and ſatisfie their revenge, which the Chimu did more ſenſibly feel than any other circumſtance, and therefore heated with anger and indignation prepared the more obſtinately to defend themſelves.

Thus did the War become moſt cruel and bloudy being encreaſed by the ancient animoſities between the Yuncas, which they exerciſed one againſt the other in ſervice of the Inca, and which was ſo ſharp, that in few days the Inca gained the Valley of Parmunca, driving the Natives out, and forcing them to retire into the Valley of Huallmi, where alſo happened many Skirmiſhes, and engagements, and being alſo driven from thence, they fled into the Valley of Sancta, eſteemed the moſt pleaſant and delightfull place in thoſe days of any upon the Sea-Coaſt, though now it remains almoſt deſolate, becauſe the Natives have deſtroyed both this, and all the other Vallies.

The Inhabitants of Sancta appeared more warlike than thoſe of Huallmi and Parmunca, ſo that Skirmiſhes and Battels frequently happened; and ſometimes with that equality of Fortune, that they gained the Honour and Reputation of good Souldiers in the eſteem of the Incas, and raiſed the hopes of the great Chimu; for he flattering himſelf with the valour and courage of his own Souldiers; and entertaining fancies and imaginations to himſelf, that this Prince, who had been educated in the ſoftneſs of his Father's Court, would quickly be tired with the long continued rudeneſs of War, and ſo be deſirous to enjoy the pleaſures of peace and quietneſs at home; that the natural deſire alſo of his Souldiers to ſee their Wives and Families, would cool their ardour and heat towards the War; and that the heat of the Countrey would abate their Mettle, and incline them to a lazy Humour, or elſe cauſe Diſeaſes and Indiſpoſitions amongſt them; with which vain imagination the reſolute Chimu entertaining his thoughts, refuſed to hearken to any Propoſitions which the Inca from time to time offered to them; but rather reinforcing his Army with all the recruits thoſe Vallies could contribute, he renewed the War with freſh vigour and courage, ſo that many being killed and wounded daily on both ſides, 'twas accounted the moſt difficult and bloudy War that was ever waged at any time by the Incas. Howſoever the Captains and Curacas of Chimu, who with due conſideration weighed the true ſtate and condition of Affairs, knew well that this oppoſition could not continue long, but that either ſooner or later they muſt yield unto the Enemy; and therefore inwardly were enclinable to hearken unto Propoſitions of Peace and Friendſhip, though in reſpect to the Will and Pleaſure of their Lord, they patiently endured all the labours and dangers of War, not daring to expreſs their opinions to the contrary, untill ſuch time as they ſaw their Wives and Children ſeized and carried into ſlavery.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of the Miseries and Sufferings of the Great Chimu; and of his Obstinacy therein; and how at length he was forced to yield.

WHilst the War was thus carried on with great resolution, the twenty thousand Souldiers which the Prince had demanded for a recruit to his Army arrived, which much abated the haughty and confident humour of Chimu, finding, to his great sorrow, all his hopes and expectations disappointed; for on one side he perceived the force and strength of the Inca to be doubled, when he supposed, or imagined it to be decreased; and on the other, he found the spirit and courage of his own people to be dejected and terrified with the appearance of a new Army; being of opinion, that they were now rather to fight in compliance with the humour of their Prince, than in hopes of making defence against the power of the Enemy: Wherefore being much dismayed and terrified, the chief and principal Lords addressed themselves to Chimu, advising him not to contend, or hold out untill the last extremity, but rather accept the offers and propositions made to them by the Inca; there being no reason to persist longer in this obstinacy, which would give opportunity to their inveterate Enemies to enrich themselves with their spoils, carrying away their Wives and Children into slavery: To prevent which, no farther delays ought to be made, lest their lasting obstinacy should provoke the Inca beyond all sufferance, and bowels of humane compassion; and that casting away the terms of Mercy, he should entirely extirpate their race with fire and sword.

With this discourse and admonition of his Friends, (which seemed rather like Menaces, than wholsome counsel) the brave Chimu lost his wonted courage, not knowing what to doe, or unto whom to fly for succour; all his Neighbours and Allies fainting under the same dread and fear of the Inca: So that at length not knowing where to turn, he resolved to accept the first offers and propositions which should be made to him by the Inca; for his great Soul could not bear a submission in Person, or that the first proffers should come from him, lest it should betray a meanness of his Spirit, but rather that the Proposals and Articles of Peace should come to him from the Inca. And in the mean time covering this his intention to his own people, he encouraged them to continue the War; telling them, that he had still hopes, and did not fear with the help and valour of his people, but to conclude this War with great honour and advantage. And therefore he encouraged them to stand up in the defence of their Countrey, for whose sake and safety they were obliged to dye with Weapons in their hands, and not for every small disaster to faint and yield; it being the manner of War to be doubtfull, and to lose that one day, which they might re-gain the next: If they were troubled to have seen some of their Wives and Children carried into slavery, that they should comfort themselves with the thoughts, that they had the advantage of their Enemy in that particular, having made greater Depredations on their Wives, than they ever did upon theirs. And therefore that they should not shew any Despondency of mind, but rather trust to his judgment and persuasions, who had more care of their safety than he had of his own.

With these faint encouragements and counsels, rather than with solid hope, the Great Chimu dismissed his people, amongst whom he was much troubled to find such dejected and disconsolate countenances; howsoever, putting the best face he could on the business, he maintained the War, untill such time as the usual Propositions came from the Inca, offering pardon, peace and friendship according to the accustomed style often and often repeated. Having heard the Proposals pronounced again to him, he seemed to entertain them with the same indifferency as formerly; howſoever, as if he were become a little more pliable than he had been, he anſwered, that for his part, he continued in the ſame reſolution never to condeſcend, unleſs for the good and quiet of his Subjects, whom he would therefore conſult, and act according to their Directions and Reſolves; and ſo having aſſembled his Relations and Captains, he acquainted them with the Propoſitions of the Inca, and that they ſhould conſider of them, and of their own welfare; for if it were their opinion to ſubmit, and obey, he would prefer their will and ſafety, before his own Honour, or Sovereignty.

The Captains were over-joyed to find their Curaca thus to meet their deſires, and to recede from that principle, which would have been their deſtruction; and thereupon took the liberty to tell him, that it was reaſonable and juſt to yield unto ſuch a mercifull Prince, as was the Inca, conſidering that when it was in his power to have ſubdued them by force, he would rather invite them by the terms of Mercy. This being the general ſenſe of all the people, it was pronounced with a confidence of Free-men, and not with the awe and reverence of Vaſſals; and therewith the Great Chimu being alſo convinced, and aſſenting, diſpatched his Ambaſſadours to the Prince Yupanqui, ſupplicating, that he would be pleaſed to diſpenſe one Ray of that mercy and compaſſion to him and his Subjects, which like the bright Children of the Sun, they had caſt upon all the four quarters of the World, which were ſubjected to their power: the which he with the more confidence implored, having had ſuch frequent examples and precedents of Clemency and Juſtice, which both his Father the Inca, and others of his Anceſtors, had daily and freely imparted to Mankind; and therefore he was no leſs aſſured of his indulgence towards his Subjects, who had leſs fault than himſelf, having rather continued in their rebellion by his inſtigation and encouragement, than by any inclination or perverſeneſs in themſelves.

The Prince being well ſatisfied with this Embaſſy, that he might ſpare the effuſion of that bloud which he had ſo long feared, received the Ambaſſadours according to his accuſtomed grace and favour, encouraging them to lay aſide all apprehenſions of diſtruſt; and for better aſſurance thereof, he adviſed them to bring their Curaca with them, that he might perſonally hear his Pardon and Abſolution pronounced by the mouth of the Inca himſelf, and receive favours and preſents from his own hand.

The brave Chimu having abated the haughtineſs of his ſpirit, with much humility and ſubmiſſion preſented himſelf before the Inca, and proſtrating with his face in the Duſt, often repeated the ſame ſupplications, which he had made by his Ambaſſadours: And in this poſture continued, untill the Prince, being greatly affected with the ſenſe of his afflictions, commanded two of his Captains to raiſe him from the Earth; and then told him, that he did not onely pardon him whatſoever was paſt; but aſſured him, that he could have done much more, in caſe he had committed greater offences. That he was not come into his Countrey to deprive him of his State, but to improve, and make it better; inſtructing them in ſuch Laws both of Religion and Civil government, as would greatly advantage their condition and happineſs of living: And in evidence hereof, that Chimu might be ſenſible that he was not to loſe his Eſtate and Government; he did here freely reſign it again into his hands, promiſing unto him all ſecurity in the enjoyment thereof; conditionally, that rejecting and deſtroying all their Idols which repreſented Fiſh, and other Animals, they ſhould Worſhip and Adore no other than the Sun.

Chimu being thus cheared up, and comforted with the pleaſant countenance, and obliging expreſſions of the Inca; again bowed himſelf, and adored him; and told him, that he was ſorry for nothing ſo much, as that he had not yielded to his firſt Summons; and though his Highneſs was ſo Gratious as to pardon this fault, yet he could not forgive himſelf, being reſolved to puniſh himſelf for this crime by a perpetual penance, and grief, and lamentation for it in his heart; and that as to Religion, or Cuſtoms, or Laws, he ſhould impoſe what he pleaſed, and they ſhould be readily received.

With theſe Conditions the Peace was concluded, and the Chimu yielded to Subjection and Vaſſalage; and thereupon both he and his Nobles were veſted and honoured. After which, for the improvement and adornment of their Countrey, Orders were given to erect Royal Edifices, and make Aqueducts and Chanels for carrying Water into their Arable Lands; and for enlarging the Grounds for planting and ſowing, and all manner of Agriculture. Store-houſes alſo were erected wherein to lay the proportion of thoſe Fruits which belonged to the Sun, and to the Inca; and for receiving ſuch Proviſions as were made againſt the times of famine, or years of ſcarcity; all which was agreeable to the ancient and laudable cuſtoms and care practiſed by the Incas: More particularly in the Valley of Parmunca, the Prince commanded, that a Fortreſs ſhould be built, and there to remain for a perpetual remembrance and ſignal Trophy of their Victory obtained againſt the King of Chimu, having been the place and ſeat of a bloudy War. The Fort was ſtrengthened with great Art, and adorned with Paintings, and other curioſities: Howſoever, theſe rarities could not adminiſter conſideration to unconcerned Strangers and Foreigners ſufficient to ſpare them, and free them from being demoliſhed; howſoever, they are not ſo totally deſtroyed, but that ſtill ſome ruines remain to ſhew the compaſs and circumference of that Work.

Things being quieted and ſetled in Chimu, Garriſons eſtabliſhed, and Miniſters appointed both for Civil Government and Matters of Religious Worſhip; the Prince took his farewell of Chimu, who was greatly ſatisfied to ſee himſelf continued in his Power and Rule; and then the Prince returned to Cozco, where he was received with the uſual ſolemnity, and the Feſtivals of Triumph celebrated for the ſpace of a Month.

CHAP. XXXIV.

How the Inca improved his Empire, and of his other Actions till the time of his Death.

THE Inca Pachacutec being by this time grown aged, began to ſtudy his quiet and repoſe, reſolving not to engage himſelf farther in War for the enlargement of his Empire, having already extended the ſame 130 Leagues North and South, and in breadth as far as it is from the ſnowy Mountain unto the Sea, which is 70 Leagues Eaſt and Weſt; and all in order to the propagation of thoſe received principles from their Anceſtors, which were to doe benefit to Mankind, reducing them to rules of Morality and good manners.

He planted many Colonies in dry and barren Countries, having by his Chanels of Water made them fruitfull.

He erected many Temples to the Sun, and Monaſteries for the Select Virgins, after the form and model of that at Cozco. He alſo made many Store-houſes for Corn and Victuals, and for Arms, wherewith to ſupply his Army in their march, and maintain his people in the time of ſcarcity, and alſo built ſeveral Palaces on the great Roads for better accommodation of the Incas in their Travels. In ſhort, he reformed every thing that was amiſs in the whole Empire, and added to his Religion many new Rites and Ceremonies, and introduced many laudable Cuſtoms, and new Laws, tending to the better regulation of Moral life: He ejected many of the Idols formerly Worſhipped by his Subjects out of the Temples, and forbad many barbarous and abominable cuſtoms in uſe amongſt them.

And that he might ſhew himſelf as great a Captain and Souldier, as he was a King and Prieſt, he reformed the Militia, inſtructing them in the Diſcipline of War; and for encouragement of his Souldiery, he eſtabliſhed new favours and honours for thoſe that ſhould deſerve them. He alſo enlarged and beautified the great City of Cozco with ſumptuous Buildings, and ſupplied it with new Citizens and Inhabitants; and particularly he erected a Palace for himſelf near thoſe Schools, which his Great Grandfather Roca had founded: For which Magnificent actions, and for his ſweet and gentle diſpoſition, he was beloved and adored like another Jupiter. He reigned fifty years, and, as ſome ſay, ſeventy; during all which time, he lived in great peace and prosperity; at the end of which he dyed, being universally lamented by his Subjects, having his place allotted to him amongst the Kings his Predecessors, and enrolled in the List and Number of their Gods. He was embalmed according to the custome of their Countrey; and his Obsequies performed with cries, and sighs, and sacrifices, and other ceremonies of Funeral, which continued for the space of a whole year.

He left the Universal inheritance of his Empire to his Eldest Son Yupanqui, and his Wife and Sister Coya Anahuarque, besides which he left above three hundred Sons and Daughters; and that in all, with legitimate and natural Children, he made up the number of more than four hundred; and yet the Indians esteem these but few, considering they were the issue of so great, and so good a Father.

The Spanish Historians confound the Names of this Father and Son in one denomination, calling the Father Yupanqui, and the Son Inca, whereas Inca was the Royal Title, as Augustus was to the Emperours. The cause of this mistake amongst the Spaniards arises from the Indians themselves, who having occasion to mention these two Kings, say Pachacutec Inca, Yupanqui; which the Spaniards misunderstanding, take to be one person, and so confound the Father with the Son; though, in reality, the Indians make great difference, distinguishing this Yupanqui from his Father and others by the sirname of Yupac, which is as much as to say (resplendent) in like manner they distinguish another Inca Yupanqui, by the Father of Huayna Capac, and another Yupanqui by the Grandfather of Huascar; and so give some distinction to them all, which I denote for better clearing the History to observing and intelligent Readers.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Schools which he founded and enlarged, and of the Laws he made for good Government.

BLas Valera discoursing of this Inca, hath these following words: " Viracocha " being dead, and placed by the Indians, amongst the number of their Gods, " the Grand Titu his Son succeeded in his Throne by the Name of Manco Capac, " untill such time as his Father gave him the Name of Pachacutec, which signifies " as much, as if they should call him the Reformer of the World: the which " Name was verified by the many famous Actions he performed, and the many " wise Sentences and Proverbs which he uttered; the which were so excellent and " renowned, that having deserved that August Title, the former Name began to " be forgotten. This Inca governed his Empire with that vigilance, prudence and " courage both in War and Peace, that he not onely enlarged it towards all the " four quarters of the World, which they called Tavantinsuyu, but strengthened " and corroborated it by such excellent Laws and Statutes, as were judged worthy " to be confirmed by the Wisedom of our Catholick Kings; those onely excepted, which had respect to the Idolatrous Rites of their Religion, and to the " permissions of their Incestuous Marriages. This Inca, above all things, amplified and endowed with Honours and Revenues those Schools which the Inca Rocca had first founded at Cozco: He encreased the number of Masters and Teachers; commanding, that no Officer, Captain or Souldier, should be capable of " any Honour, Office or Dignity, but he onely that could speak, and who was " knowing and skilfull in the Language of Cozco. And that no person might " plead excuse for his ignorance therein, he ordained and appointed several Masters to teach that Tongue to all the Nobles, and to others capable to serve in " publick employment; so that the Language of Cozco became the common and " universal Tongue of all Peru: However of late (I know not how) by negligence

" of Officers, 'tis almoſt loſt and forgotten, to the great damage and obſtruction " of the Goſpel. Such Indians as to theſe days retain that Language, are much bet- " ter civilized, and more intelligent than thoſe others, who are as groſs and cor- " rupt in their Manners, as they are in their Language.

" It was this Pachacutec who prohibited all perſons, unleſs they were Princes, " and of the Bloud-Royal, to wear Gold or Silver, or pretious Stones, or Fea- " thers of divers colours, or the fine ſort of Goats Wool, which they had learned " to Weave with admirable Art. He commanded, that upon the firſt days of " the new Moon, and other days of Feſtival, they ſhould go decently, but not " gaily dreſſed; by which means he made moderate cloathing to become a faſhion, " which to this day is obſerved by the Indians, who are Tributaries; and hath " that good effect upon them, that thereby they are freed from the danger of bad " Arts, which oftentimes neceſſitate Men to exerciſe unlawfull contrivances for " the ſake of fine cloathing, and gay apparel. Though indeed at preſent thoſe " Indians who are Servants to Spaniards, or live amongſt them, are become greatly " corrupt in that particular, not valuing their honour or conſciences in compariſon " with the gallantry and finery of their Apparel. This Inca likewiſe enjoyned great " temperance in Eating, though he gave more liberty to the Commonalty, as well " as the Princes, in the exceſs of Drink. He ordained particular Officers to " overſee, and take notice of idle Perſons, and Vagabonds, not ſuffering any per- " ſon to want buſineſs, or employment, but to ſerve his Father, or his Maſter, " ſo that Children of five or ſix years of Age were not excuſed from ſome em- " ployment and work agreeable to their years. Even the lame, and blind, and " dumb had ſome ſort of work put into their hands; the Old Men and Women " were ſet to affright away the Crows and Birds from the Corn, and thereby gai- " ned their Bread and Cloathing. And leſt Men, by reaſon of continual labour " and toil, ſhould become weary, and their lives burthenſome, he provided, that " for their better eaſe, they ſhould have three Days of repoſe and divertiſement " in every Moon, by which they accounted their Month: He appointed three " Fairs in every Month, to be held at the end of every nine Days; ſo that ſuch as " lived in the Villages might at the end of the Week find a Market, at which to " vend the Commodities they had made and worked: With occaſion of which " meeting and concourſe of people, they heard and learned thoſe Rules and Or- " dinances which the Inca and his Counſel publiſhed and proclaimed, though af- " terwards this King, for the better convenience of his people, appointed Markets " to be held every day in the City, which they call Catu, and ſo remain unto " this time: onely the Fairs he appointed to be kept on Feſtival-days for the grea- " ter ſolemnity and divertiſement of the people. He made a Law, that every " Province and City ſhould aſſign Limits and Boundaries to their Mountains, Pa- " ſtures, Woods, Rivers, Lakes, and Arable Lands, which they claimed and chal- " lenged, and ſo to remain for perpetual ſignals of their Rights and Inheritance, " that ſo no Governour, or Curaca, might dare to encroach thereupon, or extend " his authority, or juriſdiction, beyond them; but that the Inhabitants might en- " joy freely their own poſſeſſions without any diſturbance from Aliens, or peo- " ple of the Neighbouring Provinces: In like manner the Royal Rents belong- " ing to the Sun, and the Inca, were aſſigned, which the Indians were to plow and " ſow, and gather the fruits of them according to thoſe rules and meaſures which " are before preſcribed by their Agrarian Law. Hence appears the errour of thoſe " who affirm, that the Indians allowed no right or propriety in their Inheritances: " For though the proportion of Lands was not ſet out by any exact meaſures of " poſſeſſion, yet every Man's labour gave him a title to that Land which he was " able to Manure; for it was an Ancient cuſtome of the Indians to meet together, " and Manure not onely the Lands belonging to the publick, but ſuch alſo as " were the poſſeſſions of particular perſons, which every one appropriated to him- " ſelf by the right of that labour which he had beſtowed upon it: For the man- " ner was for the people to meet together, and then in the firſt place to plow and " ſow the Lands belonging to particular men, aſſiſting each other with common " labour: Then they employed themſelves in Manuring the Lands belonging to " the Sun and Inca, with common labour, obſerving the like rule in reaping and " gathering in the Fruits in times of Harveſt, and lodging them in the Royal Re- " poſitories, or Store-houſes. By the ſame help, and almoſt by the ſame com- " mon conſent they built their Houſes, the Neighbourhood being appointed and

" obliged thereunto by Orders of the Common Council within the reſpective " Precincts; to which the people ſo readily concurred, and willingly contribu- " ted to ſupply the neceſſities of each other, that in a very ſhort time they ran " up a Houſe, or Cottage, agreeable to the minds of thoſe Inhabitants: the " which cuſtome being very beneficial to the people, was afterwards made into " a Law, and confirmed by the authority of the Incas: And this uſefull aſſiſtence " which ſome Indians do unto this day afford unto each other, is like the Precepts " of our Chriſtian Charity: And where this Rule is neglected by ſome covetous " and ſelfiſh Indians, there the common good is injured and abuſed by thoſe who " are neither uſefull to themſelves nor others.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of many other Laws introduced by the Inca Pachacutec, and of his Sentences and Wiſe Sayings.

" IN fine, this King, with the aſſiſtence and wiſedom of his Counſel, having " reviewed and weighed the ſeveral Laws, Statutes and Cuſtoms in uſe and " practice amongſt the many Nations and Provinces which he had reduced, con- " firmed thoſe of them which were good and profitable, and abrogated thoſe " which interfered with the common peace, and were repugnant to the Majeſty " and Sovereign Dignity of the Inca; to which he added many other Laws againſt " Blaſphemers, Paricides, Homicides and Traytors to the Inca, alſo againſt Adul- " terers of both Sexes; againſt thoſe who forcibly ſtole away Daughters out of " the Houſes of their Parents, or by violence committed Rapes on the Bodies of " Women, or attempted the Chaſtity of the Select Virgins, or robbed, or purloi- " ned, or burned Houſes, or were guilty of Inceſt in the right line. Beſides " which, he added many Rites and Ceremonies to be obſerved in their Sacrifices, " and confirmed thoſe ancient Inſtitutions of his Anceſtors, relating unto their " Temples and Religion. He alſo confirmed theſe ancient Laws following: " Namely, That Children ſhould obey and ſerve their Parents untill the Age of " twenty five years; and that all contracts of Marriage before that time, without " the conſent of Parents on both ſides, were void and null; and that Children " born in that condition were Baſtards, and Illegitimate; but if in caſe, in the " Eſtate of ſuch Matrimony, the conſent and approbation of Parents ſhould after- " wards be obtained, then were the Children eſteemed Legitimate, and reſtored " to the privileges of lawfull Inheritance. He moreover approved and confirmed " the Eſtates which were appropriated to the maintenance of Lordſhips and Seig- " niories according to the ancient cuſtoms of Kingdoms and Provinces, in which " caſes the Judges were not to receive Fees or Rewards for Judgment. Many o- " ther Laws were made by this Inca of leſs conſideration, the particulars of which, " for brevity ſake, we omit; and ſhall hereafter diſcourſe more fully of thoſe " Laws which he made for Regulation of Judges, of Matrimonial Contracts, and " of the Teſtaments of perſons deceaſed, and of what he inſtituted about Mili- " tary Diſcipline, and the account to be obſerved in the courſe and circle of the " year. In this Age of ours Don Franciſco de Toledo, changed and altered many of " thoſe Laws and Statutes which were made by this Inca, in which the Indians ob- " ſerving and admiring his abſolute and uncontrollable power, gave him the " Name of Pachacutec the Second, which is as much as to ſay, the Reformer of " the Reformers; and ſo great was that reverence which they bore to that Inca, " that even to this day his Memory is dear and pretious to them. Thus far are the words of Blas Valera, which I found amongſt his looſe Papers; all other matters which he wrote concerning Judges and Marriages, with the account of their Militia, and the course of their year were all lost, which was a general damage to the whole World. Howsoever, in a scattered leaf, I found some Sententious Sayings of this Inca Pachacutec, which are these which follow.

When the Subjects, Captains and Curacas heartily and willingly obey their Prince, then doth the Nation enjoy perfect peace and quietness.

Envy is a Cancer which eats and gnaws into the bowels of the Envious.

He that is envious, and is envied, hath a double torment.

Better is it that thou shouldst be envied by others for being good, than that thou shouldst envy others, because thou art bad. He that envies others, hurts himself.

He that envies good Men, contracts evil unto himself, as the Spider draws and sucks poison from flowers.

Drunkenness, anger and folly are equally mischievous; differing onely in this, that the two first are transient and mutable, but the third permanent and continuing.

He that kills another without the authority of Justice, passes sentence upon himself. He that slays another like himself, must necessarily dye for it, and pay the punishment with his own life: for which reason the Kings, Our Royal Progenitors, did ordain, that whosoever killed another, should pay the price of blood with his own life.

Thieves are not upon any terms to be tolerated, because they are a generation who would rather live upon prey and robbery, than gain riches by honest labour, or enjoy their possessions by a lawfull title.

Adulterers, who take away the good reputation and honesty of another Family, are disturbers of the common peace and quiet, and are as bad as Thieves and Robbers, and therefore to be condemned to the Gallows without mercy.

A truly noble and courageous spirit is best tried by that patience which he shews in the times of adversity.

Impatience is the character of a poor and degenerate spirit, and of one that is ill taught and educated.

When Subjects are obedient, their Kings and Governours ought to treat them with gentleness and clemency; but the perverse and obstinate are to be ruled with a severity and rigour moderated by prudence.

Judges, who are corrupted by Gifts clandestinely received from Plaintiff or Defendant, are to be esteemed for Thieves, and to be punished for such with capital punishment.

Governours ought to have a special eye unto two things; first, that they themselves observe and execute the Laws of their Prince, and not suffer others to transgress them: And next, that they seriously consider, and contrive all matters which may tend to the good and benefit of their respective Provinces. That Indian who knows not how to govern his own Family, will be much less capable to rule a Kingdom.

A Physician, or Herbalist, who knows the Names, but is ignorant of the Virtues and Qualities of Herbs; or he who knows few, but is ignorant of most, is a mere Quack and Mountebank in Physick; and deserves not the name and repute of a Physician, untill he is skilfull, as well in the Noxious, as the Salutiferous qualities of Herbs.

He that would pretend to count the number of the Stars is a Fool, and worthy to be derided.

These are the Sayings and Sentences of the Inca Pachacutec, which were conserved in memory by their Knots, they having not attained to the more ready way of letters or cyphers.

CHAP. I.

Of the Colonies planted by the Incas, and of the two different Languages in Peru.

IT was a cuſtome amongſt the Incas to tranſplant the people from one Province to another, that is, from barren Lands and Countries, to more fruitfull and pleaſant ſoils, whereby both the government was ſecured from rebellion, and the condition of the people advantaged by a happy and profitable exchange: In performance of which deſign, the Incas had always a reſpect to the condition and quality of the people, and the temperature of the climate; tranſplanting thoſe who had been born and bred in hot or cold Regions, into Countries of the ſame degree, and equal temper of heat and cold. Likewiſe in Provinces where the people multiplied greatly, and were become too numerous to be contained within the limits and compaſs of it; then did they ſubtract from thence ſuch a number as might eaſe the Province, and ſupply the wants of other places. The like was practiſed in Collao, which is a Province of 120 Leagues in length, containing ſeveral other Nations under its juriſdiction: This Countrey being very cold, produced neither Mayz, which is Indian Wheat, nor Uchu, which is Red Pepper, and yet it abounds with Pulſe, and all ſorts of leſſer Grane, ſuch as that they call Papa and Quirua, which do not grow in hot Countries; and is alſo rich in Flocks and Herds of Cattel. From all thoſe cold Provinces they tranſplanted great numbers of Indians to the Eaſtward by the Mountains of Antis, and to the Weſtward along the Sea-coaſt, where lyes a vaſt Countrey, containing many large and fruitfull Vallies, which produced Mayz and Red Pepper in great abundance, and which before the times of the Incas, for want of the Art and Knowledge of making Aqueducts and Chanels for watring the Furrows of their Land, lay wholly diſpeopled and deſerted. The Incan Kings having well conſidered the benefit of theſe improvements, did frequently tranſplant their people from the barren, to more commodious and happy ſoils; and for their refreſhment in thoſe Plantations, furniſhed them with a quantity of Water ſufficient for their Lands; making it a Law, that they ſhould ſuccour and help one the other, and by bartering their commodities one for the other, what one wanted was ſupplied by the other. By theſe means alſo the Incas ſecured their own Revenue, which was paid them in Mayz or Indian Wheat, for (as we have ſaid before) one third of their Fruits which their Lands produced, did belong to the Sun, and another third to the Inca.

Moreover by this courſe the Incas were ſupplied with great quantities of Mayz, for maintenance of their Armies in that cold and barren Countrey; ſo that the Collas were able to carry great quantities of Quinua and Chinu, and great ſlices of that which they called Charqui, to their Kindred in other Plantations, and in exchange and barter for them, returned home laden with Mayz, and red Pepper, and other Fruits which thoſe Countries yielded; which commodious way of trade was of great benefit and conſolation to the Indians.

Pedro Cieça de Leon, in the 99th Chapter of his Book, diſcourſing of this manner of mutual Commerce, ſaith, " That in fruitfull Years the Inhabitants of Col-
" lao live with contentment and plenty, but in dry years they ſuffer great wants,
" and ſcarcity of all Proviſions. The truth is, had not the Incan-King preſcribed
" excellent Laws for the government of this People, and ordered every thing
" with a provident and induſtrious regard, certainly theſe Countries would have " laboured under great penury and wants, and perhaps have relapſed into the ſame
" beſtial condition, in which they once were before the times of the Incas. And
" thus much I affirm, becauſe I know that the Climate under which the Collas in" habited, is cold, and therefore not ſo fruitfull as the warmer Regions of more " happy Countries. And in regard the mountains of Andes did border on all
" ſides of thoſe Colonies; it was ordered, that all parts ſhould iſſue forth a cer" tain number of Indians, with their Wives and Children, who being planted ac" cording to the direction of their Caciques in ſuch places, as were convenient,
" might improve their Lands, and by Induſtry and Art ſupply that which was " wanting by nature; which People were called Mitimaes, and were ſo obedient,
" and obſervant to their Lords and Captains, that to this day they are Drudges
" to them, their principal care and buſineſs being to manure and cultivate the Co-
" ca Plantations, which are ſo pretious and profitable, that though in all Collao
" they neither ſow nor reap Mayz, yet neither the Lords, who are Natives, nor " the Common People, who are induſtrious, do want ſufficient quantities of " Mayz, Honey, and all other Fruits, in exchange for their Coca. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, extracted verbatim from his Original Writings.

Moreover they tranſplanted the people ſometimes on other occaſions, when having ſubdued ſome warlike and ſtubborn Nation, which being remote from Cozco, might be apt to rebell, then in ſuch caſe of ſuſpicion or jealouſie, to prevent all danger of Mutinies, their practice was, to tranſplant the people from their own ſoil to ſome other Countrey, nearer, and within the reach of the Inca, where finding themſelves encompaſſed with loyal Subjects, and friends to the Government, more eaſily ſubmitted their Necks to the Yoke, and ſo became faithfull againſt their own Inclinations. When any of theſe Exchanges were made of Colonies, they were always accompanied with ſome of thoſe whom the firſt Inca Manco Capac had honoured with the Title of being Incas by privilege; and theſe were ſuch as were appointed to govern and inſtruct the others. The title of theſe Incas was an honour to all thoſe whom they accompanied, ſo that they were much more honoured and reſpected by the neighbouring and adjacent People. The Colonies which were thus tranſplanted were called by the common Name of Mitmac.

Another piece of their policy much conducing to the regular Government of their Empire, was a Command and an Injunction laid upon all their Vaſſals, obliging them to learn the Language of the Court, which to this day is called the common or univerſal Tongue; for the teaching of which, certain Maſters, who were Incas by privilege, were appointed and ordained to inſtruct the People in it; beſides which the Incas had a Court-language appropriated to themſelves, which being eſteemed the holy and divine Speech, was not to be prophaned by vulgar Tongues. This, as they write me from Peru, is entirely loſt; for the Empire of the Incas being ruined, their Language ran the common fate of their other Regalities. The Reaſons why the Incan-Kings did command that one common Language ſhould be uſed, was for two reſpects, firſt to avoid the multitude of Interpreters, which would be neceſſary for underſtanding the variety of Languages ſpoken within the Juriſdiction of that great Empire. And in the next place the Incas entertained a particular ſatisfaction when they could ſpeak their own words unto their Subjects, and not be beholding to the Tongue of another; believing alſo that their Subjects with much more chearfulneſs received the gratious Speeches of their Prince from his own mouth, than when they were conveyed to them by the breath of their Officers: but the chief Reaſon and Ground of this policy was in reference to foreign Nations, who for want of common Speech and Dialect, were ſubject to miſunderſtandings, whence Enmities and cruel Wars aroſe amongſt them; for appeaſing which, and reconciling their Affections, nothing ſeemed more probably conducing than a communication in ſpeech, whereby all Miſunderſtandings might be obviated, and the People be induced to love each other, as if they were of the ſame Family and Parentage. With this artifice the Incas reconciled different Nations in a ſtrict alliance, who had before been divided in their Idolatry, Cuſtoms and Manners of Living, and ſo effectual hath this Expedient been, that Nations who have hated each other, have thereby been allured into amity and friendſhip by it. The which good effect being obſerved by many Countries, who had not as yet attained the happineſs of being Subjects to this Empire, was a means to invite them to the Study of this general Language of Cozco; the which they having learned, and thereby Nations of different Tongues underſtanding each other, their Affections were reconciled by it, being from mortal Enemies become Confederates and Allies. Howſoever by this new Government of the Spaniards, many of the Nations who affected the Cozcan Tongue, have now forgotten it, the which Blas Valera confirms in theſe words:

" It was the Command, ſays he, of the Incas, that all Nations ſhould ſpeak " the ſame Language, though now in theſe days, by whoſe fault I know not, " the ſame hath been loſt and forgotten in many Provinces; the which hath " proved a great interruption to the ſpreading of the Goſpel, which hath much " increaſed in the adjacent parts of Cozco, where that Tongue is uſed, and where " that people are much more civil, and docible than in other parts. Theſe are the words of Blas Valera, to which he adds in another Chapter, " That the ge- " neral Language of Peru ought not to be loſt, but rather taught and kept up " by practice amongſt the people, ſo that the Preachers of the Goſpel may have " but one Tongue to learn, and not be forced for every Province to ſtudy a " different Speech, which would be a task and labour not to be overcome.

CHAP. II.

That the Great Lords of Provinces ſent their Eldeſt Sons to be educated in the Court of the Incas, and their Reaſons for it.

THE Incan-Kings enjoined all the Lords of their Vaſſals to ſend their eldeſt Sons to be educated at their Court, that ſo they might imbibe certain good Principles of Learning and Religion in their tender years, and being accuſtomed to a converſation and familiarity with the Incas might contract a friendſhip and an affection for their Perſons and Government; and theſe were called Mitmac, which is as much as Domeſticks, or of the Family. Moreover it ſhewed the Grandeur of the Court to be frequented by the Preſence and Service of all the young Heirs to thoſe Kingdoms, States and Provinces which depended on that Empire; by which means the Language of the Court became more general and common, being learned with eaſe and pleaſure; for it being the cuſtome for the Sons of all Great Men to take their turns of waiting at Court, they could not fail of attaining ſome words and ſmatches of the Court Language; the which when they returned to their reſpective Countries, they made uſe of in all companies, being proud to ſhew what Courtiers they were, and how much refined in their Manners and Words, having learned the Tongue of the Divine Family; the which created an Emulation in others to attain that Tongue alſo for which their Neighbours and Acquaintance were ſo much admired: And having alſo by the help of this Tongue an introduction to the Converſation and Familiarity of the Chief Officers of Juſtice, and Managers of the Revenue of the Sun and of the Inca; every one did ſo labour to obtain the advantage of this Tongue, that without the inſtruction of Maſters they with great eaſe, and almoſt inſenſibly attained unto it; by which means it came to be ſo generally ſpread in all parts, that for the compaſs of almoſt one thouſand three hundred Leagues it became the onely Tongue in uſe and eſteem.

Beſides the Honour and Grandeur that this Court received by the preſence and attendance of ſo many noble Heirs, another benefit did thence accrue, by being a means to ſecure the Empire from Mutinies and Rebellion; for ſo long as the young Heirs were at the Court, they were like ſo many Pledges and Hoſtages for the good behaviour of their Parents and Countrey-men, divers of whoſe Provinces being four, five and ſix hundred Leagues from the Court, and many of them inhabited by fierce and warlike Nations, were ready and inclined upon every ſmall overture to caſt off the Yoke of their Servitude; and though theſe Nations of themſelves ſingly were not able to contend with the Power of the Incan-Empire, yet being united in a League and Confederacy, might put it into ſome danger and difficulty; all which was prevented by the reſidence which theſe Heirs made at the Court, who were there treated with plentifull Entertainment, and honoured according to their ſeveral Degrees and qualities; of all which the Sons rendring to their Parents a true Relation, and confirming the ſame with ſuch preſents as the Inca ſent to them, being Garments of the ſame quality which the Inca himſelf wore; they eſteemed themſelves ſo much obliged thereby, that their Servitude ſeemed a Freedom, and Loyalty to be their duty; and in caſe any were ſo ſturdy and ſtupid, as not to be won by ſuch gentle applications and allurements; yet then the thoughts of having Children within the power of the Inca, were conſiderations ſufficient to take them off from courſes ruinous to their own Bloud.

With theſe and the like arts of Providence and Induſtry, accompanied with rectitude of Juſtice, the Incan-Empire was ſupported, and ſecured in ſuch peace, that in all the ages which the Incas reigned, there was ſcarce heard the leaſt noiſe or rumour of Rebellion or Mutiny. Joſeph de Acoſta ſpeaking in the 12th Chap. of

of his 6th Book concerning this Government, saith, " That such was the Fide" lity and loyal Affection which these people bore towards their Princes, that " there never was mention of any Plot or Treason contrived against their Per" sons; for though with rigour and severity they required Obedience to their " Laws, yet such was the Rectitude of their Justice, and Impartiality in the Exe" cution, that none could complain of the least violence or oppression: And such " order was observed in the subordinate Magistrates, who so exactly regarded the " most minute Irregularities in their Lives, that none could be drunk, or steal a " bunch of Mayz from his Neighbour without punishment. Thus far are the Words of Acosta.

CHAP. III.

Of the Language used at the Court.

B*Las Valera*, in the 9th Chapter of his 2d Book, treating of the general Language of Peru, speaks of the usefulness and facility of that Tongue, as is to be found amongst his loose Papers.

" Now as to the common Language spoken by the Natives of Peru, the truth " is, every Province used a peculiar Tongue proper to itself, but during the Reign " of the Incan-Kings the Language of Cozco was of greatest extent, reaching from " Quitu to the Kingdoms of Chili and Tumac, and which is now in use amongst " the Caciques, and great Men, and such Officers as the Spaniards employ in their " Service and Affairs. When the Incas subdued any Countrey, their first busi" ness was to enjoin the Inhabitants to learn the Tongue and Custome of Cozco, " and to teach them to their Children; for better effecting of which they gave " them Masters and Teachers to instruct them; and for encouragement of such " Masters, they gave them Lands and Inheritances amongst the Natives, that so
" they and their Children living and growing up with that people might continue
" a perpetual succession of Masters and Teachers of that people; and for their " better encouragement the Governours of Provinces did always prefer such " Teachers unto Offices before any others, for they were happy instruments
" of Quietness to the Incas, and of Peace and mutual Affection to the people.
" The Race and Off-spring of those Teachers who anciently came from Cozco, " live still dispersed in those Countries, which were assigned for Habitations to " their Parents, who having now lost that Authority which their Ancestours en" joyed, are not able to teach the Indians, nor compell them to receive their Lan" guage. Whence it is that many Provinces which were skilfull in the Cozcan-
" Tongue, when the first Spaniards entred into Cassamarca, have now wholly lost
" and forgotten it; for the Empire of the Incas being overthrown, all their Sta" tutes, Laws and Orders perished with them; and indeed the Civil Wars which " arose between the Spaniards themselves together with the malice of the Devil, " might all contribute to this confusion, and to interrupt the propagation of the " Gospel, which might have been much advanced, had the Apostolical Preachers
" of it had onely one single Tongue to have learned: Whereas now all the Con-
" fines and Dependencies about the City of Trugillo, and other Provinces belon" ging to the Jurisdiction of Quitu, are not able to speak or understand one word " of the common Language of the Collas and Puquinas, relapsing again into their " Mothers Gibberish, know no occasion or need for the Cozcan Dialect, which " also is at present so corrupted, that it seems quite another Speech to what it former" ly was; and more diversity of Tongues are of late sprung up, than were known " in the time of Huayna Capac, the last Emperour. Hence it is, that that Concord

" cord and reconcilement of Affections, which one common Speech had produced " in the World, was loſt, ſo that Men were become perfidious and hateſull to " each other, having no common tie of Words or Cuſtoms to unite and cement
" them in the bonds of Amity. The which inconvenience not being well obſer-
" ved by the Vice-Kings, who promiſcuouſly reduced greater and leſſer Nations
" to their Obedience, not regarding the uſe of a common Language, whereby
" the Goſpel might have had entrance to them, did thereby greatly obſtruct the " progreſs of the Chriſtian Faith, unleſs the Preachers had been endued with an
" univerſal gift of Tongues, and learned all the different Dialects of thoſe People, " which was impoſſible without the Miracle of Divine Inſpiration. Some are of " opinion, that the Indians ought to have been obliged to learn the Spaniſh Tongue,
" ſo as to have taken off that difficult Task from the Prieſts, and impoſed it on
" the Indians; but this project would not eaſily take; for if the Indians were ſo
" dull, and ſtupid, that the Cozcan Language, which admits little difference from " their own, was learned with much difficulty by them; how can we expect that " they ſhould ever attain to the Caſtillian Tongue, which in every word is ſtrange, " and withour any affinity with their own. Were it not rather more feaſible for
" the Spaniards, who are Men of quick Wits, and refined Underſtandings, to " learn the general Speech of Cozco, than to put ſuch poor ſottiſh Wretches,
" who have no help of Letters, to the difficult labour of learning the Caſtillian
" Tongue; and who ſhall put their Maſters to more labour in teaching them
" one Speech, than a quick witted Prieſt ſhall have in learning ten? Wherefore
" it were a more expedite way to oblige them to the knowledge of the Cozcan
" Tongue, which differs little from their own; and in this Speech preach the " Catholick Faith to them: In order unto which if the Vice-kings and Gover-
" nours would be pleaſed to renew the Commands and Rules given in this caſe
" by the ancient Incas, obliging the Sons deſcended from the Line of the old Ma-
" ſters, to reaſſume the Authority formerly given them for teaching and propa" gating this general Tongue, they would eaſily reduce them to a knowledge
" thereof. I remember a Prieſt and Doctor of the Canon-law, a perſon very pi" ous, and truly deſirous to doe good to the Souls of the Indians, did with great " Diligence and Induſtry learn himſelf the Cozcan Tongue, which having attai" ned, he became very importunate with the Indians to learn it alſo; in compli" ance with whoſe deſires many of them applying themſelves thereunto, did in " little more time than a year become perfect Maſters of it, and to ſpeak it as " readily as their Mother-Tongue; whereby this Prieſt found ſo facile an in" troduction into the Ears of this people, that he eaſily inſtilled the Fundamen" tals and Principles of the Chriſtian Faith into their Minds and Hearts; and if " one ſingle perſon was able by his ſole diligence and endeavours to incline the " minds of this people to a compliance with his deſires; how much more might
" the authority of the Biſhops and Vice-Kings be prevalent and ſucceſsfull amongſt
" them; and how eaſily might theſe Indians, by the help of this general Tongue,
" be taught and governed with much gentleneſs and lenity, from the utmoſt parts
" of Quitu, to the Countrey of the Chiches? to evince which more clearly, it is " obſervable, that the Incas diſpatched all their judicial Acts by the help of a few
" Judges, whereas now in the very ſame Countries three hundred Spaniards, who " are Corregidores, are not able to paſs and perform the Cauſes relating to private
" Juſtice; all which difficulty is cauſed by the loſs of the common Language, the
" which is much to be lamented, conſidering it is a Tongue eaſily obtained, as may " appear by the many Prieſts, who in a ſhort time have made themſelves Maſters
" of it. In Chuquiapu, as I have been informed, there was a certain Prieſt, Doc" tor in Divinity, who had ſo great a deteſtation of this Tongue, that he had no " patience to hear it ſpoken, being of opinion, that it was ſo difficult, as not to be " attained by the greateſt Induſtry. It happened that before the time that a College " of Jeſuits was erected in that Countrey, a certain Prieſt came thither with intention " to reſide there for ſome days, to preach unto the Indians publickly in the general
" Language. The Prieſt, who ſo much nauſeated that Tongue, reſolved notwith-
" ſtanding for curioſity ſake to be preſent at the Sermon, and having obſerved
" that he quoted many places of Scripture, and that the Indians heard him with " great attention, took ſome kind of liking to the Tongue; ſo that preſently af" ter the Sermon, he asked the Prieſt how it was poſſible for ſuch divine and my-" ſterious ſayings to be expreſſed in words ſo barbarous as thoſe; to which the

" Prieſt anſwered, that the thing was very poſſible, for that the Language was " ſo copious and eaſie to be learned, that if he would apply his Mind to it; he " might in the ſpace of four or five months attain to a perfect knowledge of it; " by which being encouraged and moved with a deſire of doing good to the Souls " of the poor Indians, he promiſed all diligence and application of Mind in the " ſtudy of that Tongue; in which, after the labour of ſix months, he became ſo " great a proficient, that he was able to hear the Confeſſions of the Indians, and " to preach to them to his own great comfort, and their advantage.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Uſefulneſs of this Language.

HAving thus made appear the facility of this Language, and how eaſily our Spani- " ards, who go from hence, attain unto it, with how much more readineſs " muſt the native Indians of Peru arrive at the knowledge of it; for though the peo- " ple be of different Nations, yet their Language hath ſome affinity and ſimilitude " together, differing onely in ſome Words, Dialects and Accents; ſo that we ſee " how the common Indians, who frequent the City de los Reyes, and of Cozco, the " City de la Plata, and the Mines of Potocchi, being forced to gain their Bread " and Clothing with the ſweat of their Brows, onely by Converſation and Com- " merce with the other Indians, without any rules or precepts given to them, " have in a few months been perfect Maſters of the Cozcan-Language; to which " they have added this farther advantage, that when they have returned to their " own Countries again, they have ſeemed more poliſhed, refined and accom- " pliſhed beyond the rank of the other Indians; and for that reaſon were greatly " eſteemed and admired by Neighbours; which when the Jeſuits had obſerved, " who lived amongſt the People of Sulli, (whoſe Inhabitants are all Aymaraes, or " Philoſophers,) they concluded that the learning of this Language was of a parti- " cular advantage to the Indians, and an improvement equal with that which the " learning of Latin is to us; the which alſo is confirmed by the opinion of " Prieſts, Judges and Officers, who have had or entertained any Converſe or " Communication with this people; for they have found them more juſt and ho- " neſt in their dealings, more docible in ſpiritual matters, more acute and intelli- " gent in their underſtandings; and in ſhort, more civil and leſs barbarous, and " more like Men and Citizens than the others; witneſs the Indians of Puquinas, " Collas, Urus, Yuncas, and other Nations, who with the change of their Lan- " guage, have put off all their turpitude of Manners, and elevated their Souls to " more ſublime thoughts, which before were immerſed in ſenſe, and reached no " farther than the mere ſagacity of Brutes: But the aptitude and diſpoſition which " the Indians gain thereby, towards the receiving the Doctrine of the Catholick " Faith, is a conſideration above all others; for it is certain that this Speech of " Cozco is ſo copious, and full of words fit to expreſs the Myſteries of divine " things, that the Preachers are pleaſed to exſpatiate in their Diſcourſes with ex- " cellent Flowers of Rhetorick and Elegancies, which are made intelligible to " the Indians by the knowledge of this Tongue, which hath opened a door for " entrance of the Goſpel with great benefit and efficacy. And though the Mi- " racles of Divine Grace have evidenced themſelves by other means amongſt the " rude Indians of Uriquillas, and the fierce and barbarous Chirihuanas; yet God, " who is moſt commonly pleaſed to work by ordinary means, hath generally " made uſe of this Tongue to convey the knowledge and inſtructions of the Go- " ſpel; for as the Incan-Kings, by the help of this common Language, which they

" they with great care and diligence inſtilled into the Minds of their people, did " propagate the Law, which the light of Nature taught them; ſo alſo ought " we with the ſame care and diligence endeavour to continue this excellent me- " thod, as the moſt expedite means to inculcate the myſteries of the Goſpel; and " therefore it is great pity, and much to be lamented, that our Chriſtian Gover- " nour, who omit no ways or contrivances to ſubjugate that people to the bon- " dage of their ſecular power, ſhould be more remiſs in thoſe Courſes, which " tend to the advancement of the Catholick Faith, than the Gentiles were " of their Idolatrous Worſhip. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera, which becauſe they tend to the advancement of Chriſtianity, I have thought fit to inſert here; and then afterwards, like a learned man, and one skilfull in Tongues, he proceeds to compare the Language of Peru with the Latin, and Greek, and Hebrew; and then proceeds to confute the Opinion of thoſe who fanſie, that theſe Indians of the new World were deſcended from the Jews, and for proof thereof they produce ſome Hebrew words which have a ſimilitude with the general Language of Peru, though they are not alike in ſignification, but onely in the ſound or accent. And on this occaſion, amongſt many other Curioſities and Idioms belonging to this general Tongue, he obſerves that ſou, b, d, f, g, i, and x, are all wanting in the Peruvian Speech, and for that reaſon, had they been Jews, who are ſo affectionate to their Father Abraham, that his Name is never out of their mouths, they could never have wanted that letter (b) which is neceſſary to expreſs a true ſound of that beloved Name: To which we may farther add, that in all their Language they have no word with two Conſonants together, ſuch as bra, cra, cro, pla, pri, and the like; ſo that they do not onely want the Letter (b) but alſo the ſyllable bra, which are neceſſary for Jews to expreſs the Name of their beloved Patriarch; and though it may be objected, that this Language of Peru hath many ſyllables with two Conſonants coming together, ſuch as Papri, Huacra, Rocro, Pocra, Chacra, Llaclla, Chocllo, and the like, yet it is to be underſtood, that theſe Conſonants are diſ-joined in their pronunciation; as for example, Pap-ri, Huac-ra, Roc-ro, Llac-lla, and the like, beſides which, for want of a true obſervation, the Spaniards have many corruptions amongſt them; as for Pampa, they ſay bamba, for Inca Inga, for Roc-ro Loc-ro, and the like; as we ſhall hereafter make appear, as theſe words do occaſionally occur; and ſo we ſhall recur again unto our Hiſtory.

CHAP. V.

Of the Third Feſtival, dedicated to the Sun.

THE Incas celebrated four Feſtivals every Year in their Court; the principal and moſt ſolemn was the Feaſt of the Sun, called Raymi, of which we have formerly given a relation at large. The ſecond was the Inſtitution of the Order of Cavaliers, of which alſo we have already diſcourſed. We come now to the two laſt, with which we ſhall end, and conclude all the particulars relating to their Feſtivals; for as to their other more ordinary Feaſts, which were performed every Moon; and ſuch Feaſts as were kept in honour of Victories and Triumphs, we ſhall not farther enlarge upon, leſt they ſhould ſeem tedious to the Reader, onely we ſhall ſay in general, That theſe Feaſts were held in the Temple of the Sun, without Proceſſions into the open and publick places. And ſo we proceed to the third Feſtival, which they call Cuſquieraymi, which they celebrated about the time that their Seed and Mayz was ſprung up, and firſt appeared out of the ground; then they ſacrificed to the Sun many Lambs, barren Ewes, and male Sheep, praying to him that he would be pleaſed not to ſuffer the Froſt to deſtroy their Wheat; by reaſon that the Vallies of Cozco, and Sacſahuana, and the Countries thereabout, are ſubject to mighty Froſts, as are likewiſe all other parts under the ſame Climate, which is ſo very cold, that it freezes there almoſt the whole year, and more particularly at our Midſummer, which is the depth of their Winter, at which time the Nights are commonly clear, but very ſharp and freezing; which ſo ſoon as the Indians obſerve, they put fire to their Dunghills, to make a ſmoke and a ſmother, being of opinion that the ground under that thick covert gains ſome warmth; and thereby the ſharp keenneſs of the Froſt is much abated. I remember to have ſeen this in Cozco; but did not much examine, whether it did any good or not; for being then a Youth, I was not ſo inquiſitive into the cauſes and effects of things, as I was into the matter which was done.

And now conſidering that the Mayz was a ſort of grane, which was the chief nutriment of the Indians, and which was moſt damaged by the Froſts, they therefore, to divert that Judgment offered to the Sun many Sacrifices, with Dances and Drink-offerings, ſupplicating him that he would be pleaſed to ſhroud their Plantations from the damage of the Froſts. The Fleſh of the Beaſts ſlain at theſe Sacrifices was diſtributed amongſt thoſe people who came to the Feſtival; for beſides the Lamb which was offered, and entirely burnt to the Sun, together with the Bloud and Entrails of all the other Beaſts; the Fleſh was diſtributed amongſt the people, after the manner uſed at the Feaſt of Raymi.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Fourth Feſtival, and their preparations to it by Faſtings, and cleanſing themſelves.

THE fourth and ultimate Feaſt celebrated in the Court of the Incas was called Citu, which was performed with great joy, in regard it was by way of Thankſgiving, when ſickneſs and diſeaſes, or any other Judgments were removed from the City, and reſembled the ancient Luſtrations, or Purifications, after the foulneſs and contagion of diſtempers was removed. The preparation to this Feaſt was made by Faſtings, and forbearing the company of their Wives; being held on the firſt day of the Moon, after the Equinoctial in the Month of September, they obſerved two ſorts of Faſts, one more rigorous than the other; the moſt ſevere was kept by eating a ſmall quantity of raw Mayz, and drinking Water, which was not to continue above three days; thoſe that obſerved the other, were permitted to eat their Mayz parched together with raw Herbs and Roots, ſuch as Lettice, and Radiſhes, &c. as alſo Red Pepper, which they call Uchu, and Salt, and to drink their uſual liquour, but Fleſh, and Fiſh, and boiled Herbs were forbidden; during which Faſt called Caci, they might eat but once a day, and their moſt ſevere Faſt was called Hatun-caci.

Men and Women in general having made this preparation, and their Children alſo obliged to one day after the ſevere manner, they kneaded their Bread called Cancu, which on the Evening of the Vigil they made up in Balls, and put them into a dry pot without liquour to bake, for as yet they knew not the uſe of Ovens; and being half baked, they took them out. They made two ſorts of Bread, one ſort they moiſtned with the bloud of Children, from five to ten years of Age, which they drew from the veins of their Armes, or between their Eyebrows or Noſes; in ſuch manner as when they let bloud on occaſion of diſtempers. I have ſeen them make both ſorts of Bread; when they made that which was mixed with bloud, they firſt aſſembled together according to their reſpective Lineages, at a certain place, from whence they went to the Houſe of the Elder Brother, there to perform this ceremony; and in caſe they had no Brother, then it was done at the Houſe of the neareſt relation, who was Head of the family.

In the night, when this Bread was made, ſome hours before day, all thoſe who had thus prepared themſelves by faſting, aroſe from their beds, and waſhed their bodies; and then taking a lump of this ill-baked Bread mixed with bloud, they applied it to their head, mouth, breaſt, ſhoulders, armes and legs, as if they had purified themſelves with it, and cleanſed their bodies of all infirmities. This being done, the Maſter of the family, who was chief of the Lineage, affixed ſome of this paſte on the lintels of the door next the ſtreet; in token, that thoſe of that Houſe had performed the ceremony of Purification. The like ceremony the High Prieſt ſolemnized in the Houſe and Temple of the Sun, enjoyning the other Prieſts to perform the like in the Houſe of the Wives dedicated to the Sun, and in Huanacauri, which was a Temple about a League diſtant from the City, being a place highly eſteemed, and held in great devotion by them, becauſe that Manco Capac made a ſhort abode there, when he firſt came to the City of Cozco, as we have formerly related. On the like errant they ſent other Prieſts to all places, which were accounted hallowed and ſacred, ſuch as thoſe, where the Devil ſpoke to them, and made himſelf to be adored as God. In the King's Court the ceremony was performed by the Eldeſt Uncle of the King, who was to be an Inca of legitimate deſcent.

So ſoon as the Sun aroſe, having performed their Acts of Adoration towards him, they prayed unto him, that he would vouchſafe to deliver their City from outward calamities, and inward diſeaſes; and then they broke their faſt by eating of that Bread which was made without bloud. Having thus eaten their Bread, and adored the Sun, which was performed at a certain hour, that ſo the Adoration might be general at the ſame inſtant of time; a certain Inca of the Bloud-Royal ſallied out of the Fortreſs, richly attired like a Meſſenger of the Sun, having his Garments girt about his waſte, bearing a Lance in his hand, garniſhed with a plume of Feathers of divers colours, which hanged dangling down from the point to the end of the Staff; the length of which was of about three quarters of a Yard, ſtudded with golden Nails; and which in War ſerved for an Enſign: With this Lance he iſſued from the Fort rather than from the Temple, being eſteemed a Meſſenger of War, and not of Peace; for the Fort, as well as the Temple, was Dedicated to the Sun, being the place where matters of War were treated, as the other was, where peace and friendſhip were entertained. This Officer came running in this manner downwards from the Hill called Sacſahuamam, flouriſhing his Lance untill he came to the Market-place of the City, where four other Incas of the Bloud, each carrying a Dart in his hand, met him; having likewiſe their Garments cloſe girt, after the manner of the Indians, when they put themſelves in a poſture of exerciſe, or labour: This Meſſenger meeting the four Incas, touched the head of their Lances with his, and then told them, that the Sun commanded them as his Officers, that they ſhould purifie and cleanſe the City of all infirmities and diſeaſes; and that he gave them full power to perform it.

With this commiſſion the four Incas departed, running through the four great Streets of the City, which led towards the four quarters of the World, called by them Taventinſuyu; in their way as they ran, Men and Women, young and old, all came to the Doors of their Houſes, with great cries and acclamations, ſhaking their cloths, and the garments on their bodies, as if they would beat out the Duſt from them; and then ſtroking their hands over their heads and mouths, armes and legs, and other parts of their bodies, in manner, as if they were waſhing of them; and as if they would throw out all the ſickneſs and illneſs of their Houſes, to be expelled the City by the power and virtue of thoſe Meſſengers of the Sun. Nor was this onely done in the Streets, through which theſe four Meſſengers paſſed, but likewiſe in all the other Streets; theſe four Incas having run about a quarter of a League without the City, were met by four other Incas of the privilege, who taking their Lances, ran with them a quarter of a League farther, and at the like diſtance were met by others, untill they came five or ſix Leagues remote from the City; where having fixed their Lances, and driven them into the Earth, they made that the place of baniſhment to all their Evils; that ſo being bounded by thoſe Confines, they ſhould not be able to approach nearer to the City.

CHAP. VII.

Of their Nocturnal Feaſt celebrated at Night for purifying their City from ſickneſſes, and other calamities.

THE Night following they lighted great Torches of Straw, ſo cloſe and hard twiſted together, that they were long in burning, and were not unlike our Wiſps of oiled Straw; onely they were made round, and about the bigneſs of a Foot-ball, called by them Pancuncu; to each end of theſe, they tied a cord of about a Yard in length, with which they ran through the Streets, caſting them round untill they came without the City, ſuppoſing that by help of theſe fires, they expelled the nocturnal evils from their City: For as the evils of the day were droven out by the Lances, ſo the evils of the night were carried out by the Torches; which being quenched without the City in a brook or current of water into which they were thrown, were believed to carry with them down their ſtreams all the ſickneſſes and evils of their City; ſo that if at any time an Indian, of what Age ſoever, ſhould happen to ſee one of theſe wiſps of Straw, lodged by any accident or ſtoppage on the banks of the River, he preſently fled from it, fearing to be ſeized by ſome of thoſe evils, which were newly expelled and baniſhed the City.

The Wars being ended, and the City cleanſed and purified of all its evils and diſeaſes, great joy and mirth was heard in all their dwellings, not onely in publick, but in every private family, which continued for the firſt quarter of the Moon; during which time, they returned thanks to the Sun for cleanſing and freeing them from all their evils; and in demonſtration of ſuch thankfulneſs, they ſacrificed Lambs and Sheep to him; the bloud and entrails of which they burnt in the fire; but the fleſh they roaſted in the common Market-place, and ſhared it amongſt thoſe who were preſent at the Feſtival.

I remember, when I was young, that I ſaw ſome part of theſe ceremonies performed; and that a certain Inca ſallied out with his Lance, not from the Caſtle, for that was then deſtroyed, but from a Houſe belonging to one of the Incas, which was ſituated on the ſide of that Hill, where the Caſtle was formerly built, called Collcampata: I ſaw alſo the four Indians run with their Lances, and the common people ſhake their Cloaths, with all the other vile and fooliſh practices, as eating their Bread called Cancu, and burning the Torches called Pancuncu: For my part, I had not the curioſity to ſit up ſo late at night, as to be preſent at their nocturnal Feſtival: Howſoever, I remember, that I ſaw one of their Pancuncus lodged in the ſtream which runs through the Market-place, and near to the Houſe of my School-fellow John de Cellorico, I remember to have ſeen many Indian Boys to have run from it; but I being a Child of ſix or ſeven years old, and not Catechiſed in their Religion, nor knowing the cauſe, remained unconcerned at the bundle of Straw, not thinking it ſo terrible as did the Indians.

This Torch we now ſpeak of, was thrown into the ſtream which runs through the City, and carried abroad according to the ancient inſtitution; for the Feaſt was not now obſerved with that ſtrictneſs and veneration, as it was in the times of their Kings; for beginning now to become obſolete, it was rather performed in remembrance of their ancient cuſtoms, than out of an opinion of any effect or virtue of ſuch a practice; for there remained ſtill ſome old ſuperſtitious fellows, who refuſed Baptiſm, and obſtinately adhered to their ancient Gentiliſm. In times of the Incas the Torches were carried out of the City, and there caſt into the River: the water with which they waſhed their bodies, though it were brought from other ſtreams, was yet to be poured into the River which runs from the City, that ſo the evils which it waſhed, might be carried far diſtant, and by force of the current be lodged in the Sea. As we have before mentioned.

There

There was another Feaſt, not publickly celebrated, but kept in every private family; and that began about the time after they had ended their Harveſt, and lodged their Fruits in their Store-houſes, called Pirva. Their cuſtome was to burn a ſmall quantity of Tallow, or Fat, near the places where they had lodged their Stores, as a ſacrifice to the Sun: the Nobles, and rich people, offered tame Conies, which they call Coii, giving thanks for the proviſions of bread with which they were ſupplied for the ſuſtenance of the whole year, and praying, that he would be pleaſed to beſtow this bleſſing on thoſe conſervatories of their bread, that they might keep them well and ſafe for the ſupport and maintenance of humane life.

There were other Feaſts which the Prieſts celebrated within the Temple of the Sun, without any publick proceſſions, being the monthly ſacrifices offered to the Sun; but theſe were not to be compared with the ſolemnity of the other four principal Feaſts, which were like our Grand Feſtivals of Eaſter and Chriſtmas, and the like.

CHAP. VIII.

The Deſcription of the Imperial City of Cozco.

THE Inca, Manco Capac, was Founder of this City of Cozco, which the Spaniards have honoured with the continuance of its Name and Title, calling it the great City of Cozco, and Metropolis of all the Kingdoms and Provinces of Peru. And though they once called it the New Toledo, yet the impropriety of it ſoon cauſed that Name to be diſuſed. For Cozco is not encompaſſed by a River, as is Toledo, nor like it in the ſituation; the Houſes being placed one above the other, on the ſide of a Hill ſo high, that it ſurveys from all parts a large and ſpatious Plain beneath it: the Streets are very long and wide, and the publick Market-places very great; ſo that the Spaniards in general, as alſo the publick Notaries, and other Writers ſtyle it by no other Name than by its ancient Title; for Cozco being like another Rome, the Imperial Head of many Kingdoms and Provinces, may equally deſerve a title agreeable to its noble and generous Atchievements, and likewiſe in ſome things be compared with Rome. As firſt, in that it was originally founded by its Kings. Secondly, in that it was the Head and Chief City of many Nations, ſubjected to its Empire. Thirdly, in the Excellencies of its Laws, which were many, and wiſe, and rarely tempered for the government of its people. Fourthly, in the qualities of the Men who were educated in Civil and Military Diſcipline, and were civilized and freed from all barbarity in their manners. Howſoever we may ſay, that Rome had this advantage of Cozco, that the knowledge of Letters had eternized the fame and honour of Rome, and that its people were not more celebrated for the ſucceſs of their Arms, than they were illuſtrious and renowned for their Arts and Sciences; when Poor Cozco hath had nothing but Memory and Tradition to deliver its great Actions, and feats of Arms to poſterity. But Rome had the help of Hiſtorians to record its famous Deeds, and was as much beholding to the Pen, as to its Arms; it being doubtfull whether great Heroes are more obliged to Writers, who have tranſmitted the fame of their mighty Actions to all poſterity; or Writers are to the Noble Heroes, for opening unto them ſo large a field of great and various Atchievements. But this was not the fortune of our poor Countrey, which though abounding with Men famous in Arms, and in Intellectuals, and capable of Sciences; did yet for want of knowledge in Letters, leave no other Monuments of their paſt actions, but what Tradition hath conſerved and tranſmitted in ſome few abrupt and ſcattered ſentences from Fathers to their Children; which alſo are in a great meaſure loſt by the entrance trance or Invaſion of a new people; for where an Empire or Government hath had its period, being overwhelmed by the power of a ſtronger Nation, there alſo by natural conſequence muſt the memory of Acts and Cuſtoms periſh, which have not been recorded by a skilfulneſs in Letters.

For my own part, being moved with a warm deſire and affection to conſerve the poor remains of Antiquity in my own native Countrey, I have adventured on this laborious Deſign of Diſcovery, and of tracing the Footſteeps of the loſt reliques of its forgotten Cuſtoms and Manners; and therefore that this City of Cozco, which was once the Metropolis of many Kingdoms and Nations may be revived, and yet live in its ancient Fame, I have reſolved in this Chapter to make ſome Deſcription of it, as I have received it by Tradition, and alſo as a true born and faithfull Son of that City, to declare what I have ſeen of it with my own Eyes, and in what ſtate and condition it was in the Year 1570. when I departed thence, ſpecifying what ancient Names were ſtill in uſe belonging to places and diviſions of the City, with what alterations were at that time made in the names of Parochial Churches, and Streets which the Spaniards have built ſince their coming thither.

The King Manco Capac having conſidered all the conveniencies of Cozco, that it was ſituated in a pleaſant Valley, in the midſt of a Plain, encompaſſed on all ſides with high Mountains, through which ran four delightfull ſtreams, which though they yielded not great plenty of Water, yet were ſufficient to refreſh and make all thoſe Lands fruitfull. In the middle of this plain was a Fountain of brackiſh Water, out of which they made quantities of Salt; the Soil was fruitfull and the Air wholſome: with which advantages the firſt Inca took a reſolution of laying the Foundation of his City, and, as the Indians ſay, by Order and Appointment of his Father the Sun, ſignified by the diſcovery of a Wedge of Gold, which was the mark and ſignal of that place, where the Head and Seat of his Empire was to be founded. The Climate is rather cold than hot, but yet not in that extreme, as to require Fires to keep them warm; the Chambers, or cloſe Rooms, are ſufficient to defend the Inhabitants from the rigour of the Weather, yet a pan of Coals may ſometimes be uſefull; the Air is not ſo ſharp, but that the thin and lighter Clothing of the Summer may be ſufficient, nor ſo hot as to be incommodious with the Winter-garments; the like may be ſaid of the bedding; for one Blanket may be a ſufficient covering, and if there were three, t'were not cumberſome; for ſo conſtant and equal is the Weather, that there is little difference between the Winter and Summer, being here as in all other temperate Climates, the ſame moderation in all ſeaſons of the Year. The Air of Cozco being rather cold and dry, than hot and moiſt, is not ſubject to corruption; ſo that Fleſh being hanged up in a Room where the Windows are open on all ſides, will keep eight, or fifteen, or thirty, nay to a hundred days without being mortified, untill it is become dried like Mummy. This I have ſeen my ſelf tried and experimented with the Fleſh of Cattel of that Countrey; I know not whether the Fleſh of Mutton, brought from Spain, will endure in the like manner; for there was no experiment made thereof in my time, by reaſon that the ſtock of the Spaniſh Sheep were not killed in my time, but rather ſuffered to increaſe and breed. The Climate of Cozco being in this manner inclining to cold, breeds very few Flies, and for biting and ſtinging Gnats there are none, nor any other Inſect that is troubleſome, or vexatious to the people of the City. The firſt Houſes and Habitations were built on the ſide of the Hill, called Sacſahuamam, which lies on the North-eaſt ſide of the City, on the top of which the Succeſſours of this Inca erected the ſtately Fortreſs, which the Spaniards ſo little eſteemed, nay ſo much ſcorned, that they demoliſhed it in a few days after they became Maſters of the City. This City was divided into two parts, Hanan-Cozco, and Hurin-Cozco, which is the Upper and the Lower Town. The Way or Road to Antiſuyu, which leads to the Eaſtward, divided theſe two parts of Hanan-Cozco, which lies to the North, and Hurin which points to the South. The firſt and principal Street was called Collcampata, Collcam is a word of no ſignification with the Indians, but Pata is as much as the degree or ſtep of a Ladder, or a Bench whereon to ſit. On the riſing or turning of this Hill the Inca Manco Capac erected his Palace, which afterwards was the poſſeſſion of Paullu the Son of Huayna Capac. I remember in my time to have ſeen a large and ſpatious Hall belonging to this Houſe, which ſtill remained, designed in former days, for a place wherein to celebrate their principal Festivals in rainy Weather. That Hall onely remained in being when I departed from Cozco, but all the other Rooms, which were conformable to the greatness of this, were suffered to decay, and fall into ruines, without any repair. Next in order we come to another Street, called Canturpata, which looks to the Eastward, which signifies as much as the Gilliflower-walk; for Cantur is a Flower not unlike our Gilliflower, but of a different sort; for before the Spaniards came into this Countrey, there were no Gilliflowers; onely this Cantur resembled very much the Brambles of Andalusia, both in the Stalk, Leaf and Shortness, for the Thorns of it are very prickly, which because they did much abound in that Walk, they gave it the name of the Cantur-Walk. Next we come to the Street called Pumacurcu, or the Lion's Post, because in that place many posts or stakes were driven into the Earth, whereunto they tied their Lions which they presented to the Inca, untill they had made them tame and gentle. The next great Street was called Toco-cachi, but I know not any reason for the composition of this word, Toco signifying a Window, and Cachi Salt, which are words ill conjoined together, unless they have some other signification, of which I am ignorant; in this Street the first Convent, dedicated to St. Francis, was built: Turning a little from hence to the Southward, you come to the Street called Munaycenca, Muna signifies to love, and Cenca the Nose or Nostrils; I know not the reason or sense for this name, but there must certainly be some superstitious meaning or occasion for it. Hence proceeding on the same course, we come to the Street called Rimac-pampa, or place of Proclamation, because that there all the Laws and Ordinances were published and proclaimed, and thereunto the multitude flocked from all parts and places to hear and understand the Laws which were promulged. Hence we come into the great Road which leads to Collasuyu, and crosses Southward on the Street of Pumapchupan, which signifies the Lion's Tail, because that Street is very strait and narrow towards the end, being bound in by two Streams, which there fall into one, and which being the most remote part of the Town, was called the Lion's Tail, perhaps because they kept their Lions, and other fierce Creatures, at that place. To the Westward, being about a mile from the farthermost Houses of the Town, there was a Village, containing about three hundred Souls, which in the Year 1560. was thus far distant, but now in this Year 1602. the Buildings are so increased, that they reach up and join to this Village. About a mile farther to the Westward there is another Street, called Chaquillchaca, the signification of which is improper; by which the great Road passes to Cuntisuyu, and near whereunto are two pipes of excellent Water, which pass under ground; but by whom they were laid or brought thither, is unknown to the Indians, for want of Writings or Records to transmit the memory of them to posterity. Those pipes of Water were called Collquemachac huay, or the Silver Snakes, because the whiteness of the Water resembled Silver, and Windings and the Meanders of the pipe were like the coiles and turnings of Serpents; and they report also, that the Streets of the City are extended as far as to Chaquillchaca. Passing hence to the Northward, there is another Street called Pichu, which also was without the City; and another beyond that, called Quillipata, and another great Street called Carmenta, which is a proper Name without any signification; and here passes the great Road to Chinchasuyu, to the Eastward, where the Street is that is called Huacapuncu, or the Door of the Sanctuary, because that Huaca, amongst the many other significations which it hath, signifies a Sanctuary; Puncu is a Gate, because that a stream of Water enters through that Street, as by a gate, to the chief Market-place of Cozco; for though all the Streets and Lanes of the City were dedicated to the Use and Service of the Temple of the Sun, and of the Select Virgins; yet this passage, or chanel, by which this Water entred, was in a particular manner esteemed sacred; as also the place at which it ran out, was called the Lion's Tail, signifying, that this City, as it was holy in its Laws and Religion, so it resembled a Lion in its valour, and martial Exercises. This Street of Huaca-puncu came at length to join with Collcampata; so that we are now come to the place where we first began, having finished the rounds of the City.

CHAP. IX.

That the City contained the Deſcription of all the Empire.

THeſe four great Streets did correſpond with the four Quarters of the Empire called Tahuantinſuyu, ordained by Manco Capac, the firſt Incan-King, who intending to reduce thoſe ſavage, and barbarous Nations under his Sovereignty, did command them to inhabit thoſe Quarters, which lay towards the places from whence they came, ſo thoſe who came from the Eaſt, planted themſelves on the Eaſt ſide of the Town, thoſe that came from the Weſt, on the Weſt ſide, ſo that at length they all ſeated themſelves within the circle and compaſs deſigned for the City in their different Ranks and Situations. The Curacas built their Houſes as they found room, when they firſt came to the Court; for when one had finiſhed his Houſe, another built cloſe by him, every one keeping the order and ſituation of his Province; for if his Province lay to the Right-hand of his Neighbour's Province, then he built to the Right, if to the Left, then to the Left; if the Province lay to the backſide of his Neighbour's dwelling, then he raiſed his Houſe there, fronting towards his own Countrey; ſo that taking a view of all the People and Nations inhabiting that City, with their ſeveral Ranks and Situations, it ſeemed like a ſurvey of all the Empire, or a Map comprehending in a plain Coſmographical Deſcription all the circumference of Peru. Pedro de Cieça writing of the ſituation of Cozco, ſpeaks almoſt to the ſame purpoſe, in the 93d Chapter of his Book in theſe words. "And whereas this City contained many Nations "of divers Provinces, and ſtrange Countries, ſuch as the Indians of Chile, Paſto, "Cannares, Chachapoyas, Guancas, Collas, and many other people before mentio-"ned; they were all diſpoſed within the precincts of this City, in their reſpective "Quarters, as they were aſſigned unto them by the order of their Governours; "having liberty to obſerve the Manners and Cuſtoms of their Fathers, and the "habit of their Countrey, ſo that if a hundred thouſand Men of theſe were aſ-"ſembled together, every one would be diſtinguiſhed by the attire of his Head, "and his Countrey, and Lineage known to which he belonged. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça.

This Diſtinction was made by the different attire on their Heads, either of Feathers, or Saſhes wound about their Temples, which every Province framed to its ſelf, and not by contrivance, or order of the Incas; onely their Kings commanded them to continue their Faſhions, to avoid confuſion amongſt the Nations which reach from Paſto to Chile, which, as our Authour aforeſaid alledges, was above one thouſand three hundred Leagues. In which manner all the Streets of this City were the Habitations of the Subjects onely aſſembled thither from all parts of the Empire; and not of the Incas, or thoſe of the Bloud Royal; who lived in the Suburbs of the City, the which we ſhall lay down, and deſcribe in ſuch manner, as they were ſituated from North to South, with all their Streets and vacant places, and Palaces of their Kings; and how, and in what manner they were afterwards beſtowed, when they came to be divided by lot amongſt the Spaniards. From the Hill Sacſahuamam there runs a ſhallow ſtream of Water from North to South, to the farther part of Pumapchupan, where the City is divided from the Suburbs. But more within the City there is a Street which lies North and South, which is now called St. Auſtins, deſcending from the Houſes of the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, to the open ſquare of Rimac-pampu; there are three or four other Streets which croſs from Eaſt to Weſt, through the large ſpace which is between the Street and River, where the Incas of the Bloud ſeated themſelves according to their ſeveral Ayllus, or Lineages; for though they were all of the ſame Family, and lineally deſcended from Manco Capac. Howſoever being branched into ſeveral Lines, they derived their Pedigrees from divers Kings, ſaying, that that these descended from such an Inca, those from another Inca, and so of the rest; of which the Spanish Historians not having conceived a true Notion, delivered to us for a truth, that such a Lineage was derived from such an Inca, and that Lineage from another, as if they had been of different Stocks and Families, whenas in reality they all proceeded from the same original Being, honoured with the Title of Capac Ayllu, or the illustrious or august Lineage of the Bloud Royal.

The Men of that Family were called by the name of Inca, and the Women of Palla, which implied a descendency from the bloud Royal. In my time those quarters, descending from the upper part of the Street, were inhabited by Rodrigo de Pineda, Joan de Saavedra, Diego Oitiz de Guzman, Peter de los Rios, with his Brother Diego de los Rios, Geronimo Costillas, Gaspar Jura; but now these Houses are turned into the Convent of St. Austin, as also the Habitations of Michel Sanchez, John de Santa Cruz, Alonso de Soto, Gabriel Carrera, and Diego de Trugillo, who was one of the first Adventurers, and one of those thirteen Companions, who adhered to Don Francisco Piçarro, as we shall relate in its due place. Moreover there were Anton Ruiz de Guevara, John de Salas, who was Brother to the Archbishop of Sevil, together with Valdes de Salas, who was Inquisitor-General, besides others, which I cannot call to mind, all which being great Commanders over the Indians, had their shares and lots divided to them amongst those who were the second Adventurers in the conquest of Peru. Besides these there lived many Spaniards in this quarter, who had no power over the Indians. One of which Houses, after my departure from Cozco, was converted into a Monastery of Augustine-Friars. We call those the first Conquerours, who were of the number of those one hundred and sixty, that were Assistants of Don Francisco de Piçarro in the imprisonment of Atahualpa: And those which we call the second Adventurers in this Conquest, were those who came in with Don Diego de Almagro, and Don Pedro de Alvarado, both which parties were called Conquerours of Peru, and no others; and the second party did much honour to the first, though they were fewer in number, and of a meaner quality, yet being the first and most forward in this adventurous Atchievement, were honoured and esteemed by them as Partners in their Enterprises. And now returning by the upper part of the Street of St. Austin, to enter (as we have said) into the City; where upon the top of all stands the Convent of St. Clare, formerly the Dwelling of Alonso Dias, who married the Daughter of the Governour Pedro Arias de Avila; on the Right-hand of this Convent were many houses inhabited by Spaniards; and amongst the rest Francisco de Barrientos had possessions, which were afterwards alienated to John Alvarez Maldonado. On the Right-hand lived Hernando Bachicao, and after him John Alonso Palomino, over against which, to the South side, was the Episcopal Palace, formerly the House of John Balsa, and after him of Francisco de Villacastin; where now the Cathedral Church is situated, having been once a wide and stately Hall, which served for a Theatre in rainy Weather, where Shows at their chief Festivals were represented: It was anciently a part of the Palace belonging to the Inca Viracocha, the Eighth King; in my time there was no more remaining of it than this wide Hall, which was so large, that when the Spaniards first entred into the City, they all lodged therein, so as to be near and ready to afford assistence to each other in case of danger. I remember that I once saw it, when it was covered with Thatch, though now changed into Tile. On the North side of this great Church there is a Street with many Houses fronting towards the Market-place, in which are Shops for Artificers; and on the South side, are Shops and Ware-houses belonging to the most rich and principal Merchants of the Town.

Behind the Church were the Houses of John de Berrio, and of others, whose Names I cannot remember: Behind the chief Shops were the Houses of Diego Maldonado surnamed the rich, because he was the most wealthy Person in all Peru, being one of the first Conquerours of it. In the time of the Incas that place was called Hatuncancha, which signified the great or high Street, having been anciently the Habitation of Inca Yupanqui. On the South side of these Buildings of Diego Maldonado were the Houses of Francisco Hernandez Giron; before which to the Southward also were the Houses of Antonio Altamirano one of the first Conquerours; joining whereunto on the backside were the Houses of Francisco de Frias, and Sebastian de Caçalla; the which quarter of the Town was called Puca marca, or the coloured Street, anciently the Houses of the King Tupac Yupanqui. There is another Street beyond this to the South side, very long and wide, the name of which I cannot call to mind, where lived Alonſo de Loayſa, Martin de Meneſes, John de Figueroa, D. Pedro Puerto Carrero, Garcia de Melo, Franciſco Delgado, beſides many other Lords and Perſons of Quality, whoſe Names I do not remember. Beyond this place, to the Southward, is the Square of Yntipampa, or the Square of the Sun, becauſe it lies juſt before the Temple, where thoſe who were not of the degree of an Inca, came to offer their Sacrifices, being not lawfull for perſons of leſs quality to enter within the Walls of the Temple; there the Prieſts met and received them, and preſented them before the Image of the Sun, whom they adored for God. That quarter wherein the Temple of the Sun was ſituated, was called Coricancha, or the Street of Gold, Silver and pretious Stones, of which there was great abundance, (as we have before declared) within the Temple. What now remains to ſpeak of, is the Suburbs of the City, called Pumapchupan.

CHAP. X.

Of the Situation of the Schools, of the three Royal Palaces, with the Houſe of the Select Virgins.

NOw to finiſh our Diſcourſe of the ſeveral Streets of the City, we muſt return again to Huacapuncu, or the Gate of the Sanctuary, which lies North from the great Market-place; from whence likewiſe iſſues another Street, the name of which I cannot tell, but may properly call it the Schools, becauſe that the King Inca Roca founded certain Schools in that place, as we have already mentioned in his Life: In the Indian Language they are called Yaca Huaci, or the Houſe of Learning, where their Scholars, or learned Men, called Amautas, or Philoſophers, and Haravec, which are Poets, had their place of abode, being very much eſteemed, and had in honour by the People, becauſe they were Inſtructours and Teachers of youth, and Tutours to thoſe of the Royal Bloud. Proceeding from theſe Schools to the Southward, there are two other Streets which lead to the great Market-place, where are two Royal Palaces, of ſo great a compaſs, that they took up all the one ſide of the Square. One of theſe places which lies to the Eaſtward of the other, was called Coracora; which is as much as a large Court; the which is confirmed by Pedro de Cieça, who in the 92d Chapter of his Book, ſaith, That the King Roca ordered his Palace to be built there, for the better convenience of the Schools, whereto he often reſorted, to hear the Lectures of the Philoſophers. I have not obſerved any thing to remain of the Coracora, it being all ruined and demoliſhed in my time; though when the City was firſt divided into ſhares amongſt the Conquerours of it, the Coracora was the Lot of Gonçalo Piçarro, Brother of the Marqueſs Franciſco Piçarro, with whom I was well acquainted at Cozco, after the Battel of Huarina, and before that of Sacſahuana, he was very kind and obliging to me; for being but a Child of eight or nine years of age, he treated me as if I had been his Son. The other Palace to the Eaſtward of Coracora, was called Caſſana, or a thing of admiration; as if it had been ſuch a ſtupendious work, that every one upon the ſight of it muſt be tranſported with wonder and aſtoniſhment; it had been the Habitation of the Inca Pachacutec, great Grandſon to the Inca Roca, who in favour, and for ornament to the Schools, ordered his Palaces to be adjoining thereunto; for the Schools were on the backſide of thoſe Palaces, and were contiguous, or joining one to the other, without any other ſpace or diviſion between them. The principal Gates and Front of the Schools opened to the Street and River; but the Incas paſſed thither by the back way, being delighted to hear the Philoſophical Lectures; and ſometimes the Inca Pachacutec would be Reader himſelf, and with the ſame occaſion, declare and publiſh liſh the Laws and Statutes which he had made, being a great Legiſlator: In my time the Spaniards opened a way between the Schools, and the Palace Caſſana; of which I have ſeen a great part of the Walls remaining, being made of excellent poliſhed Stone, which appeared to have been part of the Royal Lodgings, together with a magnificent Hall, being ſo ſpatious, as in the time of rain and wet weather ſerved for a Theatre, and place wherein to celebrate their Feaſts and Dancings; and which was ſo large, that ſixty Men might Exerciſe themſelves on Horſe-back in it with their Darts and Lances. This vaſt Hall reached as far as to the Convent of St. Francis, which becauſe it was ſomething remote from thoſe quarters where the Spaniards inhabited, they paſſed a nearer way to it by the Street Tococachi. A great part of this Hall, or Gallery, was taken up for a Church, and divided from the reſt, wherein were Cells or Dormitories refectory, and other Offices for the Convent; and the open places belonging to it ſerved for the Cloiſters. John de Pancorvo, one of the firſt Conquerours, gave this Hall, and the Ground about it to the Friars, it being his lot when a diviſion of Houſes was to every Man according to his proportion: And though ſeveral others had part of this place with him, yet he bought them out at a certain price, which in thoſe days was purchaſed at an eaſie rate. Some few years afterwards this Monaſtery was transferred to the place, where it now remains, as we ſhall mention in its due place, when we come to ſpeak of the Charities which the Citizens made to the Friars for bying in the Ground, and building the Church. So that in my time I have ſeen this great Hall, or Gallery, demoliſhed; and the Shops built in the Street of Caſſana, which ſerve for Merchants and Artificers to dwell in.

Before theſe Royal Houſes was a great and open Court, being the chief place of the City, called Haucaypata, where the great entertainments and rejoycings at the chief Feſtivals were held: the length of it, North and South, was about 200 paces, or 400 foot; and the breadth, Eaſt and Weſt, about 150 paces, reaching as far as to the ſtream of water which runs through the City: At the end of this open Court, to the Southward, were two other Royal Palaces, ſituated near the ſtream, and to the Street called Amarucancha, or the quarter of the great Serpents, fronting to the Street Caſſana, anciently the Houſes of Huayna Capac, but now converted into a College for the Jeſuits. One great Hall, or Gallery, of theſe Houſes, remained in my time, but not ſo ſpatious as that of Caſſana; as alſo a handſome round Tower ſtanding in the middle of the Court before the Houſe: But of this Tower, we ſhall ſpeak more at large hereafter; for that having been the firſt quarters which the Spaniards took up in this City, they conſerved it in good repair, being alſo a rare ſumptuous Building; no other reliques of theſe Buildings remained in my time, having been all demoliſhed, and ſuffered to decay without repairs. When the firſt diviſion of this City was made amongſt the Conquerours, the principal quarter of this Royal Palace, being that which fronted towards the Market-place, fell to the lot of Hernando Piçarro, the Brother of the Marquis Franciſco Piçarro, one of the firſt Conquerours of that City. In the year 1562, I ſaw this Gentleman at the Court of Madrid: Another part of this Houſe was the ſhare of Mancio Serra de Leguiçamo, another was given to Antonio Altamirano, which he having divided into two Houſes, I was to have bought one of them: Another part hereof was ſet out by the Spaniards for a Priſon, and another was given to Alonſo Macuela, one of the firſt Conquerours, and after him to Martin Dolmos; to whom the remaining parts were allotted, I do not well remember. To the Eaſt of Amarucancha, which is the Street of the Sun; there is another Lane called Ac-llahuaci, or the Convent of the Virgins dedicated to the Sun, which we have already mentioned; and of which we have nothing farther to ſay, than that one part of it was the portion of Franciſco Mexia, having its Wall adjoining to the great Market-place, and now filled with the Shops of Merchants.

All the places which have been hitherto mentioned, whether common Streets, or Royal Palaces, were all to the Eaſtward of the River which runs through the Market-place: Whence we may obſerve, that the Incas raiſed thoſe three great Halls, or Galleries, at the front, and on each ſide of the Market-place for celebrating their Feſtivals with greater convenience, in caſe it ſhould prove rainy weather at ſuch certain times of the two Solſtices, and at the beginning of ſuch and ſuch Moons. When the Indians made a general inſurrection againſt the Spaniards, they burnt all the City, excepting onely thoſe three Galleries of the four which we have already mentioned, viz. Collcampata, Caſſana and Amaruancha: but the fourth, which was the Head-quarter of the Spaniards, where now is the Cathedral Church, they ſhot an innumerable number of Arrows into it, and ſet fire to it, with Straw, in above twenty places: Notwithſtanding all which, the fire was quenched, God not ſuffering it to be burnt that night, as we ſhall hereafter declare; and though they attempted it many days and nights afterwards, yet God who deſigned to introduce the Catholick Faith into thoſe Countries, did by a ſtrange and wonderfull Providence prevent that deſtruction, that the Spaniards by his mercy might have the greater cauſe of Triumph. In like manner they preſerved the Temple of the Sun, and the Houſe of the Select Virgins; but all the reſt was deſtroyed by fire, ſuppoſing therewith to turn the Spaniards into Aſhes.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Streets and Houſes on the Weſt-ſide of the River.

HItherto we have deſcribed the Palaces and Buildings which are to the Eaſt-ſide of the River, which paſſes through the middle of the City. On the Weſt-ſide is that wide and open place called Cuſſipata, which is a very pleaſant and chearfull ſituation. In the time of the Incas this Cuſſipata was all one place with that on the other ſide of the water, for then they covered the River over with great beams, and floored it with planks, for the more commodious receiving the great Numbers of principal Lords, and multitudes of Strangers which crouded to the great Feſtivals of the Sun: This Bridge which the Indians made of planks, becauſe they had not the Art of Building an Arch, was ruined by the Spaniards, who in the place thereof erected four Bridges at a convenient diſtance one from the other, which were likewiſe of Timber, and remaining in my time; and afterwards built three other Bridges with Arches, which were ſtanding when I departed. Thoſe two open places were not divided in my time, nor were there Houſes on both ſides of the water, as now they are. In the year 1555, when my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega was Governour, thoſe Houſes were then in building, and were appointed for Dwellings for the Natives of the City; for at that time the ſad diſconſolate Widow, though ſhe had been Empreſs of that great Empire, had not one farthing of Rent aſſigned to her; what ſhe may have had ſince, I cannot tell. The Incas had never built any thing on the Weſt-ſide of the River, unleſs it were that circle of Houſes which we have already mentioned; becauſe they would keep a ſpace of ground for ſucceeding Kings to erect and enlarge their Palaces on, as their fancies and greatneſs ſhould direct; for every King would have a Palace of his own building for conſervation of his Name and Memory; which ſeems a piece of ſtate and grandeur peculiar to theſe Kings. The Spaniards afterwards built their Houſes in the ſame row, which we ſhall now deſcribe, taking them from North to South, as we paſs along, with the Names of the perſons who dwelt in them at the time that I departed from that place.

For deſcending with the River from the Gate Avacapuncu, the firſt Houſes belonged to Pedro de Orve, next whereunto were thoſe of Juan Pancorvo, with whom lived Alonſo de Marchena, ſuch being the ancient friendſhip between them; for though Alonſo kept Indian Servants, yet Pancorvo would not ſuffer him to live ſeparate from him. Proceeding forwards, we come about the middle of the Street, to the Houſes of the Valiant Hernan de Laguna, which were formerly the poſſeſſions of Antonio Navarro, and Lope Martin, both of the firſt Conquerours: the Houſes adjoyning hereunto belonged to Spaniards, who not being Lords over the Indians, we paſs them by, as we do ſeveral other Streets, to avoid tediouſneſs to the Reader. Next to the Houſes of Hernan the Brave, were the Houſes of Alonſo Hinojoſa, Hinojoſa, which afterwards were the Poſſeſſions of Doctor Carvajal, Brother to the Factor, or Procurator, for Yllen-Suarez Carvajal, of whom the Hiſtories of Peru make mention.

And now we come again to Cuſſipata, called Our Lady of Merceds, where the poor Indian Men and Women relieved their miſeries by bartering and exchanging of one thing for another; for at that time Money was not as yet current amongſt them, nor was it coined in twenty years after; but here they kept their Market, or Fair, called by the Indians Catu. Paſſing hence to the Southward, you come to the Convent of the Merceds, which takes up the whole compaſs of four Streets. Behind this Monaſtery was another Neighbourhood, who were Maſters of Indians; which I paſs by, becauſe I am not particularly acquainted with their Names: beyond this, there are no farther Inhabitants.

But returning to the quarter called Carmenca, and paſſing into another Street of Houſes; we take notice, that the neareſt Dwellings to Carmenca, were thoſe of Diego de Silva, the Son of the famous Feliciano de Silva, who was my Godfather, when I was confirmed: To the Southward of theſe, in the middle of a Street, were the Houſes of Pedro Lopez de Caçalla, Secretary to the Preſident Gaſca, and of Juan Betanças, with many others on one ſide, and the other the Maſters, which not being Lords of Indians, I was not acquainted particularly with. Paſſing forward into another Street, are the Houſes of Alonſo de Meſa, one of the firſt Conquerours, which reach to the Square of Our Lady; adjoyning unto which, on each ſide, and alſo behind, are many Houſes; of which I ſhall not particularly make mention. The Houſes to the Southward of thoſe belonging to Alonſo de Meſa, were the Poſſeſſions of my Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega, over the principal Gate, of which was a long and narrow Gallery, or rather Balcony, where the principal Gentlemen of the City came often to take their ſeats, and ſee the running at the Ring, the Feaſt of Bulls, (which is a ſort of Baiting of them on Horſeback uſed in Spain) as alſo the Darting of Canes, and other ſports and exerciſes performed in the open place before the Gate: Before my Father's time theſe Houſes belonged to a certain Noble Perſon, who was one of the firſt Conquerours, called Franciſco d' Onate, who was ſlain in the Battel of Chupas. From this Balcony, or Gallery, as alſo from ſeveral other parts of the City, a point of the ſnowy Mountain, in form of a Pyramid, appeared; for though it was 25 Leagues diſtant, and many other Hills in the way, yet ſo high was this pique, that it fairly ſhewed it ſelf to the City with a white covering of Snow, which always remained, and never thawed: they called it Villcanuta, or ſome ſacred, wonderfull thing, for this word Villcanuta was attributed to matters of great admiration; for indeed the form of this Pyramid is rare and curious, beyond any deſcription we can make of it; and for confirmation of this truth, I refer my ſelf to thoſe who have ſeen it. To the Weſt-ſide of my Father's Houſes, were thoſe of Vaſco de Guevara, one of the Conquerours of the ſecond expedition, and were afterwards given to Coya Beatriz, the Daughter of Huayna Capac; on the South-ſide of theſe were the Dwellings of Antonio de Quinones, which alſo fronted with the Great Place of our Lady; and farther to the Southward of theſe were the Houſes of Thomas Vazquez, one of the firſt Conquerours, formerly poſſeſſed by Alonſo de Toro, Lieutenant-General of Gonçalo Piçarro, whom Diego Gonçalez his Son-in-law killed, out of a fear and jealouſie he had of him, ariſing from ſome domeſtick quarrels between them. To the Weſt-ſide of Thomas Vazquez his Buildings were the Houſes of D. Pedro Luis de Cabrera, afterwards in the poſſeſſion of Rodrigo de Eſquivel. On the South-ſide of Thomas Vazquez his Houſes, were thoſe of Antonio Pereira, Son of Lope Martin of Portugal; next unto which adjoyned the dwelling of Pedro Alonſo Caraſco, one of the firſt Conquerours; to the South-ſide of which were others of leſs conſideration, and the laſt of that quarter, which in the years 1557, and 58, began to be peopled. And now turning on the foot of the Hill Carmenca, to the Weſt-ſide of the Houſes of Diego de Sylva, we come to the Dwellings of Franciſco de Villa, a Valiant Man, one of the firſt Conquerours, and one of the thirteen Companions of D. Franciſo Piçarro. To the Southward of theſe on the other ſide of the Street, was a long and narrow Lane without Houſes: Southward from which, was a very pleaſant Walk, where now is the Convent of St. Francis, before which is a very wide and large place; and likewiſe more Southward from hence on the other ſide of the Street are the Houſes of Juan Julio de Hojeda, one of the firſt Conquerours, the Father of Don Gomez de Tordoya, who is ſtill living. To the Weſtward of theſe Houſes of D. Gomez, were thoſe of Martin de Arbieto, beyond which, in the year 1560, were no farther Buildings; for to the Weſtward of them was a great Plain in my time, convenient for running and breathing of Horſes, and at the end of it was erected that rich and famous Hoſpital of the Indians founded in the year 1555, and 56. Thus far the Buildings reached in thoſe days, what enlargements were made, were added ſince. The Gentlemen which we have named in this Treatiſe, were all Perſons of Quality, and of Noble Bloud, and famous for their Arms, having vanquiſhed and won that moſt rich Empire, the greateſt part of which I knew, and of all thoſe which I have named, there were not ten with whom I had not a perſonal acquaintance.

CHAP. XII.

Of the two Gifts which the City contributed for Charitable Uſes.

BEfore I treat of the Foundation of that Hoſpital, and the Contributions given to it; I ſhall firſt mention the charitable Gifts which the Citizens made to the Friars of St. Francis, for buying the ground and body of the Church, which they found already built to their hands, when my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega was Governour of Cozco: the matter was this: Theſe Friars (as we have ſaid) having their Convent in Caſſana, made a demand (I know not for what reaſon) upon Juan Rodriguez de Villa Lobos, for this Ground and Church; in purſuance of which, they preferred a Bill in the Chancery, deſiring that they might have poſſeſſion of this Ground and Church, paying unto this Juan Rodriguez ſo much Money as the Church and the Land about it ſhould be valued or eſteemed at, being 22200 Ducats: The Prior of their Franciſcans was then F. Juan Gallegos, a holy Man, and one of a moſt Exemplary life and converſation; by whoſe means payment was made of this Money in the Houſe of my Father, who gave poſſeſſion thereof to the Friars, delivering the price in Bars of Silver. At which the ſtanders-by much admiring, being aſtoniſhed to ſee ſo great a ſum paid ſo readily and punctually at the time by ſuch poor Friars; the Prior made them this anſwer, that they ſhould not wonder at theſe Works of Heaven, being produced by the mere charity of this City, whoſe hearts God had touched, and moved with ſuch pious Zeal, that I can aſſure you (ſaid he) that on Monday of this Week we had not above 300 Ducats of this ſum towards our payment; and now we are but on Thurſday morning, when I am preſent before you with this great ſum, raiſed by the pious contributions of the Inhabitants of this City, as well Gentlemen Souldiers, as Lords of the Indians, who for theſe two laſt nights came knocking at our Gates with Alms in their hands, which they deſired to beſtow ſecretly, with ſuch frequent and continued courſe of pious Benefactors, who called to the Porter to receive their Alms and Charity, that we have not been able to take our reſt or repoſe; all which I heard that good Man ſpeak in commendation of the liberality and charity of the City. And now to ſpeak farther of the Foundation of this Hoſpital, we muſt know, that this Godly Prior dying, another ſucceeded in his place, called Antonio de St. Michel, a Perſon of a Noble Family, (of which Name alſo there was a great Divine in Salamanca) who for his holy life and doctrine being a true Son, and faithfull Follower of St. Francis, was made Biſhop of Chili, where he lived with exemplary piety and godlineſs, as the Kingdoms of Chili and Peru can teſtifie. This holy Man, in the ſecond year of the three in which he lived a Biſhop, preaching every Sunday, Wedneſday and Friday in Lent, according to his uſual cuſtome in the Cathedral Church of Cozco, did upon a certain Sunday propoſe, that an Hoſpital ſhould be erected in that City for the Indians; and that a Frater-a Fraternity of Indians, ſhould be Super-intendents, or Superviſors over it, as the Spaniards were over theirs; aſſuring them, that the Spaniards had obligations towards the Indians in ſome manner, which no Man could acquit himſelf of, whether he were a Conquerour of them, or not, but by ſome ſuch ſatisfaction for their debt: And purſuing this diſcourſe with moſt perſuaſive Arguments in all the Sermons of that Week, on the Sunday he concluded after ſuch a preparation made; That the Governour, and he, would try what operation his Sermons had effected on them, to which end they would go perſonally from houſe to houſe to demand their charitable contributions towards this pious Work; admoniſhing them to ſhew themſelves as large and open-hearted therein, as they had been valiant and covetous to obtain the Empire. Accordingly the Governour and the Prior took their Walk from houſe to houſe to gather the charitable Alms of the City, coming at firſt to the Dwellings of thoſe onely who were Maſters of the Indians: And at night, when my Father Garçilaſſo returned home, he commanded me to ſum up the account of all the Collections; which when I had done, I found it to amount unto 28500 Pieces of Eight, which makes 34200 Ducats: the leaſt that was given by any particular perſon was 500 Pieces of Eight, which makes 600 Ducats; there were ſome who gave a 1000 Pieces of Eight. Thus much was the Collection made in one Evening, and in the ſpace of five hours onely; other days they took to go from neighbour to neighbour, every one giving ſo freely, that in a few months the ſum amounted to above a hundred thouſand Ducats: the which report being noiſed about in the Countrey, and that an Hoſpital was therewith to be founded for the Natives, many other contributions were added in the ſpace of that year, ſome being given by Laſt Will and Teſtament, and ſome by devout and charitable perſons in the time of their Life and Health, ſo that the Work was chearfully begun, the Native Indians, within the Juriſdiction of the City, concurring thereunto with all ready aſſiſtence, being aſſured that the uſe and benefit thereof was intentionally deſigned for themſelves.

Under the firſt Stone of the Foundation, which was laid by my Father Garçilaſſo, he put a * Doblon of Gold, being one of thoſe with two Faces, of Ferdinand and Iſabel, the King and Queen of Spain: That ſort of coin was rare in thoſe days, and eſpecially in that Countrey, and at that time, where, and when no Money either in Gold or other Metal was ſtamped; for the Spaniſh Merchants did then bring their Commodities, which they bartered or exchanged for Wares of the Countrey, or ſold for Silver or Gold, but brought no Money coined into thoſe parts. I believe that the Doblon was brought thither for a curioſity, and preſented to my Father as a Medal; and of the ſame opinion were all thoſe who ſaw it; for it paſſing from one to another, the whole Corporation of the City, then preſent at this Solemnity of laying the Foundation, did all eſteem it for a great curioſity, being the firſt coined Money that had been ſeen in that Countrey; and for that reaſon was worthily employed in that charitable Work. Diego Maldonado, a Native of Salamanca, ſirnamed the Rich, for the great Wealth that he had attained, having formerly been Governour of the City, laid under one of the Stones a Plate of Silver with his Arms engraven upon it; and on this poor Foundation was erected this rich Edifice; which was afterwards endowed with many Indulgences and Pardons from the Popes, for all thoſe who ſhould dye in it: the which being made known to a certain Indian Woman of the Bloud-Royal, with whom I was acquainted; ſhe finding her ſelf ſick, deſired to be carried into the Hoſpital; to which her Friends not agreeing in conſideration of the abilities ſhe had to maintain her ſelf; howſoever ſhe ſtill perſiſted in her deſires, ſaying, that it was not the cure of her Body that ſhe deſigned, but to enjoy and partake of thoſe Indulgences which the Princes of the Church had given unto thoſe who ſhould dye in that Hoſpital; for which reaſon ſhe being carried thither, refuſed to have her Bed laid in the Chambers of the ſick, but in a corner of the Church; where ſhe deſired, that her Grave might be opened near to her Bed, which ſhe covered with the Habit of St. Francis, and deſired to be buried in it; then ſhe called for the Wax-candles, which ſhe intended to have burnt at her Burial, that they might be in a readineſs: And having received the Holy Sacrament and extreme Unction, ſhe lay four days after calling upon God and the Bleſſed Virgin, and all the Celeſtial Court of Angels, and then expired. This godly end which this poor Indian Woman had made, being generally known and talked of; the two Corporations of the City, both Spiritual and Temporal, agreed to honour her Obſequies and Enter-

* A double Piſtol, or 36 ſhillings Engliſh.

Enterment with their presence; the which being observed by other Indians, (who esteemed all their Nation and Lineage much favoured therein) it was hoped that this might be a means to animate and encourage them to embrace at their Death the same advantages which the Christian Religion produces. With which we shall conclude this discourse, and pass on to the Life and Actions of this tenth King, in whose Reign we have many particulars of great admiration.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the New Conquest which the Inca Yupanqui designed to make.

THE good Inca Yupanqui having bound his Temples with the coloured wreath, and performed the Funeral Rites due to his Father; the first thing he designed was to render himself pleasing and gratefull to his people, by visiting the several Provinces and Kingdoms of his Empire; which (as we have said) was esteemed by the Indians for the greatest grace and favour which the Inca could testifie towards his Subjects: For being possessed with an opinion, that the Incas were not of humane race, but descended as Gods from their Father the Sun; they could not but conceive and fansie great blessings to accompany so gratious a presence; and we may believe, that the Inca departing with these intentions, was received in all parts by his Subjects with great joy and adoration. The Inca having passed three years in this progress and visitation, returned afterwards to the City; where having consulted with his Counsel, he resolved to undertake a brave and hazardous War towards the Antis on the East-side of Cozco; for as yet the Confines of the Empire were bounded by a long ridge of Hills, by which the snowy Mountain extended it self; but being desirous to pass it, and discover what People or Nation inhabited on the other side, the way to pass was contrived by following the current of Waters, which run through those Hills from West to East, for that the tops and precipices of those Mountains, by reason of the Snows, were esteemed impassable.

The pretence for this War was grounded on the common and plausible colour of Religion; the design of withdrawing them from their unhumane and barbarous customs, and instructing them in the knowledge and religion which the Sun their Father had delivered, and all Nations had received, were always forcible arguments, and infallible grounds for making their War just.

This desire, and motives of seeing this Countrey were encreased by an ancient relation which the Ancestors of this Inca had received, that the Nations on the other side of this Mountain were populous, and the Lands fruitfull; but that part thereof was inhabitable, being nothing but Mountains, Lakes, Bogs and Marish Grounds.

And as a farther encouragement to this design, there was a report, that amongst those populous Nations, the greatest and most considerable of them was called Musu, and since by the Spaniards Moxos; to which there is a passage by a great River, which about the Antis to the East of the City is divided into many rivulets, being five in number, every one having its proper Name; but afterwards on the other side of the Antis, they meet together, and falling into one stream, make a great River, called Amarumayu. Where this River empties it self Northward into the Sea, is not discovered; it is probable, that running Eastward, and joyning with many other Rivers, it comes at length to fall into that River which we call the River of Plate; for the Spaniards, when they first discovered that Countrey demanded of the Natives, whether there was Silver in those parts? they answered that that in that Countrey there was none, but that at the Head of that River was great abundance; from whence the Spaniards give the Name of Plate to that River, though there be no Silver Mines arising in that Countrey; towards the mouth of that River which is esteemed so famous, that it hath gained the renown of the second great River in the World after the Orellana.

The River of Plate is called in the Indian Tongue Parahuay, though the great River above (if that be it which joins with the River of Plate) is named Amarumoyu, all the other five Streams losing their proper Names, when they join with this. Mayu signifies a River, and Amaru are those great Serpents which are nourished in those Countries, of such bigness as we have before described, forasmuch as these Serpents being compared with lesser Snakes, do much exceed them, so doth that River surpass the Brooks and lesser Streams.

CHAP. XIV.

The Successes of the Expedition into Musu, untill the end of it.

IT being impossible to find a way into Musu, over the inaccessible Mountains, and through the Lakes and Bogs, the King Yupanqui resolved to follow the course of the River, though as yet not known, or discovered; in pursuance of which, Order was given to cut down Timber, and make Boats, or Floats, for transporting ten thousand Men, with Provision sufficient for them, the which were two years in preparing; all which being built, and made ready, and the Souldiers raised and armed, and the Victuals and Ammunition provided, and the General and Officers named, all which were Incas of the Royal Bloud, they embarked in their Boats, made capable to carry thirty, or forty, or fifty Men a piece. Their Provisions they laid in the middle of the Boats, raised about half a yard from the bottom, to keep them from wet. With this force and preparations they sculled down the Stream, and in their passage had many difficult Rencounters, and Battails with the Natives of Chunchu, who inhabit on the Banks on one side, and the other of that River, assembled in great numbers both upon the Water, and on the Land, to interrupt their passage. The offensive Arms used by that People of Antis, were Bows and Arrows: Their Faces, and Arms, and Legs were painted over red, and their Bodies with various colours, for the Countrey being hot, they went always naked, with a clout onely before their Privities, with Caps on their Heads, made up with the Feathers of Parrots, and Guacamayas.

In conclusion, after many Skirmishes and Treaties between one and the other Party, the several Nations and Inhabitants on the Banks of this River, were all reduced to the Obedience and Service of the Inca; and in acknowledgment of such submission and Vassalage, sent Presents to the King Yupanqui of Parrots, Monkies, Drills, Honey, Wax, and other Fruits which their Countrey yielded. These Presents were constantly made untill the death of Tupac Amaru, who was the last of the Incas, his Head being cut off by Francisco de Toledo, Vice-king of the Indies, as we shall hereafter more largely declare in the Lives and Successions of those Kings. Many of those Indians who were ordered to bring their Presents to the Incas, did afterwards, by concession from them, plant themselves near unto Tono, a place about twenty six Leagues distant from Cozco, where their Generation hath remained to this day. The Natives on the side of the River, commonly called Chunchu, being thus reduced to the service of the Inca; they proceeded forwards to other Countries and Nations untill they came to the Province of Musu, inhabited by a numerous and warlike Nation, having all things plentifull of their own product, and distant about two hundred Leagues from the City of Cozco.

The Incas report, that when they came into that Countrey by reaſon of the many Skirmiſhes they had paſſed, and the Difficulties they had encountred, their Army was reduced to a very ſmall number; howſoever they attempted to perſuade the Muſus to ſubmit unto the Inca, to whom the Sun was Father, and who had ſent him from Heaven to teach Men the way of a rational and moral Life; that being Men, they ſhould not appear like Beaſts, but adoring the Sun for God, they ſhould forſake the Worſhip of Stocks and Stones, and other vile and inanimate Creatures. The Incas obſerving that the Muſus gave attention to them, were encouraged to make known their Laws and Cuſtoms to them, and recount the great Atchievements and Conqueſts, which their Kings had made, with what Provinces had voluntarily, and of their own accord, offered themſelves to the Obedience and Service of the Inca, deſiring him to take them under his protection, as his People and Worſhippers of his Deity. It is moreover reported, that the Incas particularly declared to them the Dream of Viracocha, and his great Actions. At the hearing of all which, it is ſaid that the Muſus were ſo aſtoniſhed, that they readily accepted the friendſhip of the Incas, and embraced their Religion, Laws and Statutes with great Devotion, promiſing to be governed by them, and to acknowledge no other than the Sun for their principal God. Howſoever they refuſed to be eſteemed for Vaſſals of the Inca, having not been conquered by him; but were proud to be accounted his Allies, Friends and Confederates. Under pretext of which Friendſhip, the Muſus gave leave to the Incas to live and inhabit in their Countrey; for there not remaining above a thouſand of them, they did not apprehend any danger of being ſubdued or enſlaved by them, and therefore freely gave them liberty to take their Daughters and Kindred for their Wives, and having a great Veneration and Eſteem for their Perſons and Wiſedom, they committed the government of all things into their hands, both of War and Peace. Upon the Foundation of this new Alliance, and at their perſuaſion, they ſent Ambaſſadours to Cozco, to adore the Inca as the Off-ſpring of the Sun, and to confirm that Friendſhip and Alliance which they had contracted with his Subjects; taking a great compaſs in their way thither, to avoid the high Mountains, mariſh grounds and bogs, which were not paſſible in the direct line. Theſe Ambaſſadours being arrived at Cozco, were received by the Inca with all imaginable kindneſs and favour; commanding that care ſhould be taken to inform and inſtruct them in the manner of his Courts, his Laws, Statutes and Religion; with which the Muſus receiving great ſatisfaction, returned again to their own Countrey, with reſolution to maintain this Friendſhip and Confederacy ſo happily begun, which continued untill the time that the Spaniards invaded and overcame their Countrey. Particularly it is reported of theſe Incas, who planted themſelves in the Countrey of the Muſus; that the Children deſcended from them, deſiring to return to Cozco in the time of Huayna Capac, for that finding all things quiet in the Countrey of Muſus, and no danger of any revolt, the natural deſire of viſiting the Countrey of their Fore-fathers, invited them to carry their Wives and Children unto Cozco; but in their way thither receiving news that Huayna Capac was dead, and that the Spaniards poſſeſſed the Land, having ſubverted and utterly deſtroyed the Empire of the Incas; they altered their deſign, reſolving to return again to the Muſus, where they were ever afterwards highly eſteemed, and held in Veneration, and all matters both of War and Peace committed to their management. It is ſaid that the River in thoſe parts is ſix Leagues broad, and that their Canoes are two days in paſſing over it.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Remains which are ſtill apparent of that Expedition.

THE particulars of this Conqueſt and Diſcovery made by the Inca Yupanqui, which we have recounted in brief, were afterwards more at large related by the Indians, boaſting much of the mighty Acts and Valour of their Anceſtours; telling us of Battels which they fought upon the Water, and on the Banks of the River, and of the many Provinces they ſubdued, and many other Enterpriſes, which ſeem incredible to have been performed by a handfull of Men; and becauſe that hitherto the Spaniards have not been able to make themſelves Maſters of the people about the Antis, how much leſs can it be pointed out to us, the way and means that theſe few Incas took to ſubdue and reduce theſe ſturdy Nations; and therefore ſince theſe things ſeem incredible, we that deſign to write a true Hiſtory, have not thought fit to mix Fables with our true Relations, eſpecially of things which being acted in remote and unknown parts, could not come ſo diſtinctly to our cognizance, as thoſe which were acted in the Precincts of our own Countrey. Though the truth is, the Spaniards have in our time found many Evidences and Remains of thoſe matters, as we ſhall ſee more diſtinctly hereafter.

In the Year 1564. a certain Spaniard, called Diego Aleman, born in the Town of St. John in the County of Niebla, Inhabitant of the City of Paz, otherwiſe called the New Plantation; being made Lord over a few Indians, was perſuaded by a Curaca of that place, to take twelve Spaniards more into his company, and with them to make a journey into the Province of Muſu, where he aſſured them was much Gold, offering himſelf to be their guide; the journey they undertook was a foot, both for privacy, the better to ſurpriſe the Natives, and becauſe the way was mountainous, and not paſſable on horſeback; their Deſign was for that preſent onely upon diſcovery, to ſee and obſerve how the Land lay, to know the ways, and afterwards return with greater force, to make their Conqueſt; they entred by Cochapampa, which borders upon Moxa.

They travailed twenty eight days through Mountains and Thickets, and unfrequented places, and at length came to a view of the firſt Province of that people. The Cacique gave them a caution to proceed ſilently, and enquire of matters from ſome Indian before they diſcovered themſelves; but the Spaniards not hearkning to the caution he gave, on the cloſe of the Evening, with more boldneſs than prudence entred the Province, making a noiſe, as if their numbers had been great, or as if the ſound of the Spaniſh Tongue onely, had been ſufficient to affright them. But matters ſucceeded quite otherwiſe, for the Indians taking the allarm, and by the ſhout they made, concluding them to be few in number, took courage, and falling upon them, killed ten, and took Aleman captive; the other two, by the darkneſs of the night eſcaped, and returned to the place where their Guide promiſed to expect them, being not pleaſed with the raſhneſs of their Counſel. One of the two which eſcaped was called Franciſco Moreno, the Son of a Spaniard, by an Indian Woman, born at Cochapampa; this Man got a Cloth made of Cotton, which was hanged in the air for a Hamock or Cradle, to lay a Child in it, having ſix Bells of Gold tied to the ends of it, woven with ſeveral Works in divers colours. So ſoon as it was day the two Spaniards and the Curaca could from the top of the Hill diſcover a great number of Indians, with Lances, and Pikes, and Breaſt-plates, which glittered againſt the Sun, all which, as the Guide aſſured them, were made of Gold; and that they had no Silver in their Countrey, but that onely which they procured from Peru in exchange for their Gold. And to deſcribe the greatneſs of that Countrey, he told them, that as the Liſt was to that Mantle, ſo was all Peru in compariſon of that Countrey; but to let paſs his Coſmography, there is no doubt but that this Province was both wide and long.

Afterwards theſe Indians having every Evening converſe and ſociety with thoſe of Peru, had underſtood from them, that this Diego Aleman had been the Leader and Chief of thoſe few, who attempted this bold and raſh Deſign; on reputation of which, they ſo highly eſteemed and honoured him, that they choſe him the Captain of their Army in that War which they made againſt their Neighbours on the other ſide of the River of Amarumayu; judging themſelves extremely honoured, and ſecure under the conduct of ſo renowned a General of the Spaniſh Nation. But Franciſco Moreno, his Companion in theſe Travails, being overwearied in his Journies and Labours, ſo ſoon as he arrived in his own Countrey, dyed, having put himſelf into a Fever in his Travails over the Mountains and Mariſhes, which were not to be paſſed on Horſe-back, but on Foot onely: This Moreno recounted many things at large relating to this Diſcovery, which moved and perſuaded many to undertake this Deſign; the chief whereof was Gomez de Tordoya, a young and brisk Gentleman, to whom the Count Nieva, Vice-king of Peru communicated all the particulars of Moreno's Journal at large: But in regard great number of people came in to offer their ſervice, and liſt themſelves in this Expedition; the Vice-king fearing a Mutiny, or ſome Combuſtion, gave out that the Deſign was laid aſide, and that they would disband the Souldiers which they had already raiſed.

CHAP. XVI.

Of other unhappy Succeſſes which befell the Spaniards in that Province.

TWO Years after, Caſtro, a Doctor of the Civil Law, Governour of Peru, gave a like Commiſſion to another Gentleman, an Inhabitant of Cozco, called Gaſpar de Sotelo, who fitted and prepared himſelf with a brave and ſtout company of Souldiers, who freely and voluntarily offered themſelves to accompany him in this Expedition: But that which gave moſt hope and advantage to this Deſign was a ſecret Correſpondence between him and the Inca Tupac Amaru, who was retired into Villcapampa; they both having agreed to join their Forces together for this Conqueſt, and that Tupac was to furniſh him with flat bottomed Boats to paſs the River of Villcapampa, which lies to the Northeaſt of Cozco. But as in the like occaſions there never want malitious Spirits, who, envious of the Enterpriſes of generous Men, do always endeavour to doe ill Offices; ſo in this alſo there appeared thoſe, who derogating from the worth and ability of Gaſpar de Sotelo, perſuaded the Governour to take away his Commiſſion, and confer it upon Juan Alvarez Maldonado; which being done, he raiſed two hundred and fifty Foot, and one hundred Horſe, and embarked them on great flat bottomed Boats, built on the River Amarumayu, which lies Eaſt from Cozco. Gomez de Tordoya obſerving that this Conqueſt which he deſigned to himſelf, was by Commiſſion given to Gaſpar de Sotelo, and afterwards to Juan Alvarez Maldonado, in preparing for which, he had engaged his Friends, and ſpent his own Eſtate, he ſo highly reſented, that he would not be diverted, but publiſhed abroad, that he alſo intended to proceed on that Deſign; for though they had revoked his Authority, yet he ſtill kept his Commiſſion, by virtue of which he went on in raiſing his Souldiers; and though few appeared, and that his numbers did not amount to above ſixty Men in all, becauſe the Governour had declared his ſenſe and pleaſure againſt it; yet in deſpight of all oppoſition reſolving to proceed, he entred by the Province of Camata, which is Southeaſt of Cozco, and having paſſed inſuperable Moun-

Mountains, and difficult mariſh and boggy Grounds; he arrived at length at the River Amarumayu, where receiving advice, that Juan Alvarez was not yet paſſed, he entrenched himſelf on the banks of the River, with deſign to hinder his paſſage, and to treat him as an Enemy; and though he had but a ſmall number which adhered to him, yet being all choice Men, and faithfull to him, every one carrying two Carbines well fixed and charged, he promiſed to himſelf ſucceſs and advantage.

Juan Alvarez ſoon following after, deſcended by the ſtream untill he came to the place, where Gomez Tordoya expected his coming; they being both emulous each of other, and exaſperated with equal gall and anger, without any other treaty or prologue, came to blows. Juan Alvarez Maldonado confiding in his Numbers, was the firſt Aggreſſor; Gomez truſting in the courage of his Men, and their double Arms would not give ground, but received his charge with great conſtancy, ſo that they fought that whole day, as alſo the ſecond and third, with that ſpight and rage, and with ſuch little conſideration, that they were almoſt all killed; and ſuch as did eſcape with their lives, were yet ſo wounded, that they were diſabled, and unfit for ſervice. The Indians, who were Natives of that Province of Chunchu, having obſerved this advantage, fell in upon thoſe that remained alive, and utterly deſtroyed them; amongſt which Gomez de Tordoya was alſo ſlain. I knew all theſe three Gentlemen, and left them in Cozco, when I departed thence. The Indians took three Spaniards alive, that is, this Maldonado, Diego Martin a Portugal Friar, and a certain Gun-ſmith called Simon Lopez; Maldonado being known by the Indians to have been the Commander in chief of one of thoſe parties, was treated by them with all courteſie and reſpect; and conſidering that he was wounded, and a Man in years, they gave him liberty to return unto his Indians in Cozco, giving him convoy to as far as the Province of Callavaya, where the fineſt Gold is extracted in pieces of four or five Caracts in weight: but the Friar and the Gun-ſmith they kept above two years afterwards; during which time, they employed the Gun-ſmith ſolely in making them Hatchets and Pick-axes of Copper; and the Friar they held in great veneration, becauſe he was a Prieſt, and a Servant of the God of the Chriſtians: And when at length they gave them liberty to return to Peru, they entreated the Friar to ſtay amongſt them, and teach them the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, but he refuſed to dwell with them. This and many ſuch occaſions have been loſt, whereby the Goſpel might have been propagated by Preaching, without the force and compulſion of Arms.

Two years afterwards the Chunchus gave licence to theſe two Spaniards to return unto Peru, guiding and conducting them untill they came to the Valley of Callavaya, ſo that they told their own Story of this unhappy expedition. They alſo gave an account of all the Actions and Exploits which the Incas had performed at the lower parts of this River; and how they dwelt and inhabited amongſt the Muſus; and that after that time they acknowledged the Inca for their Lord and Sovereign, and that every year they carried him preſents of ſuch Fruits as their ſoil produced; the which preſents were continued untill the Death of the Inca Tupac Amaru, which was ſome few years after this unfortunate action and fight between Juan Alvarez Maldonado, and Gomez de Tordoya. The which Story we have fore-ſtalled and related out of its due place, thereby to atteſt, and prove the Conqueſt which the Inca Yupanqui made along the great River Amarumayu; and that the Incas who deſigned to make a Conqueſt of the Muſus, did afterwards plant themſelves, and inhabit amongſt them. All which the Friar Diego Martin, and the Gun-ſmith Simon did particularly relate and confirm: And the Friar as to himſelf did ſay, that nothing did trouble him ſo much in his life, as that he did not continue his abode amongſt the Indian Chunchus, as they deſired of him; but that not having the conveniencies there of ſaying Maſs, was a great inducement to recall him thence, for otherwiſe he would never have removed from thence. He farther ſaid, that he often purpoſed to return thither again, being troubled in his conſcience for not having ſatisfied the importunity of thoſe poor Indians, who made that reaſonable requeſt to him, which he by his vow and profeſſion was obliged to grant: And farther that Friar alledged, that thoſe Incas who were planted among the Muſus, might be of great uſe to the Spaniards in the Conqueſt which they deſigned to make of that Countrey. And ſo let us return again to the Acts and Monuments of the good Inca Yupanqui; the chief and greateſt of which, was the Conqueſt of Chili.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Nation of Chirihuana; of their cuſtoms and manner of living.

AS covetouſneſs and ambition of government is natural to all Men, ſo theſe Incas tranſported with a deſire of new Kingdoms and Conqueſts, made it their chief buſineſs and glory to enlarge their Empire. In purſuance of which, four years after that Yupanqui had ſent his Army down the River, he deſigned another Conqueſt over the great Province of Chiri-huana, which is ſeated in the Antis to the Eaſtward of the Charcas. But in regard the Countrey was unknown, and the ways undiſcovered, it was thought fit and convenient to ſend ſpyes firſt into thoſe parts, who might ſee and diſcover the Situation and Nature of the Countrey, and Manners of the People. The Spies being diſpatched, as was reſolved, they returned at a certain time, bringing a report, that the Countrey was bad, full of high and barren Mountains, Bogs, Lakes, and Mariſh Grounds; that the Natives were abſolutely brutes, and worſe than beaſts, having no Religion, or Worſhip of any thing, but lived without law or good manners, wandring in the Mountains and Woods, not aſſociated in any community or political government; unleſs it were, when they joined their Forces together to infeſt their Neighbours, with intention to eat the fleſh of thoſe which they took in War, without reſpect either of Sex or Age, and that nothing ſhould be loſt of all their ſpoils, they drank the bloud when they cut their throats. Nor did they onely eat the fleſh of their Enemies, but of their own people, when they died; onely they lamented over their bones; which when they had laid, and diſpoſed orderly according to their joints, they buried them in rocks, or caves, and the hollow of trees. They went naked, and promiſcuouſly uſed coition without regard either to Siſters, Daughters or Mothers. And this was the common way of living practiſed by the Nation of Chiri-huana.

The good Inca Yupanqui (for ſo was he ſtyled commonly by his own people, as alſo by Pedro de Cieça) having heard this report, turned to his relations and kindred, who were then preſent, and told them, that now he eſteemed it a duty and obligation incumbent on him to reduce the people of Chiri-huana, that ſo he might withdraw them from the turpitude of their manners, and from that beſtial life which they did lead, it being the grand deſign for which his Father the Sun had ſent him into the World. Having ſaid theſe Words, he appointed ten thouſand Men to be raiſed, and made ready, under the Command of Colonels and Captains of the Incan Family, Men experienced both in War and Peace, and inſtructed in their duty, and the buſineſs that they were to perform. This Army being provided, marched into the Province of Chirihuana, where they ſoon found the want and miſery of the Countrey; to ſupply which, they gave notice to the Inca, who ſpeedily furniſhed them with all things neceſſary. But ſuch were the difficulties of that Countrey, being nothing but Mountains, and Bogs, and Fens, that after the labour of two years, they were not able to effect any matter conſiderable therein; which being adviſed to the Inca, he ordered their return, deſigning after ſome time of repoſe to employ them on ſome more gratefull, and more pleaſing Conqueſts.

The Vice-King D. Franciſco de Toledo, who governed thoſe Kingdoms in the year 1572, reſolved to conquer thoſe Chirihuanas, as Acoſta in the 28th Chapter of his 4th Book doth relate at large; and in order thereunto having appointed a conſiderable force of Spaniards, provided with all neceſſaries to undertake that enterprize, he entred into that Province, carrying with him great numbers of Horſes and Cows to breed and increaſe; but he had not marched far before he experienced the inſuperable difficulties of that undertaking, which he not believing by any former report, nor yet admoniſhed by the ineffectual attempts which the Incas made made upon it, was forced at length to abandon his Design, and fly shamefully out of the Countrey. The ways were so bad, that the Mules were not able to pass with his Litter, so that he was carried on the Shoulders of Spaniards and Indians; whilst the Chirihuanas cried after them with Curses and Reproaches, saying, Throw down that Old Woman from her Basket, that we may eat her alive.

For the Chirihuanas (as we have said) are a sort of people greedy and ravenous after Flesh, because they have none in their own Countrey, either of tame or wild Cattel, the Soil not producing Herbage, or other nourishment for them being over-run with Briers and Bushes, and not cultivated with the least Art or Industry. Had they conserved the Cattel which the Vice-king left them, ordering Cow-keepers or Herdsmen to attend them, as was practised in the Islands of Hispaniola, and Cuba, they might have had an increase sufficient to have stocked their Countrey. Howsoever that barbarous people, even from that little Conversation and Learning which they had from the Spaniards, during their short abode in their Countrey, reaped some benefit as to their manners; for they did never afterward eat the Flesh of their own dead; onely they were thirsty after the Bloud of their Neighbours, and so raving for the Flesh of their Enemies, that they despised their own Lives to gain theirs, being insensible of all Dangers at the sight of their Prey; and so much did they long for humane Flesh, that when they surprised at any time Shepherds keeping their flocks of Sheep, or Herdsmen watching their Cattel, they would forsake and neglect the Herds and Droves, to take and devour the Flesh of the Shepherds. This inhumane barbarity was so dreadfull to all sorts of people, and their Neighbours round about, that ten Chirihuanas would chase a thousand others, to whom they were so terrible, that they affrighted their Children with their very Name. The Chirihuanas also learned from this short visit of the Spaniards to make Houses not for private Dwellings, but for the publick reception of all comers; the Fashion of which was one wide Gallery, divided into as many Apartments as there were Persons; the Room being no bigger than what was capable to receive one single person, for they had no Houshold-stuff, nor Garments to cover them, going always naked. And thus much shall serve for what we have to say of the condition and brutish Life of the Chirihuanas, who are so bestial, and inhumane, that nothing less than a Miracle can reclaim them from this gross and irrational course of Life.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Preparations which were made for the Conqueſt of Chili.

THough the good King Yupanqui had had but ill ſucceſs againſt the Chirihuanas, yet it did not diſcourage his Deſign for the Conqueſt of Chili, or for Atchievements of a more noble Nature: For in regard the great Maxime of the Incas State was the increaſe of their Empire, they were ever attempting and deſigning ſome thing towards the enlargement of it; and indeed ſuch was the Conſtitution of it in thoſe days, that they could not well ſubſiſt without War, their people being numerous, and without Employment, and the Stores of Arms, Cloths and Shoes, which were the Tribute of the Provinces, yearly increaſing, there would have been no conſumption of them without a War, but would have decayed and periſhed in the Magazines, or Store-houſes, without uſe; for as to Gold and Silver, (as we have ſaid) none was exacted, nor were they in uſe as current Coin, but onely were the voluntary Preſents which the Vaſſals gave for adornment of the Royal Palaces, and Temples belonging to the Sun; for theſe Reaſons, and for the Love and Obedience which his Subjects bore towards him, the King Yupanqui accounted himſelf to be in a proper and able condition for making a War upon the Kingdom of Chili, to which end having adviſed with his Council concerning the way and manner of carrying on the War, and having conſtituted and ordained Officers for adminiſtration of common Juſtice, during his abſence; he proceeded on his way to Chili, as far as Atacama, which was the moſt remote Province that was peopled on that ſide, between which and Chili were great Deſarts, without People or Proviſions; and there he intended to pitch his Camp, to give heat and life to the deſign.

From Atacama the Inca ſent his Spies, and a party like a Forlorn-hope, to diſcover and obſerve the ways and Difficulties of the paſſage; and becauſe the care was great, and the true Diſcovery of vaſt importance, the charge of it was committed to Incas onely; the Kings not being willing to entruſt the common ſafety to the faithfulneſs of any, but ſuch as were of the Royal Lineage. Theſe Incas took with them certain Indians from Atacama and Tucma for their Guides, for (as we have ſaid before) theſe had ſome knowledge of the way; for the better aſſurance of which it was ordered, that from two Leagues to two Leagues the Guides ſhould go, and return with a report of the way, and difficulties which they encountred in it; and ſhould by ſuch Advices accordingly contrive with moſt advantage to lodge, and lay their Proviſions for the Army in the moſt commodious places. With this labour and diligence they penetrated eighty Leagues through this deſart Countrey, which is as far as from Atacama to Copayapu, which is a little but a well peopled Province, environed round with long and wide Deſarts, for to paſs forward, as far as to Cuquimpu, are other eighty Leagues of deſart-Countrey.

The Spies having made a Diſcovery as far as Copayapu, and taken as much notice of every thing, as could be done by a ſurvey of their Eyes, they returned with all diligence to render an account to the Inca of what they had ſeen and obſerved. The Inca having received their Information, ordered ten thouſand Men to be made ready, under the Command of General Sinchiruca, and two other Major Generals, whoſe Names are not known, the which being diſpatched, marched in the beſt order that the way would permit, having their Proviſions carried on the backs of Sheep, whoſe Fleſh alſo ſerved for Victuals.

This Army being diſpeeded away, the Inca Yupanqui commanded that they ſhould be followed by ten thouſand more, for the ſuccour and reinforcement of their Companions, which marched before, the which added to the greater terrour and affrightment of the Enemy. The firſt Army being arrived near to Copayapu, ſent their accuſtomary Summons to the people, requiring them to render and ſubmit themſelves to a Child of the Sun, who was ſent from his Father to give them a new Religion, and Laws, and Cuſtoms, that ſo they might live like Men, and not like Beaſts; nor would it avail them to fly unto their Arms for ſuccour or defence, for that either by foul means or fair, they muſt obey the Inca, who was Sovereign Monarch of the four parts of the World. The Natives of Copayapu, being affrighted at theſe Summons, betook themſelves immediately to their Arms, being reſolved to defend the Confines of their Countrey; where at firſt they had ſome light Skirmiſhes and Encounters, both parties trying and proving the Courage and force of each other. The Incas, in compliance with the command of their King, faintly managed their Arms, being unwilling to uſe Fire, and Sword, and other Extremities of War, but rather by dallying with them ſometimes in Words, and again with Blows, induce them to a ſubmiſſion. The Enemy on the other ſide remained in great perplexities and doubts what to doe; the terrour and dread which they apprehended in oppoſing the Deity of the Sun, made them fear that ſome great Curſe or Malediction would be the effect of their Rebellion, yet the deſire they had to maintain their Liberty, and the ancient Worſhip of their Gods, was a moſt prevalent Argument againſt all Innovations.

CHAP. XIX.

The Incas poſſeſs themſelves of the Valley which they call Chili; and of other Summons ſent to divers new Nations, with their Anſwers thereunto.

IN this doubtfull condition and ſuſpenſe were the people of Copayapu, when the ſecond Army came to the Succour and Reinforcement of the former; with the ſight of which, being now totally diſcouraged, and out of all hopes of making reſiſtance, they came to a treaty, and accepted all the conditions both of civil manners, and religious Worſhip, which the power of a prevailing Enemy was pleaſed to impoſe upon them. All which being adviſed to the Inca, he was greatly pleaſed with the ſucceſs, conceiving that he had now an open and plain Field before him to the Conqueſt of Chili, which untill now he very much doubted, apprehending that the diſtance and difficulties of the way would render the Enterpriſe almoſt inſuperable. The Province of Copayapu having ſubmitted on compoſition, rather than ſubdued by force, the Inca followed the courſe of his good Fortune; commanding ten thouſand Men more to be raiſed, and furniſhed with Arms and neceſſary Proviſions for their March, and therewith to be diſpatched away with all Expedition, for reinforcement of the former Army; which being thus ſtrongly recruited, they marched eighty Leagues farther into the Countrey, where, after many difficulties, and much labour, they arrived at length at another Province, or Valley, called Cuquimpu, which they ſubdued. What particulars occurred in this Enterpriſe, what Battels were fought, or what Treaties paſſed, is not certain, for that being a Countrey very remote, the Indians of Peru were not able to render any perfect account of particular matters, more than in general, that the Valley of Cuquimpu was added to the Dominions of the Empire. Thence they proceeded forwards, conquering all the Nations before them, as far as to the Valley of Chili, from whence that Kingdom takes its denomination. During all the time of this War, which (as ſome ſay) laſted ſix years, the Inca with great care reinforced his Armies from time to time, furniſhing them with Arms, Cloths, Shoes, and all proviſions and neceſſaries required; for it concerned greatly the Dignity and Honour of his Majeſty, that his Souldiers ſhould not loſe ground, or retreat one ſtep from the Poſſeſſions they had gained; ſo that at length Chili being made the ſeat of War, was invaded by the Inca with fifty thouſand Men, provided with as much convenience and plenty, as if they had been quartered within the City of Cozco.

Of all matters that ſucceeded, intelligence was given to the Inca from time to time, and having made neceſſary proviſions for ſecuring the late Conqueſts, they continued their march to the Southward, ſubduing all the Nations before them to the River of Maulli, which is almoſt fifty Leagues diſtant from the Valley of Chili. What Battels or Skirmiſhes paſſed here is not particularly known, and therefore it is probable that matters were ended by way of Friendſhip, or Compoſition; it being always the firſt Trial which the Incas made at the beginning, before they put matters to the extremities of a War. The Incas had now enlarged their Empire above two hundred and ſixty Leagues in length, the diſtance being ſo great from Atacama to the River Maulli, counting the Deſarts as well as the inhabited places; for from Atacama to Copayapu are eighty Leagues, from Copayapu to Cuquimpu are eighty more, from Cuquimpu to Chili are fifty five, and then from Chili to the River Maulli are almoſt fifty more; all which was not as yet ſufficient to ſatisfie the Avarice and Ambition of the Incas: For having given out the neceſſary orders for Government, and ſecuring the late Conqueſts, and made proviſion againſt all accidents and contingencies which might happen in War, they proceeded farther, paſſing the River Maulli with twenty thouſand Men; where, according to their cuſtome, they in the firſt place ſent their Summons to the Province of Purumauca, (called by the Spaniards Promaucaes) requiring them either to accept the Inca for their King and Lord, or otherwiſe provide to defend themſelves by Arms. The Purumaucans having received intelligence of the approach of the Incas, had put themſelves into a poſture of Defence, and having made an Alliance with their Neighbours of Antalli, Pincu, and Cauqui, reſolved to dye, rather than loſe their ancient Liberty; and on this confidence gave for Anſwer, That the Conquerours ſhould be Lords over the conquered, and that the Incas ſhould ſoon underſtand in what manner the Purumaucans were uſed to obey.

Three or four days after this Anſwer the Purumaucans having joined with their Allies, appeared in a Body, to the number of 18 or 20 thouſand Men, pitching their Camp in ſight of the Incas, who ſtill continued to repeat their inſtant ſolicitations for Peace and Concord, proteſting to them, and calling the Sun and Moon to witneſs, that they came not to deprive or deſpoil them of their Lands and Eſtates; but onely with an intention to reduce them to a manner of rational living like Men, and impoſe nothing more upon them, than the Worſhip and Adoration of the Sun, whom they required them to accept for their God, and the Inca for their King and Sovereign. The Purumaucans replied, That they would not ſpend their time in parlying, or vain Diſputes, but would refer the Controverſie to be decided by the Sword, and that the Incas ſhould accordingly provide the next day for a Trial, they being reſolved neither to ſend other Propoſals, nor receive them.

CHAP. XX.

Of the cruel Battel between the Incas and other Nations, and of the first Spaniard who discovered Chili.

THE day following, both Armies raising their Camps, put themselves in order of Battel, and began the Fight with great Courage and Resolution, which continued that whole day with such equality of Fortune, that it could not be discerned to which part the Victory most inclined; many were slain and wounded on both sides, untill the night divided them, and caused them to retreat to their several Quarters. The second and third days were alike bloudy, one party contending for Liberty, and the other for Honour. The fourth day both sides were drawn up in their Camp, expecting which should make the attempt; and in this order they continued for the space of two days after, and then they both drew off, each side suspecting that the other had sent for more Succours, requiring speedy Recruits. The Purumaucans, and their Allies, thought that they had gained Credit enough, in being able to withstand the invincible Power of the Incas, and with this Reputation they returned to their own Countries, proclaiming Victory and Triumph in all parts where they passed.

The Incas, after due and mature consideration, thought it not convenient to pursue after the Enemy, but rather give way to their bestial Fury for a time; howsoever the Debates hereupon were divers, some were for pursuing the Enemy, untill they had entirely subdued them; but others of a more moderate temper, were for following the mild and gentle Principles of the Incas, not being over forward in the utter destruction of their Enemies. At length it was agreed and concluded, that they should preserve that which they had already gained, making the River Maulli the utmost limit and bound of their Frontiers, untill such time as they should receive new Orders and Instructions from the Inca. Of all which the King Yupanqui being advised, gave directions, that they should give a stop to the farther progression of their Conquests, and attend to the improvement and cultivating of the Lands and Possessions they had gained, with particular respect to the ease and benefit of the new Subjects; that so the neighbouring people being allured by this good treatment might offer themselves to become Vassals to the Inca; and in case the Nature of this people should be so dull and stupid, as not to observe and distinguish between the happiness of an improved Life, and their own Bestialities, that then the loss would be theirs, and redound more to their own hurt, than to the prejudice of the Incas. In compliance with this Command from the King, they desisted from farther prosecution of their Conquests in Chili, making the River Maulli the ultimate bounds of their Empire, which they fortified with Castles, and strong Garisons; so that now their business was to administer Justice, and improve the Incomes of the Sun; all which was performed with great respect to the benefit of the Subjects, who finding themselves obliged by such kind treatment, did with great Zeal and Affection embrace the Government of the Incas, and comply with their Laws, Rites and Religion, continuing constant in them, untill such time as the Spaniards became Masters of their Countrey.

The first Spaniard that discovered Chili, was Don Diego de Almagro; but he did but just see it, and afterwards return to Peru, having sustained innumerable labours, and endured great fatigues both in his journey thither, and in his return; the which enterprise was the cause of the general Revolt of all Peru, and the original of that Discord and civil Dissention which happened afterwards between those two Governours, and of the Death of the said Almagro, being taken Prisoner at the Battel of Salinas; and also of the Death of the Marquis D. Francisco de Piçarro, and of D. Diego de Almagro, who was born of Spanish and Indian Bloud, and who commanded in the Fight, called the Battel of Chupas. Of all which we ſhall (God willing) treat more at large in its due place. The ſecond perſon that entred into the Kingdom of Chili was the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, who with a ſtrong party both of Horſe and Foot, marched beyond the Dominions of the Incas, making conqueſt of all before him; the Colonies which he planted were thriving and proſperous, though he himſelf unhappily fell by the hands of his own Subjects of the Province of Araucu, which he having ſubdued, made choice of for himſelf, when the Lands were divided amongſt the Conquerours. This worthy perſon planted many Colonies, and founded Cities with Spaniſh Inhabitants; and amongſt the reſt, that which after his own Name was called Valdivia; in the Conqueſt of this Province he performed many and noble Exploits, and afterwards governed it with great prudence and juſtice, and had not onely been happy in himſelf, but fortunate alſo to his people, had not the boldneſs of an Indian, who adventured to cut the thread of his life, given a period to the expectation of many other bleſſings, which his Wiſedom and Conduct might have produced to his Subjects. And in regard the Death of this Governour and General was in a manner without Example, and that which was never practiſed by the Indians either before or ſince the Entrance of the Spaniards into that Countrey; and what turned to their greater miſchief; I have thought fit to relate it in this place, that ſo the Reader may be clearly informed of the particulars of that unhappy battel, according to the firſt report which came of it to Peru, ſoon after the Fight was ended, and likewiſe what intelligence the ſecond report gave of it; for better underſtanding of which, it will be neceſſary to begin from the original and cauſe of this whole matter.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Rebellion of Chili againſt the Governour Valdivia.

THE poſſeſſion and inheritance of the Kingdom of Chili falling to the ſhare and lot of this Gentleman, who was worthy of an Empire, his fortune was to be Maſter alſo of that part, which yielded him a yearly Tribute of a hundred thouſand pieces of Gold: But in regard the thirſt of Gold encreaſes with the gains of it, and that there is no end propoſed to Wealth and Riches; ſo the more this Governour amaſſed, the more labour and hard uſage he impoſed on the Indians, forcing them beyond their ſtrength and abilities, to which they had not been accuſtomed to labour, and dig in the Mines to ſatiate that Avarice of his, which was never to be ſatisfied: The people of Araucu (which were the Subjects of Valdivia) not being able to ſupport this Yoke of bondage and ſervitude, joined themſelves with others in confederacy, and put themſelves into open rebellion, committing all the outrages and inſolencies they were able upon the Spaniards. The Governour Valdivia having intelligence hereof, marched out with a hundred and fifty Horſe, deſpiſing the Indians, as the Spaniards have always done, on occaſion of ſuch-like revolts and mutinies of that people: But this contempt of an enemy coſt dear, having been the ruine and deſtruction of Valdivia, and of thoſe who were with him, who all periſhed by the hands of thoſe whom before they had deſpiſed.

The firſt news which came of this diſaſture, was brought to the City de la Plata, which is in Peru, by the hand of an Indian wrote in a ſcrip of Paper, without form or date either of time or place, in a few words, that Pedro de Valdivia, with 150 Lanciers, were ſwallowed up by the Earth. This report coming in a ſcroll of Paper, and by an Indian Meſſenger ſoon gained belief, being quickly ſpread through all Peru, to the great amazement of the Spaniards, who could not underſtand what thoſe Words ſhould mean, of being ſwallowed up by the Earth; for they could not think it poſſible for 150 Spaniſh Horſe to be overthrown by the Indians; and there-therefore they were more inclinable to believe, that in regard that Countrey is like Peru, mountainous, and full of precipices and hollow places, and ſubject to Earthquakes, that the Spaniards were unadviſedly fallen, and periſhed in ſome unſtable, and falſe grounds and caves, rather than by the force and courage of the Indians, whom after many years of experience, they concluded unable to deſtroy ſuch a number of Spaniards in battel. Whilſt they of Peru remained in this doubtfull belief of matters, after 60 days time a more particular and certain relation came of the Death of Valdivia, and all his Souldiers, with all the circumſtances of the late battel, which the Indians fought with him: the which I ſhall relate according to that account which was given of it from Chili; the which having in the firſt place ſpecified the Inſurrection of the Indians, and the many inſolencies and outrages they had committed, proceeded to tell us; That when Valdivia came to the place where theſe Rebels of Arauca were aſſembled, he found 13 or 14000 of them in Arms; which he ſuddenly aſſaulting with his Horſe, did in many and divers Skirmiſhes always beat them, and put them to flight; ſo that the Indians were ſo terrified with fear, and dread of the fury of the Spaniſh Horſe, that they would never adventure into the open Plains; for that ten Spaniards were able to beat a thouſand Indians, but kept themſelves lurking in the Woods and Mountains, where the Spaniſh Horſe could not come at them; and from thence they often ſallied out, doing all the ſpoils and miſchiefs that they were able to the Spaniards, from whom they would receive no Articles or Propoſals of Accommodation, being more willing to dye, than obey, and ſerve them longer.

Thus the War was continued and carried on for many days, during which time the report was ſpread in all parts of the Countrey of the Araucans; and coming to the Ears of an old Captain of theirs, who had been famous in War, and of long experience; being one day in his Houſe, he began to conſider the reaſon, how it could be poſſible for ſo ſmall a number as 150 Spaniards to ſubdue and enſlave 12 or 13000 Indians; for that either they muſt be Devils, or otherwiſe immortal Men, as once the Indians did at the beginning believe them to be. To diſcover this myſtery, and the reaſon of this great diſproportion in War; he one day aſcended to the top of a Hill, from whence he could ſee and ſurvey the two Armies encamped; that of the Indians was large, and far extended with great numbers of Men, that of the Spaniards was little, and contracted within a ſmall compaſs of ground: Conſidering awhile hereupon, and of the ſituation of the two Camps, and wondering how it was poſſible for ſo ſmall a number to be always victorious over a greater; he departed, and went from thence to the Indian Camp, where having called a Council, and made a long and rational diſcourſe upon this ſubject; he at laſt made theſe Queries and Demands in the caſe:

Whether the Spaniards vvere mortal Men, like them, or vvhether they vvere immortal and incorruptible bodies, like thoſe of the Sun and Moon? Whether they vvere inſenſible of hunger and thirſt, and ſtood in need of ſleep or repoſe after toil and labour? and in ſhort, vvhether they vvere made of fleſh and bones, or of ſteel and iron? The like Queries he alſo made concerning their Horſes: To all which anſwer being made, that they were Men like them, and of the ſame compoſition and nature; Then, ſaid he, go your ways, and take your repoſe, and to morrovv you ſhall ſee vvho are moſt Men, they, or vve. With this the Aſſembly being diſſolved; in the morning, by break of day, they ſounded to Arms, the Indians giving louder ſhouts, and making greater noiſe vvith their Trumpets and Drums, and ſuch-like inſtruments, than they had formerly done; and in a ſhort time the Old Captain had divided his Army into thirteen ſeveral Squadrons, each conſiſting of a thouſand Men, keeping them ſtill in reſerves one after the other.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the New Method and Way of Fighting, contrived by an Old Indian Captain.

THE Spaniards being allarumed with the noiſe and ſhouts of the Indians, ſallied forth in their bright and glittering Arms, with long Plumes on their Helmets, and Feathers on the heads of their Horſes; and ſeeing the many Diviſions and Squadrons of the Enemy, they imagined that they were more able to break the ſmaller Battalions, than if they were united into one body. So ſoon as the Indian Captain ſaw the Spaniards appear, he encouraged the firſt Squadron to fight with them, exhorting them to doe their beſt; not (ſaid he) that I expect you ſhould overcome them, but that you ſhould perform what you are able in favour and defence of your Countrey; and when you are worſted, and can perform no more, that then you ſave your ſelves by flight, taking care in your retreat, that you break not into the other bodies, ſo as to diſorder them, but that you fly behind all the reſt, and there rally, and make up your body again; the like advice and order he gave to all the other Squadrons. With this deſign and reſolution the Indians engaged with the Spaniards, with whom having fought awhile, and performed what they were able; being routed, they retired into the Rere of the Army, the ſecond, third, fourth and fifth, were eaſily broken, and routed by the Spaniards, but yet not without ſome loſs on the Spaniſh ſide both of Men and Horſe.

Thus as the firſt Squadrons were overthrown, ſtill new reſerves came up, who all fought in their orders one after the other. In the Rere of all was another Captain, who governed in the orderly rallying of the Squadrons, which he cauſed to eat, and drink, and repoſe themſelves, whilſt the others continued the fight, that ſo they might be refreſhed, when their turn came for the next engagement. The Spaniards having already routed five Squadrons of the Enemy, and ſeeing ſtill ten or twelve more before them coming on; and having fought three long hours, yet encouraging one the other, they aſſaulted the ſixth Squadron, which came in relief of the fifth, which they overthrew, as alſo the ſeventh, eighth, ninth and tenth Diviſion. But now having fought ſeven long hours without intermiſſion, both the Men and Horſes began to fail, not being able to charge with that mettle and vigour as they did in the beginning; which the Indians obſerving, would not permit them one moment of repoſe, but ſtill plied them with new and freſh Squadrons, and after all the Spaniards ſaw notwithſtanding ten Diviſions ſtill to be fought with; and though the natural force both of Man and Horſe began now to grow tired, and faint; yet they ſtill rouſed their invincible ſpirits, not to ſhew or evidence any ſymptoms or appearances of failure to the Indians: Howſoever the Indians beginning ſenſibly to find the decay of the Spaniſh vigour and mettle, and that their force was not ſo impetuous and irreſiſtible as it was at firſt, ſtill continued to bring up their Squadrons, untill two a clock in the afternoon; which the Governour Pedro de Valdivia obſerving, and that there were eight or nine Squadrons ſtill to be overcome; and that when thoſe vvere routed, they vvere alvvays rallied, and made up; vvhich nevv vvay and method of Fighting having vvell conſidered; and that it being novv late tovvards the Evening, it vvas probable the Enemy would afford them as little repoſe in the Night, as they had given them reſpite in the Day; he reſolved to retreat before their Horſes were wholly ſpent, and diſabled of farther ſervice: According to his Command his Souldiers retreated towards a narrow paſs, which if they could reach, being about a League and a half from the place where the Fight was, they imagined themſelves ſecure from any attack of the Enemy; for that two Spaniards on foot were able to defend it from all the Army of the Indians. Having taken this reſolution, though late, he gave Command to his Souldiers to retreat, paſſing the word ſtill as they retired, that they ſhould make for that narrow paſs, ſtill turning upon the Enemy, and making head againſt them, changing the ſtate of their caſe from an offenſive, to a defenſive Fight.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Indians overcome the Spaniards by the Treachery of an Indian.

A Certain Indian, who from a Boy had been bred up in the Family of the Governour Valdivia, whoſe Chriſtian Name was Philip, but by the Indians called Lautaru, being the Son of a Cacique: This Fellow being more biaſſed by the natural affection which he bore to his Countrey, than by his love to God, or fidelity to his Maſter; ſo ſoon as he heard the word given to the Spaniards to retreat, he inſtantly reported it to the Indians, having the knowledge of both Languages, and called out to them not to content themſelves with this flight and advantage, in letting them go free, but to run and poſſeſs the narrow paſſage, and prevent their entrance into it, in the which they did now place all the hopes of their ſecurity and protection; wherefore cried he ſtill out, Make uſe of this advantage, which is now given you for the liberty of your Countrey, and reſcue it from deſtruction by the bloud of theſe Thieves and Traytors. And having ſaid theſe words, that he might encourage them by his Example, he took up a Lance from the ground, and placed himſelf in the front of them to fight againſt the Spaniards.

The Old Captain, who was the firſt Projector of this way of Fighting, obſerving the way which the Spaniards took, ſoon apprehended their deſign by the hint which Lautaru had given them; to circumvent which, he diſpeeded away two freſh Squadrons of thoſe which had not as yet fought, to haſten with the beſt order they were able to the narrow paſs, and there, at the entrance of it, to keep their ſtation firm untill the reſt came up; which having done, he purſued the Spaniards with the other Squadrons, ſtill plying them with freſh bodies of Souldiers, ſo that they did not permit them one moment of reſpite, always killing and purſuing them, untill they came to the very mouth and entrance of the narrow paſs; where when they came, and that the Spaniards found it already poſſeſſed by the Enemy, they began to deſpair of all hopes to eſcape Death; which to avoid, no means appearing, they called on the Name of Chriſt and the Bleſſed Virgin, and of ſuch Saints for which they had the greateſt devotion.

The Indians perceiving that both the Men and Horſes were wholly ſpent and tired, came in upon them in an entire body, and 15 or 20 of them together fell on one poor Horſe, ſome catching him by the legs, ſome by the tail, others by the mane, whilſt others with their great clubs knocked both Man and Horſe down, killing them with the greateſt cruelty and rage imaginable. The Governour Pedro de Valdivia, and a Prieſt that was with him, they took alive, and tied them to trees, untill they had diſpatched all the reſt, that they might in cool bloud conſider with what Death they might puniſh them. Theſe particulars came by the ſecond Advice from Chili to Peru, being ſent by ſome Indian friends, who were preſent in the Battel, three of which made their eſcape, having by the darkneſs of the Night hid themſelves in the Thickets of a Wood, untill ſuch time as the Indians retiring from that place to celebrate their Victory with joy and triumph, gave them opportunity to eſcape; who being Men well acquainted with the ways, and more faithfull to their Maſters than Lautaru, returned again to the Spaniards, bringing the fatal news of the loſs of Pedro de Valdivia, and all his companions.

CHAP. XXIV.

How they killed Valdivia, and maintained a War Fifty Years afterwards.

THE manner how they killed Valdivia, was after the coming of this second Advice related in different ways by these three Indians, because that none of them were present at his Death: One said, that Lautaru finding his Master tied to a Tree, reviling and reproaching him first, said, Why is this Traytor suffered to live? and with that killed him with his own hand: Another said, That Valdivia, before he died, desired first to speak with his Servant Lautaru, hoping by his means and intercession to save his life; But the most certain intelligence we have, is this, That an Old Captain beat his brains out with a club, perhaps it might be that Old Captain who managed all this affair; for it is said, that he killed him without any parly, lest his people treating with him, and believing all the promises and vows which this unfortunate Governour might make whilst he was tied to a Tree, and in apprehensions of Death, when he might easily Article on the conditions of life to leave their Countrey, and depart thence with all his People, and Souldiers, and never to return again; not trusting, as I say, to the credulous humour of his people, whom he perceived hearkening to the promises and vows of Valdivia, he resolutely passed through the midst of them, and with a club dashed out his brains, putting an end to the parly which his Souldiers entertained with him; and therewith turned towards them, saying, Are ye so foolish and credulous as to trust to the words of a vanquished and captivated slave? What will not a Man in his condition promise, and how little will he perform after he hath obtained his liberty?

But the circumstances of his Death were reported in another manner by a Spaniard, who was a Native of Truxillo, called Francisco de Rieros, who was a Captain then in Chili, and Master of some Indians in that Kingdom; who coming to Peru sometime after that fatal disasture, reported, that the Indians passed the night after this Victory with Dances and Merriment; and at the end of every Dance they cut off a piece of the flesh of Valdivia, and another of the Priest's, (they being both tied together) which they broiled before their faces, and then eat it; during which time, Valdivia confessing his Sins to the Priest, they both expired in that condition. It is more probable, that after the Captain had killed him with his club, that the Indians might eat him, not that this sort of Indians delighted in humane flesh, but onely to vent their rage and spleen on him, who had been the Authour and Original of all the slavery and misery they had endured.

From that time the Indians took up a custome of fighting with the Spaniards in several Squadrons or Divisions, as D. Alonso de Erzilla in the first Canto of his Araucana reports; and that after this rebellion, they maintained the War 49 years, untill the end of the year 1553; at which time D. Sebastian de Castilla began his rebellion in the Villa de la Plata, and Potosi, which are in the Kingdom of Peru, and Francisco Hernandez Giron began his in Cozco.

Thus have I, as clearly as I could, related the particulars of the Fight and Death of the Governour D. Pedro de Valdivia, as it was written and related in Peru, by those who lived in Chili; it being referred to every Man's judgment to believe that report which he esteems most probable: the which Story I have anticipated, and reported out of its due place and time, in regard it is the most memorable and notorious passage that ever happened in the Indies, which I would not omit to describe, lest I should have had no other occasion which might lead me to a farther discourse of Chili, or lest I might have had time or life to extend this History to that period of years in which the Spaniards became absolute Masters of that Kingdom.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of other unhappy Succeſſes in the Kingdom of Chili.

THus far had I writ when freſh Advices came of other fatal and unfortunate Succeſſes in Chili, which happened there in the Year 1599. and in Peru in the Year 1600. Amongſt other Calamities the Earthquake about Arequepa is recounted as one, which at length ended in ſuch a terrible irruption of fire from a certain Hill, which for the ſpace of twenty days continually threw up ſuch quantities of Aſhes and Sand, as in the parts round about covered the Earth two yards thick, and in places farther off at leaſt a yard, and where leaſt, a quarter of a yard deep, for the ſpace of thirty or fourty Leagues round in the Countrey of Arequepa; whereby all their Vines and Corn Lands were ſpoiled, their Trees and Fruits ſcorched and blaſted, and all their Cattel periſhed for want of paſture. Their Cows and Oxen lay dead in Droves of five hundred in a place, and their Flocks of Sheep, and Goats, and Hogs lay buried in theſe Aſhes. Many Houſes were overwhelmed with the weight of the Earth and Sand, which this irruption threw up, ſuch as remained were preſerved by the diligence of thoſe Maſters who always cleared and threw them off as they came; all which was accompanied with ſuch dreadfull Flaſhes of Lightning, and claps of Thunder, as were heard and ſeen at thirty Leagues diſtance from the Confines of Arequepa; and ſo thick were the Clouds of Sand and Aſhes, which were thrown up, that for many days they ſo obſcured the Sun, that they were forced to light Candles for performance of their neceſſary occaſions. Theſe and the like particulars were adviſed from that City, and the adjacent parts, the which we have ſuccinctly touched, referring our ſelves for a more full Relation thereof to the Hiſtorians of thoſe times, whoſe buſineſs it is to deſcribe all the particulars hereof more at large.

Howſoever we ſhall relate the misfortunes of Chili, as they were adviſed in writing from thence, becauſe they come pertinent to the foregoing ſtory of the Indians of Arauca, and are conſequences of the Inſurrection begun in the Year 1553. and which continued untill the beginning of 1603. nor is it known when there will be an end thereof, in regard that after forty nine years ſince this Rebellion began, (during which time they have endured all the miſeries of Fire and Sword,) yet ſtill thoſe troubles ſeem rather to increaſe than abate, as plainly appears by the intelligences which we have extracted from a Letter written from an Inhabitant of the City of Sanctiago in Chili, which came at the ſame time with the relation of the Calamities of Arequepa. Theſe Advices were delivered to me by a Gentleman who was my Friend, and had lived in Peru, and ſerved in quality of a Captain againſt the Rebels in the Kingdom of Quitu, when they mutined on occaſion of the great Taxes which were laid upon them, his Name was Martin Cuaço, a perſon who hath done great Service to the Crown of Spain. The title of theſe misfortunes of Chili runs thus:

Advices from Chili: and preſently adds, So ſoon as an end was put to the writing of the foregoing Intelligence of Arequepa, came other more diſmal ſtories from Chili, full of ſorrow, and greatly to be lamented. The particulars were related in the manner following.

A Relation of the Loſs and Deſtruction of the City of Valdivia in Chili, which happened on Wedneſday the 24th of November, 1599.

ABout break of day five thouſand Indians, belonging to the parts adjacent, " and to the Diviſions of the Ymperial, Pica and Purem, whereof three " thouſand were Horſe, and the reſt Foot, having (as was ſaid) ſeventy fire-" Arms, and above two hundred Men armed with Coats of Male, aſſaulted " the City, ſurpriſing it without the leaſt allarm, by the guidance of treache-" rous Spies belonging to the ſame place. They divided themſelves into ſmall " Bodies of twenty four or twenty five in a Company, for they knew that the " Spaniards lay ſecure, and ſleeping in their Houſes, and that their Corps of " Guard were but four Centinels, and that two onely went the rounds: They " conſidered alſo that the Spaniards were elevated with the ſucceſs they had " had in the two Incurſions lately made, when in the ſpace of twenty days they " had the fortune to take and demoliſh a Fortreſs which the Indians had erected " on the ſide of the mariſh Grounds of Paparlen, with ſo great a ſlaughter of " them, that the Spaniards believed, that in the compaſs of eight Leagues round, " there was not an Indian that could appear. Howſoever having bribed the " Spies which the Spaniards entertained amongſt them, they ſucceeded in the " moſt notable Plot that ever was deſigned by ſilly Barbarians; for they with " great quiet and ſilence encompaſſed every Houſe with people ſufficient to deal " with thoſe which were within, for they were well adviſed of the num-" bers which dwelt in it; and ſetting Guards at the entrance to every Street, " they aſſailed the unhappy City, giving fire to the Houſes, and having ſeized on " the Gates, the Inhabitants could neither relieve one the other, nor yet make " their eſcape by flight; ſo that in the ſpace of two hours, they had deſtroyed all " the people by Fire and Sword, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the Fort, and Guns " in it, there being no people within to defend it. Thoſe that were killed and " taken, were about four hundred Spaniards, of Men, Women and Children. " They ſacked and plundered to the value of three hundred thouſand Pieces of " Eight, nor did any thing remain which was not either burnt, or laid deſolate. " The Ships of Valtano, Villarroel, and of one D. Diego de Royas, were let run a " drift down the Stream, to which ſome people made their eſcape by the means " of Canoes which lay by the water ſide, otherwiſe none had remained to have " been the Meſſengers of this fatal News. The Indians had been provoked to " this cruelty in revenge of thoſe people whom the Spaniards had ſlain in two " late Incurſions; having ſold their Wives and Children to Merchants, who " tranſported them into foreign Countries; and ſo ſenſible were they of the " ſlavery they had endured for fifty years paſt, that though they had been bap-" tized, and entertained Prieſts to inſtruct them in the Chriſtian Doctrine, yet " the firſt thing they did was to burn their Temples, and with ſacrilegious hands " to throw the Images of Saints from the Altars.

" Ten days after this unhappy fate the good Colonel Franciſco del Campo ar-" rived in the Port of this City with the ſuccour of three hundred Men, which " the Governour of Peru had ſent thither, for the relief of that, and the other di-" ſtreſſed Cities: It was his fortune to recover a Son and a Daughter of his " which were both Children, which being committed to the charge of his Siſter-" in-law, had been taken, and carried away captives, when the City was ſacked " and laid deſolate; the miſerable State of which, when he ſaw, he with great " Rage and Reſolution landed his Men, marching with all expedition to relieve " the Cities of Oſorno, Villarrica, and the unhappy Ymperial; from which places " they had received no news in the ſpace of a whole year, but that they had en-" dured a Siege of ſo long a time, and were almoſt all famiſhed and dead, ha-" ving no other ſuſtenance than the Fleſh of their dead Horſes, and when thoſe

" failed of Cats, and Dogs, and the Skins of Beasts; and this was all the Intelli" gence they had, being brought to them by a Messenger who escaped down the " River, representing with Sighs and Tears the miserable condition of their " people. Wherefore the first thing that this Colonel designed after his landing,
" was to relieve the City of Osorno, for he was informed that the Enemy soon
" after the Destruction of Valdivia, were gone thither with the like intent; his " success herein was accordingly prosperous, for he raised the Siege, and perfor" med other Actions of happy consequence.

" At the instant that I am writing this, news is come, that all the people in " Ymperiall were starved with hunger after the Siege of a complete Year, excepting " twenty Men, who, to avoid Famine, yielded themselves into the hands of " the Enemy, and thereby endured a greater misery than Death itself. In Angol
" they killed four Souldiers, but who they were is not yet known. God Al" mighty have Mercy upon us.

From Santiago in Chili, in the month of March, 1600.

All which Relation came (as I have said) in several Letters from Peru, and the Kingdom of Chili, which was a great calamity to that Countrey. Moreover Father Diego de Alcobaça, whom I have formerly mentioned, in the Year 1601. amongst many other things relating to the Affairs of that Countrey, writes me these very words concerning the Kingdom of Chili.

" The condition of Chili is now become very unhappy, for there is not an In- " dian but who can mount his Horse, and dare encounter with his Launce the " best Spanish Souldier that is; and though we send every year Souldiers thither,
" yet none of them return; they have destroyed two Plantations of the Spaniards,
" and having killed all the Men, and destroyed every thing of use, they carried
" their Wives and Children into Slavery; and lately they killed the Governour
" Loyola from an Ambuscade, who married the Daughter of D. Diego Sayrutipac, " who was an Inca, and was departed from Villcapampa, before you left these " parts. God in his mercy pardon the Sins of the dead, and put an end to these
" Afflictions of the living. Thus far are the words of Alcobaça, which he writes me with many other sad stories, which I purposely omit, because they contain nothing but what is tragical, and full of sorrow; amongst which recounting the afflicted Estate of Arequepa, he says that Wheat that Year was worth in that Countrey ten and eleven Ducats a Bushel, and Mayz thirteen.

Moreover, besides all that which we have already delivered concerning Arequepa, they wrote farther, that their calamities still continued, having to contend with the extremities of the four Elements, as appears at large by those Relations which the Jesuits have given to the General of their Order, concerning the most remarkable Occurrences of Peru, which happened in the Year 1602. And though those Letters say, that their misfortunes were not at an end, yet they farther add, that greater were the Afflictions of the Kingdom of Chili, which happened after the forementioned troubles; the particulars of which were given me by Francisco de Castro, who was born at Granada, and in this Year 1604. is Prefect of the Schools of the sacred University of Cordova, and Rhetorick Professour. The Title of which, together with the particulars, is Verbatim in these words.

Of the Rebellion of the Araucans.

OF the thirteen Cities which were eſtabliſhed in this Kingdom of Chili, the " Indians have deſtroyed ſix, namely Valdivia, Imperial, Angol, Sancta Cruz, " Chillan and Conception. They overthrew, conſumed and laid deſolate their " Houſes and Habitations, diſhonoured and prophaned the Temples, obſcured " the brightneſs of that Faith and Devotion which ſhined in thoſe parts, and " what is worſt this ſucceſs hath encouraged, and raiſed the Spirits of the Indians " in that manner, that they are grown bold and confident, omitting no op- " portunity or advantage which may offer to rob and deſtroy our Cities and " Monaſteries with Fire and Sword. They have learned alſo many Arts and " Strategems of War; for that when they beſieged the City of Oſorno, and com- " pelled the Spaniards to retire within their works, they ſo ſtraitened them, that " they could receive no ſuſtenance, unleſs it were ſome ſmall quantities of the " Seeds of Herbs, and Leaves of Turnips, which ſome few were fain to fight " for, and gain with the point of the Launce. In one of theſe Sieges of this Ci- " ty they broke the Images of Chriſt and our Lady, and other Saints, to the " great diſhonour of God, which none but his infinite Mercy and Patience could " have ſuffered. In the laſt Siege which the Indians laid to this place, they ſur- " priſed the Spaniards, and killed the Centinels, and without any oppoſition en- " tred and poſſeſſed themſelves of the Town, exerciſing ſuch cruelty as was " agreeable to the barbarity of their Natures; for they butchered the Children, " and chained the Women and Nuns, intending to carry them away into Slavery; " but whilſt they were thus buſily employed in packing up, and diſpoſing their " Booty, and plundering every where without order; the Spaniards took courage, " and with that opportunity fell upon them, and God aſſiſting their endeavours, " they reſcued their Wives and Nuns from their violent hands, and with the loſs " of ſome few forced them to fly, and quit both their Prey and their City. The " laſt Victory which the Indians obtained, was when they took Villarrica, with " great effuſion of Spaniſh bloud; they ſet fire to the four Quarters of the Town " and killed all the Friars of St. Dominick, St. Francis, and the Merceds, with all " the Clergy that were there, carrying all the Women away Captives, many of " which were Ladies of Quality, and Condition. And this was the Fate of that " City, which was once of Fame and great Renown, and illuſtrious amongſt the " neighbouring Cities of that new World. Thus far proceeds the Relation of Chili in the Year 1604. To all which nothing can be farther ſaid, than that theſe were Judgments of God, which his ſecret Providence permits for the chaſtiſement of Mankind. And herewith let us return to the good Inca Yupanqui, to conclude the remaining Actions of his Reign.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the quiet Life of the Inca Yupanqui, and of the Actions wherein he employed himself untill the time of his Death.

THE King Yupanqui having eſtabliſhed and confirmed the Conqueſts which his Captains had made, under the ſecurity of good Laws, and ſettled Religion in all parts, having alſo made proviſion for his own Royal Revenue, and ſeparated a maintainance for the Prieſthood of the Sun, he determined to put an end to his farther Conqueſts, which are now far extended, reaching no leſs than a thouſand Leagues in length; ſo that he reſolved to ſpend the remainder of his Days in erecting Monuments and Trophies of his greatneſs, which might ever conſerve his Memory in great Renown. To which end he built new Fortreſſes, and many Temples dedicated to the Sun, with Houſes for the Select Virgins, Royal Palaces, and made many Aqueducts, Walks and Gardens. He alſo endowed the Temple of the Sun in Cozco with greater Riches, of which though it ſtood in no need, yet he thought it a duty to contribute ſome thing towards the glory of him whom he honoured, and eſteemed for his Father; and more eſpecially he buſied himſelf in building and completing the Fortreſs at Cozco, for which his Father had made proviſion of all materials, and gathered great quantities of Stones and Rocks, of which we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to diſcourſe more at large. He alſo perſonally viſited all the parts of his Empire, that ſo he might with his own Eyes ſee the State of things, hear the Complaints and Aggrievances of his people, and provide a Remedy and Relief for his Subjects; to all which he attended with ſo much care and compaſſion, that he worthily deſerved to be ſurnamed The Pious. In theſe Employments this Prince with great Peace and Tranquillity ſpent his time for ſeveral Years, being greatly beloved and obeyed by his Subjects; at the end of which falling ſick, and finding within himſelf his end to be near, he called the Prince, who was his Heir, and his other Sons together, recommending to them by way of Teſtament the ſtrict obſervance of their Laws, and religious Rites of their Idolatrous Worſhip; and above all encharged them to perform and adminiſter Juſtice to their Subjects in the moſt equal balance, and therewith he gave them his Bleſſing of Peace, for that now his time was come to depart this Life, and reſt with his Father the Sun, who called and ſummoned him to his Manſions of Felicity.

Thus dyed Yupanqui full of Glory and Triumph, having enlarged his Empire above five hundred Leagues in length to the Southward, being as far as from Atacama to the River Maulli; and to the Northward one hundred and forty Leagues, along the Coaſt from Chincha to Chimu. He was lamented with great grief, and having ranked him in the tenth Order of their Gods, who were Children of the Sun, becauſe he was the tenth King, they celebrated his Obſequies with great ſolemnity, which, according to their Cuſtome, continued for the ſpace of a whole Year, offering unto him many Sacrifices. He left Tupac Inca Yupanqui his Heir and eldeſt Son, which he begot of his Wife and Siſter, called Coya Chimpu Occlo, to ſucceed him in all his Dominions. The proper Name of this Queen was Chimpu, but the word Occlo was a ſacred Title amongſt them, he left many legitimate Sons and Daughters of the true Bloud; beſides many other natural Children, to the number of about two hundred and fifty, which was no great matter amongſt them, conſidering the many Women, which thoſe Kings maintained in every Province of their Dominions. And becauſe this Inca laid the Foundation of this great Work, it is requiſite that we ſhould treat of it immediately after the Life of its firſt Founder, becauſe it is the moſt excellent Trophy of the Incan Magnificence, and that which may ſerve for a matter of Oſtentation and Glory, not onely to the Authour himſelf, and the preceding Kings, but ſufficient to derive Honour to all their Poſterity in future Ages.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Fortreſs of Cozco, and the greatneſs of the Stones with which it was built.

THE Incas, who were Kings of Peru, erected many wonderfull and ſtately Edifices; their Caſtles, Temples, and Royal Palaces, their Gardens, Storehouſes, and other Fabricks, were Buildings of great Magnificence, as is apparent by the ruines of them; though very obſcure conjectures are to be gathered from ſuch remains.

The work of greateſt oſtentation, and which evidences moſt the Power and Majeſty of the Incas, was the Fortreſs of Cozco, whoſe greatneſs is incredible to any who hath not ſeen it, and ſuch as have viewed it with great attention cannot but admire it, and believe that ſuch a work was erected by Enchantment, or the help of Spirits, being that which ſurpaſſes the Art and power of Man. For the Stones are ſo many and ſo great, which were laid in the three firſt rounds, being rather Rocks than Stones, as paſſes all underſtanding, how and in what manner they were hewen from the Quarry, or brought from thence, for they had no inſtruments of Iron or Steel, wherewith to cut or faſhion them: Nor leſs wonderfull is it to think, how they could be carried to the Building; for they had neither Carts nor Oxen to draw them with; and if they had, the weight was ſo vaſt as no Cart could bear, or Oxen draw; then to think that they drew them with great Ropes, over Hills, and Dales, and difficult ways by the mere force of Mens Armes is alike incredible; for many of them were brought ten, twelve and fifteen Leagues off, particularly that Stone, or Rock rather, which the Indians call Saycuſca, which ſignifies tired or weary, becauſe it lies in the way, having never been brought ſo far as to the Building; but it is certain that it came fifteen Leagues from the City, and was tranſported over the River of Yucay, which is almoſt as broad as the Guadalquiver, which runs by Cordova. The Stones brought from the neareſt parts were from Muyna, which is five Leagues diſtant from Cozco: But to proceed farther in our imagination of this matter, and conſider how it was poſſible for this people to fit and join ſuch vaſt Machins of Stones together, and cement them ſo cloſe, that the point of a Knife can ſcarce paſs between them, is a thing above all admiration, and ſome of them are ſo artificially joined, that the crevices are ſcarce diſcernible between them: Then to conſider that to ſquare and fit theſe Stones one to the other, they were to be raiſed, and lifted up and removed often, untill they were brought to their juſt ſize and proportion; but how this was done by Men, who had no uſe of the Rule and Square, nor knew how to make Cranes, or Pullies, and Cramps, and other Engines, to raiſe and lowr them as they had occaſion, is beyond our imagination, being of that bigneſs that Joſeph Acoſta ſaith was prodigious: For the bigneſs and compaſs of theſe Stones, I ſhall rather refer my ſelf to the Authority of this Acoſta, than to the report of my School-fellows, of whom I deſiring to be informed of the juſt proportion of theſe Stones, they ſent me the meaſures of them by Fathoms, and not by Yards and Inches,; which account not being ſo exact as I deſired, it ſeemed requiſite in a work ſo wonderfull, and in which the vaſtneſs of the Stones is the greateſt matter of Admiration, to take the more authentick teſtimony of Notaries. Acoſta in the 14th Chapter of his 6th Book, ſaith, " That the Expences which the Incas " made in building Forts, Temples, Houſes of Pleaſure, and other Edifices was " very great, and the labour exceſſive, as the Ruins which remain make to ap- " pear, and are ſtill to be ſeen in Cozco, Tiaguanaco, Tambo, and other places, " where the Stones are of that vaſt proportion, as paſſes underſtanding how they " were hewen, ſquared, and carried to the places where they are now fixed. It " is certain, that for erecting thoſe vaſt Buildings of Forts and Temples in Cozco, " and other parts, by direction of the Inca, there was the aſſiſtence and concourſe of

" of great multitudes required from all Provinces, for the forwarding of theſe " Works; the labour was certainly great, and the faſhion admirable and unuſual, " for they uſed no Mortar, nor had they Iron or Steel to cut and poliſh the " Stones, nor Inſtruments or Engines to carry and raiſe them, and yet they were " ſo curiouſly joined and fitted, that the places where they joined were ſcarce diſ- " cernible; and yet the Stones were of that vaſt bigneſs, as is incredible, unleſs it " be to thoſe who have ſeen them. In Tiaguanaco I meaſured one my ſelf, which " was thirty foot in length, and eighteen in breadth, and ſix foot in thickneſs. " In the Wall of the Fortreſs built at Cozco there are Stones of a far greater big- " neſs, which were laid by hand, and what is moſt admirable, is, that they were " never cut by any Rule, being rough caſt, and without equal proportion, and " yet are fitted and joined one within the other without any Mortar or Cement; " all which muſt be done by force of Men, and great toil and labour; for cer- " tainly to fit one Stone to the other, which were at firſt unequal, there muſt be " often removes, which could not be performed eaſily but by force and ſtrength " of the Armes. All which are the Words of Acoſta, extracted verbatim, whereby he manifeſts the difficulty of that labour to Men who had not the uſe of thoſe Inſtruments and Engines which are common amongſt us.

Perhaps the Incas in the height of their Glory were deſirous to recommend the greatneſs of their power to the admiration of all Ages; as alſo to ſhew the Art and ingenuity of their Maſter-builders, not onely in poliſhing their freezed Stone, (which the Spaniards do much admire) but alſo in laying their rough Stones, (called by the Italians a la ruſtica) in which they did as much excell as in the former; and herein they did not onely ſhew themſelves Artiſts, but Souldiers alſo in the contrivances of their Fortreſſes, which they built in every advantageous Paſs and place, where ſuch a Bulwark might be of defence or bar againſt the Incurſions of an Enemy.

This Caſtle or Fortreſs they erected on the top of a high Hill on the North-ſide of the City, called Sacſahuamam, at the foot of which are the Dwelling-houſes of Cozco, which extend themſelves at a great diſtance on all quarters, the ſide of this Hill which is towards the City, is exactly perpendicular, ſo that it is impregnable, and cannot be ſtormed on that part, nor can it be battered with Cannon, by any level, or upper ground which commands it; though the Indians before the coming of the Spaniards, had no thoughts or imagination of Cannon, nor provided any other defence than a thick Wall of Stone, curiouſly poliſhed on all quarters, being about two hundred fathom in compaſs; every row of Stones was of a different height, and yet laid exactly by the line, and ſo well fitted and enchaſed one within the other, that they needed no Lime, or other Mortar to cement them. The truth is, they uſed no Mortar mixed with Sand, becauſe they knew not how to burn Lime; howſoever they had a kind of a red Earth, of a bituminous matter, which was very binding, and ſuch as ſerved to fill up holes and nicks in the Building. And in this firſt row they ſhewed both Induſtry and Art, for the Wall was thick, and the Workmanſhip rare on all ſides.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the three Walls which are moſt to be admired of all this Work.

ON the other ſide from the City, the Hill hath an open proſpect to the Plains, and the aſcent to the Fortreſs is ſo eaſie and wide, that an Enemy may eaſily attack it in a formed and orderly Body. Wherefore they fortified it on that ſide with three Walls, one before the other, each Wall being 200 fathom in length, being made in the ſhape of a half Moon, becauſe they come to join with the ſingle Wall, which is towards the ſide of the City. In the firſt Wall which is to front the power and firſt ſhock of an Enemy, though they are all of the ſame Work, they have placed the greateſt of their Stones, which are of that ſtupendious bigneſs, as are admired by all that ſee them. For my part I am of opinion that thoſe Stones were never digged out of any Quarry, but were looſe Rocks found in the Mountains, which they took and faſhioned to their purpoſe, and laid them as they caſually came to hand, ſome being hollow, others rough, and others plain and ſmooth; ſome were pointed at the corners, others without; in the mending and plaining of which they were not very curious, by paring or cutting off the uneven parts of every Stone; but rather filled up the hollow or vacant places with ſome other Stone, which was as great or greater than the other, and ſo ſupplied the inequalities of one Stone by ſome other which fitted to it; for it ſeemed to have been their intention to have compoſed all the work with great Stones, and not to have pieced it up with the adjuncts of leſs, being a matter of greater State and Magnificence. And this is what Acoſta did much admire in the Work, that the Stones of the Wall not being cut, but worked without any Rule or compaſs, were yet ſo well fitted, as if they had been all poliſhed; and though the outward ſuperficies of the Stone was rough, and not ſmooth, but remained in its natural faſhion, yet the joint, by which it was incorporated with another, was ſo well worked, that nothing could be better fitted; ſo that conſidering the ruſtical outſide, and the artificial junctures within, it made in groſs a noble and a ſtately Frontiſpiece.

A certain Prieſt, born at Montilla, who remained at Peru after I was come to Spain, and where he alſo returned in a ſhort time after, ſpeaking of this Fortreſs, and of the prodigious Stones, told me, that before he ſaw them he could not believe the report was made of the mightineſs of them, and after he had ſeen them, the Fame ſeemed leſs than they really were; and conſidering by what power or art they were laid in that form, he could not conclude or imagine other than that they were ſo diſpoſed by ſome Enchantment or power of the Divel. And really though the Indians had been provided with all the Engines and Arts which are common in our Countries, yet ſtill the difficulty will occur, how the Art of Man was able to arrive to ſo great a work, which exceeds all the Seven Wonders of the Univerſe. We know that to make a Wall ſo long and broad as that of Babylon, to erect a Coloſſus at Rhodes, or the Pyramids in Egypt, are eaſily contrived and completed by the force of multitudes, and quantities of all materials, ſuch as Brick and Lime for making the Walls of Babylon, Braſs and Copper for caſting the Coloſſus, Stones and Mortar for raiſing a Pyramid; in fine, time, and labour, and numbers of People are able to effect and compaſs any thing of this nature; but how the Indians without Engines ſhould be able to carry and tranſport ſuch vaſt Stones or Rocks from remote places up to the top of a Hill, and without Tools poliſh and fit them for a Building, is ſuch a riddle as the wit of Man is not able to reſolve, but muſt have recourſe to Enchantments, and helps from the Devil; in regard that evil Spirits entertained ſuch familiarity with that people.

Every Wall of the Rampire had its Gate about the middle, and every Gate had its Percullis of Stone, of the length and breadth of the Gate which ſhut it. The firſt Gate they called Tiupuncu, which ſignifies the Gate of Gravel, becauſe the Soil

Soil thereabouts is gravelly, and full of Sand, which may be mixed with Mortar, for they call Sand and Gravel Tin, and Ypuncu a Gate. The next Gate of the ſecond Rampire they called Acahuana, for the Word Acahuana, pronounced with an aſpiration in the Throat, was the Name of the Maſter-workman that made it. The third Gate was called Viracocha Puncu, being conſecrated to their God Viracocha, which was the Apparition before related, which in a Dream revealed unto the Prince the Rebellion of the Chancas, and for that reaſon they eſteemed him the Defender and new Founder of their City of Cozco, and called that Gate by his Name, imploring the like Protection and Aſſiſtence in defence of that Fortreſs which he had formerly ſhewed in the ſafeguard of that City, and of the whole Empire: Between one Wall and the other there was a diſtance of about twenty five or thirty foot, which was filled up with Earth to the top of the Wall; but it is not certain whether this Earth was caſt up by hand, or whether it were from the riſe of the Hill, perhaps it might be by both, and that what was wanting by the aſcent might be ſupplied by the hand. Every Rampire had its Breaſt-work, under which they could fight with better ſhelter, than if they had expoſed themſelves to the open force of the Enemy.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the three great Towers; of the chief Workmen employed in this Building, and of the great Rock which reſted in the way.

HAving paſſed theſe three Walls or Rampires, we come to a long, and narrow place, where were three ſtrong Towers built in a Triangle, according to the ſituation of the place; the chiefeſt of them was placed in the middle, called Mayoc Marca, which ſignifies the round Fortreſs, in which ſprings a plentifull Fountain of excellent Water, which was brought at a far diſtance under ground, but where, and from whence the Indians do not know; for ſuch Secrets as theſe were always reſerved from common knowledge in the Breaſts of the Inca, and of his Council. In that Tower the Kings had their Apartments, when at any time they went up to recreate themſelves in the Fortreſs, the Walls of which, inſtead of Tapeſtry, were adorned with Gold and Silver, inlaid with the ſhapes of Birds and Beaſts, which were excellently well counterfeited; it was alſo furniſhed with its ſervices of Plate and other moveables, properly belonging to it, as had all the other Royal Palaces. The ſecond Tower they called Paucar Marca, and the third Sacllac Marca, they were both ſquare, with many Chambers for lodging Souldiers belonging to the Gariſon; they were often relieved and changed by their turns, and were to be all Incas of privilege, for other Nations were not capable of admiſſion into that Fortreſs, being eſteemed a ſacred place, and conſecrated to the Sun for exerciſe of Arms, as the Temple was for Prayers and Sacrifice. The Captain or Commander in Chief was to be of the true and legitimate Royal Bloud, under whom were ſeveral Lieutenants and Officers ordained, ſome for government of the Militia, others were Purveyors, and ſuch as had care of the Proviſions, others were Armourers to furbiſh and cleanſe the Arms, and others had the care of the Wardrobe, of keeping the Cloths and Shoes of the Gariſon. Under theſe Towers was as much room as above, and between them were Galleries of Communication. The Quarters under ground were formed with great Art, having Lanes and Paſſages with ſuch windings and turnings, all of the ſame ſize, and faſhion, that they ſeemed a labyrinth, and ſo difficult to find out, that none durſt enter in without a Guide, or direction of a twine of Thread, which being faſtened at the entrance, directed their return through all the Turnings and Meanders of it. When I was a Boy I often went up to the Caſtle, with others of the ſame age with me; and then the upper Rooms were all ruined, and ſome of thoſe which were under; into which we durſt not adventure farther than we could ſee the light which ſhined in them, for the Indians told us, that if we adventured farther, we ſhould loſe our ſelves, and never find our way out again.

In making their Vaults they were ignorant of the way of arching, but inſtead thereof they laid Braggets or Corbels of Stone, which ſerved in the place of Beams for ſupport of the whole frame of Building, which being equally cut, and ſhaped at all ends reached from one Wall to the other. All the great Fabrick of this Fortreſs was made in part of poliſhed, and part of rough Stone, richly embelliſhed according to the beſt of their Art, whereby the Incas made oſtentation both of their Skill and Grandeur, being deſirous to advance the Excellency and Magnificence of this Work above any other; that ſo it might remain for a conſummation of all their Trophies; and indeed ſo it proved, for the Spaniards, a few years after this was completed, invaded their Empire, and put a ſtop to the proceedings of ſeveral other great Works, which they deſigned to have finiſhed.

There were four chief Undertakers in the Building of this Fortreſs; the principal Perſon, who drew the Draught, and deſigned the whole Plot, was Huallpa Rimachi, he was an Inca, and ſtiled Apu, which ſignifies Chief; the ſecond to him was Inca Maricanchi, and the third Acahuana Inca, to whom they aſcribe the chief contrivance of the Buildings at Tiahuanacu, which we have formerly mentioned. The fourth and laſt was Calla Cunchuy, in whoſe time the great Stone which reſted in the way was brought thither, and his Name engraved on it, as a monument to conſerve his memory; the which Stone (or Rock rather) was of that vaſt proportion, and ſo exceeding all the others, that I would gladly inſert here the true meaſure of its height and thickneſs, but in regard I have not procured an exact and certain account of it, I ſhall refer my ſelf to the relation of thoſe who have ſeen it: It remains in the Plain before the Fortreſs, to which, as the Indians ſay, it could never arrive, in regard it tired by the way, and wept bloud, proceeding from the toil and fatigue it had endured in its motion. The ſtone is rough and unpoliſhed, in the ſame manner as it was hewn from its Quarry, a great part of it is buried under ground, and they ſay, it is now ſunk lower than when I ſaw it; for they fanſied that there was great treaſure hid under it, and for that reaſon they digged about it as deep as they were able, that ſo they might arrive at this imaginary Riches; but in regard that as they digged the Stone ſunk lower, therefore the greateſt part of it is now hidden under the Earth. According to my beſt remembrance it hath a hole or two upon the upper part of it, or ſuch as paſſes from one ſide to the other; the Indians call theſe holes the Eyes of the Stone, out of which it wept bloud; from the Duſt which is lodged in thoſe Holes, and the continual droppings of water upon them, it hath died the Stone in thoſe parts with a reddiſh colour, becauſe the ſoil thereabouts is of the ſame colour, and which the Indians ſay proceeded from the bloud which iſſued with the tears of that Stone. This Fable is commonly reported amongſt the Indians, and I have heard it often from them.

But the true Moral of this Fable, recounted by the Inca's Amautas, who were their Philoſophers, and people of learning, was this: That this Stone, or Rock, was moved and drawn by twenty thouſand Indians, who dragged and drew it with great Cables; the undertaking was great, for it was to paſs through cragged, and uneven ways, and over Aſcents and Deſcents; one half of the people drew before, the other half were on each ſide to poiſe the weight, and keep the Stone direct, leſt it ſhould fall into any precipice, or gravel it ſelf in any place, from whence it could never be recovered. It is ſaid, that for want of due care in thoſe who had the poiſing of this weight, it happened to lean too much towards the deſcent of a hill, and being over-born by its great burthen, it tumbled down a bank, and killed three or four thouſand of thoſe Indians who were the guides to direct and ſupport it; notwithſtanding which misfortune they again took courage, and raiſed the Stone, carrying it to the Plain where it now reſts. The Bloud which it ſhed, and ſqueezed from the Veins of theſe poor Wretches, were the true tears which iſſued from the hollow orbs of its Eyes; and becauſe the weight was too vaſt to be carried up to the place, unto which it was deſigned, they ſaid, that it tired and fainted in its Journey, attributing all the feelings and paſſions of the Men to the inanimate and ſenſeleſs Stone. This, and many ſuch Fables, the Indians conſerve amongſt them, believing that ſuch paſſages as theſe are beſt recommended to Poſterity, and conſerved under ſuch wonderfull and improbable fictions.

The Spaniards, who in reaſon ought to maintain, and at their own coſt to have kept this Fortreſs in repair, for the greater advancement of their own honour, that ſo they might give occaſion to the World to admire their Atchievements and great Proweſs, in being able to ſubdue a people ſo potent, and which were able to erect ſuch wonderfull and prodigious Fabricks; but on the contrary, as if they had been envious of the great Acts of thoſe they had ſubdued, they have laid their own hands to the pulling down of this prodigious piece of Art and Induſtry; and with the Materials thereof have built the private Houſes of ſome particular perſons in Cozco; for to avoid the coſt, and time, and labour of the Indians in bringing Stones and Materials from diſtant parts, they have brought from the Walls of the Rampire, all the poliſhed and wrought Stones; that there is ſcarce a Houſe in all the Town, at leaſt ſuch as belongs to the Spaniards, but what is built out of the ruines of that Fortreſs.

The great Stones which were the ſupporters of the lower Buildings, were digged up, and brought away for Threſholds and Jambs of their Doors; the leſſer Stones ſerved for the Walls; and for Steps to their Stairs, they choſe ſtones of ſuch ſize as was convenient, which when they had found, and pitched upon, they caſt down all the rows of Stones above them, to ten or twelve degrees above them, untill they came to thoſe which fitted their occaſions. In this manner they wholly overturned and deſtroyed the Majeſty of that noble and ſtately building, unworthy of ſuch a Fate, and which will ever remain an object of great compaſſion to all Beholders, the Spaniards were ſo expedite in the deſtruction of it, that in my time there remained onely ſome few ruines which we have formerly mentioned. The three great Rampires of Rock are ſtill remaining, becauſe the Stones are ſo vaſt and weighty, as cannot be removed; howſoever they have diſordered ſome of them, in hopes of finding that Chain or Cable of Gold, which Huayna Capac made, for they had ſome intimation that it was buried there.

The good King Inca Yupanqui, who was the tenth of the Incas, was the firſt Founder of this abuſed and injured Fortreſs, though others will have it begun by his Father Pachacutec, becauſe he had left the firſt draught and model of it, and had made Proviſions of great quantities of Stone and Rocks for the Building, beſides which there were no other Materials. The whole Work was fifty Years before it was completed, not being finiſhed untill the Reign of Huayna Capac, nor then neither, as the Indians report, for that the great Rock which reſted in the way was deſigned for additional Buildings to it; but to this and many other Buildings in divers parts of the Empire, a ſtop and diſappointment was given by the Civil Wars which aroſe not long after between the two Brothers, Huaſcar Inca, and Atahualpa, in whoſe time the Spaniards made their Invaſion, and then thoſe Deſtructions and Ruines followed, which are apparent at this Day.

CHAP. I.

The Conqueſt of the Province Huacrachucu, and whence that Name was derived.

THE Great Tupac Inca Yupanqui (whoſe Name of Tupac ſignifies Brightneſs and Splendour, and indeed the greatneſs of his Atchievements deſerve no leſs a Title) ſo ſoon as his Father was dead, took upon him the coloured Wreath, and having complied with the Obſequies, Rites, and Funeral Ceremonies and Sacrifices due to the memory of deceaſed Kings, in which he ſpent the firſt Year of his Reign, he took a Progreſs into the ſeveral Kingdoms and Provinces of his Empire; for it was the conſtant Cuſtome of the young Heir, ſo ſoon as he came to his Sovereignty, to ſhew himſelf to his Subjects, that they might both know and love his Perſon, and that both the publick Counſellers in Provinces, and particular Perſons might have opportunities to repreſent their Aggrievances perſonally to the King, whereby the Judges and Miniſters of Juſtice might with more care perform their Duties, fearing to tyranize and oppreſs the people.

Having in theſe Journies and Viſitations paſſed four long years, with which his people remained highly ſatisfied and contented, he decreed that fourty thouſand Men ſhould be raiſed, and put in Arms againſt the following Year, that ſo he might proceed forward in the Conqueſts and Deſigns which his Anceſtours had projected. The great pretence on which the Incas did moſt avail themſelves, and that which beſt covered the Ambition they conceived for enlargement of the Empire, was a Zeal towards the Welfare of the Indians, whoſe unhumane and beſtial Cuſtoms they deſired to reform, and improve to a more moral and political way of living, and to a knowledge and worſhip of his Father the Sun, whom they owned and proclaimed for their God.

The Army being raiſed, and all things put in order for this Deſign, and a Governour appointed for Rule of the City, the Inca took his march by way of Caſſamarca, intending to invade the Province of Chachapuya, which, as Blas Valera ſays, ſignifies the Countrey of ſtout Men; it lies Eaſtward from Caſſamarca, the Men being very valiant, and the Women beautifull. Theſe Chachapuyas adored Serpents, and worſhipped the Bird Cuntur for their principal God; on report of which the Inca Tupac Yupanqui was greatly moved to reduce this Province to his Empire, being famous in ſeveral reſpects, but the approach to it was difficult, the

ſituation being mountainous and craggy, and the people of it above forty thouſand in number.

Theſe Chachapuyas bound a Sling about their head for the dreſs and ornament of it, being thereby diſtinguiſhed from other Nations; the manner and faſhion of their Sling was different from other Indians, being the chief Arms which they uſed in the War, as they were of the Ancient Mayorkins.

But before they came to the Province of Chachapuya, they were to paſs through another, called Huacrachucu, which is very large and great, but the ſituation mountainous, and the people fierce. They wear for a deviſe and diſtinction on their heads, or rather did wear it (for now all thoſe fancies are confounded) a black Binder of Wool, ſtitched with white flies; and inſtead of a Feather upon it, they carried the point of a Horn of a Deer, or Stag; whence they had the Name of Huacrachucu, which is the horned Cap; for Chucu ſignifies the Saſh about the head, and Huacra a Horn. This people, before they were ſubdued by the Incas, adored Serpents, and in their Temples and Houſes ſet up their figures for Idols to be worſhipped.

This Province offering it ſelf in the way to Chachapuya, was firſt to be ſubdued, and accordingly orders were given to the Army to attack it: the Natives appeared in defence of their Countrey, ſuppoſing it impregnable, and not paſſable for an Army, and therefore at all the difficult paſſes oppoſed the Enemy, in which Skirmiſhes many were ſlain on both ſides. Which being obſerved by the Inca and his Council, they conſidered, that in caſe they proceeded in that rigorous and forcible manner, the conſequence would be of great damage to their own people, and the total ruine and extirpation of their Enemies: To prevent which, having gained ſome ſtrong and faſt places, they ſent their Summons and Propoſals of Peace and Friendſhip, as was the cuſtome of the Incas; by which they made known to them, that the intention and deſign of the Inca was to doe them good (as had all his Anceſtours done to the other Nations they had ſubdued) and not to tyranize, but to bring them greater benefit than he could expect from them: That they would doe well to caſt their eyes for example on other Nations, whoſe Lands or Poſſeſſions they had not taken away, but improved by Aqueducts, and other benefits: That they had permitted the Curacas to enjoy the ſame Government which they formerly had, having no other deſign in all their Wars and Actions, than to force Men to Adore the Sun, and reform them from their inhumane and beſtial cuſtoms. Theſe Propoſitions afforded great matter of debate to this people; for though many were of opinion, that they ought to accept the terms of the Inca, and receive him for their Lord; yet the younger ſort, who were more in number, and of leſs experience, oppoſed the agreement, and carried it in the Negative, and thereupon proſecuted the War with much fury and reſolution; for having contradicted the more Aged Men in their opinion, they eſteemed themſelves engaged in point of reputation to overcome, or dye.

But that the Enemy might not think that the Conditions which the Inca had offered, did proceed from timorouſneſs, or cowardiſe, but onely from that piety, and compaſſionate diſpoſition, which was inherent in him, and all his family; he commanded that the War ſhould be renewed with heat and violence; and having made divers detachments of his Army, aſſailed them in ſeveral places at the ſame time; that ſo making a diverſion of their Forces, he might abate the heat of their courage, and make them underſtand their own weakneſs. With this ſecond attempt they gained other places, and ſtrong paſſes, and ſtraitened the Enemy in that manner, that they had no other remedy, but to have recourſe unto the mercy and clemency of the Inca, who, according to the accuſtomary goodneſs of thoſe Kings, received them to pardon, giving order to his Officers and Miniſters to treat the Huacrachucus, as if they were Brethren and Allies, to cloath the Curacas with the fineſt ſort of Garments called Compi, and the more ordinary people with the Avaſca, which is the more coarſe. He alſo commanded, that they ſhould be ſupplied with Proviſions for their ſuſtenance, for that a year of War had conſumed all their Stores; which they took ſo kindly, that they eſteemed it the greateſt evidence they could receive of the favour and forgiveneſs of the Inca.

Here-

Herewith an end was put to the War of this Campagn; for that the Conqueſt of a Province ſo inacceſſible in its ſituation, and ſo well defended by its Natives, was a ſufficient Work for one Summer. And becauſe that Countrey was ſubject to much rain, he quartered his Army in the Frontiers of it, and recruited it with twenty thouſand Men more, that he might make a more quick diſpatch and riddance in his Conqueſts. But firſt he took order to have his new Subjects well inſtructed in the ſuperſtitious Rites of his Religion, and in the Laws and Moralities of his Empire: He appointed alſo, that deſigns ſhould be laid for Aqueducts and Gardens, and for clearing thoſe Grounds which were fruitfull, and of good Soil, of Buſhes and Weeds, making them good and profitable manure, and fit to be ſown; for want of which induſtry, and good husbandry, little or no benefit was made of their Lands: All which, when the Indians ſaw, they admired, and acknowledged the infinite goodneſs of the Inca to them.

CHAP. II.

Of the Conqueſt which the Incas made on the Borders of Chachapuyu.

THE recruits being come, and the ſeaſon of the year fit for action, the Inca Tupac commanded his Army out of their Winter-quarters to take the Field, and march towards the Province of Chachapuyu; but in the firſt place he diſpatched a Herald before to offer them terms of War, or Peace; but they ſlighted all terms of Accommodation, and reſolutely anſwered, That they were ready with Arms in their hands to defend their Liberty, and that the Inca might doe his pleaſure, for that they reſolved never to be his Vaſſals. This Anſwer being given, both parties prepared for War, which was carried on with that reſolution and fury, that many were killed and wounded on both ſides: The Incas reſolved never to retreat; and the Chachas (for they had that Name alſo) were obſtinately determined rather to dye than yield. Both parties being thus reſolved, the War became very bloudy, by reaſon that the Chachas, whoſe Countrey may be ſtyled a Kingdom, being 50 Leagues in length, and 20 in breadth, reaching to Muyupampa, which is 30 Leagues farther; foreſeeing the intentions of the Inca, and growing jealous of his Power, had made proviſion for two years before againſt him, having fortified all their ſtrong holds, the ruines of which remain to this day; and having Barracadoed the narrow paſſes, which are rocky and mountainous, and ſo difficult to climb, that in many places the Indians have made eight or ten ſeveral Stories, with ſteps to deſcend; and beſides theſe, there is no paſſage forwards by other ways. Notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the Incas, with loſs of many of their Men, gained ſeveral of theſe ſtrong Holds, which proved of great advantage to them: The firſt of theſe was ſituate on a Mountain, being two Leagues and a half high, called the Hill of Pias, becauſe the people, who live on the other ſide, are ſo called, being the moſt conſiderable of that Province. And thus far the Incas having gained with great difficulty, they were now entered eight or ten Leagues within the Countrey, the people retreating before to other places of greater ſtrength.

Howſoever the Old Men and Women, who were not able to climb the Mountains in company with the Young, were taken by the Inca, together with young Children, whom the Parents could not carry with them; all which the Great Tupac committed to the care and kind treatment of his Officers.

Having

Having paſſed this people of Pias, the Army proceeded in its march; and being come to a certain opening, or breach of the ſnowy Mountain, called Chirmaccaſſa, which ſignifies the dangerous Gate, becauſe it had been fatal to many people, who paſſed that way, the Inca made a detachment of 300 Men, which like a forlorn Hope, preceding the Army on deſign of diſcovery, were on a ſudden over-whelmed with the fall of a Mountain of Snow, in which all periſhed, not one Man eſcaping. By reaſon of this misfortune, the Inca could not paſs for ſeveral days, which gave occaſion to the Chachapuyas to ſpread a report through all their Countrey, that the Incas terrified with the late unhappy accident, were retired, and fled to their own Countrey.

The Snows being in a manner thawed, the Inca purſued his Conqueſt, and with much difficulty gained ſtep by ſtep all the Countrey, as far as Cuntur Marca, which a conſiderable people inhabits; paſſing by others on each hand of the way, by reaſon that the paſſages to them were obſtructed, and difficult, and the Natives not worth the labour and charge of a Conqueſt. But the people of Cuntur Marca made great reſiſtence, fought valiantly, and continued the War for many days. But whereas the power of the Inca was at that time invincible, and that nothing could be oppoſed ſufficient to withſtand it, the Chachas being over-powered by the Numbers which aſſailed them, were forced to yield, and ſubmit themſelves at diſcretion to the Inca, who, according to his cuſtome, received them to mercy and pardon; and that he might quiet and ſatisfie their minds with confidence of his Clemency, and might by their example invite and allure others to the like ſubjection, he treated them with kind entertainment, beſtowing favours, and his beneficence upon them.

The Inca having ſettled his Miniſters and Officers neceſſary for the Eſtabliſhment of affairs, he proceeded forward, taking in all the Forts and ſtrong places in the way before him, which now yielded without much bloud or oppoſition, following the example of Cuntur Marca: Eight Leagues from which is another people called Caſſa Marquilla, who defended themſelves within their Rocks and Mountains: For theſe being naturally warlike and fierce, adventured to try the force of the Incas in many engagements; but at length theſe Chachas having proved their irreſiſtible power, and conſidering that the greateſt part of their Province had ſubmitted to the Inca, they thought it beſt for them to follow the ſame example, and yield alſo.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the Conqueſt of other People, and Barbarous Nations.

FRom Caſſamarquilla the Inca proceeded to another People called Papamarca, from the Papas or Dewlaps, which are great bunches that hang from their throats; the which were ſubdued by the Inca in the ſame manner as the others: Thence he marched eight Leagues farther, conquering all before him, untill he came to a conſiderable Plantation, called Raymipampa, which ſignifies the place of Feſtival, the principal Feſtival of the Sun being called Raymi; of which we have treated at large in a diſtinct Chapter. And it happening when this people was ſubdued, (whoſe Countrey was all a pleaſant and even Plain,) that the grand Feſtival of Raymi was then come; wherefore the Inca appointed that place for the celebration of it; for, as we have ſaid, it was not a material point in their Religion, where, or in what place that Feaſt was kept by the Inca himſelf, provided that the High Prieſt, and the other Incas, obſerved it at Cozco, with all the formalities and ſolemn rites of it.

From Raymipampa he marched three Leagues farther to Suta, which he ſubdued with like facility; for the Natives ſeeing the greateſt part of their Countrey already in poſſeſſion of the Inca, yielded themſelves with all readineſs into his power. From Suta the Army marched to a people called Llavantu, which was the moſt remote part of the Province of Chachapuya, which alſo yielded, deſpairing of power to make reſiſtence againſt the Inca, who now was become abſolute Maſter of the whole Province; the moſt conſiderable people of which, we have already mentioned, though beſides theſe there were many little Plantations not worth the naming. The Conqueſt of this Province was very difficult and laborious, by reaſon of the Mountains and ſtrong Paſſes, defended by a ſtout and fierce people.

From Llavantu the Inca, Tupac Yupanqui, made a detachment of his Army, to ſubdue the Province of Muyupampa; through which the Valiant Ancohualla took his March, when he caſt off his ſubjection to the Inca, as we have related in the Life of Viracocha; this Province is ſituated within the Antis, and once acknowledged ſubjection to the Chachas, but whether it was by force, or by agreement of confederacy, or alliance, the Indians are ignorant; it lyes 30 Leagues Eaſtward from Llavantu.

The Natives of Muyupampa having received information, that the whole Province of Chachapuya had yielded to the Inca, did alſo with much readineſs receive his Religion, Laws and Cuſtoms: the like alſo did the Province called Caſcayunca, and divers others of leſs note within that Diviſion; all which being received into favour of the Inca, he commanded, that they ſhould be inſtructed in the Knowledge and Religion of the Sun, and all neceſſaries provided for their better welfare and ſubſiſtence; to which end, he ordered Aqueducts to be made, their Lands to be plowed, and broken up, that ſo they might yield greater abundance, and increaſe; and that the Curacas ſhould be veſted with the fineſt Compi, which they eſteemed as a high favour; and with theſe and other benefits the people remained abundantly ſatisfied. Herewith the Wars concluded for that year, the Army being drawn into Winter-quarters; and in the interim Orders were iſſued out for ſupplying the Souldiery, and the new Conqueſts with Proviſions from the Neighbouring Countries; for the Wars had made deſtruction, and cauſed want and famine of all things neceſſary for the ſupport of life. The Summer being come, the Inca Tupac took the Field with an Army of forty thouſand Men, and marched to the Province of Huancapampa, which is a Countrey large and populous, but all of different Nations and Languages; every Nation or Lineage lived apart, or by it ſelf, without friendſhip or alliance, but in a ſtate of War, acknowledging no Lord, or Government, for their Superiour, but like brute beaſts, preyed one upon the other: they had no employment or occupation to busie themselves in, for most of them went naked, without cloaths or covering; the prize and reward of their War, were the bodies of the Wives and Daughters of the conquered, of which they enjoyed as many as they could get; and for the Men, they eat and devoured one the other.

Their Religion was as bestial as their Morality; they adored many Gods, every Lineage, or Family, had one or more proper to it; some adored Animals, or living Creatures, others Birds, Herbs, Plants, Rivers, Fountains, nay any thing which they liked, or were pleased with; in which diversity of Gods, there often arose Disputes and Arguments concerning their Power and Goodness, which was most commonly decided by War. People living at this rate, without reason or politiques, were easily subdued; for they could never stand to make any defence, but, like wild beasts, were hunted in the Mountains, where in the Thickets, in Caves and Rocks they concealed themselves; but famine, and want of sustenance, forced many of them from their retirements, into the power and obedience of the Inca, though many of them, who were obstinate and surly, like brute beasts, perished in their places of concealment.

But the Inca Tupac used all diligence to catch, and tame them, committing them into the hands of Masters and Instructors, who might teach them to associate, and live in communities, how to cultivate the Grounds, and wear Cloathing, and make Garments of Wool and Cotton: they also shewed them how to bring chanels of water for refreshing their Fields, and so learned them to manure their Lands, that it became the most fruitfull soil of all Peru. In some time afterwards, for greater improvement of that Countrey, they ennobled it with a Temple of the Sun, and a House of Select Virgins, with many other Edifices of Honour and Renown. They commanded, that all their Gods should be thrown to the Earth, and that they should acknowledge and worship no other but onely the Sun, who was the sole God of the Universe: that none should eat Man's flesh on pain of Death, and utter destruction of himself and family; and for other matters they gave them Priests and Men of learning to instruct them in their Laws and Customs: In all which they became so docible, and such proficients, that in a short time they lived orderly and sociably in civil communication, and the two Provinces of Cascayunca, and Huancapampa became the most knowing, and most orderly Citizens in all the Empire of the Incas.

CHAP. IV.

The Conquest of three Great and Warlike Provinces.

Huancapampa being conquered, the Incas proceeded to reduce three other great Provinces, containing many other Nations under their power; but how long this succeeded after the Conquest of Huancapampa, is not certain: But these people were of a different quality to those before mentioned; for they lived in a political manner, had their Towns, and Fortifications, and some manner of Government amongst them; they often assembled, and held Counsels to consider of the publick good and welfare. No person pretended to a Right of Dominion over them, but by common consent they elected their Chief Governour in the time of Peace, and Captain in case of War, serving them with entire obedience, during the time of their Magistracy. These three Provinces were called Cassa, Ayahuaca, and Callua. The Inca, so soon as he approached the Confines of these Countries, sent his Summons to the Inhabitants, requiring them to receive him for their Lord and Sovereign, or otherwise provide to defend themselves by force of Arms; for answer whereunto, they returned a short reply, That they were ready to dye in defence of their Liberties; for as they never had received any Lord that was imposed on them, them, ſo now they could not incline their minds to any ſervile ſubjection. Herewith a cruel War began, for all the fair offers and pretences of the Inca could avail nothing; for their ancient liberty and freedom ſtill preſenting it ſelf before them, ſtopped their Ears to all the gentle words of favour the Inca expreſſed, ſaying, That the greateſt favour and grace he could doe them, was to leave them to their own liberty. All theſe three Provinces being aſſociated together, unanimouſly contributed to the aſſiſtence of each other, and made ſtout oppoſition, having killed about 8000 Incas; with which ſlaughter the Incas being enraged, perſecuted the Enemy with fire and ſword, and all the miſeries of War, which they ſupported with great patience and equality of mind in contemplation of their liberty, which they diſputed and defended with great reſolution; for no ſooner were they forced from one ſtrong Hold, but they poſted to another, and thence to another, abandoning their Countrey, and Houſes, without care of their Wives and Children, reſolving to dye with Arms in their hands, rather than become the Slaves and Vaſſals of another.

The Incas ſtill proceeded in the Conqueſt of this Countrey, untill they had forced them into a corner of it; where having fortified themſelves, they endured all extremities; and though reduced to the ultimate point of periſhing by famine, yet ſtill continued conſtant, and reſolved not to be ſubject to the Inca: the which ſome of their more ſober and intelligent Captains conſidering, and finding that upon theſe principles all of them muſt neceſſarily dye and periſh, without knowing any cauſe or reaſon for it: And ſeeing that other Nations, as free as they, had ſubmitted to the Dominion of the Inca, under whom their peace and plenty was augmented, rather than in the leaſt abated or infringed. The Captains and Chiefs having this communication together, agreed to yield themſelves and people to the Inca; the which was performed, though not without ſome mutiny and ſedition amongſt the Souldiery; howſoever the generality being led by the example and dictates of their Commanders, did all at laſt ſubmit, and yield unto due obedience.

The Inca Tupac received them with all expreſſions of grace and favour, telling them, how much he pitied their folly, which had ſo unneceſſarily betrayed them to the laſt extremities of want and famine; but now to relieve them in this condition, he ordered, that they ſhould be entertained and treated like his own Children: And that whereas many of them periſhed in the late War, ſo that their Lands and Dwellings were void and depopulated; he ordered, that they ſhould be again ſtocked and ſupplied by people tranſplanted from other Provinces. And thus the Inca having provided matters for due adminiſtration of that Government, and ſettled and eſtabliſhed their Doctrine and Religion, he returned again to Cozco, being more troubled and uneaſie for the loſs and deſtruction of thoſe poor Indians, than tired or wearied with the fatigues, and incommodiouſneſs of the War; of which he was ſo ſenſible, that he would often ſay, that if he were aſſured that the other Nations, more remote, had taken example by the obſtinacy of theſe, that he would defer the Conqueſt of them for the preſent, and untill ſuch a conjuncture of time, as might render them more pliable, and better diſpoſed to receive the Government of the Incas.

Wherefore the Great Tupac refraining from War, ſpent ſeveral years in viſiting his Kingdoms, adorning them with ſtately Edifices in every Province, and inhabited Countrey, ſuch as Royal Palaces, Fortreſſes, and Houſes for publick Stores, Aqueducts and Temples dedicated to the Sun, with Convents for the Select Virgins, beſides many other publick Works, ſuch as making High-ways and open Roads, of which we ſhall treat more at large in the Second Part; but more eſpecially his care was, to finiſh the Fortreſs of Cozco, the Foundation of which was laid, and begun by his Father the Inca Yupanqui.

Having thus ſpent ſome years in the exerciſes and employments of Peace, the Inca re-aſſumed his thoughts of conquering the Provinces, which lye Northward, called Chinchaſuyu: The firſt Quarter he came to, was Huanucu, which contains many Nations, but all independent each of other, living ſcattered up and down the Fields, without government or communication, but in perpetual War and Fightings: they had ſome Fortreſſes and ſtrong Holds on the tops of Mountains, to which at any time, when they were worſted, they fled for refuge; all which people, by fair terms, according to the accuſtomary clemency of the Incas, were with much facility reduced to their command; though at firſt the Natives of Huanucu ſhewed themſelves ſurly, obſtinate and rude; with which the Officers of the Incas being highly provoked, put many of them to the Sword with great ſeverity and cruelty; but the Inca, to appeaſe and moderate their fury, put them in mind of the Original Law of the firſt Inca, Manco Capac, who commanded them to reduce the Indians to his ſubjection by gentle and fair terms, rather than by Arms, or effuſion of Bloud.

The Indians being on one ſide terrified with the fear of puniſhment, and allured on the other by the promiſes, and kind offers of the Inca, were reduced without much labour; ſo that they were perſuaded to live in Societies, and receive the Idolatry and Government of the Incas, who, in a ſhort time, ſo improved this pleaſant Province of Huanucu, that by the fruitfulneſs of the Soil, and good temperature of the Climate, it became the Head and Chief of all the Neighbouring Countries. And here, as a principal mark of favour, they erected a Temple dedicated to the Sun, with a Houſe for the Select Virgins: In the building of which, twenty thouſand Indians were continually employed, and as ſome will have it thirty thouſand; all which took their turns in the labour, which ſhews the great numbers of thoſe Inhabitants. Pedro de Cieça in his 80th Chapter ſpeaking of the Huanucu, hath theſe words, which I have extracted Verbatim. "In the Precincts of Guanucu, there was "erected a Royal Edifice, rarely built of great Stones, and well poliſhed. This "Palace, or Royal Chamber, was the chief place where the Courts of Judicature "were held for the Neighbouring Provinces, and for the Andes, adjoyning where-"unto was the Temple of the Sun, with many Virgins and Officers belonging "to it; and was ſo conſiderable in the time of the Incas, that above 30000 Indi-"ans were always employed in the ſervice of it. It belonged to the Stewards of "the Incas to collect in the ordinary Tributes; and the Countrey people were "obliged to afford their attendance and ſervice at this Palace. Thus far are the words of Cieça de Leon.

The Conqueſt being made of Huanucu, as we have in ſhort related; we ſhall now briefly touch on other matters, unleſs ſome remarkable paſſage occur, for I reſolve to haſten to the end of thoſe Conqueſts which were made by the Incas, that ſo I may treat of the Wars between Huaſcar and Atahualpa, who were Nephews of this Tupac Yupanqui. To proceed therefore, we ſay, that the Inca Tupac commanded an Army of forty thouſand Men to be raiſed, and fitted for the year following, intending to conquer the great Province, called Cannari, which was the Chief over divers others, being very populous, and the Inhabitants valiant and warlike; for their diſtinction from others, they wore their Hair long, tying up their Locks on the top of their heads with a knot. The Nobles, and thoſe who would be fine in their Dreſs, wore a Cap on their heads of a thin woven thread, like a fine Sieve, ſcarce above three fingers high, through which ſome threads were drawn of divers colours: but the common ſort, and ſuch as were lazy, and ungentile, wore, in the place hereof, the ſhell of a Goard, or Pumpkin, for their Cap; ſo that oftentimes in diſgrace, the Indians would call this Nation of Cannari, by the Name of Matiuma, or Pumpkin-pate. By this, and ſuch-like devices on their heads, during all the Reign of the Incas, the Indians were diſtinguiſhed, and known of what Countrey and Province they were; in my time alſo they carried theſe diſtinctions; but now, as I am informed, they are neglected, and every one wears what he pleaſes. Theſe Natives of Cannari, before the times of the Inca, went almoſt naked, both Men and Women, wearing onely a looſe Cloth to cover their privities: They had many Lords which ruled over them, ſome of which made an Alliance one with the other; but theſe were ſuch as were of the meaneſt rank, who, to reſiſt the power of the great ones, and their tyrannous oppreſſion, joined together in confederacy and alliance.

CHAP. V.

Of the Conqueſt of the Province of Cannari; of its Riches and Temple.

Tupac Yupanqui marched to the Province Cannari, and in his way conquered all that tract of ground which is named Palta, from whence, and from the low and warm Vallies, they carried unto Cozco, that pleaſant Fruit which is called Palta; the which Countrey, though the people thereof were fierce and warlike, yet the Incas eaſily overcame, alluring them with fair words, and kind uſage and treatment into a ſubmiſſion. The device, or diſtinction of this Nation, was a certain little Tablet; which ſo ſoon as a Child was born, they bound on his forehead, and another on the nape of his neck, which every day they bound harder and harder, keeping it on untill he was three years of Age; by which time taking it off, it had brought the head into a moſt ugly and deformed ſhape; they always carried their Children at their backs; ſo that when they ſaw an Indian with a broader and flatter forehead than was uſual, and the nape of his neck wide and broad, they would in deriſion call him Palta Uma, or Palta Pate. And here the Inca having ſettled and eſtabliſhed all things neceſſary for the religious and ſecular Government, he proceeded with his Army to the borders of Cannaris, from whence he diſpatched his accuſtomary Summons, that either they ſhould ſubmit, and yield, or prepare for War. Theſe offers of Peace being tendered, occaſioned ſome debates amongſt the Cannarians; but at length, after variety of opinions in the caſe, it was generally, and by the major part agreed to ſubmit, concluding themſelves unable to make reſiſtence, and thereupon full of joy and feſtival, they went to make tender of their ſervice and obedience to the Inca; after whoſe example the Curacas came in, and with much readineſs paid their homage and duty. The Inca received them with much commendation and praiſe, commanding that ſuch Cloths and Veſtments ſhould be given them, as were neceſſary and convenient for them; and that ſome courſe ſhould be taken to inſtruct them in the Doctrine and Religious Worſhip of the Sun, and in that Political way of Government by Laws, which was practiſed by the Incas: For before this time the Cannarians adored the Moon for their principal God, and after that Great Trees and Stones, which were rare, and not common, eſpecially the Jaſpar; but having received the Doctrine of the Sun, there was a Temple immediately built, and dedicated to him, and a Houſe of Select Virgins, with many Palaces for the Kings. They erected alſo Houſes to receive the Royal Stores, and the common Proviſions of the people; they enlarged alſo their Arable Grounds and Paſturage, they made Aqueducts and Chanels to convey their water; in ſhort, they made the ſame improvements in this, as in all other Countries which were ſubdued by the Inca, and with better ſucceſs, becauſe the goodneſs of the Soil was ſuch, as produced all manner of Fruit in great abundance; which the Cannarians obſerving, were much ſatisfied with the change of their condition and vaſſalage, proving ever afterwards very good Subjects, which they teſtified by their Loyalty in the time of the Civil Wars between Huaſcar and Atahualpa: Though afterwards, when the Spaniards came in, one of the Cannarians fled over to their ſide, after whoſe example all his Countreymen affected the Spaniards, and deteſted the Incas, as we ſhall hereafter declare in its due place, it being the cuſtome of the World to take part with the ſtrongeſt ſide. The Inca Tupac having reduced the Cannarians to his Dominion, took eſpecial care to ſatisfie and content the ſeveral People and Nations which were under that denomination; and to oblige them the more, he reſolved to aſſiſt by himſelf in Perſon, in teaching and inſtructing them in the Doctrine of his Idolatry, and the Laws of his Government; in the inculcating of which, he ſpent much time and labour; ſo that at length they remained well eſtabliſhed and ſettled in peace and quietneſs: Upon report of which, many other Provinces, not as yet ſubdued, took ſuch a kindneſs to the Government of the Inca, that that voluntarily, and of their own accord, they joyfully received him for their Lord and Maſter. Amongſt theſe Nations, there is a ſort of people called Quillacu, who are ſo miſerable and mean-ſpirited, that they fear they ſhall want Earth, and Water, and Air. Whence the Indians had a Proverb amongſt them, which the Spaniards afterwards allowed in their Language, calling a Man Quillacu, when they would denote a covetous perſon, or any of a vile and ſordid nature; and theſe were thoſe on whom the Inca impoſed a Tax, or Tribute of Lice, that ſo they might oblige them thereby to pick and cleanſe themſelves, not ſuffering their bodies to be devoured alive by this vermine. Tupac Yupanqui, and after him his Son Huayna Capac did greatly ennoble theſe Provinces of the Cannarians, and that alſo which is called Tumipampa, with theſe publick Edifices, and Royal Palaces, adorning the Walls of the Chambers with the Figures of Herbs and Plants, and all living creatures repreſented in Gold and Silver; the Doors of them were plated with Gold, and ſtudded with Emeralds, Torquoiſes, and other pretious Stones; for thoſe Indians made it their buſineſs to make them Preſents of things of great oſtentation; and to pleaſe and flatter their humour, adorned their Temples and Palaces with all the Treaſure they were able to procure.

Pedro de Cieça in the 44th Chapter of his Book, treating at large of the Richneſs wherewith their Temples and Royal Chambers were adorned in the Provinces belonging to the Cannarians, as far as Tumipampa, which the Spaniards miſcall Tome-bamba, by a miſtake of letters: he there ſays, That beſides theſe Riches, there was an immenſe ſum of Treaſure laid up in Jars, and Pots, and other Utenſils, together with rich Robes and Veſtments of Silver, with curious ſtitches, of which he touches in many paſſages of his Hiſtory; the which was ſo neat and curious, the Gold being ſtitched, or woven, in leſs pieces than Seed-pearl, and with ſuch artificial work, that the beſt Silver-ſmiths in Seville have asked me the manner how they were woven, or ſown ſo cloſe, that the ſeam could not be diſcerned; a ſmall piece of which work I brought into Spain, and it was highly prized and eſteemed. Pedro de Cieça having diſcourſed at large of the Treaſure of the Cannarian Provinces, hath theſe words. "In ſhort, whatſoever I can utter or expreſs of the Riches with which "the Incas have adorned their Palaces, will fall ſhort of the true value of it; and then ſpeaking in particular of the Chambers and Temple of Tumipampa, he ſaith, "That the Indians report, that the greateſt part of thoſe Stones, of which thoſe "Chambers and Temple were built, were brought from the great City of Cozco by "command of the King Huayna Capac, and his Father Tupac the Great, by force of "Men, who drew them with Cables; which if ſo, was very wonderfull, conſidering the weight of the Stones, and the great number of them, and the diſtance "of the way. Theſe are the very words of that Hiſtorian, who, by reaſon of the difficulty of that work, ſeems to doubt the truth of that report which the Indians gave; but for my part, who am alſo an Indian, and acquainted with the humour of my Countreymen, I do declare my belief to be thus far of it; it being probable, that thoſe Incan Kings, who were always deſirous to ſhew favour to their Subjects, would alſo oblige them in the tranſportation of theſe Stones from Cozco; which coming from thence, were eſteemed Sacred: For if it were a favour to have a licence granted for building a Temple to the Sun in any principal Province, becauſe thereby the Inhabitants became Citizens of Cozco; much more muſt it be to have the very Materials of it brought from the City it ſelf, by command of the Inca, without other charge or labour to the Natives; and not onely to have their Temple reſemble that at Cozco, but alſo to be the ſame with it in the ſubſtance. Now the Indians, to enjoy ſuch a piece of grandeur, which they eſteemed to be God-like, and Divine, would omit all other Works to employ themſelves in the carriage of theſe Stones, over Rocks and craggy Mountains, and to ſuch a far diſtance as it is from Cozco to Tumipampa, which is no leſs than 400 Leagues, which none would believe, but thoſe who were employed in the work: But as to the report which Pedro de Cieça received from the Indians, who averred, that the greateſt part of thoſe Stones, of which the Temple and Palaces of that Countrey were compoſed, were brought from Cozco, was more to boaſt of the favour and honour which the Inca did them in giving out ſuch a Command, than to raiſe the glory of ſuch a Work by a belief, that the Stones were really brought from ſo far a diſtance. And ſo much ſhall ſerve for what we have to ſay concerning the Greatneſs and Riches of thoſe Royal Palaces and Temples of the Sun, which were built in Tumipampa, and in all parts of Peru.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Conqueſt of many other and great Provinces, as far as the Confines of Quitu.

THE Inca having ſettled and eſtabliſhed affairs in Canaris, he returned to Cozco, where he ſpent ſeveral years in the adminiſtration of good Government, and other juſt actions appertaining to the Office of a Great King. But as it is natural to Puiſſant Princes to be ambitious, and deſirous to enlarge their Empire, ſo likewiſe this Inca thought it not fit to loſe longer time in a repoſed life, but to proceed in his Conqueſts; to which end he raiſed a conſiderable Army, with which he marched to the Confines of Tumipampa; from whence beginning his Conqueſts, he reduced many Provinces as far as the Borders of the Kingdom of Quitu, which extend little leſs than 50 Leagues in length; the chief places of which are Chanchan, Moca, Queſna, Pumallacta, which ſignifies the Countrey of Lions, becauſe they abound more in thoſe parts, than in the places thereabouts, and are adored by the Inhabitants of Ticcampi, Tiucaſſa, Cayampi, Urcollaſu, and others of leſs note, for their Gods: the which places being very thin of people, were eaſily reduced; and moreover, the Lands are very barren, and the people ſottiſh, without Lords, or Government, or Religion, or Political Communication: every one adored that for God, which they moſt deſired, or rather they worſhipped nothing, living like brute beaſts, ſcattered and wandering in the Fields and Woods, whom there was more trouble to inſtruct and inform with any kind of good manners, than to overcome, or reduce: theſe they taught to make Cloths, and Shoes, and to Manure the Land; for watering of which, they made Aqueducts and Chanels for them. In all theſe Provinces the Incas made large Roads, and High-ways, and Store-houſes to lay up Proviſions for ſuſtenance of the Souldiery, and Chambers for their Kings; but would not honour ſo vile and ſervile a ſort of Inhabitants with the beauty of Temples dedicated to the Sun, or with the Houſes of Select Virgins; they being capable of little more, than to keep themſelves clean from Lice, by obligation of that Tribute they were to pay in them.

Whilſt the Inca, Tupac Yupanqui, was thus employed in reducing and inſtructing the Provinces before mentioned; other Nations which are ſeated to the Weſtward of theſe, bordering on the Confines of that Province which the Spaniards call Puerto Viejo, or the Old Port, ſent their Ambaſſadours to the Inca with Preſents, beſeeching him to receive them for his Subjects and Vaſſals, and that he would be pleaſed to ſend them Captains and Teachers, who might inſtruct them in the way of living in Societies, and how to manure their Lands, that they might live like Men, and not like Beaſts, promiſing for themſelves all loyalty and faithfulneſs: Thoſe that made the firſt motion to ſend this Embaſſy, were of the Nation of Huancavillca. The Inca gratiouſly received their Addreſs, commanding that ſatisfaction ſhould be given them in all their deſires; and ſo Teachers were ſent to inſtruct them in Religion, and in the Laws and good Cuſtoms of the Inca: Engineers were alſo ſent them to make Aqueducts, and manure their Fields, and reduce them into Societies: But afterwards the ingratitude of this people was ſuch, that contemning the favours and promiſes which the Inca had made them, they aroſe up againſt his people, and barbarouſly murthered them all. As Pedro de Cieça in his Obſervations reports, which becauſe it ſerves to confirm the particulars we have often repeated in this Hiſtory, touching the gentleneſs and good-nature of the Incas, who were always ready to teach and inſtruct the Indians, who ſubmitted to their Dominion; we have here inſerted the Words of de Cieça, that ſo what we have ſaid concerning the Incas, may alſo be confirmed by the authority of the Spaniſh Writers: His Words are theſe which follow.

" To

" To return then to our purpoſe; I ſay, that I have heard from Old Indians, " who were Chiefs in the time of the Great Topa Inga Yupanque, that ſome of " his Captains, with certain Troops, which they had drawn out from thoſe Gar- " riſons, which he maintained in divers Provinces of his Kingdom, had by di- " vers ways of management reduced much people to the friendſhip and ſervice " of the Inca; the principal ſort of which went with their Preſents to the Pro- " vince of Paltas to pay their reſpects of reverence and duty to the Inca, who " courteouſly received them with all affection, beſtowing on ſeveral of them rich " pieces of Woollen, made at Cozco. And whereas the occaſions of the Inca re- " quired his return to his principal Provinces, where he was ſo much eſteemed, " that they ſtyled him Father, and honoured him with Titles of Supreme Emi- " nence: And ſuch was his affable diſpoſition towards all, that his Fame was " great, and his Memory perpetual. But in regard the occaſions of his Kingdom " were ſo preſſing, that he could not ſtay, and in Perſon viſit thoſe Indians; he " committed the care of that Government to certain Officers, who were Natives " of Cozco, and whoſe charge it was to inſtruct them in the manner of living, " that they might become rational Creatures, and live with ſome form and rule: " But theſe did not onely ſhut their Ears to neceſſary inſtructions, and diſdain " the Orders which the Officers of Topa Inga preſcribed, for their living under " Laws in good ſociety, and uſing laudable cuſtoms and ways to live, ſuch as " Manuring their Lands, and other matters which contribute to the happineſs of " of life: But in return for ſuch benefits, which they ill underſtood, they killed " their Inſtructors, not ſuffering one of them to live and eſcape; and this vil- " lany they acted without any provocation, or any oppreſſion, whereby they " might deſerve ill from them. It is ſaid, that when the Inga Topa heard of " this Maſſacre, temporizing with the preſent ſtate of his affairs, he diſſembled " the matter, not having opportunity at that time to revenge the Death of thoſe " Captains and Subjects. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, with which he concludes his Chapter: To which we add, that the Inca having finiſhed the Conqueſt of thoſe Provinces, returned again to Cozco, to take ſome repoſe and divertiſement after his great labours and cares in War.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

The Inca conquers Quitu, and ſends to his Son the Prince Huayna Capac to come to him.

THE Inca Tupac, after ſome few years of eaſe and peace, re-aſſumed again the thoughts of War, reſolving to turn his Arms againſt the Kingdom of Quitu, being a Countrey great and famous, of 70 Leagues in length, and 30 in breadth, the Soil fruitfull, and capable, by good Husbandry, of great improvement and benefit to the Inhabitants. Wherefore providing an Army of forty thouſand ſtrong, he marched to Tumipampa, which borders on the Confines of that Kingdom, ſending thence the uſual Summons to the King of Quitu, who ſtyled himſelf after the Name of his Countrey. This Prince was of a barbarous and rude nature, and conſequently fierce and cholerick, feared by his Neighbours for the great Power and Dominion he had over them. Wherefore relying on his own force, he confidently anſwered, that he was Lord and Sovereign himſelf, and would acknowledge no other, nor receive Foreign Laws, but gave ſuch as he thought fit to his own Vaſſals; nor would he forſake the Gods of his Anceſtors, which were wild beaſts, and great trees, ſuch as afforded them fleſh and wood, and other benefits neceſſary for the ſupport of life. The Inca having received this anſwer, would not immediately break into Acts of Hoſtility, endeavouring for awhile to try the effects of gentle allurements, and moderate terms, according to the rule and maxime of his Anceſtors. But this kind uſage operated little on the affections of the people of Quitu, who grew more proud and inſolent by the condeſcentions of the Inca; which was the cauſe, that when the War broke out, it continued many months and years; during which time, many Skirmiſhes and Battels happened with great ſlaughter and damage on both ſides.

Tupac Inca Yupanqui perceiving that this War was likely to continue long, ſent for his Eldeſt Son and Heir the Prince Huayna Capac, that ſo he might exerciſe and practiſe him in the War, commanding him to bring a recruit of twelve thouſand Men with him; his Mother was called Mama Occlo, Siſter of his Father, according to the cuſtome of thoſe Kings, who always took the Eldeſt Siſters for their Wives: The Spaniſh Hiſtorians ſay, that Huayna Capac, in the vulgar Language of that Family, ſignifies a Rich Youth: But it is certain, that thoſe Indians in giving their Names and Sirnames to their Kings, obſerved (as we have ſaid) other Elegancies and Phraſes in Speech, different from the common Language, having ever ſome reſpect to thoſe ſymptoms, and appearances of Vertue, which they obſerved eminent and hopefull in their Princes, adding other Auguſt Titles agreeable to the Proweſs, and Illuſtrious Actions performed in their Manhood. And ſo, becauſe this Prince demonſtrated in his Youth clear evidences of a Royal and Magnanimous Soul, they gave him the Name of Huayna Capac, which ſignifies as much as a Youthfull Spirit, invigorated with inclination to heroick and illuſtrious Atchievements. For when they gave the Title of Capac, which is Rich, to Manco their firſt Inca, they did not mean the Riches of Fortune, but the Excellencies and Greatneſs of Mind; they ever after appropriated this Title to the Capac Ayllu, which is to the Royal Family, and Princes of the Bloud; ſo they attributed the Title of Capac, to the Feaſt of Raymi, which is the principal Feſtival of the Sun; ſo alſo they called a Subject Capac Runa, which is Subject and Vaſſal of the Rich, meaning the Inca, being never given to any other Lord, though he were never ſo Rich, or powerfull: And ſo alſo this word Capac was given to any other thing, which they would dignifie with relation to Royalty.

Amongſt the many other Illuſtrious Qualities with which this Prince was endowed, he had one, by which he moſt particularly obliged his Subjects, giving early Indications of his Vertue, which merited the Name of Capac, during the time he was Prince, and which afterwards he conſerved, when he came to be ſole Monarch; The which particular quality was this: That he never denied any Woman the grant of her Petition, of whatſoever age, quality or condition ſhe were, anſwering her according to her years; for if ſhe were elder than he, he would ſay, Mother, what you deſire, ſhall be done. If ſhe were of equal years with him, he would uſe the compellation of Siſter; if younger, he would call her Daughter, and ſay, What thou askeſt, ſhall be performed; and to all Women generally he would lay his hand on their left ſhoulder, in token of his favour and reſpect to them. And this Magnanimity of mind he carried ſo even and conſtant, that in matters of great importance, he would condeſcend to the diminution of his own Right and Prerogative of his Majeſty. As we ſhall hereafter more at large diſcourſe.

This Prince being now about twenty years of Age, purſued his Wars, gaining on the Kingdom by little and little, ever treating with them, and offering terms of Peace and Friendſhip. But this barbarous Nation, which went almoſt naked, and was ignorant of Political Government, would never give ear to propoſals of Accommodation. Tupac the Father obſerving the good Conduct of his Son, committed the abſolute Government of this War to his management, and ſo returned to Cozco, the important affairs of his Empire requiring his preſence there.

The Prince in the mean time, with the aſſiſtence of his Captains, ſo well managed the War, that in the ſpace of three years he became abſolute Maſter of the Kingdom of Quitu, though ſome Indians of that Countrey ſay, that he was five years; but then they count the two years, in which his Father was there in perſon, attributing the Conqueſt of that Countrey to them both. The gentleneſs and good-nature of the Father and Son was the cauſe of this long continuance of the War; for had they vigorouſly proceeded with fire and ſword, they might ſoon have completed their Conqueſt; but they willing to ſave the Bloud of the Natives, preſſed upon them as they retired, and ſo won the Countrey by little and little; though the Indians ſay, that the War had continued longer, had not the King of Quitu died at that time; they ſay alſo, that his Death was occaſioned by grief, for ſeeing himſelf in an unhappy condition, deveſted of the greateſt part of his Dominion, and unable to defend the remainder; and not daring to truſt, or confide in the Clemency of the Inca, whom he believed he had provoked to that degree, as never to obtain his pardon; he died with the preſſure of his great troubles and afflictions; he being dead, his Captains preſently yielded themſelves to the mercy of Huayna Capac, who received them with obliging terms, commanding them to be veſted with Garments of the fineſt ſort, and preſented them with other gifts, which were moſt in eſteem amongſt the Indians; treating alſo the more common ſort of people with great kindneſs and friendſhip: In ſhort, he performed all the generous Actions he was able to them, to render his Clemency the more apparent and perſpicuous to that ſtupid Nation: And to oblige all that whole Countrey in general, ſo ſoon as the War was ended, he not onely made them Aqueducts to refreſh, and make fruitfull their Soil; but alſo built a Temple there for the Sun, and a Houſe for the Select Virgins, adorned with Riches, and other Embelliſhments agreeable to the quality of thoſe Edifices: In performance of which, thoſe Indians had great advantage, for their Countrey yielded much Gold, which they had digged for the ſervice of their own King, and much more afterwards for the uſe of the Prince Huayna Capac, becauſe they found that they very much gratified his humour by Preſents of that Metal; his affection and covetouſneſs of which, tranſported him to ſuch extremities of Oppreſſion, as were never before practiſed by Incan Kings, which was the cauſe of the ruine of their Empire, and occaſion of all that miſery, which afterwards extinguiſhed this Royal Family.

Huayna

Huayna Capac leaving Quitu, proceeded to another Province called Quillacenca, which ſignifies a Noſe of Iron; becauſe they boared the Bridge which paſſes beween the Noſtrils, to hang a Jewel, or a piece of Gold or Silver, which reached to their Lips: the Inca found theſe to be a ſordid, vile people, almoſt all naked, and full of Lice; they had no Religion amongſt them; for they worſhipped nothing, unleſs it were the Fleſh of ſome Animal; of which they were ſo ravenous, that whereſoever they found any carrion, fleſh of Horſe or Mare, or any thing elſe corrupted and ſtinking, they would eat and devour it with the greateſt pleaſure and appetite in the World: So that it is very probable, that ſuch a ſort of Beaſts as theſe, were eaſily ſubdued, and reduced to obedience.

From hence the Inca marched to another Nation called Paſtu, as vile and ſordid as the former, differing onely from them in this, that they would by no means be perſuaded to eat Fleſh, ſaying, That they were not Dogs. Theſe being eaſily reduced to the obedience of the Inca, Inſtructors were appointed for them to teach them the manner of living after the rational manner, impoſing on them the Tribute of Lice, that ſo they might keep themſelves clean, and in health.

From Paſtu they proceeded to another Province called Otavallu, the Inhabitants whereof were much more Political and Warlike than the others. Theſe having made ſome little reſiſtence againſt the Inca, did ſoon yield, finding that they were not able to defend themſelves againſt that Potent Prince.

And having here made due proviſion to ſecure the Countrey, the Inca proceeded to another Province called Caranque, the people of which were moſt barbarous in their life and manners; they adored Tygers, and Lions, and great Serpents, offering the hearts and bloud of Men in their Sacrifices: Making War upon their Neighbours, onely for the ſake of War and Enemies, that they might have ſuch as they might kill and eat. At firſt they made great oppoſition againſt the Inca, but being repulſed, they ſoon diſcovered their errour, and in a few days ſurrendred at diſcretion. Huayna Capac ordained and conſtituted Maſters to teach and inſtruct them in their Idolatrous Worſhip, and in the rules of a Moral life, forbidding them to acknowledge any other Idol but the Sun, or ſacrifice the bloud of Men, or eat humane fleſh; which laſt was the moſt grievous of any to them, becauſe they were of any thing the moſt ravenous of that. Thus far the Conqueſt of thoſe Provinces extended on that ſide, which bordered on the Kingdom of Quitu.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the three Marriages of Huayna Capac; of the Death of his Father, and his Sayings.

Tupac Inca Yupanqui desisting now wholly from Wars, attended to the Government of his Empire, visiting divers parts of it at different times, to the great joy and comfort of his Vassals, who were transported with joy, as often as they saw the Inca in their Countries: It was he who effectually laboured about the Fortress of Cozco, his Father having onely begun, and laid the foundation of it; this Work was many years in building, on which twenty thousand Indians were always employed, every Nation and Province taking its turn, with that rule and order, that nothing could be disposed in better and more exact method and discipline. Every two years the Inca visited his Kingdom of Chili, sending every year thither many fine Garments for cloathing of the Curacas, and their Kindred, with more common habit for the ordinary people. In exchange for which, the Caciques sent much Gold, and plumes of Feathers, and other Commodities of the growth of their Countrey. And this continued untill the time that Don Diego de Almagro invaded that Countrey.

The Prince Huayna Capac having conquered the Kingdom of Quitu, and the Provinces of Quillacenca, Pastu, Otavallu and Caranque, and given instructions for the orderly management of the affairs of those Countries, he returned to Cozco to render an account to his Father of all the Actions he had performed in his Service, being received by him with great triumph and joy for his happy return: And then he married a second time with his second Sister, called Rava Occlo, because by his first Wife, and eldest Sister, called Pillcu Huaco, he had no Children; it being necessary that the Succession should be supplied by an Heir legitimate on the side both of the Father and Mother. In like manner he married a third time lawfully, according to their Laws and Customs, with Mama Runtu, the Daughter of his Uncle Auqui Amaru Tupac Inca his Father's second Brother. Auqui is a title of distinction, given always to the second Sons of the King, and in a courtesie to all those of the Royal Bloud, but not to others, of what quality soever. Amaru is a Name given to the greatest Serpents of the Antis. The like Names of living Creatures, of Flowers or Herbs, or any thing supereminent, or excellent in its degree or quality, the Incas would take upon themselves, signifying, that as those Creatures were famous in their Species, so the Incas were in the generation of Mankind. The King Inca Tupac, with the consent and advice of his Council, ordered that those two Women, last married to Huayna Capac, should be esteemed and judged as lawfull Wives as the first, and not for Concubines, their Children being made capable to inherit, lest a legitimate Heir should fail in the Succession. On which consideration the Marriage with his Cousin Germain was esteemed lawfull, because she was the next of kin, Huayna Capac wanting a third Sister, with whom he might match. By his Sister Rava Occlo, he had a Son sirnamed Huayna Capac, a Huascar Inca; the signification of which Name of Huascar, we will declare in its proper place, because his true and proper Name was Inti Curi Huallpa. Of his Cousin Germain, who was his third Wife, he had Manco Inca, who succeeded him in his Kingdom, that is, in Name onely, for the Inheritance was then in reality fallen into the hands of Strangers, as we shall see in its due place.

Some years of peace and tranquillity being passed, during the Reign of Tupac Yupanqui, he began at length to feel himself crazy, and declining towards his end; wherefore he assembled the Prince Huayna Capac, and all his other Sons and Daughters together, to the number of two hundred, and more: To whom after the custome of former Kings, and by way of his last Will and Testament, he recommended the practice of Peace and Justice for the good and benefit of their Subjects, which would render them Illustrious, and make them to appear true Children of the Sun. In particular and especial manner he encharged to his Eldest Son the care of conquering the Barbarous Nations, with intent that he might reform their manners, and reduce them to the true Religion of the Sun, and teach them to live in Societies, and with Political Government, and that in all things he should imitate the examples of his Ancestors. Lastly, he encharged him to revenge that perfidious treachery, of which the people of Puerto Viejo, and the parts adjacent, and especially those of Huancavillcas had been guilty in killing those Captains and Instructors, which at their request he had sent amongst them, lest the impunity and remisness in punishment of that ingratitude should be of ill example to other Subjects; and that after having chastised this offence, he should endeavour to reform their bestial way of living, by teaching them to Manure and Sow their Fields, and cover their Bodies. And farther, he encharged them to live in love and amity together, for that he was going to rest, and repose himself with his Father the Sun. Thus the Great Inca Tupac Yupanqui died, leaving to his Subjects a perpetual memory of his Piety, Clemency, and many other benefits bestowed on his Empire. In consideration of which, his people, besides his Titles and Appellations of Honour, common to other Kings, gave him the supereminent denomination of Tupac Yaya, which signifies the glorious and resplendent Father. Besides the Prince, who was his Son and Heir, he left five Sons, which he had by his Sister Mama Occlo; his second Son was called Auqui Amaru Tupac Inca, after the name of his Father; the third was Quekuar Tupac, the fourth Hualpa Tupac Inca Yupanqui, which was * my Great-Grandfather by the Mothers side; the fifth was Titu Inca Rimachi; and the sixth was Auqui Mayta. His Body was afterwards so well embalmed, that when I saw it in the year 1559, it seemed to be alive.

* The Authour.

Blas Valera speaking of this Inca, hath these words, which I have translated out of Latin. Topac Yupanqui delivered this Philosophical discourse by way of Argument. "Many say that the Sun lives, and that he is the Maker of all things; "now it is necessary, that the thing which is the cause of the Being of another, "should be assistent and operate in the production thereof; now we know that "many things receive their Beings, during the absence of the Sun, and therefore "he is not the Maker of all things: And that the Sun hath not life, is evident, "for that it always moves in its circle, and yet is never weary; for if it had life, "it would require rest, as we do; and were it free, it would visit other parts of "the Heavens, unto which it never inclines out of its own sphere; but as a thing "obliged to a particular station, moves always in the same circle, and is like an "Arrow which is directed by the hand of the Archer. He said also, that this "Inca did often repeat that Saying of Inca Roca, the sixth King, as a politick and "wise sentence; which was this: That it was not fit that Sciences, which be-"long to Noble persons, should be communicated to the common and vulgar "people, lest they grow proud, and contemn the wisedom of those to whom the "charge of Government is committed; it is sufficient for them to learn the trade "of their Fathers, and follow their profession, not aspiring to those improvements "of mind, which appertain onely to Princes and Rulers of the people. He had "this other Saying likewise, That Covetousness and Ambition render a Man un-"capable to govern himself, or others; for Covetousness diverts the mind of a "Man from its true object, that is, from the common welfare, to his own private "interest; and Ambition corrupts the understanding, making it uncapable of "other counsels, than such as tend to its own exaltation and glory. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera concerning the sententious Sayings of Tupac Inca Yupanqui.

And since we now approach near the time in which the Spaniards obtained this Empire; it will be convenient to declare in the following Chapter, what Provisions were then found in those Countries for the sustenance of humane life. And then next in the life of Huayna Capac, we shall shew what things were wanting, and supplied by the Spaniards, that so one thing may not be confounded with another.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of Mayz, Rice, and other Seeds.

THE Fruits of Peru, by which the Indians were ſuſtained before the coming in of the Spaniards, were of divers ſorts, ſome being produced above, and others under ground. Of the Fruits which grow above ground, the chief and principal is that Grane which the people of Mexico and Barloventa call Mayz, and thoſe of Peru, Cara, being the onely Bread they uſe: And this is of two ſorts; one is hard, which they call Muruchu; and the other tender and fine, called Capia: they eat it for Bread, either baked or parched over the fire, or boiled in water: the hard Mayz is that which they have brought to ſhow in Spain, but not the fine and tender ſort. Some parts produce much finer, and tenderer than others, particularly the Countrey of Rucana. At their ſolemn Sacrifices, as we have ſaid, they uſed Bread made of Mayz, which they called Cancu; and at other times, on occaſion of a Feaſt or treatment which they gave, they made that ſort of Bread which was called Huminta; the which ſorts of Bread had little difference in themſelves, being onely diſtinguiſhed by their uſe, ſome being made for ſacrifice, and others for common ſuſtenance: Their Corn was Ground by the Women on a broad Stone, on which they caſt the Griſt, and on the top thereof they laid another Stone in the faſhion of a Half Moon, not round, but with a point of three fingers broad at each corner. At the corners of the Stone, made Half Moon wiſe, they laid their hands, rubbing and preſſing it hard on the Mayz, untill it was broken: This difficulty and trouble they had in Grinding their Mayz, and all other Grane; for which reaſon they did not commonly eat Bread. They did never beat their Corn in Mortars, though they had learned the way of it; becauſe it required more labour of the Armes, than the Grinding with a Stone, the weight of which made the work more eaſie: And then the good Houſewife having ground awhile, with one hand lifts up the upper Stone, and with the other ſweeps up the Corn, gathering it into the midſt of the Quern, which for the likeneſs of it we may call a Fulling-Mill, becauſe of the ſtrokes which they gave on it with their hands. They made alſo a kind of a Haſty-Pudding, called Api, which was a great Diſh amongſt them, and which they eat with much delight; but this was eſteemed high feeding, and not common at every meal. The Flour they divided from the Bran, in this manner, they laid all upon a clean cloth made of Cotton, and then ſpread it with their hands all over the Cotton-cloth; the fineſt part of the Flour would ſtick to the Cotton, but the more groſs parts of the Bran would remain looſe from it, and ſo they eaſily took it up, and divided it with their hands; then they ſwept up the Flour which ſtuck to the cloth into the middle; and having taken that away, they brought more, untill they had cerned and ſifted all their Griſt; but they chiefly took this pains for the ſake of the Spaniards, and not of the Indians, who were not ſo curious in their diet, but that the courſeſt ſort of this Bran would go down with them; for the Bran of Mayz is not ſo harſh or choaky, as much to offend the palate. This was their manner of dividing the Bran from the Flour, for as yet the uſe of Sieves was not brought from Spain, by reaſon that their Bread was all made of this Mayz, and not of Wheat: All which I can teſtifie to have ſeen with my own eyes, having been nouriſhed for nine or ten years with no other Bread than that of Cara, which is Mayz; the which is of three ſorts: Cancu is for Sacrifice, Huminta for their Feaſts, and great Entertainments; Tanta, with an aſpiration on the top of the mouth, is common Bread. Cara, when it is parched, they call Camcha, which being pronounced with an N, Cancha ſignifies a Street, or Neighbourhood. The boiled Cara, they called Muti (and the Spaniards Mote) which is boiled Mayz, having two Names for the ſame thing. Of the

Flour

Flour of Mayz the Spaniſh Women made Biskets and Fritters, and other Diſhes, both for healthfull, and people that were ſick; for the Phyſicians in that Countrey forbid Wheaten bread to all thoſe that are ſick, and preſcribe them no other diet, than what is made of Mayz. Of this Flour, with water, they brew their Drink, which the Indians know how to make ſower after a certain manner, that it becomes excellent Vinegar. Of the Canes before the Mayz is ripe, they make rare Honey; and after it is ripe, the Canes being dried, are good feeding for all Cattel. Some Indians, who love to be drunk, lay Cara ſteeping in the water, untill it be grown, and then they grind it, and boil it in the ſame water, and afterwards draw it off, and keep it untill it be ſtale: This is the ſtrongeſt drink they have, and which preſently makes them drunk, they call it Vinnapu, and in other Languages Sora. The Incas forbad it, becauſe it was ſo violent and ſtrong, though now, they ſay, it is come in uſe again amongſt ſome toping fellows. All theſe uſes, as we have ſaid, they have of this Cara, beſides many others in Medicines and Phyſick, and in Plaſters, as we have mentioned in the other part.

The next ſort of Grane, which is ripe in the Harveſt of that Countrey, is that which they call Quinua, or ſmall Rice, becauſe in form and colour it much reſembles it. This Plant in the ſtalk or blade, is very like our Spinage, the leaf being very tender, and much uſed by the Spaniards and Indians in all their boiled Diſhes, and is put into all their Broths and Potages. The Indians alſo in thoſe Countries, which do not produce Mayz, make their Drinks of this Quinua; and the Indian Phyſicians make uſe of the Flour of it in all their Medicines for the ſick. In the year 1590 they ſent me ſome of the Seeds of this Quinua into Spain, which I ſowed at divers times and ſeaſons, but never came up. Beſides this Grane, they have three or four ſorts in Peru of Fetches, like Kidney-beans, which they put into their boiled Meats, called Purutu: they are in Shells or Pods, like our Lupines in Spain, though bigger and whiter, called Tarvi: They have alſo a ſort of theſe Beans which are not to be eaten, called Chuy, of divers colours: they are uſed for Counters in play by Men in years, and Boys in their common ſport; the variety of which, for brevity, we omit.

CHAP. X.

Of Pulſe and Roots which grow under ground.

THere are many other things which are produced under ground, and yet are eſteemed for excellent nouriſhment in the barren Countries, which yield no plenty or quantities of Cara: The chief Diſh of all is Papa, which being boiled, or baked, ſerves them for Bread, and which they put into all their Diſhes: To conſerve it, they dry and wither it in the Sun, or Froſt, and call it (as we have ſaid) Chunu: There is another ſort which they call Oca, of a very pleaſant taſte, it is long, and thick as a Man's middle finger; it is very ſweet, being eaten raw; they boil it with their Meat; and to keep it, they dry it in the Sun; and it is ſo delicate, that without either Sugar or Honey it ſeems a Conſerve, and then it is called Cavi. There is another ſort like this in the ſhape, but not in the taſte, being very bitter, and cannot be eaten unleſs it be boiled, and then they call it Annus. The Indians ſay that it is an Enemy to procreation: but thoſe who would not loſe their appetite to Courtſhip, holding in their hands a wand, or ſtick, at the time they eat it, can (as they ſay) find no hurt or prejudice by it. I have often heard them to talk and diſcourſe to this purpoſe, and ſeen them practiſe it; but I believe it was rather by way of jeſt, or merriment, than out of belief of this old Womans ſtory.

Thoſe

Thoſe Roots which the Spaniards call Patatas, and the Indians of Peru Apichu, are of four or five ſeveral colours, ſome are red, others white, others yellow, others brown, and are of different taſtes, the worſt ſort are of thoſe which are brought into Spain. They have alſo a ſort of Goards, called Roman Goards, and in Peru, Capallu, they grow like Melons; they eat them boiled, or baked, but never raw. The ſort of Goards of which they make Bottels, or Veſſels, for all manner of uſes, are very good, and in great plenty, which they call Mati; but the Goards which are eatable, were not known untill the time of the Spaniards. There is another ſort of Root which they dig out of the Earth, which the Indians call Ynchic, and the Spaniards Mani; all the Names which the Spaniards give to their Fruits and Pulſe of Peru, are all taken from the Language uſed in the Iſland of Barlovento. The Ynchic both in the kernel and taſte is very like Almonds: If it be eaten crude, it offends the head; if baked or parched, it is pleaſant and wholſome, and with Honey makes admirable Almond-cake; they alſo preſs Oil out of it for divers diſeaſes. Beſides theſe, there is another ſort of Root which grows under ground, called by the Indians Chuchuchu, for which, as yet, the Spaniards have coined no proper Name, becauſe they have no ſort of that Fruit in the Iſlands of Barlovento, which are very hot Countries; but this grows in Collao, which is a cold Climate; being eaten raw, it is delicious to the palate, and a great ſtrengthener of the ſtomach, the Roots of it are much longer, and deeper in the ground than the Anni-ſeeds: It caſts no leaf above ground, but onely a green Fiber, which ſhews the place where the Chuchuchu is found; and when that greenneſs withers, it is a ſign that the Fruit is ripe; and the ſeaſon to gather it: This Fruit, and the Ynchic, are eſteemed delicacies, fit for the palate of the rich and curious, rather than for the diet of the common people, who make it their buſineſs to gather and preſent them to the Rich, and perſons of Power and Quality.

CHAP. XI.

Of Fruits and Fruit-Trees of the largeſt ſort.

THere is another ſort of Fruit, excellent and good, which the Spaniards having no name for, call it a Cucumber, becauſe it is ſomething like it in its ſhape, though not in the taſte, nor yet in the quality of it, being of good digeſtion, and ſuch as they preſcribe to perſons ſick of Calentures, or high Fevers, and of another nature to the Cucumbers of Spain. What name the Indians give them, I muſt confeſs that I have quite forgot; for which I blame my ſelf, and cannot imagine the word they give it, unleſs it be Cacham; but I hope that the diſtance I am now from my own Countrey, and my long abſence from thence will excuſe my ignorance amongſt my Countreymen, for whoſe ſake I have undertaken this work, without other hopes or expectation of reward, than onely to pleaſe and ſerve them. Theſe Cucumbers are of three ſeveral ſorts and ſizes; the leaſt, which are ſuch as are in the form of a Heart, and grow in little buſhes, are the beſt. There is another ſort of Fruit called Chili, which was brought to Cozco in the year 1557. It is very delicious to the palate, and wholſome; it grows on branches which run almoſt level with the ground, it bears a kind of colour, or grane, like the Arbuteus, and is of the ſame bigneſs, onely it is not round, but rather long, in faſhion of a Heart.

There are many other ſorts of Fruits, which grow on high Trees, ſome of which are produced in hot Countries, ſuch as are on the Sea-coaſt, about the Antis, others in more temperate Climates, ſuch as are the warm Vallies of Peru; but becauſe theſe Fruits are common in many places, it will not be neceſſary to particularize the ſeveral ſorts of them, but onely to report in what manner they grow.

And

And first as to that Fruit which the Spaniards call Guayavas, and the Indians Savintu; we say, that they are of a round fashion like the common Apple, and with a skin or paring like them: In the meat, or pulp of it, are many little round seeds, less than Grape-stones; some of which are yellow without, and red within, and are of two kinds; some are so sower, that they cannot be eaten, others are sweet, and very pleasant to the palate; some are green without, and white within, and are much better than the red; though in some Countries on the Sea-coast they esteem the red much better than the white. The Spaniards make a Conserve of them, as also of other Fruits, which hath been practised since my departure out of Peru. At Seville I saw some Fruit of the Savintu, which a Passenger, a friend of mine, brought from Nombre de Dios; and becaufe it was a Fruit of my own Countrey, he invited me to the eating of it.

Another Fruit the Indians call Pacay, and the Spaniards Guavas, which grow in green Pods, of about a quarter of a Yard long, and two fingers broad; within the pod, or shell, there is a kind of hairy substance, like cotton; and so much resembles it, that some New-comers out of Spain have quarrelled with the Indians for giving them Cotton to eat; but when they tasted them, they found them sweet and pleasant; being dried in the Sun, they will keep a long time: within the Pod they have a black Seed, like small Beans, but those are not to be eaten.

The Fruit which the Spaniards call Pears, because they resemble them in the greenness of their colour and shape, the Indians call Palta, because they first grew in a Province of that name. They are two or three times bigger than the largest size of Pears in Spain; they have a fine skin, or rine, which covers them, under which is the pulp, or meat, of about a finger thick, within which there is a shell, or stone; they are of the same form as the common Pears with us; there hath been no experiment, whether they be Medicinal, or not; onely 'tis certain, they are pleasant to the taste, and wholsome for the sick; and being eaten with Sugar, they are a rare confect.

They have also another sort of wild Fruit, which the Indians call Rucma, and the Spaniards Lucma; it is in no manner pleasant to the taste, though it be rather sweet, than sharp or bitter; howsoever, it is a gross kind of feeding, the Fruit being about the bigness of a common Orange; in the meat of it, it contains a kernel or seed of a Chestnut-colour, which is so bitter, that it cannot be eaten. Moreover the Indians had a sort of Plums which they called Ussun, which are red, and sweet; and being eaten, they turn the Urine into a colour like bloud.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tree Mulli, and of their Red Pepper.

AMongſt the other Fruits of this Countrey, we may reckon that which is produced by the Mulli Tree; it grows of it ſelf wild in the Fields; it bears its Fruit within long and ſlender bunches, with Seeds as ſmall as Coriander, the leaf is ſmall, and always green: the Seeds being taken in their due ſeaſon, are ſweet, and well taſted at the top, but within are very bitter. Of theſe Seeds they make a ſort of liquour, which preſſing gently in their hands in warm water, they ſqueeze out the ſweet juice, which is at the top of the Seed; but are careſull not to preſs it over hard, leſt they ſhould come to the bitterneſs of the Seed, and ſo ſpoil the brewing. This water being ſtrained, and kept three or four days, untill it hath done working, is very wholſome and pleaſant Beverage: it is very diuretick, and cleanſing of the Kidnies and Reins; and being mixed with the drink which is made of Mayz, is much ſtronger, and more pleaſant. The ſame water being boiled up, grows thick, and becomes ſweet like Honey; and the ſame water being ſet in the Sun, with a certain Ingredient which they put into it, turns to very ſharp and ſtrong Vinegar. The milky juice and raſine which ſweats from this Mulli Tree, as we have ſaid in another place, is an excellent Balſam for green Wounds. The leaves of it being boiled in water, is a rare Elixivium, and wholſome to bathe the body and legs in, for it ſcours off the ſcurf, and cures old boils and wounds; and little ſticks being cut from the tender bows, are excellent Dentifrices for the Teeth. I have known the Valley of Cozco, in my time, over-ſpread with innumerable Trees of this ſort, which were very beneficial, and of great uſe; and in a few years afterwards they were all cut down, and deſtroyed: the reaſon was, becauſe they felled them to make Charcole; for though there was great trouble to kindle them, yet being once lighted, they keep their fire, untill they are quite burnt out.

Amongſt theſe Fruits, the chief and principal of them all, becauſe it agrees beſt with the palate of the Indians, and which they put into all their Diſhes and Sauces, whether boiled or roaſted, is that which they call Uchu, and we Red Pepper; and the Spaniards Axi, which is the Language of Barlovento, though in Spain they give it the name of Pimiento. The people of my Countrey are ſo fond of the Uchu, that they can eat nothing, though but crude Herbs without it; being eſteemed ſo rich, and high in the taſte, that they prohibit the uſe of it, at their times of Faſtings and Mortification, as we have formerly mentioned. This Red Pepper is of three or four ſeveral ſorts; the moſt common is thick and long, without any point, called Rocot Uchu, to diſtinguiſh it from others; they eat it in its ſeaſon, when it is green, and before it hath taken its perfect colour: There are other ſorts which are yellowiſh, and murry colour, though in Spain there is none but the red. There are other ſorts of this Pepper, ſlender and long, as the middle finger, which being of the beſt kind, is uſed in the Families of the Incas. Another ſort is ſmall and round, about the bigneſs of a Cherry, the ſtalk not unlike it, called Chinchi Uchu, but is hotter than any of the others; and being rare, and in no great quantity, is more eſteemed; and all theſe ſorts of Red Pepper have this quality, that all venemous Inſects fly from them, being a great enemy to them. I have heard a Spaniard ſay, that came from Mexico, that it is excellent good for the Eyes; and for that reaſon they always eat two Cods of this Pepper after Meals; generally all the Spaniards, that come from the Indies, make it their common Sauce in all their Diſhes, and which ſavours better with them than all the Spices which come from the Eaſt-Indies.

Of the Tree Maguey, and the Virtues of it.

AMongst the Fruits of this Countrey, we may account that which the Spaniards call Maguey, and the Indians Chuchau, which ſerves for many uſes to them, as we have elſewhere mentioned. Blas Valera reckons up many Virtues of this Chuchau, on which we ſhall touch in brief. " He ſays, that it is not pleaſant " to ſight, the Timber being of a pale-coloured Wood, with a bark upon it; " that they are commonly about twenty foot long, and not bigger in compaſs than " a Man's arme or leg; the Pith within is light and ſpungy, and ſuch as Pain- " ters and Carvers uſe in their Sculptures. The leaves are thick, and half a Yard " long, and grow all towards the bottom of the Tree, like Garden-Carducy; " and for that reaſon the Spaniards give it the name of Cardamum, and may pro- " perly be ſo called, becauſe it bears prickles on its leaf; the juice of them is " very bitter, and ſerves to take ſpots out of Cloaths, it cures Cancers, aſſuages " and cools Inflammations, and cleanſes ſoars of all Worms. The ſame ſap, or " juice, being boiled with the Roots of that Tree in Rain-water, takes away all " wearineſs from them, who waſh themſelves with it, and is a moſt Medicinal " and wholſome Bath. Of theſe leaves, when they are taken in their ſeaſon, " and dried at the foot of the Tree, they make Cords as ſtrong as thoſe made " with Hemp; hereof likewiſe they make Soals for their Shoes, Ropes, Halters " and Head-ſtalls for their Horſes, and other ſorts of ſtrong Work: Thoſe that " they cut, before they expoſe them to be dried in the Sun, they moiſten and " ſteep them firſt in water, that ſo the viſcous humour, which makes them brittle, " may be waſhed away. From this leaf alſo they ſpin a finer ſort of thread " than the former, with which they make the Binders for their Heads, which " ſerves them for Linen, where they have neither Wool nor Cotton, and ſome- " thing reſembles the courſe cloth which is brought out of Flanders: And from " this they ſpin likewiſe a finer thread than all this, wherewith they make their " Nets to take ſmall Birds; for theſe being laid in certain open places between " two Hills, and faſtned to Trees on both ſides, they drive and frighten the " Birds into the Nets; which being dyed green, are not eaſily diſcerned by " them. Theſe Nets are made very long, of ſix, eight, twelve, fifteen and " twenty Yards long. The leaves of this Maguey Tree are hollow, and capable " to receive great quantities of Rain-water, which is wholſome for divers diſ- " eaſes. The Indians ſave it, and brewing it with Mayz, or Quinua, or with " the Seed of the Mulli Tree make a very ſtrong liquour; likewiſe they make " both Vinegar and Honey of it. The leaves of the Chuchau they grind, and " make little cakes of Soap of it, with which the Indian Women waſhing their " heads when they ach, it takes away all their pain; it cleanſes Spots and Frec- " kles from the skin; it makes the Hair to grow, and Dyes them very black. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera, onely I have added ſomething of the large- neſs of their Nets which he had omitted. Now we ſhall tell you ſomething more of the Virtue of this Maguey, how it makes the Hair grow, and turns it black, being done in an unuſual and ſtrange manner.

The Indian Women of Peru do all wear long and deſhevelled Hair; which when it is very much and thick, they tye it up in breads about the thickneſs of a Man's thumb; onely the Collas living in a cold Countrey, cover their heads. The Indian Women do naturally love long and black Hair, which they wear without any covering or dreſs; and when they would dye it of Cheſnut-colour, or when it tangles, or falls, in combing, they boil it in a Pan of water with certain Herbs; one of which ſort of Herbs, as Blas Valera ſaith, was Chuchau, and I think it was ſo, to my beſt remembrance; for when I was a Boy, I often ſaw them uſe it, though I did not much obſerve or enquire concerning it. What I remember is, that I ſaw the Women put their Hair into a Pan of hot water, which boiled with fire under it; they uſed a kind of a Screen for their Necks to defend them from the fire; taking care that neither the water ſhould ſcald, nor the fire burn their heads; and thoſe Hairs which could not be put into the Pan of boiling water, they dipped after with the water which had by infuſion received virtue, and a deep tincture from the Herbs. In this tormenting poſture of holding their heads back, that their Hair might ſink in the water, they would continue ſometimes for the ſpace of two hours, though I cannot preciſely ſay the time, becauſe that being a Boy then (as I ſaid) I was not ſo curious as to obſerve the ſtrict minutes; howſoever, I cannot but wonder at the pains they did take, and the torments they ſuſtained for a non-ſenſical piece of folly: But then again methinks I could excuſe them, when I conſider the pains which the Spaniſh Ladies undergo, and the time they ſpend in trimming and curling up their Hair; for they ſmoak it with Sulphur, and wet it with Aqua fortis to make it ſhine, and then they ſpread it in the hot Sun, of the Dog-days, making other kinds of Elixiviums to waſh it in, which are of ſuch a nature as I know not, which is moſt pernicious to the health either of that which the Indian Women uſe, or that which is ſo common with the Ladies in Spain. The Indian Women have alſo other Waters in which they bathe and dye their Hair, whereby they become blacker, and with a more ſhining luſtre than the Feathers of Ravens, that after moulting are new grown. This and much more can Women contrive and endure, that they may ſeem beautifull.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Platane, the Pine-Apple, and other Fruits.

BUT to return again to our diſcourſe about thoſe Fruits which are produced in the Antis of Peru, which are the moſt hot and moiſt parts of all thoſe Provinces, we ſhall onely touch upon thoſe which are the moſt remarkable, and in the firſt place ſpeak of that Tree and Fruit which the Spaniards called the Platanus, which in its height and leaf reſembles much the Palm, being very broad and green. Theſe Trees grow wild, and of themſelves, and thrive beſt in a moiſt, rainy Climate, ſuch as the Antis; the bows of which are ſo large, that Acoſta ſaith, that on one branch onely there are thoſe who have counted 300 Platane-Nuts; they grow in a ſhell, which hath neither rine nor bark over it, but ſomething like a husk, that is eaſily pilled off; it is of about a quarter of a Yard long, and about three fingers in thickneſs.

Blas Valera alſo writing of this Tree, ſaith, That when the bunches of their Fruit come to full growth, that they then cut them off, leſt the weight of them ſhould tear them off from the body or trunk; which being of a ſoft, ſpungy kind of ſubſtance, is neither fit for timber nor fire. Theſe bunches of Fruit they lay up in Jars to ripen, ſtrowing them over with a certain Herb, which ſerves to haſten and force them to grow ripe and mellow: the Meat of them is tender, ſweet and pleaſant; and being laid in the Sun, are like a conſerve, or confect: they boil them in their Broth, and ſerve them for Sauce in their roaſted or boiled Meats; and in every way they are good, having a ſweetneſs like Honey, or Sugar, and make ſeveral Conſerves of them: The bunches which hang long upon the Trees are moſt delicious and delightfull: the Trees are about two Yards high, ſome more, and ſome leſs. There is another ſort of Platans which are leſs, which they call Dominicos, to diſtinguiſh them from others; becauſe the ſhell, when it is young and tender, is white; and when the Fruit is ripe, and in its ſeaſon, it is white with black ſpots; but this ſort is not half ſo big as the other, but yet is much better, and therefore is not ſo common, nor in that plenty, as the other is.

They

They have another ſort of Fruit which the Spaniards call Pinna, becauſe of the likeneſs it hath with the Pine-nuts in Spain; but theſe reſemble one the other in ſhape and form onely, being in the ſubſtance of a different nature; for theſe Indian Nuts being opened with a Knife, yield a white and a moſt pleaſant Kernel to the taſt, having a little kind of an acidity with it, which is very ſavoury, and are as big again as the Pine-nuts are in Spain. Likewiſe in the Antis they have a ſort of Fruit which the Spaniards call Manjar blanco, (which is a meat made of the Breaſts of Capons beaten up with Roſe-water and Sugar) and they give it this Name, becauſe that when it is divided in the middle it looks like two ſpoonfulls of this Manjar blanco, or white Meat; within are certain ſmall black Stones, which are not to be eaten. This Fruit is about the bigneſs of a ſmall Mellon, the Rine of it is as thick and hard as a dried Goard; within it is contained a moſt excellent juicy pulp, extremely delicious and pleaſant to the taſt, having a grateſull ſharpneſs with it. There are many other ſorts of Fruits in the Antis, which grow wild, and of themſelves, ſuch as the Spaniards call Almonds, being Nuts which reſemble them in their form and likeneſs, but are of a different nature and taſt; for the Spaniards who came firſt into Peru, ſeeing and obſerving the fruits of that Countrey, and wanting names to give them, called them by ſuch names as were given to thoſe Fruits, which moſt reſembled them in Spain; and ſo they gave the name of Almonds to theſe Nuts, becauſe they were ſomething like them. And now leaving theſe Fruits and ſeeds of no great importance, which are produced in the Antis, let us diſcourſe of thoſe which are of moſt eſteem in other parts.

CHAP. XV.

Of the pretious Leaf called Cuca, and of Tobacco.

BUT above all we muſt not omit to diſcourſe at large of the Herb which the Indians call Cuca, and the Spaniards Coca, being that which is and hath been a conſiderable part of the Riches of Peru, and ſuch as hath yielded great benefit to the Merchants. And indeed the Indians did juſtly eſteem it for the rare Virtues and Qualities of it, which the Spaniards have not onely approved, but have alſo diſcovered ſeveral other ſpecifick and medicinal Qualities belonging to it. Blas Valera, who was a very curious Perſon, and one who had reſided many Years in Peru, and came from thence thirty years after my departure, hath wrote very largely of the many Virtues of this Herb, and ſuch as he hath found out by his own experience. His Words are theſe: "The Cuca is a ſmall tender Tree, or Bind, "about the height and bigneſs of a Vine; it produces not many Branches, but "is full of delicate Leaves, of about the breadth and length of a Man's Thumb, "it is of an excellent ſmell, and very fragrant; the Spaniards and Indians do both "give them the name of Cuca; the which is ſo much eſteemed by the Indians, "that they prefer it before Gold, or Silver, or pretious Stones. They plant and "manure them with great art and diligence, and gather them with great care, "pulling them leaf by leaf, and then lay them to dry in the Sun, and ſo the Indians eat them dry.

"The virtue and benefit of this Cuca is plainly obſervable in labouring Men, "who having eaten it are much refreſhed, and often labour a whole day in the "ſtrength of it, without other nouriſhment. The Cuca moreover preſerves the "Body from many infirmities; and our Phyſicians make uſe of it, being dried and "beaten to powder, to eaſe and aſſuage the Inflammation, or ſwelling of any "Wound; it is good to ſtrengthen bones which have been broken, and expell "colds from the Body, and to prevent them; it is good alſo to cleanſe great "Wounds of Worms, and heal them; nor is the Virtue of it leſs being taken "inwardly, than it is by outward applications. Beſides all which Virtues it yields

"a great

" a great benefit to the Bishop and Canons, and other Dependents on the Ca" thedral Church of Cozco, the Tithes of the Leaves of Cuca being their greatest " Revenue; it is also a great Commodity amongst the Merchants; notwith" standing all which good Qualities of the Cuca, there are many, who being ig" norant of its Virtues have wrote against it; for no other reason, than because
" the Gentiles in ancient times did by their Diviners and Wizards offer this Cuca
" to their Gods in Sacrifice; and therefore having been abused to Idolatry, they " conclude that it ought for ever to be esteemed abominable and prophane. This " Argument might be available, if it had been the custome to offer this Herb
" onely to the Devil, but in regard that both ancient and modern Idolaters have " made their Corn, and Fruits, and whatsoever grows above or beneath the earth,
" their Drinks and Water, their Wool and Clothing, their Flocks and Herds, " and all things else, the matter and subject of their Sacrifices; we may argue from
" the same foundation, that all those things are defiled and rendred as abominable
" and unclean as the Cuca; but to the clean all things being clean, let us teach " them to abhor and forsake their superstitious and idolatrous Worships, and let " us, using our Christian Liberty, receive those Blessings with moderation and
" thanksgiving. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera. To which we shall add thus much farther, that this little Tree is about the height of a Man, in the planting of which they cast the seed in its green shell, and when it grows up, they then hoa and open the Earth for it, as they doe for Vines, supporting the tender twigs with stakes; and in planting they take great care that the tender roots be laid streight in the Earth, for with the least doubling they dry and wither; they take likewise the leaf of every sprig by it self, and holding it between their fingers, they cut it with great care till they come to the Bud, but do not touch it, for then the whole branch will wither; both the outside and inside of this Leaf in the greenness and shape of it, is like the Arbuteus, onely the Leaves are so thin, that three or four of them being doubled, are not so thick as that of the Arbuteus. I am pleased to find any sort of Fruits here in Spain, to which I may compare them; though the difference between them is so great, that they may easily be distinguished one from the other. When they gather the Leaves they dry them in the Sun; but care is to be taken that they be not over-dried, for then they lose much of their Virtue, and being very thin, soon turn into powder; nor will they bear much moisture; for they soon grow musty and rotten; but they lay them up in Baskets of slit Canes, of which many fine ones are made in the Antis. With the Leaves of those big Canes, which are about the third of a yard broad, and about half a yard long, they cover the top of the Baskets, to keep moisture from the Leaves, which is very prejudicial to them; and to consider the great pains and care which is taken to nourish this Cuca, and the provisions of all things which are made for it, we ought rather to render thanks to God for his abundant blessings in the variety of his Creatures, than to believe or conclude that what we write is fabulous or incredible; if these fruits were to be planted or nourished in other Countries, the charge and labour of them would be more than the benefit.

This Herb is gathered every four months, that is three times a year, and in the manuring of it care is taken to weed it often; for the Countrey being hot and moist, the Weeds grow apace, and the Herb sometimes increases so fast, that the season for gathering of it advances fifteen days; so that sometimes they have four Harvests for it in a year; the which a certain covetous Tithe-gatherer observing in my time, farmed the Tithes of all the principal and rich Inheritances and Possessions about Cozco, and taking care to keep them clear and clean from Weeds, he so improved his Revenue, that the year following the Farmer of the Tithes made two thirds more than what had been made in the preceding years; which caused a Law Suit between the Farmer and the Proprietor, but what the Issue was of it, I, that was then but a Boy, did not much remark.

Amongst many other Virtues of this Cuca, they say it corroborates the Gums, and fortifies the Teeth, and that it gives strength and vigour to any person that labours and toils, onely by carrying it in his mouth. I remember a Story which I heard in my own Countrey. That a certain Gentleman both by Bloud and Vertue, called Rodrigo Pantoia, journying once from Cozco to Rimac, met with a poor Spaniard (for there are some poor there as well as here) travelling on foot, carrying a little Girl of about two years of age in his Armes; and being an acquaintance of this Pantoja, he asked him how he came to give himself the trouble of carrying that burthen; to which the person that was on foot replied, that he was poor, and had not money to hire an Indian to carry it: In this discourse with him Pantoja observed that his mouth was full of the Cuca; and it being at that time that the Spaniards abhorred all things which the Indians did eat or drink, because they had been abused to Idolatry, and particularly they hated the Cuca, as a base and stinking Weed, which gave cause to Pantoja to ask him farther, why he, being a Spaniard, did use those things which the Spaniards hated; for his necessities could never be so great as to compell him to Meats or Customs unlawfull. To which the Souldier replied, that though he abhorred it as much as the Spaniards, yet necessity forced him to imitate the Indians therein; for that without it he could never be able to travell and carry his Burthen, for that holding it in his mouth, he found such refreshment and strength, that he was able to carry his Load, and perform his Journey with chearfulness. Pantoja wondring at this Report, related it to many others, who afterwards making the same experiment thereof, found that the Indians made use of it rather for their refreshment and necessity, than for any pleasure in the taste, which in it self is not very pleasant or agreeable. Hereafter we shall discourse in what manner they carry it to Potosi, and how they trade and make Merchandise of it.

As to that Plant which the Spaniards call Tobacco, and the Indians Sayri, we have already discoursed in an other place. Dr. Monardes writes many wonderfull things of it. As to Sarsa Parilla, we need not speak much, since the Virtues and excellent Operations of it are already known both in the new and the old World, especially in the cure of the Venereal Disease, and other acute Distempers: There are many other Herbs in Peru of those medicinal Qualities, that as Blas Valera saith, if they were well known, and searched into by some experienced Botanist, there would be no need of bringing any Herbs or Drugs thither from other parts of the World. But our Spanish Physicians do so little addict themselves to the knowledge of Herbs growing in those Countries; that even the Virtues of those formerly known by the Indians are forgotten; which are so many, that the study of them is difficult and abstruse: the Indians know not their Virtues and Qualities, but distinguish them onely by bitter and sweet; sometimes eating them raw, as we do Lettuce and Radishes, and sometimes they make pottage of them, and stew them with other things; and which the poorer sort make the best part of their Diet, having no store or abundance of Fish, or Flesh, to make their Food. The bitter Herbs, such as are the Leaves which they gather from the Bushes, called Sunchu, and the like, they boil in two or three several Waters, and afterwards dry them in the Sun, and keep them for the Winter provisions; for which also they gather all the little Snags and Cockles they can find on the Banks of Rivers, or on the Sea-Coast.

CHAP. XVI.

Of their tame Cattel, and of the great Caravans, or Droves of them.

THE tame Cattel which God hath given to the Indians of Peru, are of two ſorts, which, as Blas Valera ſaith, are of a Diſpoſition as gentle and eaſie as the Indians are themſelves; being ſo tame, eſpecially thoſe which ſerve to carry their burthens, that a Child may be able to govern them. Theſe are of two ſorts, ſome of a bigger kind, and ſome of a leſs; in general the Indians give them the name of Llama, and the Shepherd or Paſtor of them, Llama Michec. In diſtinguiſhing them one from the other, they call the greater Huanacullama, becauſe it hath a likeneſs with that brave and fierce Creature, which is called Huanacu, being of the ſame ſhape with it, but different onely in the colour; the tame Huanacu varies as much in its colours as the Horſes do in Spain, but the wild is of a dark Cheſnut colour onely. This Creature is about the ſize or bigneſs of the Hart or Stag in Spain, but reſembles a Camel moſt of any other, the bunch upon the back onely excepted, but in proportion is but one third of its bigneſs; its Neck is long and ſmooth, the Skin of which being flead, the Indians uſed to make it gentle and ſupple, and being dreſſed after their faſhion, ſerved for ſoals to their Shoes; but becauſe they had not attained to the Skill of Tanning of Leather, they always took off their Shoes when they were to paſs wet, or Waters, becauſe the moiſture ſpoiled them, and made them like a Gut, or Tripe. The Spaniards made Reigns of them for their Horſes, after the Faſhion of thoſe which come from Barbary, as alſo Girts and Cruppers for their Saddles. This ſort of Cattel is uſefull both to the Indians and Spaniards, for carrying their Merchandiſe from and to what place they pleaſe; but commonly they choſe ſuch ways where the Countrey is plain and even, as is between Cozco and Potocchi, being about two hundred Leagues; and likewiſe from many other parts they go and come to and from thoſe Mines, carrying Proviſions, Commodities of the Indians, Merchandizes from Spain, ſuch as Wine, Oil, Conſerves, and all other things which are conſumed in that Countrey, and eſpecially that Herb which is called Cuca. I remember that in my time they had Droves of that Cattel which carried burthens, ſometimes ſix or eight hundred, or a thouſand in a Caravan; and that a drove of five hundred was eſteemed as nothing. The burthen which one of theſe Beaſts will carry is about three or four Aroves, (an Arove in Spain is about twenty five pounds weight) and will travel about three Leagues a day, which is about nine Miles. They are not to be driven beyond their uſual pace, for if they are, they will tire, and lie down, and then all that can be done to them, cannot raiſe them, though they eaſe them of their Burthen, and take off their Saddles; for when they come to raiſe them up, they preſently eject all they have in their Maw, or Stomach, into their Mouths, whence they caſt it, if poſſible, into the Faces of thoſe who diſturb them; which ſeems to be the onely Revenge and inſtrument they are able to exerciſe, having no Horns like the Stag or Hart. Howſoever the Spaniards call them Mutton, or Sheep, though the difference between theſe and thoſe be as much as we have before mentioned. And that theſe Creatures, nor any of them, may tire, and hinder the Travels of the whole Caravan, or Drove, they have always forty or fifty of them, which go looſe, and free of burthen in their company, and ſo ſoon as they obſerve that one begins to tire, they preſently eaſe him of his Burthen, and lay it upon another, for if he once lies down, there is no remedy, though you kill him, to raiſe him again. The Fleſh of this ſort of Cattel is the beſt, and moſt ſavoury of any in the World, being both tender and wholſome. The Phyſicians preſcribe the Fleſh of the young ones of four or five months old to their Patients, and prefer it far before Hens or Chickens.

In the time of the Vice-king, called Blaſco Nannez Vela, in the year 1544. and 45. amongſt other Contagions at that time in Peru, there was a Murrain amongſt this ſort of Cattel, which the Indians called Carache, being a certain Mange, or Scab, a Diſeaſe never known before in thoſe parts; it took them firſt in the Legs and Ventricle, and then diffuſed it ſelf over all the Body, riſing in Bunches three or four fingers high; which ſometime burſt with Matter and Bloud, and iſſued in that abundance, that the poor Creature died in two or three days. This Murrain was ſo contagious, to the great trouble and affliction both of the Spaniards and the Indians, that two thirds of the greater and leſſer Cattel dyed, both Paco and Huanacu; and farther it extended it ſelf to the wild Huanacu and Vicanna, though it was not ſo mortal amongſt them, becauſe they belonged to colder Countries, and did not herd in ſuch droves as the tame Cattel. This Murrain alſo extended it ſelf to the very Foxes, and affected them in ſo cruel a manner, that as I remember in the Year 1548. when Gonçalo Piçarro was at Cozco, and victorious after the Battel of Huarina, I ſaw a great many Foxes which were ſeized with this Plague come into the City by night, and in the morning were found dead in the Streets, having great boils on their Backs, from Head to Tail, which were cauſed by this Plague amongſt Beaſts. The Indians, who were very ſuperſtitious in matters of this nature, did from hence prognoſticate the Death of Piçarro, which accordingly enſued in a ſhort time afterwards. When this Murrain firſt began amongſt the Cattel they applied many Remedies, which ſerved rather to encreaſe than abate the evil; amongſt which one was to kill or bury alive one of the kind which was infected, as Acoſta mentions in his 4th Book; but in regard the evil encreaſed ſo faſt, that neither the Indians nor Spaniards knew in what manner to give a ſtop to it; they at length made a trial how it might be done by fire, or cauterizing; then they tried to cure it by preparations of Mercury, and Sulphur, and Hogs-greaſe, but all proved too violent Remedies, ſo that the Cattel dyed the more ſpeedily by them. At length, after many experiments made, they found none better than to anoint the parts where the Scab aroſe with Hogs-greaſe, melted and warm, taking great care to obſerve if the Scratches began on their Legs, and then to anoint them, for the Murrain ſeized them firſt there, before it ſpread it ſelf into the upper parts. This was the beſt remedy they found, yet ſerved for little untill the evil influences were over, which were the cauſes of it. And by reaſon of the great benefit, which they found by this Greaſe, they very much eſteemed of Hogs, though for the numbers of them they were cheap, and yielded no great price. It is obſervable that this general Plague upon almoſt all ſorts of Cattel, did not yet touch the wilder Animals, ſuch as Stags, and Fallow-Deer, becauſe perhaps they were of another temper. I remember that in Cozco they made choice of St. Antonio for their Saint and Protectour againſt this Murrain, for which cauſe they ſolemnize a Feſtival to him every year.

Though this ſort of Cattel be great and large, (as we have ſaid) and the Journies long which they travell, yet they put their Maſters to no charge, either in their Meat, or Shoeing, or Stable, nor in their Pack-ſaddles, or Girts, or Cruppers, or Stays, or other Utenſils which our Carriers uſe; for when they come to the end of their days journey, they onely throw off their burthen, and ſend them to feed on the Graſs which the Land affords, being at no charge, either of Straw or Corn, though they would gladly eat Corn, if their Maſters would be ſo kind as to beſtow it upon them. Then as to their ſhoeing there is no need of it, for beſides that they are cloven footed, they have a kind of a callous, or ſpungy matter on their Feet, without a Hoof. Then for their Pack-ſaddles they have no need of them, becauſe they have ſo much wool on their Backs as ſerves in the place of a Saddle, and keeps the burthen faſt and cloſe, which the Maſters of them take care to lade in ſuch manner, as that it may lie even, and well poiſed, and not touch ſo far as to gaul the Withers; nor have they need of a Surcingle which our Carriers uſe, for the Beaſt wearing no Pack-ſaddle, all Girts or Cords may rub off the Fleſh; howſoever many of them travelling in a Drove were tied one to the other, having 20 or 25 beaſts running looſe, ſo as to eaſe and change the Burthens of thoſe which were tired. The Merchants in travelling carried their Tents with them, which they pitched in the Fields, whereſoever they found it convenient to lodge and repoſe; and there unloaded their Merchandize; ſo that they never entred into Villages or Towns, becauſe too much time and labour would be loſt to put their Cattel to Graſs, and then to go and fetch them up. In their Journey from Cozco to Potocchi in going and returning they are commonly four months, beſides the time that they are detained at the place for traffick, and packing up their Merchandize. One of this ſort of Sheep, which was of the beſt kind, was worth in Cozco eighteen Ducats, and one of the more ordinary twelve or thirteen. The chief Merchandize brought from that City was Cuca, and Garments for the Indians. All that I have before ſpoken I have ſeen and obſerved with my own Eyes, but how things have been ordered ſince my departure, I know not. I have traded with many of them for this commodity, as the Merchants went and came, and I am aſſured that ſome of theſe Travellers have ſold a Basket of this Cuca for above thirty Pieces of Eight, weighty Money. And notwithſtanding the value of their Commodities, and that theſe Caravans, or Droves of Sheep, returned with thirty, forty, fifty, and an hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, yet ſuch was the ſecurity of thoſe Countries, and the little danger they had of Thieves, or Robbers, that they lodged and ſlept in the open Fields, without other Guards or Defence than their own. The like ſecurity and confidence did Men uſe in their dealings and Merchandize, as alſo in payment of their Rents, or Loans of Money, making no Conveyance, or Writing, or Obligation, beſides their mere Word; which they kept and obſerved ſo punctually, that when a Spaniard had loſt Money by Play, he would ſay to the Winner, Tell ſuch a one, that the Money which he ows me he ſhould pay to you, in ſatisfaction of what you won of me at Cards. Theſe Words were eſteemed as ſufficient as a Bill of Exchange, for ſuch was the Innocence and the ſimplicity of thoſe Countries, that no ſcruple was made in giving all belief and credence thereunto; and this was ſo common, that whether the Perſon were a Merchant, or a Souldier, or a Lord of Indians, his Word would paſs, and he was credited in every thing that he uttered; and ſuch was the ſecurity of the ways, that it ſeemed the golden Age, wherein was no fraud nor violence amongſt Mankind. And as I underſtand it continues ſtill ſo in thoſe Countries.

In times of Peace, when all Wars were ceaſed, many Nobles and Gentlemen having no employment, thought it no diminution to their Honour, rather than to remain idle, to travell frequently to Potocchi, and trade in Cuca, and other Indian Commodities, but then it was not eſteemed honourable to ſell or buy them by parcels, but by the whole ſale; nor yet to deal in Spaniſh Commodities, or to ſell by the yard, or open a Shop. Howſoever many of them were pleaſed to travell with their Commodities, it not being eſteemed ignoble for Men of Quality to be Merchants; but then they did not go according to the pace of their Droves, but often went out of the way, and divertiſed themſelves with their Hawks, and Spaniels, Greyhounds, and Guns, hunting as their Cattel travelled; and then at night when they came to the place of repoſe, they would entertain themſelves with what they had killed, perhaps with a dozen of Partridges, with a Huanacu, or Vicunna, or ſome other ſort of Veniſon, for the Countrey being wide and large, was full of all ſorts of Game: And in this manner entertaining themſelves in going and coming, their Journies ſeemed rather deſigned for Pleaſure than for Merchandiſe; which was an employment ſo far from diminiſhing the Honour of the Noble Souldiers, that it was an addition to their Fortune and Reputation. Joſeph Acoſta in his 4th Book ſpeaks much in praiſe of this bigger ſort of Cattel, and of the profit which they bring. But of the leſſer ſort, which is of the ſame ſpecies with theſe, called Pacollama, there is not much to be ſaid; for they are not uſefull for Burthens, or in that manner ſerviceable: howſoever their Fleſh is almoſt as ſavoury and as good as that of the bigger ſort; and their Wooll is excellently good and long, with which they make three ſorts of Stuffs for clothing, which the Indians die with ſuch excellent colours, that they never fade: But the Indians make no uſe of the Milk either of the bigger or leſſer ſort of this Cattel for making Cheeſe, or eating it otherwiſe; the truth is, they yield little Milk, and no more than ſuffices for the nouriſhment of their Young. In my time they brought Cheeſes from Mayorca to Peru, which were greatly eſteemed. Milk, and the Dug, and Sucking, are all called by the ſame Word Nunna. The Indians have no Dogs, but ſuch as are Curs, and not of that difference of Races, and Kinds, as we have in Europe. The Indian Word for a Dog is Alco.

CHAP. XVII.

Of their wild Cattel, and Vermine.

BEfore the time that the Spaniards came into Peru, the Indians had no other diſtinction or variety of tame Cattel, but onely of the Paco and Huanacu, as we have before ſpecified. Of their wild Cattel they had much more variety, of which they made notwithſtanding the ſame benefit, and uſe, as they did of the tame, according as we have ſpecified, in the Chapter of their Huntings, which they performed at their certain ſeaſons. One ſort of this wild Cattel was called Huanacu, for the likeneſs it had to that of the greater kind, which was tame; the Fleſh of which was very excellent and ſavoury, though not ſo good as that of the tame; in ſhort, they reſemble each other very much, both in Colour, Wool, Shape, and every thing elſe. The Males of theſe Creatures always keep watch on high Hills, whilſt the Females are feeding in the lower Paſtures, which ſo ſoon as they eſpie people coming towards them, they preſently make a bleating, (which reſembles the neighing of a Horſe) to give warning to them to fly and ſave themſelves; and then the Males ſtay untill their Females come up, which they put before them, and remain themſelves in the rere. The Wool of this wild Huanacus is ſhort and courſe; howſoever the Indians made uſe of it for their clothing; and in my time the Spaniards uſed to take them with their Grey-hounds.

The Vicunna, which is another ſort of wild Cattel, reſembles the Paco; and is a neat Creature, but very lean, and yields great abundance of fine Wool. Acoſta writes of the many medicinal Virtues which belong to this Creature; and as he deſcribes the Beaſts and Fowl of all the new World, ſo in reading of his Writings we ought to diſtinguiſh thoſe of Peru from other parts. The Vicunna is long legged, and higher than the biggeſt Goat; the colour of its Wool is of a light Cheſnut, or as ſome call it, Lion-coloured; they are ſo nimble and ſwift, that no Grey-hound can take them, and therefore they kill them with Guns, or take them in toils, as they practiſed in the times of the Incas. They feed commonly in the higheſt parts of the mountains near the Snows; the Fleſh may be eaten, though it be not ſo ſavoury as that of the Huanacu; and though it be lean and tough, is yet eſteemed by the Indians.

They have Fallow Deer and Stags in Peru, though they are much leſs than thoſe in Spain, the Indians call them Taruca; they were in ſuch numbers, in the times of the Incas, that they were common and tame, and would come into the Villages; and from all theſe wild Beaſts they now take out the Bezar-ſtone, though in my time it was a thing not imagined, or ſought for. They have certain ſorts of wild or mountain Cats, which they call Ozcollo, being of two or three kinds.

Their Foxes are much leſs than thoſe in Spain, which they call Atoc; they have alſo other little Animals, leſſer than our Houſe-cats, which the Indians call Annas, and the Spaniards Zorrinas; if their Smell were ſweet, as it is ſtinking, it would ſurpaſs the Musk or Amber; but as it is fetulent, it is the moſt offenſive ſmell in the World, and the ſtink of it is ſo ſtrong, that it may be ſmelt at the diſtance of a hundred paces, and though the Doors and Windows are ſhut, yet the ſunk is ſo ſubtile, that it will find an entrance at the Crevices: It is well that theſe Creatures are not in great numbers, for if they were, they were able to poiſon and ſtench up a whole Countrey. They have both tame and wild Conies, different from each other, both in colour and taſte; they call them Coy; ſome tame Conies have been brought from Spain, though the Indians will give little for them; and yet becauſe their Countries do not abound in Fleſh, they eſteem them for great Delicacies, and eat them with much delight. There is another ſort of Coney which they have called Vizcacha, it hath a long Tail like a Cat, and is bred in the Mountains where the Snows lie. In the Reign of the Incas, and many years after, untill the times that I remember they made great uſe of the Skins of theſe Conies, ſpinning and weaving the Wool into their fine Cloths, for variety of colours; the colour of which is a light grey, and is very gentle and ſoft in the touch, and ſo much eſteemed amongſt the Indians, that they uſed it onely in clothing for the Nobles.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of their Lions, Bears, Tigers, Apes and Monkies.

THE Lions in Peru are few in number, and neither ſo large nor fierce as thoſe in Africa, which they call Puma. They have alſo ſome Bears, but not many, becauſe that the Countrey of Peru is not proper for them, not being mountainous to that degree, as is agreeable to Beaſts of that fierce nature; and, as they ſaid, the Incas commanded in their Huntings, that they ſhould be killed, and no quarter given to Beaſts of Prey and Slaughter: The Bear is called Veumari. There are no Tigers, but onely in craggy and horrid Mountains of the Antis, where alſo Serpents are produced of a prodigious bigneſs, being of about twenty five to thirty foot long, which they call Amaru, and in compaſs as big as a Man's Thigh, where alſo are great numbers of Snakes, or leſſer Serpents, called Machachuay, and poiſonous Serpents, and many other venemous Inſects; but Peru is free of theſe venemous Creatures. A certain Spaniard, with whom I was acquainted, killed a Lioneſs of a prodigious bigneſs within the Antis, on that ſide which borders toward Cozco; which having lodged her ſelf in a high Tree, he ſhot her down with four Arrows, and ripping her up, found her with young of two Whelps, which were the Cubs of a Tiger, well known by their Spots. What the Word is for a Lion in the general Tongue of Peru, I have forgot; and yet I cannot much reproach my memory, but rather lay the fault on my own neglect, not having in the ſpace of forty two years either ſpoken or read in that Language, which I think is a very good excuſe to any who would blame me for this forgetfulneſs. I think the Tiger is called Uturuncu, though Acoſta calls a Bear Otoronços, according to the corrupt manner of the Spaniſh pronunciation. There is another ſort of animal in the Antis, very like a Cow, but without Horns, nor yet ſo big; the Hide makes a moſt ſtrong ſort of Leather, and, as ſome ſay, reſiſts a Sword better than Buff, or a Coat of Mail. They have wild Boars in ſhape like our tame Hogs, but there are not many of this kind on that ſide of the Antis, which borders upon Peru: And as to matters on the other remote parts of the Antis, it is not my deſign or purpoſe to treat. Monkies and Apes there are many, both great and ſmall, ſome of them with Tails, and others without them. Of the natures of them we might ſay much, but becauſe Acoſta hath wrote thereof at large, we ſhall uſe his own Words, as he ſets them down in the 39th Chapter of his 4th Book, being agreeable to what both the Spaniards and Indians report, and of what I my ſelf have been an Eye-witneſs: His Words follow. "There are great numbers of Micos, "which are a ſort of Monkies, found in all the Mountains, as well thoſe which "are on the Main land, as in the Iſlands in Antis; they are of the ſame ſpecies with "the Baboons, but differ in the length of their Tails, and in their proportion and "ſize; ſome of them being three or four times bigger than others: Some of "them are all black, others grey, and others ſpotted. Their activity and moti-"on is ſuch, that they ſeem to have reaſon, and diſcourſe, leaping from one Tree "to another, in imitation of Birds. In Capita, as I travelled from Nombre de Dios "to Panama, I ſaw one of theſe Micos ſpring at one leap from a Tree to another "Tree, which grew on the other ſide of a Stream, which to me ſeemed moſt "ſtrange and wonderfull. Their manner is to ſit on their Tails at the end of "a Bough, and thence to throw themſelves to what place ſoever they pleaſe; "and when the diſtance is ſo far, that they are not able to reach it, they uſe this con-

" contrivance; many of them getting together, one hangs at the Tail of ano" ther, making a kind of a long Chain, with which fetching a long Swing, the " lowermoſt throws himſelf with the help of the others, to the bough they " aim at, where hanging by his fore feet, ſtretches out his Tail to the next com" panion, and ſo one helps the other, untill all are come over. The tricks and " mimical poſtures which they have, are matters of great divertiſement, and the " actions which they perform in obedience to their Commanders, ſeem effects of " humane Underſtanding, rather than of irrational Creatures. I ſaw one of theſe
" Monkies at Cartagena, in the Houſe of the Governour, of which they related " ſuch ſtrange things as to me ſeemed almoſt incredible. They ſaid, that they
" ſent him often to the Tavern for Wine, with Money in one hand, and a Bot-
" tel in the other; and that when he was come to the Tavern, he would " not deliver his Money untill he had received his Wine; if the Boys met with " him by the way, and made a houting, or noiſe after him, he would ſet down " his Bottel, and throw Stones at them, and having cleared the way, he would " take up his Bottel and haſten home; and that though he loved Wine exceſſive-
" ly, yet he would not dare to touch it, unleſs his Maſter gave him licence. They
" ſay alſo, that if he ſaw a Woman at any time fine, and well dreſſed, he would " preſently pull her by the Cloths, and ruffle them in a ſtrange manner. Per" haps ſomething may be reported of theſe Creatures more than I have ſeen;
" howſoever it is moſt certain that there is no Animal in the World ſo ſagacious,
" and ſo delighted with humane Society as this ſort and race of Monkies: and be-
" cauſe the Reports concerning the underſtanding of theſe Creatures are ſo ſtrange
" that the Inſtances thereof ſeem incredible to me, and would perhaps appear fa" bulous to others, I ſhall therefore omit to mention them, and onely bleſs and ad" mire the Authour of all Creatures, that amongſt all his works made for the uſe and " benefit of Mankind, he hath ſhaped and faſhioned a Creature ſo ridiculous in its " form and poſtures, as ſerves to move laughter, and yield matter of Recreation " and Divertiſement to Man, whom he hath made Lord of this Univerſe. Some " have written that Solomon brought his Monkies from the Weſt-Indies, but I am
" of another opinion, and believe that they were fetched from the Eaſtern Parts.
Thus far are the Words of Acoſta, to which may be farther added, that theſe Apes and Monkies carry their young ones at their backs, untill they are able to ſhift for themſelves; the young ones taking hold with their fore-feet about their necks, and claſp their hind legs about their middle; all which, beſides their tricks and inventions before recited, ſerve to demonſtrate their ſagacious dexterity, and ſhifts like experienced Souldiers in time of neceſſity. And becauſe the noiſe they make is a Language, by which one underſtands the other; (as for my part I believe that all Birds and Beaſts do by their ſeveral voices underſtand the meaning of their own ſpecies) therefore the Indians ſay, that they can ſpeak, and that they diſguiſe their want of ſpeech to the Spaniards, leſt they ſhould ſend them to work in the Mines, and dig for Gold and Silver, and that in imitation of the Indians they carry their young ones at their backs. And thus much ſhall ſuffice to have ſpoken of Apes and Monkies.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX.

Of their Tame and Wild-fowl both of Water and Land.

THE Indians of Peru have no tame fowl, but onely a sort of Ducks, so called by the Spaniards, becauſe they have ſome kind of likeneſs with thoſe in Spain: they are of an ordinary ſize, neither ſo big, nor ſo tall as a Gooſe, nor yet ſo little as a Duck, but ſomething between both; the Indians call them Nuuma, deriving their Name from Nunu, which is to ſuck, becauſe they draw in their meat as if they were ſucking; beſides which they have no tame fowl in all that Countrey. As to Birds of the Air, and Water-fowl belonging to the Sea, or Rivers, they are of ſuch variety, as is not poſſible for us to declare one quarter part of them; but we ſhall mention ſome of them which are moſt common: There are Eagles of all ſorts, great and ſmall, though not ſo large as they are in Spain: They have Hawks of divers kinds, ſome like thoſe in Spain, and others not; the general word which the Indians have for them is Huaman; the leſſer ſort of Hawks have been brought thence into Spain, and are much eſteemed: Thoſe which in my Countrey are called Neblies are mettled Hawks, and long winged, with large talons, and are of a blackiſh colour. At Cozco, in the year 1557, a certain Gentleman of Sevil, who was a great Faulconer, uſed all his Art to teach and train up ſome of this Countrey Hawks for his paſtime; in which he ſo far proceeded, as to make them come to hand, and to the lure readily at a far diſtance, but could never teach them to prey upon any game, ſo that he gave over his hopes of doing any good with thoſe Hawks. There are other Fowls which we may reckon with thoſe of prey, which are of a large ſize, called Cuntur, and by the Spaniards corruptedly Condor. Many of theſe fowls having been killed by the Spaniards, had their proportion taken, and from one point of their Wing to the other meaſured fifteen or ſixteen Foot, which being reduced to Yards, makes five Yards and a third: Nature, to temper and allay their fierceneſs, denied them the talons which are given to the Eagle, having their feet tipped with claws like a Hen; howſoever their beak is ſtrong enough to tear off the Hide, and rip up the Bowels of an Oxe: Two of them will attempt a Cow or Bull, and devour him; and it hath often happened, that one of them alone hath aſſaulted Boys of ten or twelve years of Age, and eaten them: Their colour is black and white, like a Magpye; it is well that they are but few in number; for if they were many, they would very much deſtroy the cattel: they have on the fore-part of their heads a comb, not pointed like that of a Cock, but rather even, in the form of a Razor; when they come to alight from the Air, they make ſuch a humming noiſe with the fluttering of their Wings, as is enough to aſtoniſh, or make a Man deaf.

Acoſta treating in his fourth Book concerning the Birds of the New World, ſpeaks there particularly of the Cuntur; to which I refer thoſe who are deſirous to reade and hear of ſtrange and wonderfull things; he there hath theſe words: "The Fowls which they call Cuntur are of a vaſt bigneſs, and ſo ſtrong, that they "are able to prey upon Sheep and Calves, and do often devour them. Acoſta treating alſo of the little Birds which are in Peru, which the Spaniards call Tomineios, and the Indians Quenti, which are of a golden azure colour, finer and brighter than that about the Neck of a Peacock: they feed like Bees, piercing with their long ſharp bill into the Flowers, and ſuck from thence a ſweetneſs, and Honey, with which they are nouriſhed: they are ſo little, that Acoſta ſpeaks in this manner of them: "In Peru there is a ſort of Birds ſo little called Tomineios, that when I "have ſeen them upon the Wing, I have much doubted whether they were "Bees, or Butterflyes. And now that we have given a report of two ſorts of Birds, ſo different in the extremes, there is no perſon will wonder at what we ſhall ſay of thoſe which are of a moderate proportion.' There is a ſort of great Birds

Birds which are black, called by the Indians Fuyuntu, and by the Spaniards Gallinaza; they are great devourers of Fleſh, and ſo ravenous, that if they find any carrion dead in the Fields, they gorge themſelves with it to ſuch a degree, that they are not able to fly; and when they find themſelves in that condition purſued by Men, they run away on their legs, helping their flight with the fluttering of their Wings, vomiting up all their meat as they run; that it is pleaſant to obſerve how they ſpue up their prey with the ſame eagerneſs as that with which they devoured it: Howſoever, if they are hardly purſued, they may be taken and killed; but Men forbear to deſtroy them, conſidering that they are not good for meat; and being a ſilly Bird, doth no hurt, but onely ſerves to devour carrion, and cleanſe the ſtreets and ways from filthineſs. Acoſta is of an opinion that it is a ſort of Crow.

There is a ſort of Sea-Birds which reſemble theſe, ſuch as the Spaniards call Alcatrazes, (in Engliſh Sea-Mews) they are leſs than Buſtards; they live upon Fiſh, and it is pleaſant to ſee how they take them. At certain hours of the Morning or Evening, when the Fiſh uſually play and riſe upon the ſurface of the water, which are the times alſo that theſe Birds are moſt hungry; they raiſe themſelves high upon the Wing, from whence obſerving where the Fiſh move, they clap their Wings cloſe, and fall with ſuch a ſoop, like a Hawk, that they never miſs of their prey; and ſometimes dive with ſuch agility under water, following the ſhoals of Fiſh, that they ariſe again with their prey croſſed in their beak; and then mounting in the Air, devour the Fiſh, and then try for others. It is very pleaſant to ſee them ſtoop, and give blows upon the water, and dive into it, others to be at the ſame time in the Air, watching their opportunity; others having miſſed their ſtroke, to riſe again: In ſhort, to ſee at the ſame time 200 Hawks ſtooping, and mounting, like the Hammers of an Iron Mill. Beſides theſe, there are flocks of Sea-birds of a leſſer ſort; howſoever, ſome are greater, and ſome are leſs; but in ſuch incredible numbers, that they will ſometimes cover the Sea of Zur for two or three Leagues in length, and fly ſo cloſe together, that for ſuch a compaſs they even darken the Sky: And hereby we may admire the Providence of the Eternal Majeſty, who hath created ſuch a multitude of Creatures, and therewith a ſufficient proviſion of Fiſh, wherewith to ſupport and maintain them. And thus much for Sea-fowl.

Now as to Water-fowl which belong to Rivers and Lakes in Peru, they are in great numbers; ſuch as Herons, Wild-ducks, and Bran-geeſe, and thoſe which we call Shovelers; beſides many others of a different kind, which we cannot exactly deſcribe, by reaſon that we have not obſerved their variety with due attention: They have alſo Swans which live upon Fiſh, and are very white, without any mixture of black; they have long legs, very beautifull, and go always in couples, or pairs, but are in no great number.

CHAP.

CHAP. XX.

Of Partridges, Doves, and other ſmaller Birds.

THere are two ſorts of Partridges in my Countrey; one is like our Hens which lay Eggs, and theſe are found in the deſarts, which the Indians call Puna; the other is leſſer than our Partridge in Spain, but the fleſh is excellent good, and more ſavoury than the greater kind; they are both of a greyiſh colour, their bill and feet being white; they name them Yutu from the ſound of the call which they make; the leſſer ſort are of the ſame colour with our Quails, onely that their beak is different; to moſt Birds the Indians give Names according to the inarticulate voice or noiſe they make, as we ſhall hereafter declare. I know not whether the Partridges of Spain have been tranſported to Peru, to make a breed of them in that part of the World: They have Wood-Pigeons, or Ring-Doves of the ſame colour and bigneſs as they are in Spain, they call them Urpi; Houſe-Pigeons have been brought thither from Spain, which the Indians call Caſtilla Urpi: They have Turtles of the ſame colour and bigneſs as thoſe in Spain, if not ſomething larger; they call them Cocohuay, from the noiſe they make, which ſounds ſomething like it. They have another ſort of Turtle about the bigneſs of a Thruſh, or Lark, and of the ſame colour, they breed under the Eves of a Houſe, like our Sparrows, and ſome of them in the Fields, but thoſe are few. They have a ſort of ſmall Birds of a greyiſh colour, which the Spaniards for the likeneſs of their colour, call Sparrows, but are different in their note, for theſe ſing ſweetly, and chirp not like the ordinary Sparrow: the Indians call them Pariapichiu; they breed in the Mud-walls of Houſes, or in Walls covered with Buſhes, and ſometimes alſo in the Field. They have another ſort of ſmall Bird, which we call a Nightingale, by reaſon of its reddiſh colour, but differs in its note as much as white and black, having that unpleaſant ſound, that the ancient Indians eſteemed it as unlucky as the croaking of a Raven. They have another ſort of ſmall Birds of a blackiſh colour, which the Spaniards call Swallows, but they are rather Swifts, than Swallows, and come at their certain ſeaſons; they commonly lodge, and make their neſts, in places where people do inhabit; for my part, I never ſaw either Swallows or Martens in the Hilly Countries of Peru. The Birds of the Plains are the ſame with ours, but their Sea-fowl is much different. They have neither Plover, Heath-pouts, nor Thruſhes in that Countrey, nor Cranes, nor Buſtards; howſoever there may be others like them which I cannot remember.

In the Kingdom of Chili, which was within the Dominions and Empire of the Incas; there were Oſtridges which the Indians call Suri, but their Feathers were not ſo fine and curious as thoſe of Africa; their colours are commonly grey: they take no high flight, but making uſe of their Wings and Feet, flutter along, and run faſter than a Horſe. The Spaniards run them ſometimes down with their Horſes, but then two or three Horſemen chaſe them from one to another, untill they are tired. In Peru they have a ſort of Starlings, which fly in Flocks, and are of a black and grey colour; the Indians call them Chayna from the noiſe they make: they have alſo ſeveral other ſorts of Birds, greater and leſſer, of which, for the variety of them, I am not able to give an account. I remember that they have a kind of Keſtrel, or Wind-hover, but of more ſpirit and courage than thoſe which we have here, for thoſe will adventure to prey upon ſmall Birds. In the Plains of Yucay I once ſaw two Keſtrels fly at a ſmall Bird, which they had purſued a great way, and at laſt lodged her in a tall and thick Tree which is in that Plain. I left that Tree ſtanding when I departed from thence, which the Indians in the time of their Gentiliſm held, and eſteemed for Sacred, becauſe their Kings did often ſit under the ſhadow of it, to ſee the diverſements and paſtimes which were repreſented in thoſe Plains. Theſe Keſtrels following their natural ſagacity, combined againſt the poor Bird; and one of them them entered into the Tree, whilſt the other ſoared aloft, being ready to take the Bird ſo ſoon as ſhe adventured out. When the Bird was forced out by the Keſtrel in the Tree, the other without ſtooped at her like a Hawk; which the Bird avoiding, returned again to the Tree, to ſhelter her ſelf; then the Keſtrel, which was on the Wing, entered in after her, whilſt the other took her place in the Air; and thus they entered and ſallied three or four times, untill at laſt the poor Bird adventured to fly towards a building, where ſhe ſheltered her ſelf within the hole of a Wall, ſo little, that the Keſtrels could not enter, and ſo eſcaped from being made a prey unto them. All this time ſome Spaniards with great delight and curioſity obſerved the many ſhifts of theſe Creatures, which nature had taught them to maintain and preſerve themſelves. They have wild Bees in divers manners; but ſuch as are houſed and hived at home, they have none, neither have the Spaniards taught the Indians as yet how to manage them. Their wild Bees hive themſelves, and make their Honey in clefts, and hollow places of the Rocks, and hollow Trees: the Bees which are in the cold Countries make little Honey, becauſe they want Flowers and odoriferous Herbs out of which to extract it; and that little which they do make is bitter, and the Wax black, and of no uſe: But in the warmer Countries, and more temperate, where the Climate yields good Herbs, and odoriferous Flowers; the Honey is excellent, and white, clean, and very ſweet: This ſort of Honey being carried into colder Countries, candies and turns to a Sugar; they highly eſteem it, not onely becauſe it is wholſome food, but alſo becauſe it is medicinal, and very wholſome.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the divers ſorts of Parrots; and how talkative they are.

PArrots breed, and are found moſt commonly in the Mountains of Antis; they are of divers ſorts and ſizes, ſome being greater, and ſome leſs: the little ones are leſs than Thruſhes, and the great bigger than Keſtrels; there are ſome all over of the ſame colour, others of great variety, being green, yellow, blew and red, eſpecially thoſe of the great kind, which the Spaniards call Guacamayas, which are of all colours, eſpecially their Tails, which are long, and the Feathers ſo fine, that the Indians on the days of the Feſtivals adorn themſelves with them; from the beauty of which Feathers John Bocacio took his ſubject to frame the pleaſant Novel of Friar Cipolla. The Spaniards call theſe Parrots by divers names, according to the difference of their ſize and bigneſs: the leaſt of all they name Periquillos, thoſe that are bigger they call Catalnillas, and ſuch as are a ſize bigger, and which ſpeak beſt, they name Loro; and the biggeſt of all, which are dull, and never ſpeak, they call Guacamayas, and are good for nothing but to look upon, for the beauty of their Feathers: Such as theſe they carry into Spain in Cages, for the delight they have in hearing them talk; but others, which are not ſo beautifull, nor diverting, they think not worth the care and charge of tranſporting ſo far.

In the Year 1555, and 56, there was a Parrot at Potoſi, which was one of thoſe called Loro, which was ſo ready in its Tongue, that it would call the Indians, as they paſſed along the Streets, by the names of their ſeveral Countries; ſuch as Colla, Yunca, Huayru, Quechua, &c. as if it had been acquainted with the ſeveral Saſhes they wore on their Heads, to diſtinguiſh their Countries.

Upon a certain day there was a beautifull Indian Woman paſſing the Streets very fine, and accompanied with three or four Servant-Maids, as if ſhe had been ſome great Lady, or Palla of the Bloud-Royal: So ſoon as the Parrot ſaw her, he fell into a great laughter, crying out, Huayru, Huayru, Huayru, which is a Nation the moſt baſe and contemptible of all the Indians: With which the Indian Woman was greatly aſhamed, being laughed at by the people, who in great Numbers were always about the Parrot, hearing him talk; and when ſhe came near he called her Cupay, which is Devil; the Indians which were by, approved the Saying of the Parrot, for they knew that ſhe was an ordinary Woman diſguiſed in the Habit of a Palla, or great Lady.

Some few years paſt in Sevil, there was another Parrot of this kind, which did moſt horribly abuſe a certain Phyſician, though unworthy of that name, being a mere Quack, as he paſſed the Streets; which he did ſo ſcurrilouſly, and ſo much to the purpoſe, that the Doctor took it ill, and was really offended: Whereupon the Juſtice commanded the Maſter not to ſet the Parrot any more in the Street, upon penalty of forfeiting it to the next perſon offended at his prate. The general word which the Indians have for Parrots, is Uritu; and when they hear a Man talk much, and obſtreperouſly, with much noiſe, they call him Uritu, for the noiſe and chat which the Parrots make when they fly in great flocks, is like the prate of a vain-talking fellow, who, as the Divine Arioſto ſays, in his twenty fifth Canto, Knows little, and talks much.

Theſe Parrots, at the ſeaſon of the year, when the Corn is ripe, fly out from the Antis, to ſeek their food; and being in great flocks, they ſpoil the Mayz, or Corn, whereſoever they alight; they are very ſtrong upon the Wing, and fly high: but the Guacamacas being a dull and heavy ſort of Bird, go not out from the Antis: And all theſe different ſorts of Parrots keep to their own kind; to make the Proverb true, that Birds of a Feather flock together.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the four famous Rivers, and of the Fiſh which is taken in thoſe which belong to Peru.

I Had almoſt forgot to give a Relation of the Fiſh which the Indians of Peru have in their freſh-water Rivers of Peru; the which Rivers are many, and very great, of which, for brevity ſake, we ſhall onely mention four. The firſt is that great River, which is now called the Madalena, falling into the Sea between Cartagena, and Santa Maria; the mouth of which, according to the Sea-charts, is eight Leagues wide, having its head, or ſource, from the high Mountains of Peru: The fierce ſwiftneſs of the current with which it falls into the Sea is ſuch, that for ten or twelve Leagues the forcible ſtreams are ſenſibly perceived to reach into the Seas, the fury thereof contending with the Waves of the Ocean. The River Orellana, called ſo by us, being diſtinct from the Madalena, is, according to the Sea-charts, about fifty four Leagues wide at the mouth of it, though ſome Authours onely reckon it for thirty, others forty, others ſeventy, making their account with great variety; howſoever, for my part, I ſhall rather adhere to the opinion of Seamen, who are knowing and learned in Maritime affairs, and thoſe whoſe buſineſs it is to ſail over, and meaſure the Seas, and have made Sea-charts and Draughts with great Art: the diverſity of the opinions in the meaſures, is this, becauſe ſome meaſuring juſt at the mouth of the River, from ſide to ſide, make it fifty Leagues; but ſuch as draw their lines from the extreme points of Land, which extend into the Sea, may meaſure ſeventy Leagues, as is well known to the Pilots. The ſource or head of thoſe Fountains which make this River, ariſes in the diviſion of Cuntiſuyu, being to the South-Weſt of Cozco, and diſtant about eleven Leagues Weſtward from thence. This River, at the very head of it, is very deep, and not fordable, and is very ſwift and rapid, the ſtreams thereof being contracted between very high Mountains, which from the bottom to the top, where the Snow is lodged upon them, measure thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen Leagues almost perpendicular. This River is the greatest of any in all Peru, wherefore the Indians call it Apurimac, because Apu signifies Chief, or Principal both in War and Peace: they call it also Capac Mayu, Capac signifying plentifull, rich, abundant, and Mayu a River: For as Capac was an Epithet, or Title given to their Kings, so they attributed that Title or Dignity to the Chief and Prince of all their Rivers. This River keeps its name, whilst it passes through the Countrey of Peru; but whether it loses its name afterwards or not, or that the Nations who live in the Mountains give it any other name, I am not able to say.

In the year 1555, by reason of the great Rains which fell that Winter, a vast part of the Mountain tumbled into the River, with such mighty and prodigious Rocks, as gave a stop to the current of the water for three whole days; and so remained till the water overflowing the ruinous Mountain which fell in, came at last to take its naturale course; at which detention, or stoppage of the water, the poor Inhabitants, which lived below, much admiring, and not knowing the reason thereof, concluded that the end of the World was come; and this stoppage below caused the water to rise at fourteen Leagues distance above, being sensibly elevated as far as the Bridge, which is in the great and royal High-way leading from Cozco to Ciudad Real. This River Apurimac runs North and South at least five hundred Leagues from the head and source of it to the Equinoctial; thence taking a turn to the Eastward, it runs under the Equinoctial, six hundred and fifty Leagues measured on a strait line, to the place where it falls into the Sea; but being measured by the turnings and windings of it, 'twill make fifteen hundred Leagues, as Francis de Orella reports, who sailed down that River, in a Voyage he made in company with Gonçalo Piçarro, who went to make discovery of the Countrey of Canela, as we shall mention in its due place. The Chart of Navigation makes it on a strait line to be six hundred and fifty Leagues without any doublings of the River. And though Merchants in describing the situation of places do not much meddle with in-land Countries, but those onely which lye on the Sea-coast, and those Rivers which fall into the Ocean: Yet in regard that this River is the greatest in the World, being above seventy Leagues in breadth at the mouth of it, and runs with so great a stream and torrent, that it makes fresh water for above a hundred Leagues within the Sea; they have thought it worthy of their observation and enquiry: So that according to the Relation of Orellana (as Gomara attests) those five hundred Leagues which we mention in a strait line, will make two thousand Leagues with the turnings, and doublings of this River falling into the Sea directly under the Equinoctial; and it was called Orellana according to the name of this Gentleman, who sailed over it in the year 1543.

Howsoever a discovery was made before that time of this River by the Pinconos of Sevil, in the year 1500; to which they then gave the name of the River of Amazons, because they observed that the Women fought with as much courage in defence of those parts, as the Men; the like instances whereof we have in our History of Florida. In that River there are many greater and lesser Islands, and the tide flows from the Sea above an hundred Leagues up the River: And thus much shall suffice to have said of this River.

Now as to that River which is called Marannon, it falls into the Sea about seventy Leagues to the Southward of Orellana, which is about three degrees of South-latitude, being about twenty Leagues wide at the mouth of it. This River issues from some great Lakes on the upper parts of Peru, which are filled by the Snow-waters that dissolve from the high Mountains which are covered with Snow. Now in regard that these two Rivers fall into the Sea, so near one unto the other, I am apt to believe that they make one River of these two, giving the name of Orellana to both these Rivers, so far as the fresh water runs into the Sea. As to the River which the Spaniards call el rio de la plata, and the Indians Parahuay; we have in our second part given the reason, why this River was so called in Spanish, and explained the signification of the Indian word; the Fountains of whose waters, like those of Marannon, have their head or source from the prodigious Mountains of the snowy desart, called the Cordillera, which passes through all the Countrey of Peru. This River many times overflows with rapid inundations all the Fields and Villages near the banks, and forces the people for three Months in the year, to be ready with their Boats and Canoes, which they tye to the branches of Trees to ſave themſelves, untill thoſe Flouds are over, having no other place wherein to ſecure themſelves: It falls into the Sea about the degree of thirty five, being about thirty Leagues wide at the mouth; and yet here below it is narrower than it is eighty Leagues above, where it is fifty Leagues broad; ſo that joyning the breadth of theſe four Rivers together at the places where they fall into the Sea, we may ſay, that they meaſure one hundred and thirty Leagues in breadth, and may be reckoned amongſt the Miracles and Wonders of Peru. Beſides theſe four great Rivers, there are multitudes of other ſmaller Rivers, which every-where fall into the Sea, as we may ſee deſcribed in the Waggoners, and Sea-Maps, to which I refer my ſelf; which if joyned together, would make greater Rivers than any we have hitherto mentioned.

And now in ſuch vaſt Rivers we might rationally conclude, that great plenty of Fiſh were produced in them; but it is quite otherwiſe, namely in Peru, which is the Countrey I chiefly treat of; for with other parts I meddle not. Some attribute the cauſe of this ſcarcity of Fiſh in thoſe Rivers to the rapidneſs of their ſtreams, which are too violent for Fiſh to remain in; and there are very few places in thoſe Rivers, where the Waters are ſtill, or tolerably quiet. Moreover it is obſervable, that the Fiſh which is bred there, is of another and different ſort to that in Spain; they ſeem to be all of one kind, without ſcales, the Head being broad and ſmooth, in faſhion of a Toad, with a wide Mouth: Howſoever, it is very ſavoury, and pleaſant to eat; and the skin is ſo delicate and ſweet, that it is the beſt Meat of all: they call them Challua, which ſignifies Fiſh. Another reaſon why theſe Rivers of Peru, which fall into the Sea, are ſo ill ſtored with Fiſh may be, becauſe the Waters are ſhallow, as well as rapid; and yet in the Winter they are too deep to be waded over.

In the great Lake of Titicaca are great quantities of Fiſh, which though they are of the ſame quality and form with thoſe in the Rivers, yet the Indians, to diſtinguiſh them from others, give them the name of Suchi: they are ſo fat, that when they are fryed, or ſtewed, they need no other greaſe than their own. There is likewiſe in this Lake another ſort of Fiſh, which the Spaniards call Bogas, the Indian word for them I have forgot; it is a little ſmall Fiſh, of a bad taſte, and a worſe ſhape; and if I am not greatly miſtaken, they have ſcales, and might well be called Harrihuelas, or Sprats, for the ſmallneſs of them: both ſorts of theſe Fiſhes breed abundantly in that great Lake, having room enough to ſpawn in, and have ſufficiency of feeding, which is brought down by the Rivers which fall into it. And thus much ſhall ſerve to have ſpoken of Rivers, and of the Fiſh which the Waters of that Countrey afford.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Emeralds, Torquoiſes, and Pearls of that Countrey.

THE pretious Stones found in Peru, in the time of the Incas, were Torquoiſes, Emeralds, and Cryſtal of the fineſt ſort, though they were not acquainted with the manner how to work it: the Emeralds grow in the Mountains of the Province of Manta, which is within the Juriſdiction of Puerto Viejo; but yet the Spaniards have not been able, with all their endeavours, to find out the quarry of them, which is the reaſon that they are ſo ſcarce and rare; ſuch of them as are found, are the beſt of that kind in all Peru: Howſoever from that, and other parts of the Weſt-Indies, they have brought ſuch great quantities of them into Spain, as have made them cheap, and diſeſteemed: howſoever the Emeralds from other parts are not to be compared with thoſe of Puerto Viejo; the which grow in their Quarries, and take their tincture from the nature of the Soil from whence they are produced, ripening there with time, like fruit in their proper ſeaſons: The Emerald, when it firſt begins, is of a paliſh white, partaking of a grey colour mixed with a green; then as it grows ripe, or towards its perfection, it takes at one end a tincture of green, perhaps at that end firſt which points towards the Eaſt, after which that pleaſant colour diſperſes it ſelf over all the Stone; ſo that as the Stone is when it comes from its Quarry, ſo it remains for ever after. I ſaw in Cozco, amongſt many Emeralds, two eſpecially of ſingular note, being of a perfect round ſhape, as big as ordinary Nuts, and bored through the middle; one of theſe Stones was complete, and in all parts perfect; the other in the middle, and at one of the corners, was perfect, and extremely beautifull; the other two parts, or corners, were not ſo pleaſing, being not come to their full beauty and perfection, howſoever were not much ſhort of the beſt; but the other which was oppoſite to it, was foul, and little worth, having received but a faint green, and ſuch as appeared worſe, by the beautifull luſtre of the others, ſo that it ſeemed a piece of green glaſs joyned to the Emerald. Wherefore the Maſter of that Stone cut off that part from the other, for which he was much blamed by curious and inquiſitive Men; who were of opinion, that for proof and evidence, that the Emerald grows by degrees to perfection in the Quarry; he ought to have permitted them to remain together; and that the curioſity of the thing would have been more valuable than the Stone it ſelf. I then being a Boy, they gave me that part which was cut off to play with, which I ſtill keep, not being of any value.

The Torquoiſe is a Stone of a blew colour, ſome of them of a more deep azure, and finer than the others, but not ſo much eſteemed by the Indians as the Emerald.

Pearls were not much uſed or worn in Peru, though they had a knowledge of them: the reaſon was, becauſe the Incas, who were always more tender of the welfare and ſafety of their people, than of their improvements in that which we call Riches, forbad them to expoſe themſelves to that danger which is required in fiſhing for Pearls, which therefore were not in uſe amongſt them. Since that time they are become ſo common, that Acoſta reports thus of them, which words we ſhall rehearſe verbatim. "Since we have undertaken (ſaith he) to treat of the "principal Riches, which are brought from the Indies, we muſt not omit Pearls, "which the Ancients called Margarites; the value of which were at firſt ſo great, "that they were eſteemed Jewels fit and worthy onely for Princes and Royal Perſons: but now they are become ſo common, that even Neger Women wear "Strings of them. Then afterwards in another part of this Chapter, he proceeds, "and ſays, That Pearls are found in divers parts of the Indies; but the place, "where they abound moſt, is in the South-Sea, about Panama, where thoſe Iſlands "are, which are called the Pearl-Iſlands: but the beſt and greateſt quantity is found

" found in the North-Sea, near the River called Hacha, where I underſtood how " they fiſhed for them, and took them; which is done with the great labour and " hazard of thoſe poor people, who will dive ſix, nine, and ſometimes twelve " fathoms under water to gather the Oiſters, which include the Pearls, and grow " cloſe to the ſides of the Rocks; and having loaded themſelves at the bottom " of the Sea, they ariſe, and buoy up themſelves again to the ſurface of the wa- " ter, and emptying their ſhells which they bring up into their Canoes, they " then open them, and take out that Treaſure, which good fortune hath preſen- " ted to them: the coldneſs of the water at the bottom of the Sea is great, and " troubleſome to the Divers, but much more laborious to hold their breath for a " quarter of an hour, and ſometimes for a full half hour, during the time that " they remain under water; the which cannot be performed by any, but thoſe " who have accuſtomed themſelves to it from their infancy, and who uſe great " abſtinence, adventuring not to dive, but when they are faſting: Likewiſe " covetouſneſs in this people makes them the more abſtemious, though it be ne- " ver ſo grievous: they drudge for Pearls in divers manners, and find them in ſuch " quantities, that they now ſtring them in Neck-laces. In the year 1587, within " my memory, there came from the Indies, for the King's account, 18 Mark " weight of Pearl, with three other large Cheſts of the ſame, beſides 1264 Mark " weight for account of particular perſons, and ſeven other bags full not weigh- " ed: the report of which, at any other time, would have ſeemed incredible. Thus far are the Words of Acoſta, with which he concludes that Chapter.

And now hereunto I ſhall add two Stories about Pearls; one is, that about the year 1564, they brought ſo many Pearls to Sevil for the King's account, that being heaped up into a hoard like ſeed, they were ſet to ſale in groſs to the higheſt Bidder. Out-cry being made of the ſale to him that ſhould give moſt, and the price agreed; one of the King's Officers preſently offered to him that had bought them 6000 Ducats for his bargain; and a certain Merchant called Proſpero, who was skilled in that commodity, immediately laid down the Money; ſo the Pearls being ta- ken up, the firſt buyer remained contented with the advantage of 6000 Ducats, which he had gained for one word ſpeaking; and the other well ſatisfied with his bargain, hoping to get much more Money and benefit by ſo conſiderable a parcel of Pearls. The other Story is this: I knew a young Man in Spain of low condi- tion, and in great want; and though he were a Silver-ſmith by Trade, yet ha- ving no Stock to ſet up with, he worked as a Journey-man. This perſon lived in Madrid in the year 1562, and 63, and lodged with me at my Lodgings; and ob- ſerving him to play away all that he got by his work, I often chid him, and told him that I believed I ſhould one day ſee him in very great miſery: To which he replied, that his wants and miſeries could not be greater than they had been, when he came on foot, and onely with 14 * Maravedis in his pocket to Madrid. This fellow, to improve and better his fortune, reſolved to go to the Indies, and deal in Pearls, for I knew he had ſome skill in them: It happened that he was ſo ſucceſs- full in his Voyage, and in his profit, that he got an Eſtate of above thirty thou- ſand Ducats; and then to ſhew his Gallantry (for I knew both him and his Wife) he made him a large Coat of black Velvet, which he embroidered with fine Pearl before, at leaſt ſix fingers broad, and quite round the borders; which was very gallant, and agreeable to the new Mode; this Embroidery being valued at the leaſt in four thouſand Ducats. This Relation I have made, to ſhew the great quantities of Pearl, which have been brought from the Indies; beſides thoſe which we have mentioned in the third Book and fifteenth Chapter of our Hiſtory of Florida, which are found in many parts of that great Kingdom, particularly in that rich Temple of the Province called Cofachiqui; the 18 Mark weight of Pearl, be- ſides the two Cheſts which Acoſta mentions to have been brought for the King's ac- count, were all choice Pearls, and ſuch as at ſeveral times were culled out by the Indians, and ſet apart for the King's uſe and ſervice, to whom a fifth part belonged of all the Pearls which were taken, and accordingly delivered into the Royal Wardrobe; from whence they were given out for adorning a Manto and Petti- coat for the Image of our Lady of Guadalupe; embroderying a whole Suit, ſuch as the dreſs of her Head, Frontlets, Surcoat, hanging Sleeves, and hem of her Gar- ments, all with the fineſt ſort of Pearl ſet in Diamond-work: the Houſe, or Chair of State made for this Image, which were uſually of a darkiſh colour, were now covered with Rubies and Emeralds ſet in Gold; by which it was apparent, by whoſe whoſe command, and at whoſe charge thoſe Artiſts worked, and to whoſe ſervice the Catholick King did dedicate ſo great a Treaſure, which was immenſe, and beyond the abilities and magnificence of any other, than his onely who was Emperour of the Indies.

But to compute, and rightly to calculate the Riches of this Monarch, we ought to reade the fourth Book of Acoſta, wherein are ſuch ſtrange diſcoveries of things in the New World, as are almoſt incredible. Amongſt which I have been an eye-witneſs my ſelf at Sevil, in the year 1579, where I ſaw a Pearl, which a Gentleman, called Don Diego de Temez, brought from Panama, and deſigned for King Philip the Second: the Pearl was about the bigneſs of a Wallnut, and roundneſs of a Pigeon's Egg: it was valued in the Indies at twelve thouſand Pieces of Eight, which make fourteen thouſand four hundred Ducats. Jacomo de Treço of Milan, an excellent Artiſt and Jeweler to his Catholick Majeſty, eſteemed it at fourteen, thirty, fifty, and ſometimes at a hundred thouſand Ducats, that is, that it had no price; for in regard there was none like it in the World, and that there was none with which it might be compared, it was not capable of any eſtimation: In Sevil many went to ſee it for a ſight, giving it the Name of the Foreigner. A certain Italian Gentleman at that time went about that City, and bought up all the choiceſt Pearls he could find for account of a Great Lord in Italy; when having purchaſed a String, or Chain of the beſt; yet being compared and laid by the Foreigner, they ſeemed like ſo many little pebles of the Brook. Thoſe that knew, and were acquainted with Pearls, and pretious Stones, did aver, that it weighed 24 Quilats above any other that was ever known; but what that means, I am not skilfull enough to interpret. The Proprietor of this Pearl ſaid, that a little Neger Boy, which was not worth above a 100 Ryals, fiſhed the ſhell, wherein it was contained, out of the water; which was ſo cragged, and promiſed ſo little outwardly, that they were going to caſt it again into the Sea; but yielding unexpectedly ſo great a profit to the Maſter, he was pleaſed in reward for the benefit to give liberty to the Slave; and in honour to the Maſter on whom fortune had beſtowed ſo great a Treaſure, the Inhabitants of Panama were pleaſed to make him their High Conſtable: the Pearl was never poliſhed, becauſe the Maſter would never conſent that it ſhould be touched, unleſs it were to bore a hole through it; for they never attempt to alter the faſhion or ſhapes of them, but ſtring them as they come from the ſhells; ſo that ſome of them come out very round, others long, others flat, others round of one ſide, and flat on the other; but thoſe vvhich are in faſhion of a Pear, are moſt eſteemed, becauſe they are not common: When a Merchant hath got one of this ſhape, he preſently enquires, and makes ſearch for another vvhich is like it; for being vvell matched, they riſe double in their price; ſo that vvhen a Pearl, being ſingle, is valued at a hundred Ducats; being aftervvards vvell matched vvith another, doth preſently double its price, and both give a value to each other, becauſe they are made the more fit for Chains and Neck-laces, for vvhich they are principally deſigned. Pearl is of a nature vvhich vvill admit of no poliſhing, being compoſed of a certain ſhell, or tunicle, vvhich covers it, and vvhich decays vvith time, loſing much of its luſtre and brightneſs vvhich it had at firſt; hovvſoever, vvhen they take off the upper coat, or tunicle, of the decayed part, that vvhich is under appears as oriental as it did at firſt, but yet vvith great damage to the Pearl, being conſiderably leſſened, at leaſt one third of its bigneſs: Hovvſoever, the beſt ſort of Pearls do never decay, and may be excepted from this general rule.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of Gold and Silver.

Spain it ſelf is a ſufficient witneſs of the Gold and Silver which comes from Peru, conſidering that for the twenty five years laſt paſt, (beſides what hath been formerly carried) there hath been every year tranſported twelve or thirteen Millions, according to Regiſter, beſides that which hath paſſed without account. There is Gold found in all the parts of Peru, ſome more, and ſome leſs generally in every Province. It is found on the top or ſurface of the Earth, carried by ſtreams and currents, and waſhed down by great flouds of Rain, which the Indians gather and put into water, ſeparating it from the Earth, as the Silver-ſmiths do the filings, which fall in their ſhops. That which is found in this manner, is called Gold in duſt, becauſe it is like filings; ſome of which are indifferently big, and about the faſhion of a Mellon-ſeed, ſome are round, and others of an oval form; all the Gold of Peru is about eighteen or twenty Quilats, more or leſs, in goodneſs, onely that which comes from the Mines of Callavaya, or Callahuaya, is of the fineſt ſort, being twenty four Quilats and better, as I have been informed by ſome Gold-ſmiths in Spain. In the year 1556, there was digged out of the veins of a Rock in the Mines of Callahuaya, a piece of Gold Ore, of the bigneſs of a Man's head, in colour like the Lungs of a living creature, and indeed did ſomething reſemble it in the ſhape, having certain Perforations through it from one end to the other; in all which holes there appeared little kernels of Gold, as if melted Gold had been dropped into them, ſome of them being outwardly in knobs, and others more inward: Thoſe that underſtood the nature of Mines, were of opinion, that had that piece of Ore been ſuffered to remain, it would all with time have been turned into perfect Gold. In Cozco the Spaniards looked upon it as ſtrange and unuſual, and the Indians called it Huaco, as they did every thing which was wonderfull, and worthy of admiration; the which word alſo was uſed by them when any thing was abominable, or deteſtable in its kind. The Maſter of this piece of Ore determined to carry it with him into Spain, and preſent it to King Philip the Second as a curioſity greatly to be eſteemed: But I was informed by thoſe who were in the ſame Fleet with him, that the Ship in which that perſon embarked was caſt away, and that he was drowned, and all his treaſure, with much more, periſhed with him.

The Silver is digged with much more labour than Gold, and refined with much more charge and difficulty: There are many Mines in divers parts of Peru, but none like thoſe of Potoſi, the which were diſcovered in the year 1545, being about fourteen years after the Spaniards firſt poſſeſſed that Countrey, as appears by the Record. The Mountain in which theſe Mines ariſe, is called Potoſi; but why it is ſo named, I cannot tell, unleſs it hath ſome ſignification in the proper Language of that Countrey; for in the general Speech of Peru it hath none. It is ſituated in the midſt of a Plain, in form of a Sugar-loaf, is about the compaſs of a League at the bottom, and a quarter of a League towards the top, it is round, and very pleaſant to behold, ſtanding alone, and ſingle in a Plain; which Nature hath adorned and beautified, having added comelineſs to that fame, which its Riches hath made renowned, and eſteemed in the World. Some Mornings it appears with a cap of Snow, the Climate thereabouts being ſomething cold. That Mountain in the diviſion which was firſt made fell to the ſhare of Gonçalo Piçarro, and afterwards to Pedro Hinojoſa; as we ſhall hereafter declare, in caſe we may be ſo free, as to bring to light ſome hidden and ſecret practices contrived in the times of War, which Hiſtorians do often omit; fearing to diſparage the Actions of great Men, and thereby create enmity and diſpleaſure to themſelves.

Acoſta in his fourth Book writes at large of Gold, and Silver, and Quick-ſilver, of which every day there are Mines diſcovered in that Empire, ſo that I ſhall not need to write of them; onely I ſhall mention ſome few remarkable things concerning thoſe Metals, and how the Indians melted, and founded them before the Spaniards niards found out the use of Quick-silver; and refer the Reader, to satisfie his curiosity to that History of Acosta, in which he writes of all these Metals, and particularly of the Nature of Quick-silver, at large. 'Tis observable that the Mines of the Mountain Potosi were first discovered by certain Indians, who were Servants to Spaniards, called in their Language Yanacuna; who under the seal of friendship, and promise of secrecy, kept it concealed for some time, enjoying to themselves the benefit of the first discovery; but finding the Riches immense, and difficult to be hidden, they could not, or would not, conceal the intimation thereof from their Masters, who opening the first vein of Ore, found passage to a greater Treasure. Amongst those Spaniards, to whom this booty and fortunate lot happened, there was one called Gonçalo Bernal, who was afterwards Steward to Pedro de Hinojosa; this Man discoursing some short time after the discovery of this Mine, with Diego Centeno, a Gentleman of Quality, and other Noble persons, concerning the rich and spreading veins of this Mountain, declared it to be his opinion, that in case this Mine were digged, and the Silver melted, which it would produce, that Silver would become more common, and less valuable than Iron. The which assertion I have seen made good in the years 1554, and 55, when in the War of Francisco Hernandez Giron, an Iron Horse-shoe was worth five Pieces of Eight, or six Ducats, and a Shoe for a Mule rated at four Pieces of Eight, and two Nails for shoing valued at a Tomin, or * fifty five Maravedis. I have seen a pair of Buskins, or Spatterlashes, sold at thirty six Ducats; a Quire of Paper for four Ducats; an Ell of Valentia Cloth, dyed in grane, at sixty Ducats; and according to this rate, all the fine Cloths made of Sigovia Wool, their Silks, Linen, and other Merchandises of Spain, were estimated: but the War was the cause of this dearness, because in the space of two years, that it continued, there arrived no Ships in Peru with the Commodities of Spain. Moreover, the great abundance of Silver which those Mines yielded, caused it to be cheap, and of no esteem; that a Basket of Cuca came to be worth thirty six Ducats, and a Bushel of Wheat valued at twenty four or twenty five Ducats; at like rates they sold their Mayz, and all their commodities for Shoes and Cloathing; and their Wine also was sold at excessive prizes, untill such time as it came to be imported in greater quantities: And though this Countrey be rich, and abounding with Gold, Silver, and pretious Stones, yet the Natives are the most poor and miserable people in all the World.

* About ten pence.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Quick-silver; and how they melted their Ore before they discovered that Mineral.

WE have in the foregoing part of this History signified, that the Incan Kings had a knowledge of Quick-silver, but were unacquainted with the Nature, or Use of it, and onely admired the lively and quick motions of it; howsoever, having observed some certain noxious qualities and effects it produced, such as stupefactions, palsies, and tremblings of the Nerves, the Kings, whose chief care was the safety of their people, (for which reason one of their Titles was, Lovers of the Poor) did absolutely forbid their Subjects to use or meddle with it; and they being possessed with an apprehension of its noxious qualities, abhorred it to that degree, as not to think it worthy of their thought or word; so that they had no name for Quick-silver, unless they have coined one for it since the Spaniards in the year 1567, made a discovery of it; and if they had any before, they had certainly forgot it, as Men are liable to doe, who have no knowledge or practice of letters. That which the Incas used and permitted to their Subjects, was a sort of Earth of a pure Vermilion-colour beyond expression, found in dust within the Mines of Quick-ſilver; the Indians call it Ychma; that which Acoſta calls Llimpi is of a Purple-colour, and extracted from other Mines; for in thoſe Countries they have Earth of all colours, which ſerve us for Painting: But as to this curious Crimſon with which the Indians are ſo much affected, it is alſo forbidden to be extracted without licence, leſt the people venturing themſelves far into the Caverns of the Earth in the ſearch of it, ſhould prejudice their healths, and endanger their lives; and therefore the uſe of it is forbidden to the common people, and onely permitted to Ladies of the Royal Bloud; Men never uſe it, nor Women in years, but ſuch onely as are young and handſome; who do not lay it upon their Cheeks, as our Women do in Spain, but onely draw it in ſtreaks about the breadth of a ſtraw, from the corners of their Eyes to their Temples; and in this manner it ſeemed very becoming. Other Fucus, or Painting, than this with Ychma, the Pallas or great Ladies did not uſe, nor was it their adornment of every days dreſs, but onely then, when they would appear fine and well dreſſed upon the days of the principal Feaſts, when they always waſhed their Faces very clean, as alſo did all the common people. But the truth is, thoſe Women who did much avail themſelves of their beauty, and clearneſs of their skin, would for conſervation thereof, lay a ſort of white ſtuff like Milk upon it, (of what they made it, for my part I cannot tell;) but there they let it ſtick, and remain for the ſpace of nine days, at the end of which being well dried, like a ſcurf on the skin, they would then take it off, and the complexion would remain much more bright and clear than before: But as to the Ychma, the Prohibition that was made againſt extracting of it, cauſed it to be ſcarce, and of little uſe. And whereas a certain Authour ſays, that the Indians did uſually paint their faces in the Wars, and at their Feſtivals, it is a groſs miſtake, though perhaps ſome Nations might doe it, which were eſteemed the moſt ſalvage and barbarous.

And now we are to declare how they melted their Silver, before they found the uſe of Quick-ſilver: the manner was this. Near to the Mountain Potocchi, or Potocſi, (which is all one) there is another Mountain in the ſame form and ſhape, but not ſo great, nor ſo high, called by the Indians Huayna Potocſi, or the Potocſi the Junior, as if they were Father and Son. The Silver, for the moſt part, is extracted from Hatun Potocſi, or the Elder Potocſi; in melting of which, they at firſt found great difficulty, for not being able to make it run, it burnt away, or evaporated in ſmoak; of which the Indians could not penetrate the cauſe, nor diſcover a remedy. But as neceſſity and covetouſneſs make Men ingenious and contriving, ſo particularly the Indians were infinitely induſtrious to find out ſome way to Melt their Gold and Silver; at length, after many experiments, they happened to try the melting of a baſer ſort of Metal, which the leſſer Potocſi produced, conſiſting, for the moſt part, of Lead mixed with Silver; the which yielding more eaſily, melted, and run; and this being put into the Melting-pots, together with the fine Silver and Gold, would immediately cauſe them to melt and diſſolve; for which reaſon the Indians gave it the Name of Curuchec, which ſignifies any thing that diſſolves. In the melting of which Metals, they obſerved a certain proportion of this courſer ſort, for to ſo much Silver they put ſuch a quantity of this Curuchec, according as time and experience had informed their judgments; for all ſorts of Silver were not of the ſame fineneſs, though digged and extracted from the ſame vein; ſo that according to the quality and richneſs of the Metal, the quantity of Curuchec was to be applied. The Silver being thus mixed with more fuſible Metal, they melted it down in Earthen or Clay-pots, or Cryſobles, which they carried from place to place: But in regard they had no uſe of Bellows to make the heat of their fire more intenſe, nor yet uſed Copper Pipes, which we have formerly mentioned, wherewith to blow the fire; it often happened, that they could not poſſibly cauſe their Silver to melt; of which the Indians not being able to comprehend the reaſon, did at length conclude, that it muſt be a natural blaſt of Wind which muſt doe this work: But then if the Wind were too ſtrong, it would blow away the Coles, and cool the Metal, ſo that a temperate and eaſie gale was requiſite: To procure which, their cuſtome was to go upon the Hills by night, obſerving how the Winds ſate, and there placed their Melting-pots at ſuch a height, higher or lower, according as they perceived the force of the Wind. It was a pleaſant ſight in thoſe days to ſee eight, ten, twelve or fifteen thouſand of theſe Fires burning all at the ſame time, upon the ſides of theſe Mountains ranged in order one by the other. The firſt Melting of the Ore was made in this manner on the Mountains;

but then the ſecond time they founded it again in their Houſes, blowing the fire, as we have ſaid, with the Pipes of Copper, when they made ſeparation of their Lead from their Silver. For in regard the Indians had not the knowledge of all thoſe inventions, which the Spaniards have attained in the Art of ſeparating Gold, and Silver, and Lead, performed by Aqua fortis, and other Ingredients; their way was by often Melting, to burn out the Lead, and ſo refine: By which we may obſerve, that the Indians had ſome knowledge of refining the Silver of Potoſi, before the diſcovery of Quick-ſilver; and ſtill conſerve that Art, though not ſo commonly or frequently known amongſt them as formerly.

The Maſters and Owners of the Mines, perceiving that by this way of Melting by natural Winds, their Goods and Riches were divided, and much embezelled by being diſperſed into ſeveral hands; wherefore to remedy this inconvenience, they employed Day-labourers, who were Indians, to dig and extract the Metal; and then the Spaniards themſelves melted down their own Silver; whereas before the Indians having extracted the Ore, for every hundred weight thereof agreed and ſtipulated with their Maſters to return them ſuch a quantity of Silver. By this good husbandry, and by the improvements they had made in the Art of Melting, they made great Bellows, which being placed at a diſtance, would blow their fires into an extremity of flame. But this neither proving a ready way, they made an Engine with Wheels, carried about with Sails like a Wind-mill, or turned by Horſes; which fanned and blowed the fire with great violence. Nor did this neither doe the work, ſo that the Spaniards deſpairing of the ſucceſs of their inventions, made uſe of thoſe which the Indians had framed and contrived; and ſo things continued for 22 years, untill the year 1567, when by the wit and induſtry of a certain Portugal, named Henrique Garces, a great plenty of Quick-ſilver was diſcovered in the Province of Huanca, ſurnamed Villca, which ſignifies Greatneſs, or Eminence; I know not for what reaſon, unleſs it be for the great abundance of Quick-ſilver which that Countrey yielded; which is ſo neceſſary in the founding of Metals, that without it there is great waſte and conſumption; and which hath been ſo uſefull, that eight thouſand Quintals of it have every year been ſpent in the ſervice of his Majeſty; and yet notwithſtanding this great plenty of Quick-ſilver which was diſcovered, the Spaniards were for ſome time ignorant of the uſe which might be made thereof in the more eaſie extracting of their Silver; nor had they for the ſpace of four years after any good Aſſay-Maſter, untill the year 1571, when a certain Spaniard named Fernandez de Velaſco, who had lived at Mexico, and learned the manner of extracting the Silver with Quick-ſilver, came to Peru, and taught the uſe of it to them there. As Acoſta more largely and curiouſly relates, to whom I refer the Reader, who deſires to be informed of many rarities and matters of this nature worthy to be known.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. I.

Huayna Capac caused a Chain of Gold to be made as big as a Cable; and his Reasons for it.

THE puissant and powerfull Huayna Capac being absolute Lord of his Empire, employed the first year of his Reign in performing the Funeral Solemnities of his deceased Father; and then afterwards, to the great joy and satisfaction of his people, made his progress in visiting divers parts of his Empire; and everywhere as he passed, the Curacas came forth to meet and receive him, and the people strowed their ways with Flowers, and made Triumphal Arches with Canes and Rushes, covered with Roses and Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs; all places resounded with loud Acclamations of the people, repeating the August Titles of the Inca, especially the Name of Huayna Capac, Huayna Capac, which they often echoed, as that which contained most of Grandeur and Renown; the which he having deserved from his infancy, did now, as they believed, merit a greater advance of Adoration, being placed in degree of a God. Acosta writing in the 24th Chapter of his sixth Book in commendation of this Prince, hath these words: " This Huayna Capac was adored by his people in his life-time for a " God, and with that divine Worship which was never before used towards his " Ancestours, as ancient Men still living do remember, and relate of their own " knowledge. As this Huayna Capac had newly begun to make his Journey into divers parts of his Empire, news was brought him, that he had a Son and Heir born, who was afterwards called Huascar Inca: This Child being greatly desired, filled all the Court with joy; and was so pleasing to his Father, that he returned to Cozco, to be present at the Entertainments which were made for celebrating the Festivals of his Son's Nativity, and was there received with all the evidences of joy, and cordial welcome, as could be possibly expressed. This Solemnity being past, which lasted for twenty days; the Inca, out of the abundance of joy, which he conceived for the Birth of an Heir, began to entertain thoughts of doing and contriving something extraordinary, and never before invented against the time that his Son was to be weaned, at which time they cut off his first lock of Hair, and gave him his Name, which, as we have said in the former part of this History, was the most solemn Festival that they kept, being observed by all sorts of people, from the King to the Beggar; every one having a share, and being concerned in the Birth and Welfare of the Prince, who who was Heir. Amongſt divers other particulars of Greatneſs, in an extraordinary part inſtituted for celebration of this Feſtival, one was a Chain of Gold of that wonderfull bigneſs, as made it famous by report through the whole World, and yet was never ſeen by Foreigners, whoſe Avarice was as ſtrong as their curioſity to ſee a piece of ſuch magnificence; the deſign which the Inca had to make it, was this: In the Countries of Peru every Province or Nation had Dances properly belonging to their Countrey, different from others, by which they were diſtinguiſhed one from the other, as much as by the Dreſs upon their Heads; and theſe Dances were always conſtant, and the ſame, without any change or alteration of new Modes. The Incas had a ſort of Dance which was grave and decent, without jumping, or capring, as others uſed. Their Cuſtome was for the Men to dance without admitting the Women into the Ring, and to claſp hands one with the other, reaching them out to the foremoſt, untill all were entred in, and chained as it were one to the other, ſo that ſometimes two or three hundred Men were concerned in the Dance, according to the number of thoſe preſent at the Feſtival; the which they began at ſome diſtance from the King, before whom they preſented it. Their manner was to begin all at the ſame time, and to make three ſteps by rule, the firſt was back, and then two others forward, like the Chaſes and Coupees that we uſe in our Spaniſh Dances; ſo that giving but one ſtep backward, and two forward, they ſtill gained ground, untill they came to the middle of the place, where the Inca ſate: as they danced they ſang by turns, not to tire themſelves, ſo much as they would do, in caſe they all ſang together; their Tunes were according to the meaſure of their Dances, and the ſubjects of their Songs were in praiſe of the preſent Inca, and his Anceſtours, and thoſe of the Bloud Royal, and of their Actions and Exploits performed in the times of Peace and War. The Incas alſo there preſent, and ſtanding about the King, bore their part in the Conſort, as thoſe who were equally concerned in the merriment, and the King himſelf danced ſometimes, to render the Feſtival more ſolemn.

From this manner of claſping and linking hands one within another, the Inca Huayna Capac took his invention of making his Chain of Gold, eſteeming that it would be much more ſtately and majeſtical to have theſe Dancers linked and faſtened one to the other by this Chain, rather than by their hands. The particulars of this Chain I did not hear from common report, but from my Old Uncle, whom I mentioned at the beginning of this Hiſtory, who being a Perſon much pleaſed with the remembrance of old Stories, told me that this Chain was ſo long, as would reach the length and breadth of the chief Market-place of Cozco, where they danced at the time of all their principal Feaſts; and though it was not neceſſary to have it ſo long in reſpect to the Dance, onely the Inca was pleaſed to order it of that length, for greater State, and in honour to the Feſtival of his Son and Heir, in which nothing was to be deficient which might render it great and ſolemn. I ſhall not need to inform and trouble thoſe who have ſeen and meaſured that Market-place, with an account of the length and breadth of it; howſoever to ſatisfie the curioſity of ſuch as have not been there, I dare to affirm, that that place North and South is two hundred common Paces in length, allowing two Foot for every Pace, and an hundred and fifty Paces Eaſt and Weſt in breadth, taking in thoſe Houſes which the Spaniards in the Year 1556. when my Maſter Garcilaſſo de la Vega was Chief Juſtice, had built on the ſide of the River; ſo that this Chain muſt have been three hundred and fifty Paces long, which make ſeven hundred Foot; and when I asked the ſame Indian of the compaſs of this Chain, he held up his Hand, pointing to his Wriſt, ſignifying that every Link was of that bigneſs. The Accountant General Auguſtine Carate, in the 14th Chapter of his firſt Book, having at any time occaſion to ſpeak of the Riches of the Royal Palaces belonging to the Incas, reckons up vaſt Treaſures, and almoſt incredible, but I ſhall onely repeat what he ſays particularly of this Golden Chain, which I have extracted verbatim.

Guaynacava

" Guaynacava, when he had a Son born, cauſed a Golden Chain of that weight to " be made, (as many Indians ſtill alive can teſtifie) that being faſtened to the Ears " or Luggs of two hundred Indians, it could ſcarcely be raiſed by them; and in me- " mory of this remarkable Fabrick of Gold; the Child's Name was called Guaſca, " which in their Language ſignifies a Rope, or Cable, with the additional Title " of Inca. And thus far are the Words of that noble Hiſtorian of Peru.

This rich and magnificent piece of Gold, together with other vaſt Treaſures, the Indians made away with, or concealed, ſo ſoon as the Spaniards invaded their Countrey, and ſo confounded them beyond all recovery, that no knowledge or intimation remains where any part of them is to be found: And in regard this rich and ſtately piece of Gold was compounded and framed onely for that time when the Prince an Heir was to have his Lock cut, and his Name impoſed; they ſurnamed him Huaſcar, adding it to his other Names of Ynti Cuſi Hualpa; and be- cauſe Huaſca ſignifies a Rope or Cable, (for in the Language of Peru they have no Word for a Chain,) they, for better Grace of the Word, added R. the which took ſo much with his Subjects, that they for the moſt part called him Huaſcar, omitting Ynti Cuſi Hualpa, which Word Hualpa ſignifies the Sun of Chearfulneſs. For whereas in thoſe days the Incas became very potent, and that power for the moſt part raiſes in Men a Spirit of Pride and Vanity; ſo they began to be weary of thoſe ordinary Titles, which anciently expreſſed their Grandeur and Majeſty; and expected other Hyperbolies and Exaltations of Divine Attributes, which might raiſe them to the Heavens, and make their adoration equal to that of their God the Sun. So they called him Ynti, which ſignifies the Sun, or Phœbus, Cuſi Chearfulneſs, Pleaſure, Contentment or Rejoycing. And thus much ſhall ſerve in Explanation of the Names and Titles of the Inca Huaſcar. Let us now return to his Father Huayna Capac, who having given order for the making of this Chain, and left ſufficient directions for the faſhion and ſize thereof, (that ſo it might be ready againſt the time that his Child was to be weaned,) he proſecuted the De- ſign he had already began, of making a Viſit to the remote parts of his Empire; the which having finiſhed in the ſpace of two Years, being about the time that his Child was to be weaned, he returned to Cozco, where all things were prepa- red that could be contrived to make this Feaſt ſolemn, and joyfull, and full of di- vertiſement; and then the Child received the Name of Huaſcar.

CHAP. II.

Ten Vallies of the Coaſt are reduced, one after the other, as they lay in order; and Tumpiz ſurrenders of it ſelf.

A Year being paſt after this Solemnity, Huayna Capac ordered that an Army of forty thouſand Men ſhould be raiſed, with which he marched into the Kingdom of Quitu, taking the Eldeſt Daughter of the King of that Countrey which he had Conquered, to be his Concubine, during the time of that Expedition; but firſt to prepare and hallow her, ſhe was ſent to remain ſome days in the Houſe of the Select Virgins. By this Woman he had Atahualpa, and his Brothers, as we ſhall ſee by the ſequel of this Hiſtory. From Quitu the Inca deſcended into the Plains by the Sea-coaſt, and in proſecution of his Conqueſts he came to the Valley called Chimu, now Trugillo, which was the ultimate bounds to which his Grandfather the good Inca Tupanqui had proceeded, as we have already mentioned. From thence he ſent his Heralds with the accuſtomary Summons and Offers of Peace and War to the Inhabitants of the Valley of Chacma, and Paſcaſmayu. Theſe people having long been Borderers and Neighbours to the Subjects of the Inca, had from them been informed of the gentleneſs of their Kings, and the advantage of their Government, and therefore from a quick ſenſe of ſo much felicity, returned anſwer, That they deſired nothing more than to be Subjects to the Inca, to obey his Laws, and be ruled by him. All the other eight Vallies followed the Example of theſe two adjoining Provinces, being ſituate between Paſaſmayu, and Tumpiz, and are theſe which follow, namely Canna, Collque, Cintu, Tucmi, Sayanca, Mutupi, Puchin and Sullana; in the ſettlement of which Countries, and in the improvement of them with good Husbandry, and in making Aqueducts to water their Glebe-lands and Paſturage, two years were ſpent, rather than in the Conqueſt or Subjection of them, for they chearfully, and with free Will ſurrendred themſelves to the Inca. During which time the Inca relieved his Forces three or four times, for in regard the Air of that Countrey was hot and moiſt, and conſequently unwholſome, he judged it fit for the better health of his Subjects, to change his Guards frequently, that ſo the Diſeaſes of the Countrey might not enter the Camp, before they were again relieved by an exchange of freſh Men.

The Inca having ſubjected theſe Vallies, returned to the Kingdom of Quitu, where he remained for the ſpace of two Years, that ſo he might adorn that Countrey with ſumptuous Edifices, and ſtately Aqueducts, wherewith he advantaged, and obliged that people. After which he commanded a levy to be made of fifty thouſand Souldiers, which being raiſed and armed, he marched with them along the Sea-coaſt, untill they came to the Valley of Sullana, which is the neareſt Sea to Tumpiz; from whence he ſent his uſual Summons, and Offers of Peace and War. The Inhabitants of Tumpiz were a ſort of people more luxurious in their Diet and Habit, than all thoſe who live on that Coaſt, and had already ſubmitted to Obedience of the Incas; their manner was to wear a Garland on their Heads by way of diſtinction, which they called Pillu. Their Caciques or Lords maintained Buffoons, Jeſters, Dancers, and Singers, for their Paſtime and Divertiſement; but their Religion yet was vile and baſe, for they adored Tigers and Lions, and offered the Bloud and Hearts of Men in Sacrifice; they were ſerved and obeyed with great Fear and Awe by their own Subjects, and feared by Strangers; howſoever being poſſeſſed with dreadfull Apprehenſions of the Inca, they had no heart nor courage to make oppoſition againſt him, and therefore returned ned Anſwer to his Heralds, that they were with all willing obedience ready to receive him for their Lord and Emperour: The like Anſwer was made by the Inhabitants of the Vallies upon the Coaſt, and other In-land Nations called Chunana, Chintu, and Collonche, Jaquall, and others, ſeated on the neighbouring parts.

CHAP. III.

Of the puniſhment inflicted on thoſe who killed the Officers of Tupac Inca Yupanqui.

THE Inca being entred into Tumpiz, raiſed a ſtrong Fortreſs, and put a conſiderable Garriſon into it; he built alſo a Temple for the Sun, to which he adjoined a Houſe for the Select Virgins; the which Work being finiſhed, he paſſed forward into the Countrey of thoſe who had ſlain the Captains, Inſtructors, and Doctors of Religion, which his Father Tupac Yupanqui had formerly ſeated in that Countrey, for the better Government and Erudition of that people, as we have formerly mentioned. In memory of which treacherous Villany Huayna Capac ſent his Meſſengers to them, commanding them immediately to repair to his Court, to render an Account of the wickedneſs they had perpetrated; and though they were conſcious of the Fact, and trembled with the thoughts of the puniſhment they had deſerved, yet they durſt not refuſe, or neglect the Summons, and therefore in due ſenſe of their demerit they humbly approached the Inca, caſting themſelves with all ſubmiſſion at his Feet. The Inca hereupon aſſembled all the Curacas, Ambaſſadours, Counſellours, and Nobles, who were preſent at that Meeting, when his Father, at their requeſt, ſent his Officers and Inſtructors amongſt them, the which they had treacherouſly murthered; and all of them appearing before him, a certain Colonel of the Army ſtood up, and made a Speech to them in behalf of the Inca; and in the firſt place upbraiding them with treachery, breach of their Faith, and cruelty, he accuſed them of Ingratitude, and want of Underſtanding; for that whereas they ought to have adored the Inca and his Officers, for withdrawing them from their brutiſh and beſtial Life, to live like Men, with all the Comforts and Enjoyments of a rational Being; they on the contrary had barbarouſly and cruelly murthered the Authours and Inſtruments of their Felicity, to the great diſhonour of the Sun his Father; for which offence they had deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment, that if their whole Nation of both Sexes, and all ages were extirpated, and their Race extinguiſhed, they were not able with the effuſion of all their Bloud, to make expiation for this heinous crime. But in regard that Huayna Capac was an Inca to whoſe Nature Mercy and Clemency were moſt agreeable, and whoſe Title it was to be a Lover of the Poor, he did freely forgive all the common people; and as to thoſe Authours and Contrivers of this Murther, though they had all deſerved Death, yet he was contented to decimate them, and every tenth Man to die, as his Lot ſhould fall upon him, that ſo it might be evident, that the Inca had no Spleen or Hatred to any in particular, but onely to puniſh Offenders, as Truth and Juſtice required. And farther, that a Mark and Teſtimony of this Treachery might remain in the Memory of future Ages, the Inca commanded that the Curacas, and principal Perſonages of the Nation, Huancavillca, ſhould have two of their Teeth drawn from above, and two from beneath, and for ever to be ſo continued to them, and their Poſterity, and to remain as a Mark whereby to reproach the falſity of the Words pronounced with their Mouths, and the breach of the Promiſe of Fidelity and Vaſſalage made to his Father Tupac Yupanqui.

Theſe Nations received the Sentence and Execution of Juſtice with great Humility and Reſignation; eſteeming themſelves very happy that the Infliction of their puniſhment was no greater, fearing that it might have extended to a general Maſſacre of them all who were concerned in this Treachery; for ſince the time that the Empire of the Incas began to be dilated, nothing was puniſhed with ſo much ſeverity as Rebellion; which Crime being complicated with the vile ſin of Ingratitude, made the puniſhment inflicted ſeem eaſie, and not bear an equality with what the offence deſerved; ſo that when the whole Nation of Huanca-villca was puniſhed for all the reſt, they ſupported the Sentence with Patience and Moderation; and their Curacas and Captains, willingly conſented to have their Teeth drawn; and to ſhew their readineſs herein, they made it the Badge and Diſtinction of their Nation, drawing out the upper and nether Teeth of their Children, ſo ſoon as having ſhed them, they were grown again; whereby it is obſervable, that rude and barbarous People are as well pleaſed with Moderation in the Execution of Puniſhment, as others are in the Exceſſes of Benefits.

I was once acquainted with an Indian Woman of Huancavillca in Cozco, who recounted unto me at large all this Story; the Men and Women, (as ſhe ſaid) of that Countrey, did uſually boar their Noſtrils, for carrying Jewels of Gold and Silver in them; and I remember when I was a Child, that a Neighbour of ours, called Coca, had a Horſe of a Cheſnut colour, which being broken-winded, for his more eaſie breathing they ſlit his Noſtrils, with which Novelty the Indians being much pleaſed, they called the Horſe Huancavillca, in ſimilitude of one of that Nation.

CHAP. IV.

The Inca viſits his Empire, conſults the Oracles, and gains the Iſland of Puna.

THE Inca Huayna Capac having reduced thoſe Provinces, puniſhed the Offenders, and placed ſufficient Guards and Garriſons for ſubjecting the people, and keeping them in obedience, he returned to the Kingdom of Quitu, and thence taking a compaſs to the Southward, he proceeded to the Charcas by way of Cozco, being a Journey of above ſeven hundred Leagues in length. He alſo ſent viſitors to the Kingdom of Chili, from whence they brought much Gold to himſelf, as they had done to his Father; in which Travels he ſpent four Years, and then reſided two Years in Cozco. After which he raiſed fifty thouſand Souldiers out of the Diviſion of Chinchaſuyu, which is to the North of Cozco, commanding them to make their Rendezvous on the Frontiers of Tumpiz, whilſt he in Perſon deſcended into the Plains, to viſit the Temples of the Sun, of which there were many of great Devotion in thoſe parts. In the firſt place he went to the rich Temple of Pachacamac, whom they adored for the unknown God; and there commanding the Prieſts to conſult the Oracle, who was the Devil, concerning the happineſs of his Succeſſes, anſwer was made, that he ſhould proceed in his Enterpriſes, for he ſhould be proſperous in them, and in all others that he ſhould undertake; for that he was choſen for ſupreme Lord of all the four Quarters of the World. Hence he paſſed to the Valley of Rimac, where that famous prating Idol was ſeated, the which he conſulted in compliance with the Capitulations which his Great-grandfather had made with the Yuncas, of which one was, that that Idol ſhould be always conſerved by him in great veneration, and having received his Anſwer, which was full of Ambiguities and Flatteries, he proceeded forward to the Vallies which border upon Tumpiz; where being arrived, he diſpatched his accuſto-accuſtomary Summons of Peace and War to the Inhabitants of the Iſland of Puna, not far diſtant from the Main Land is a fruitfull ſoil abounding with all things neceſſary for humane Life. This Iſle contains about twelve Leagues in compaſs, the Lord of which was by Name Tumpalla, one of a proud and haughty Spirit; for having neither by himſelf nor Anceſtours acknowledged any Superiour, they domineered over their Neighbours, and thereby being at diſcord amongſt themſelves, were the leſs able to make head or reſiſtence againſt the Inca. Moreover this Tumpalla was vitious and luxurious in his Manners, and Way of living, for he kept many Wives, and Boys uſed after the faſhion of Sodomites; they ſacrificed the Bloud and Hearts of Men to their Gods; which were Tigers and Lions, and the Fiſh of that Coaſt, which, becauſe they yielded them Food in great abundance, were by them, as well as by the common Indians, adored for Deities. Theſe People, when they heard the Summons of the Inca, were greatly ſurpriſed and troubled; to which, that they might return their Anſwer, Tumpalla aſſembled the principal Perſons of his Iſland, and then with great ſorrow declared unto them, ſaying, Here now appears at the Gates of our Houſes a certain Tyrant, who threatens to take from us all our Goods and Eſtates, and to deſtroy us all, unleſs we readily receive him for our Lord and Maſter; and now in caſe we ſhould admit him, we muſt renounce our ancient Liberty, our Command and Principality, which for many Ages hath deſcended to us from our Anceſtours. Nor is this all, for this Foreigner not truſting to our Words and Fidelity, will compell us to labour, and erect Towers and Fortreſſes, and having put Garriſons into them will force us to maintain the Charge and Expence, that ſo we may never be in any capacity of recovering our Liberty. He will moreover ſeize upon the beſt of our Poſſeſſions, and take from us our Wives and Children, and the moſt beautifull of our Daughters; and what is moſt grievous, he will aboliſh our Laws, and ancient Cuſtoms, and in the place thereof impoſe new ones upon us, making us worſhip ſtrange Gods, and throw down our own, with which we have been acquainted; and in ſhort, live after their manner and pleaſure, which is the worſt of ſervitudes. Which being certainly our Caſe, I leave it to you to conſider, whether we had not better die, than be enſlaved, deſiring you to conſult and adviſe me what courſe is beſt to be taken in this exigence.

The Indians hereupon debating the matter amongſt themſelves, did greatly bewail their own weakneſs and inability to reſiſt ſo powerfull a Tyrant; and that the correſpondence between them and their Neighbours being very ill, there was no hopes of making a firm and faithfull Confederacy with them; in conſideration of which having no proſpect of defending themſelves, and that their reſiſtence would produce nothing but Ruine and Deſtruction, they concluded at laſt, that the leſs evil was to be choſen, which was to ſubmit to the Inca; and to make a Vertue of Neceſſity, to diſſemble a ready Obedience untill opportunity preſented, which might acquit them of their ſervitude. On this Reſolution Tumpalla did not onely render a very favourable and gentle Anſwer to the Meſſengers ſent by the Inca, but alſo diſpeeded Ambaſſadours in his own Name, and in behalf of all his Dominions, to him with preſents, humbly offering himſelf, and all his People, to his Obedience; beſeeching him to grace that Iſland, and his new Vaſſals, with the favour of his Royal Preſence, which would be the greateſt felicity that they could expect or imagine.

The Inca gratiouſly receiving this Addreſs of Tumpalla, ordered conveniences to be provided for paſſing his Army into the Iſland, that he might take poſſeſſion of the Countrey; all which being prepared with great punctuality, and in ſuch manner as the ſhortneſs of the time would permit, though not with ſuch Pomp and Oſtentation as Tumpalla did deſire, the Inca paſſed into the Iſland, where he was received with Feaſting, and Dancing, and new Songs, purpoſely compoſed in Praiſe and Honour of Huayna Capac, and his mighty Actions. His Lodgings were provided in a new Palace, lately built, for the Inca was not to ſleep in ſuch a Chamber where any other Perſon had repoſed. The Inca remaining here for ſome days, employed himſelf in giving out neceſſary Orders for the Government, by Laws, and the Inſtitution of his Religion, commanding the Inhabitants thereof, and all the Neighbours of the Main Land, bordering thereabouts, which conſiſted of divers Nations and Languages, that leaving the Worſhip of their former Gods, they ſhould forbear to ſacrifice the Bloud or Fleſh of Men, nor eat it, nor commit any other wickedneſs of this nature; but that they ſhould adore the Sun for their univerſal God, and live amongſt Mankind with Juſtice and Reaſon. All which the Inca, whoſe Father was the Sun, pronounced, as Legiſlator of that great Empire, from whoſe Words nothing was to be ſubtracted or diminiſhed upon pain of Death. To which Tumpalla and his People anſwered, that they would comply with whatſoever the Inca ſhould pleaſe to enjoin them.

The Solemnity of the Feſtival being paſt, which was provided for the more decent reception of the Inca, the Curacas had time to think upon what they had done, and conſidering more maturely of the rigour of the new Laws impoſed upon them, and how contrary they were to their ancient Cuſtoms, and reſtrictive of thoſe Paſtimes and Divertiſements they formerly enjoyed, they began already to eſteem a foreign Subjection grievous unto them; and ſo being deſirous to return to their old beſtiality, the Iſlanders and their Neighbours conſpired together to kill the Inca, and all his Army, in a treacherous manner, when the firſt occaſion ſhould occur. To which end they conſulted their Gods, privately reſtoring their Idols to ſome ſecret and convenient places, which that they might reconcile for the late affront offered them for their Revolt and Deſertion, they ſacrificed to them, demanding their Counſel and Advice, whether the Enterpriſe they had now deſigned ſhould be ſucceſsfull and proſperous, or not: To this demand the Devil gave them this Anſwer, That they ſhould go on and be proſperous. With which theſe Salvages became ſo proud and confident, that they had immediately proceeded to the Execution of it, had they not been diſſuaded by their Magicians and Diviners, who adviſed them to have patience for a while, for that their Gods were willing to defer the Execution untill a better and more ſecure opportunity.

CHAP. V.

The Iſlanders of Puna Maſſacre the People and Captains of Huaina Capac.

WHilſt Huayna Capac was ordering and diſpoſing Affairs for the better government of this People, and reducing them to a more political way of living, in the mean time the Curacas were meditating the manner how to execute their Treachery; an occaſion for which ſeemed to offer it ſelf, at the time when the Inca ſending his Captains and Miniſters with Commiſſion and Inſtructions, to inform and teach the Nations of the Main-land the Laws, Doctrines, Cuſtoms and Religion of the Incas, for he then withdrew his Forces from the Iſland, the Natives readily ſupplying Boats and Ferries to tranſport them into thoſe parts to which they were deſigned; which being performed, the Inca alſo returned to Tumpiz, on other important occaſions; for whereas theſe Princes employed their whole time to buſineſs for the better government of their People, they omitted nothing which might tend to their good, and to the happineſs of their living, and therefore might moſt juſtly be ſtiled Lovers of the Poor, and Guardians of their People.

So ſoon as the Inca was departed, his Captains and Officers prepared alſo for their paſſage, ordering Boats and Ferries for their tranſportations, the which were provided by the Natives, in ſo ſmall a number, as were not ſufficient to carry above half the People at a time, the which they purpoſely contrived, that ſo being being on the Water, they might be able to maſter that Party, and execute their Deſign, which was to kill them all: Wherefore one half being embarked together with their Luggage, or Baggage, which was great, for it appertained for the moſt part to Incas of the Bloud, who were near the Perſon of the King, and therefore carried many changes of Apparel with them, which were very fine: Theſe Traitors which conducted the Boats being come to ſuch a place of the Sea, where they had deſigned to execute their Treachery, cut the Cords and Ropes which bound the Timbers and Planks of the Boats together, which carried the Incas, with which all the Captains and Souldiers being plunged in the Sea, the Aſſaſſinates took up the Oars, and the Arms belonging to them, and therewith knocked them on the Head, not ſuffering one of them to eſcape with his Life. And though ſome of them endeavoured to ſave themſelves by ſwimming, for moſt of the Indians are very expert in that Art, yet it availed them little, for they were not ſuffered to come aſhore by the People of the Coaſt, who preyed upon them in ſuch manner, as the Maritime Creatures do upon thoſe of the Land. In this manner theſe Iſlanders having gained their Victory, and made themſelves Maſters of the Spoils, which were very great, they with much Joy and Triumph ſaluted one the other from Boat to Boat, applauding the contrivance and ſucceſs of their Deſign, with which they were ſo elevated, being an ignorant and ſottiſh People, that they believed they had now not onely ſecured their Liberty, but were able alſo to make themſelves Maſters of the Empire. With this vain opinion they returned to the Iſland, and with like Diſſimulation and Wickedneſs of Intention, took aboard the reſidue of the Captains and Souldiers, which remained for the ſecond adventure, whom having brought to the ſame place where the former Villany was perpetrated, they acted the like on them; and then returning home, they completed their Villany, by putting all the Governours and Miniſters to death, whom the Inca had left to doe Juſtice, and to overſee the Revenue belonging to the Sun, and to the Inca, the which they acted with incomparable Cruelty and Diſdain of the Royal Perſon of the Inca, placing the Heads of the murthered at the Gates of their Temples, and ſacrificing their Hearts and Bloud to their Idols, complying hereby with the Vows they had made to their Spirits and Devils, in caſe they would favour and proſper their Attempt.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Puniſhment which was inflicted upon theſe faithleſs Rebels.

THE ſad news of this unhappy ſucceſs being made known to Huayna Capac, he received it with as deep a ſenſe of trouble, as the loſs of ſo many Incas of the Bloud Royal, and of Men experienced in War and Peace did require, condoling much that their Bodies ſhould be caſt into the Sea, to be the Food and Prey of Fiſh; for which being full of ſorrow, he put himſelf into mourning Weeds, which amongſt them is a Clothing of a greyiſh colour, called Vellori. But the Anger and Indignation of the Inca ſoon overcame his ſorrow, for having aſſembled his People together, and provided all things neceſſary, he with the greateſt Expedition imaginable paſſed into the rebellious Provinces upon the Main-land, and with great facility ſubjected the Inhabitants, who were a ſilly people, without Counſel, Policy, or Military Art, whereby to defend themſelves.

From

From the Subjection of these people on the Main, the Inca passed into the Island, in his way whereunto he encountred a slight resistence on the Sea, but so inconsiderable and weak, that the Enemy was immediately overcome, and yielded to Mercy. Whereupon the Inca commanded all the principal Authours and Counsellours of this Design, together with the Captains, and Souldiers of chiefest note, who were in any wise concerned in this Treason, to be seized, and brought before his Tribunal of Justice; to whom one of the Generals made a grave Speech, representing to them the deformity of their Wickedness, aggravated with all the black circumstances that were possible; for that whilst the Inca was studying their good, and endeavouring to reclaim them from their bestial and brutish Life, that they might enjoy a condition more agreeable to a rational Being; that then they were contriving to disappoint his good Intentions by the worst and foulest Cruelties: Wherefore since Justice was to be performed, and that the Inca could not exercise that Clemency and Compassion which was natural to his Temper, they were to prepare themselves to receive a punishment agreeable to their demerit; upon which Sentence being passed, it was executed with divers sorts of Death, according as the Inca directed; that it might have some conformity to that kind of Cruelty which they acted on the people of the Inca, they threw some into the Sea, with great weights to sink them to the bottom; others they ran through the Body with their Lances, and pitched them on Spears before the Gates of their Temples; others were quartered after their Throats were cut; others they killed with their own Weapons, and others were hanged. Pedro de Cieça having at large described the particulars of this Rebellion, and the Revenge of it, writes afterwards these Words. "In this manner many thousands of Indi- "ans were killed and destroyed with different sorts of death; the principal Lea"ders of which Councils were either drowned or empaled. And after Huayna
"Capac had done Justice upon these Offenders, he commanded that this dismal
"story should be made the Subject of those Songs which were to be recited on "their days, and times of Calamity, which they in dolefull Ditties composed "in their Language and Proprieties of their Countrey. After which the Inca at"tempted to make a Causey over the River Guayaquile, which certainly was a "great and magnificent work, according to those remains which to this day ap"pear of it; but it was never finished according to the manner that he designed,
"being called to this day the Pass of Guayna Capa; all which being performed, "commands were given to obey the Governour who resided in the Fortress of "Tumbez, with other matters relating to Government; and so the Inca departed "from those Quarters. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Mutiny which aroſe amongſt the Chachapuyas, and the Valour of Huayna Capac.

WHilſt the King Huayna Capac was preparing for his return to Cozco, and to viſit ſeveral Kingdoms in his way, many Caciques, or Lords of thoſe Provinces adjoining to the Coaſt, which were reduced to the Obedience of the Empire, preſented themſelves with ſuch Gifts and Offerings as their Countries afforded; amongſt which they brought a Lion and a Tyger, both Creatures moſt fierce in their Nature, and which the Inca very much eſteeming, gave order that they ſhould be kept and nouriſhed with ſingular care; by which Creatures God was pleaſed to work ſo great a Miracle in favour of the Chriſtians, (as we ſhall hereafter relate) that they were adored by the Indians for it, and eſteemed like their Incas for Children of the Sun.

The Inca Huayna Capac having provided all things neceſſary for government of Affairs both in War and Peace, departed from Tumpiz, intending in his Journey to viſit one half of his Kingdom in length, as far as the Chicas, which is the ultimate Confines of Peru, and then taking a compaſs to viſit the other half, which lies to the Eaſtward. And being in the Countrey of the Chichas, he employed and ſubſtituted certain Viſitors to ſurvey the Kingdom of Tucma, called by the Spaniards Tucuman, and others to viſit Chile; and with them he ſent many Veſtments, of ſuch ſort as the Inca himſelf wore, and other Curioſities for the Governours, Captains, and other Miniſters of the King; as alſo for the Curacas, who were Natives of thoſe Countries, that ſo they might in the Name of the Inca oblige them with thoſe Preſents which were highly eſteemed. In his Journey from Cozco, and his return thither, he viſited the Fortreſs, which was then almoſt finiſhed, and the better to give Life and Encouragement to the chief Architects, and Labourers in the Work, he himſelf would lay his own hand to ſome part of the Edifice. This Viſitation or Progreſs being made, in which four Years were ſpent, he commanded Souldiers to be levied, for the farther Conqueſt of Tumpiz to the Northward, where it ſtretches it ſelf along the Sea-Coaſt; and whilſt he reſided in the Province of the Cannaris, which was the way, as he thought, that did lead to Quitu, that he might the better deſcend for Conqueſt of that Coaſt, News was brought to him, that the Inhabitants of the great Province of Chachapuyas, ſeeing him engaged in Wars and Conqueſts of great importance, took that opportunity to make a Rebellion; and confiding in the faſtneſs of their craggy and mountainous Countrey, and in the numbers of their People, which were ſturdy and ſtout, had made a general Maſſacre of all the Governours and Captains, and many of the Souldiery, which the Inca had appointed to preſide over them; and ſuch of the Souldiers, whom they had ſpared, they made Slaves to ſerve them in the baſeſt Drudgeries, and meaneſt Offices. So ſoon as this Intelligence was brought to the ears of Huayna Capac, with great anger and diſdain, he countermanded all his Troops from their march on the Sea-coaſt, and appointed them to bend their courſe towards the Chachapuyas, reſolving to puniſh them with the extremity of ſevere Juſtice; and he in perſon went to the place which he had appointed for the general Rendezvous; and whilſt his Army was gathering into a Body, he ſent his Summons to the Chachapuyas, requiring them to return to their Obedience, and declaring pardon to all ſuch as ſhould voluntarily ſubmit themſelves: but theſe brutiſh people inſtead of returning a ſubmiſſive and penitent Anſwer, treated the Meſſengers with indignities and opprobrious words, threatning them with Death, if they did not immediately depart; the which rude treatment the Inca highly reſenting, made all the ſpeed imaginable to unite his Forces, and having aſſembled and fitted his Army, he marched to a great River, where they found found many Boats made of a ſort of light and boyant Timber, which in the common Language of Peru are called Chuchau.

The Inca conſidering that it was neither honourable, nor decent for his Perſon, nor People, to paſs over the water in companies of five or ſix in a Boat, commanded that all theſe Boats ſhould be joined together, and linked one to one, by which means the Army might march over them in a more compact and conjoined Body, as over a Bridge, the which was ordered with ſo much Art and induſtry, that the Inca and his Army paſſed the Water in one days time; and then with all expedition marched in Battalia towards Caſſa Marquilla, which is the principal Province of that people, intending to deſtroy and conſume all before him; for as this Prince availed himſelf much in being eſteemed gentle, and gratious towards his good and loyal Subjects, ſo he deſired no leſs to render himſelf terrible to Rebels, Traitors, and Falſifiers of their Word.

Theſe Rebels being ſenſible of the juſt Anger of the Inca, and the power of his Army, and the puniſhment of their crime, which they too late repented; and alſo conſidering the rude and brutiſh terms and treatment they had uſed towards the Meſſengers, which brought the late Summons from the Inca, with which deſpairing of all favour and pardon, they reſolved to demoliſh their Houſes and Dwellings, and with their Wives and Children, and ſuch as were able to flee unto the Mountains. Howſoever the old people and infirm remaining behind, and being of more experience, and more conſiderate than the others, recalled to mind the late generoſity of this Huayna Capac, and the aſſurances they had, that he would never refuſe the Inſtances and Requeſts made him by a Woman, did therefore addreſs themſelves to a certain Matron, named Chachapuya, a Native of Caſſa Marquilla, who had formerly been the Wife of Tupac Inca Yupanqui the Great, beſeeching her that ſhe would with all the Prayers and Tears ſhe was able, endeavour to divert the preſent danger, and appeaſe the Wrath of the Inca, perſuading him notwithſtanding the late provocations, to receive the people to pardon and mercy, without which there could be no hopes, or other expectation than a total ruine and deſolation of that Province.

This Matron conſidering her ſelf involved with the her family in ſame Deſtruction, readily inclined to this good Office, and ſo with Women of all Ages, without admitting one man into their company, ſhe went forth to meet the Inca, whom finding about two Leagues diſtant from Caſſa Marquilla, ſhe boldly proſtrated her ſelf at his Feet, and with great preſence of mind, expoſtulated in this manner with him: Sir, ſaid ſhe, where is it you are going? Do not you conſider, that full of Rage and Indignation you are going to deſtroy that Province which your good Father gained, and added to his Empire? Conſider I beſeech you, that you are proceeding againſt the Rules of that Clemency and Piety which are natural to you, and that you are going to execute that Deſolation and Deſtruction in your anger, which you will repent with much remorſe, ſo ſoon as you return to your ſober and natural temper. Reflect I beſeech you on your Title of Huacchacuyac, which is a Lover of the Poor, and a Deliverer of the Diſtreſſed; the which generous Quality you cannot exerciſe at a more ſeaſonable time, when you may manifeſtly evidence to all the World the compaſſion you have for humane frailty. Remember, Sir, that your Father conquered this People, which, though unworthy ſuch a Patron, are yet your own, and therefore let not your Fury ſo far tranſport you in the puniſhment of this People, and in the unprofitable effuſion of their Bloud, which may blemiſh your ancient Praiſes, and eclipſe the bright character you have of being deſcended from the Sun your Father. Conſider that how much the greater the crime is which you pardon, ſo much the more will your Clemency and Piety bee exalted and admired, and the memory of your Anceſtours be rendred more pretious and glorious by the proof and exerciſe of this Vertue, which they have derived unto you. Wherefore my Petition is, that you would vouchſafe to receive this People unto pardon; and if not, that at leaſt ſince I am a Native of this Province, you would vent your Anger and Revenge firſt upon me, and thereby doe me that grace and favour, that I may not live to behold the entire Deſtruction of my People. The Matron having uttered theſe Words, was ſilent, and then all the other Women, that were with her, lifted up their Voices and Cries, repeating often the Titles of the Inca, ſaying, O thou Child of the Sun, thou Lover of the Diſtreſſed, thou Great Huaina Capac, have pity on us, and pardon our Fathers, our Husbands, our Brothers and our Children.

The Inca herewith was ſtruck dumb for a while, conſidering the Reaſons which Mamacuna had given him, which being ſeconded by the Cries, and Tears, and Sighs of the Indian Women, the Anger of the Inca began to moderate and aſſuage, with with which going towards his Mother-in-law, he raiſed her from the ground; and then ſaid to her, Well doſt thou deſerve to be called Mamanchic, or the common Mother (he would have ſaid the Mother of me, and thy people) ſince thou haſt been ſo provident, as to foreſee the Miſeries which were coming, and to provide that remedy againſt them, which was agreeable to my Honour, and the Glory of my Father's Memory: For which I moſt heartily thank thee, being aſſured, that in caſe I had given way to my rage, I had to morrow repented the actions of this day. Well haſt thou performed the office of a Mother towards thy people, in redeeming their lives from deſtruction; in which, ſince thou haſt been ſo ſucceſsfull, whatſoever thou haſt deſired of me, ſhall be accompliſhed; and conſider, if there be any thing elſe which thou wouldſt require of me, return therefore with happineſs to thy people; pardon them in my name, and offer them what other grace and favour thou ſeeſt convenient: And for the better aſſurance of this my pardon, take with thee the four Incas, who are your Sons, and my Brothers, without other attendance than their own Menial Servants, to whom I ſhall give no other Commiſſion, than onely to ſettle them in peace under a good and wholſome Government. Which being ſaid, the Inca returned with his whole Army, commanding them to march along the Coaſt in proſecution of his firſt deſign.

The Chachapuyas by this gratious Act of Clemency being convinced of their errour, became afterwards moſt loyal Subjects to the Inca; and in remembrance and gratitude for ſuch high and ſublime generoſity, they hallowed and eſteemed that place Sacred where this diſcourſe had paſſed between the Inca and his Mother-in-law, fencing it about, that for ever after, neither Man, nor Beaſt, nor yet the Fowls of the Air, ſhould ſet their foot, or tread that Sacred place: For ſecurity of which they encompaſſed it about with three Walls; the firſt was of Stone rarely poliſhed, with all its Corniſhes; the ſecond was of rough and ruſtick Stone, for better ſecurity of that within; and the third was of Clay, or Sun-burnt Bricks, for defence of the other two, being more expoſed to the weather: Of which ſome Reliques and Ruines ſtill remain, and might have endured for many Ages, had not the Covetouſneſs of the New-come Gueſts overthrown thoſe Edifices in the Queſt of Riches.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Gods, and Cuſtoms of the Nation of Manta; of their Subjection; together with many other Barbarous Nations.

Huayna Capac having fitted and prepared his Camp in order to the Conqueſt he had formerly deſigned along the Sea-coaſt, he arrived at the Confines of that Province, which was called Manta, within the juriſdiction of which lyes that Harbour, which the Spaniards do now call Puerto Viejo, or the Old Haven: the reaſon of which Name, we have already given, at the beginning of this Hiſtory. The Natives of this Countrey, and all the Inhabitants for many Leagues on the Sea-ſide Northward, obſerved the ſame Cuſtoms, and the ſame Idolatrous Religion; Worſhipping the Sea and Fiſh, of which there was great abundance, ſerving them both for food, and for Gods: They alſo adored Lions, and Tygers, and Serpents of incredible bigneſs, and other creeping creatures, as they beſt fanſied: But above all in the Valley of Manta, which was the Metropolis, or chief place of all that Countrey; they Worſhipped an Emerald of a prodigious bigneſs, being not much leſs than the Egg of an Oſtrich.

At their principal Feſtivals they expoſed it to publick view, ſo that the Indians came far and near to Worſhip it, and offer Sacrifices to it, bringing Preſents of leſſer Emeralds; the Prieſts and the Cacique of Manta telling the people, that the Offerings of the leſſer Emeralds, which were the Children and Off-ſpring of this great One, were the moſt pleaſing and acceptable Sacrifice that they could make to this Goddeſs; the which doctrine being inculcated into the people by the covetouſneſs of the Prieſts, was the occaſion that vaſt numbers of Emeralds were amaſſed together in this place, where they were afterwards found by Don Pedro de Alvarado, and his Companions, of which Garçilaſſo de la Vega, my Maſter, was one, when they were employed in the Conqueſt of Peru: but they being unskilfull Lapidaries, were of opinion, that theſe Stones, if they were true, and not Glaſs, could never be broken; and therefore in the trial of them broke the greateſt part of them with Hammers upon an Anvil: But the great one, which was their Goddeſs, was conveyed away by the Indians in ſuch manner, ſo ſoon as they underſtood that the Spaniards had invaded their Countrey, that with all the diligence and menaces which could be uſed, it could never be recovered; as alſo other vaſt and immenſe treaſures which have been loſt and embezled in that Countrey.

The Natives of Manta, and the parts adjacent, and eſpecially thoſe that live along the Coaſt (though we muſt exempt the Serranos, who inhabit within the Land) did uſe and profeſs openly, and without ſhame, that abominable vice of Sodomy, and were more addicted to it than all the other Nations we have before mentioned, as guilty of this ſin. Their Marriages were contracted, on condition that the Parents and Friends of the Bridegroom ſhould firſt enjoy the Bride before the Husband. Thoſe which they took in the War they flea'd, and filling their Skins with Aſhes, they hanged them up at the Gates of their Temples in ſignal of Victory, or in the publick places where they danced.

To this people the Inca ſent his accuſtomary Summons, requiring them either to ſubmit themſelves to his Empire, or prepare to defend themſelves by Arms: But this people of Manta had a long time ſince been well aſſured, that their force was not ſufficient to reſiſt the power of the Inca, though they had been able to have made an Alliance with the neighbouring Nations; for conſidering that they were a brutiſh ſort of people, without Government, Union, or Law, there was no poſſibility of reducing them within any terms of confederacy; and therefore they all with much facility ſubmitted themſelves to Huayna Capac. The Inca received them very gratiouſly, treating them with kindneſs and rewards; and having placed Officers and Governours over them, and Inſtructours to teach them their Religion, Laws and Cuſtoms, he proceeded afterwards in his Conqueſt to another great Province called Caranque. In the parts adjacent there were many other Nations, all brutiſh, living without Law, Religion or Government. The Conqueſt of them was performed without any difficulty, for they never attempted to defend themſelves; and if they had, it would have been to little purpoſe, being all of them, though united together, an unequal match for the power of the Inca. In the ſubjection and diſpoſal of theſe people, the ſame rules and methods were uſed, as with the former, over whom Governours and Inſtructours were ſent to preſide, that they might rule and teach them. Proceeding forward in theſe Conqueſts, they came at length to other Provinces more barbarous and ſottiſh than any as yet inhabiting along that Coaſt; for the Men and Women cut and ſlaſhed their faces with ſharp flints, and moulded their Childrens heads into a deformed ſhape, different to what nature had given them: For ſo ſoon as their Infants were born, they clapt a ſmooth Plate upon their foreheads, and another on the hinder parts of the head; the which was ſtraitned every day harder and harder, untill they came to the Age of four or five years; by which time the head was grown broad on each ſide, and conſequently the forehead low, and the face contracted in the length: And to make themſelves yet more deformed, they cut off the hair behind, and on the crown of the head, leaving onely locks on each ſide; nor were theſe locks of hair combed, or pleated, but friſled and frowſed, to make their countenances yet more monſtrous and deformed: their food was for the moſt part Fiſh, (for Fiſhery was their chief employment) likewiſe they ate Herbs, and Roots, and ſuch wild Fruits as the Woods produced; they went naked, and worſhipped the Gods which their Neighbours adored. Theſe Nations were called Apichiqui, Pichunſi, Sava, Pecllanſimiqui, Pampahuaci, and the like. Theſe people being reduced, the Inca proceeded to another Nation, called Saramiſſu, and then to another named Paſſau, which is ſituated directly under the Equinoctial line; and theſe were yet more barbarous than the reſt, for they owned no Gods, nor did the thoughts of a God ever enter into their conſideration; for they were not aſſociated in any political communion, nor had they Houſes, but lived in hollow

Trees,

Trees, which are very capacious in those Mountains; they had no propriety in Wives, nor Children, but mixed together as they casually met, and used Sodomy in an open manner: they knew not how to cultivate the Land, or doe any other thing which is conducing to humane life. Their Bodies were naked without any habit; their Lips they cut and slashed both within and without; their Faces they painted in four quarters, with divers colours; one part was yellow, another blew, another red, and another black, changing the colours as they thought fit: They never combed their heads, but suffered their hairs to grow long and matted, being full of straw, or dust, or any thing that fell upon them; in short, they were worse than beasts. In the year 1560, when I went for Spain, I remember I saw some of these people at a place where we touched to take fresh water, and remained there for three or four days; and there these people came out to us in their Boats made of Rushes to trade with us, and sell us their great Fish, which they struck with their Fisgigs; which they performed with such dexterity, that the Spaniards took great pleasure to see them, and would bargain for them before they struck them: their price was made for Bisket and Flesh, for they had no value for Silver: their Privities they covered with leaves, or barks of Trees, not for the shame they had of them in the way of common modesty, but out of respect to the Spaniards; in short, they were salvage and barbarous above imagination.

It is said, when Huayna Capac observed the barrenness of those Countries, being nothing but Mountains; and the bestiality of that nasty people, which was so stupid, that he despaired of ever reducing them to a tolerable Oeconomy; that then he should say to his people, Come, and let us return again, for these deserve not the Honour of our Dominion. At which words the whole Army faced about, and returned, leaving the people of Passau in their ancient filthiness and brutality.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Giants which were in that Countrey, and the destruction of them.

BEfore we conclude our History relating to the affairs of this Countrey, we cannot omit one notable particular, which the Natives by tradition from their Forefathers have received, telling us of certain Giants which came to that Countrey by Sea, and landed at that Point, or Cape, which the Spaniards call St. Helen's, becaufe they firft difcovered it upon that day; and though the Spanifh Writers mention Giants, yet there is none who treats of them fo much at large as Pedro de Cieça doth, who took his information from the people of that Countrey, where thefe Giants refided, we fhall make ufe of his Relation, and rehearfe his words verbatim, as he fets them down; for though Joſeph Acoſta, and the Accountant-General Auguſtine de Carate touch thofe particulars; yet none defcribe them fo much at large as Pedro de Cieça, whofe Words are thefe, in the 52d Chapter of his Book: "Seeing that there are many reports of Giants in Peru, which, ac- "cording to common fame, landed at the Cape of St. Helen, which lyes near to "Puerto Viejo; I have thought fit to declare my opinion in the cafe, without re- "gard to the variety of common report, which often magnifies things above the "truth. The Natives of this Countrey having received it by tradition from their "Fathers, tell us, that many Ages paft, there was a fort of Men of an extraor- "dinary fize, which arrived at that Countrey in great Junks; they were fo large, "that a Man of our ordinary ftature reached but to their knees; and that their "bodies being proportionable thereunto, (as we may meafure the body of Hercu- "les by his foot) were ftrange monfters to behold: their Heads were great, co- "vered with long hair hanging to their fhoulders; their Eyes were as big as Sau- "cers;

" cers; they had no Beards; ſome of them were cloathed with the Skins of " Beaſts, others were naked, and without other covering than long hair, which " nature had given them. They brought no Women with them, but being ar- " rived at this Point, they landed, and ſeated themſelves in the manner of people " under Government, of which there remain ſome Ruines to this day: But in re- " gard they found no water, they ſet themſelves to make Wells, which they dig- " ged out of the hard living Rock, ſo that they may continue for many Ages, " and which ſpeak the great and mighty ſtrength of thoſe robuſtious Men; and " being very deep, they yield a moſt ſweet and pleaſant water, very cool, and " wholſome to drink.

" Theſe great Giants, or over-grown Men, having ſeated themſelves, and pro- " vided Ciſterns for their Drink, the next thing was to make a ſufficient provi- " ſion for their Victuals; for they had already almoſt conſumed the whole Coun- " trey; for one of theſe great Men was able to eat as much as fifty of thoſe ordi- " nary people, that were Natives of the place; ſo that food beginning to want, " they ſupplied themſelves from the great quantities of Fiſh, which they took from " the Sea, which yielded to them in great abundance. They lived with great " abhorrence, and in ill correſpondence with the people of the Countrey; for " their Women, they could not uſe without killing them; and the Natives, for " that and other cauſes, as much deteſted them; but being weaker than they, the " Indians durſt not attempt, or aſſault them, though they often entertained Con- " ſultations in what manner to take advantages upon them. Some years being " paſſed, ſince theſe Giants reſided in thoſe parts, and having no Women fit for " them, with whom to couple for propagation of their race, their numbers be- " gan to diminiſh; and wanting the natural uſe of Women, by the motion and " inſtigation of the Devil, they burned in Luſt one towards the other, and uſed " Sodomy publickly in the face of God, and the Sun, without ſhame or reſpect " one to the other. The which abomination being deteſtable in the ſight of " God, as the Natives report, it pleaſed his Divine and pure Majeſty to puniſh " this unnatural Sin, with a Judgment extraordinary, and agreeable to the enor- " mity of it: For being one day all together conjoined in this deteſtable Act, there " iſſued a dreadfull Fire from Heaven, with great noiſe and thunder; and imme- " diately an Angel proceeded from this flame with a glittering and flaming Sword, " with which, at one blow, he killed them all; and then the Fire conſumed them, " leaving no more than their bones and skulls, which it pleaſed God to ſuffer as " reliques to remain for an everlaſting Memorial of this Judgment. Thus much is the Relation of the Giants; the which we have ground to believe, becauſe the bones of Men are found there of an incredible bigneſs; and I have heard Spaniards ſay, that they have ſeen the piece of one hollow Tooth to weigh above half a pound of the Butcher's weight; and that they had ſeen one of the Shank-bones of an incredible length and bigneſs: beſides which evidences, their Wells and Ciſterns are clear teſtimonies of the places of their habitation. But as to the parts from whence they came, I am not able to render any account.

In the year 1550, being in the City de los Reyes, when Don Antonio de Mendoça was Vice-king, and Governour of New Spain, there were certain bones of Men digged up, which were of Giants, or Men of an extraordinary proportion; and I have heard alſo that at Mexico there were bones digged out of a Sepulchre, which for being of an extraordinary ſize, might be the bones of Giants: By which teſtimony of ſo many perſons, it plainly appears, that there were Giants, and thoſe bones might be the reliques of thoſe mighty Men, of which we have already ſpoken.

At this Cape of St. Helena, (which as I have ſaid is upon the Coaſt of Peru, and bordering near to Puerto Viejo) there is one thing very conſiderable, and that is a Mine, or Spring of Tar, of ſuch excellent quality, and which iſſues in that plenty, as may ſerve to Tar a whole Fleet of Ships. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, which we have faithfully tranſcribed out of his Hiſtory, to ſhew the Tradition which the Indians have of theſe Giants; and the Spring of Tar which iſſues out about that place, which is a matter alſo very obſervable.

CHAP. X.

Of the Words which Huayna Capac uttered relating to the Sun.

THE King Huayna Capac (as we have ſaid) commanded his Army to return from the Province called Paſſau, the which he made his extreme and frontier Countrey to the Northward; which having done, he returned again to Cozco, viſiting his Provinces in the way, doing them all the favours he was able, and adminiſtring Juſtice to thoſe which did demand it of him.

Returning at length to Cozco, after this long Journey of ſome years, he arrived there about the time that the principal Feaſt of the Sun was to be celebrated, called Raymi: And the Indians tell us a ſtory, that upon one day of the nine, that this Feſtival continued, the Inca took a liberty to fix his eyes upon the Sun, which was a freedom yet unknown, and eſteemed a prophanation ſo to doe, or to behold the circle wherein he moved; on which object, whilſt for ſometime he continued his ſight, the High Prieſt, who was one of his Uncles, and ſtood next to him, ſaid, Inca, what is it you doe? know you not that this is not lawfull?

Hereat the King withdrew his Eyes for awhile, but preſently after lifting them up again, fixed them upon the Sun; which the High Prieſt obſerving, reproved him for it, and told him, Sir, conſider what it is you doe, for you not onely doe an action which is unlawfull in it ſelf, but you give ill example and ſcandal to all your Court, and the people of your Dominions, who are here preſent to perform that venerable adoration which they owe to your Father, as their ſole and ſupreme Lord. Hereupon Huayna Capac turning to the High Prieſt, told him, that he would ask him two Queſtions, which he required him to make anſwer unto: I being (ſaid he) your King and univerſal Lord; is there any of you ſo bold as to command me for your pleaſure to ariſe from my ſeat, and take a Journey to thoſe parts whereunto you ſhall direct me? How, replied the High Prieſt, can any perſon be ſo impudent and daring? Is there any Curaca (ſaid the Inca) the moſt rich and powerfull of all my Subjects, who will adventure to diſobey my Commands, in caſe I ſhould diſpeed him poſt from hence into the moſt remote parts of Chili? No, replied the High Prieſt, there cannot certainly be any who dares to diſobey you, or refuſe your commands even to death. Then (ſaid the King) if it be ſo, there muſt be ſome other whom Our Father the Sun takes and eſteems for a more ſupreme, and more powerfull Lord than himſelf; by whoſe Commands he every day meaſures the compaſs of the Heavens, without any intermiſſion, or hour of repoſe; for if he were abſolute, and at his own diſpoſal, he would certainly allot himſelf ſome time of ceſſation, though it were onely to pleaſe his own humour and fancy, without other conſideration than that of liberty and change. For this Speech and others of the like nature, which the Indians reported of this Prince, the Spaniards conceived ſo great an opinion of his judgment and underſtanding, that they believed the ſubtilty of his wit would very eaſily have comprehended, and given admiſſion to the Doctrines of the Catholick Faith. A certain Spaniſh Captain, who might have heard this Story of Huayna Capac, for it was commonly diſcourſed in Peru, did make himſelf the Authour of this Saying, and recounted it to Acoſta for his own. This Acoſta, in the fifth Book of his Hiſtory of the New World, mentions this particular Saying, which is attributed to Huayna Capac, but names not the perſon by whom it was uttered: but reports, "That there was a certain Inca, "a perſon of a ſubtile wit, and refined underſtanding, who obſerving how his "Anceſtours had always adored the Sun for a God, ſeemed to wonder at it, and "ſaid, that it was impoſſible for the Sun to be God. For God was certainly a "great Lord, who formed and acted all his matters with quiet and ſettlement; "but that the Sun was a thing always in motion, which was contrary to the unalterable Being of God: His reaſon was admirably good and ſound; and ſuch "as being well explained to the Indians, might effectually have convinced them "of their errours and follies. Thus far are the Words of Acoſta; with which he concludes that Chapter. The Indians, who were very ſuperſtitious and ſcrupulous in their Idolatry, interpreted this unpractiſed liberty which Huayna Capac took in beholding the Sun, to be an ill Omen of ſome unhappy ſucceſs. But this conceit concerning the Nature of the Sun, was not (as I hear) primarily to be attributed to Huayna Capac, but that he received it firſt from his Father Tupac Inca Yupanqui, who uttered ſomething of the like nature.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Rebellion of the Caranques, and their Puniſhment for it.

THE Inca Huayna Capac taking his Circuit through the ſeveral Provinces of his Empire, which was the laſt Journey he made; news was brought him, that the Province of Curanque, which was one (as we have ſaid) that was the lateſt conquered in the utmoſt Confines of Peru, was riſen into rebellion; for being a ſort of barbarous and cruel people, ſuch as offered the bloud, and heads, and hearts of Men, whom they had killed, in ſacrifice to their Gods, and ate Man's fleſh; for not being able to bear the Laws of reaſon and good manners, which were given them, eſpecially that which forbad the eating of Humane fleſh, they had joined with the neighbouring Countries in Alliance and League, intending to make a general Inſurrection: For this reaſon they held many ſecret Meetings, and gathered people to ſurprize and kill the Governours and Miniſters of the Inca, together with the Souldiers and Garriſons which were ſet over them: And whilſt matters were thus preparing for execution of their deſign at the time appointed, they diſſembled their ſubmiſſion and treachery with the greateſt demonſtrations of fidelity and kindneſs imaginable, that the Incas being thereby become more confident of their Loyalty, they might with the more facility, and leſs danger, find an opportunity to cut their throats. The Plot being laid, and the time come for the execution of it, they without any remorſe killed all the Incas, and others which preſided over them, offering their heads, hearts and bloud to their Gods in ſacrifice, by way of acknowledgment for being freed from their ſubjection to the Incas. They then devoured their fleſh, and drank their bloud with much greedineſs, for being debarred for ſome time from that food, they longed for it; and partly in revenge, and partly from a voracious appetite thereunto, they ate with ſpight, ſatisfying both their palate and their anger. The advice of which being come to Huayna Capac, he was greatly troubled, and immediately diſpeeded away his Captains with an Army to execute juſtice for this great offence, whilſt he in perſon kept at ſome diſtance, obſerving the ſucceſs of this affair: The Captains accordingly inveſted the Caranques; but firſt, according to their uſual cuſtome, they ſent Propoſitions of Peace and Amneſty, in caſe they would return to obedience and ſubmiſſion of the Inca. But theſe barbarous Rebels were ſo far from accepting theſe terms, that they impudently rejected, and ſcorned them; and ſo ill treated the Meſſengers, that they hardly eſcaped from their hands. Of which Huayna Capac being informed, he reſolved perſonally to aſſail them with his whole Army, putting all to fire and ſword before him. The Rebels fought with great obſtinacy, and the Incas honourably acquitted themſelves to revenge the affront to their King; ſo that on one ſide and the other many thouſands were ſlain: But whereas the power of the Inca was, as to that people, invincible; they in a ſhort time began to abate in their courage and hopes; ſo that not daring to fight in the open Plains, they betook themſelves to the Woods and Mountains, and to defend themſelves in difficult paſſes. But ſuch was the Power and Military Diſcipline of the Incas, that they entirely defeated the Enemy, taking many thouſands of them them Priſoners; the moſt culpable of which, and the moſt active in this Rebellion, to the number of two thouſand, part of which were Caranques, and part Allies with them, were put to death, having their throats cut within a Lake, and their bodies ſunk into the deep; the waters of which being ſtained with the bloud, the Lake was for ever afterwards called Yahuarcocha, or the bloudy Sea, in a perpetual Memorial of this rebellious crime, and the puniſhment of it. Pedro de Cieça mentioning this particular, reports, that twenty thouſand of them ſuffered this puniſhment; perhaps he means, that ſo many might be killed in this War on both ſides.

The Inca Huayna Capac having executed this juſtice in the puniſhment of Rebels, departed for Quitu, being much troubled, that during his Reign, ſuch enormous wickedneſſes ſhould ariſe, which ſhould require his extreme ſeverity and rigour in the juſt puniſhment; being an action as much contrary to his natural inclination, as it was to the cuſtome and practice of his Anceſtours, who moſt availed themſelves on the Titles of Pious and Mercifull: He was moreover much concerned, that theſe unhappy accidents ſhould concur in his time, and not in the Reign of his Predeceſſours; having no example, or precedent of ſo much cruelty, unleſs it were in the caſe of the Chancas, which happened in the Reign of the Inca Viracocha. Perhaps the matter being well conſidered, it might be a fore-runner of that grand rebellion and defection, which was the deſtruction of the Empire, and ruine of the Bloud-Royal, as we ſhall now ſee in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

CHAP. XII.

Huayna Capac makes his Son Atahualpa King of Quitu.

THE Inca Huayna Capac (as we have before noted) had by the Daughter of the King of Quitu, who was Heir to that Kingdom, a Son named Atahualpa, who was a perſon of great underſtanding, and of a quick wit and apprehenſion; he was alſo of a ſubtile, jealous, and cautious temper, naturally courageous, and addicted to War, of a good ſhape, and gentile body, with a pleaſant Air in his mouth, as have commonly all the Incas and Pallas, which are Ladies. Theſe Endowments of mind and body were ſo pleaſing to his Father, that he loved him entirely, and would have him always in company with him; and would have made him his ſole Heir and Succeſſour to his Empire, but that he could not diſinherit his Eldeſt Son Huaſcar, who claimed by Right of Primogeniture a title to all the Eſtate and Empire of his Father: Howſoever, as to the Kingdom of Quitu, there ſeemed ſome colour of juſtice to diſmember it from the Empire, and confer it in right of his Mother on her Son Atahualpa; the which being the deſire and intention of Huayna Capac, he ſent for the Prince Huaſcar, then at Cozco, to come to him, and in a full Aſſembly of his Captains and Curacas, ſpake to his legitimate Son and Heir in this manner: It is well known, Prince, that according to the ancient Cuſtome and Canon of our Anceſtours derived to us from our firſt Father Manco Capac, this Kingdom of Quitu belongs to your Crown and Inheritance; having ever been maintained for a rule unto this day, that whatſoever Kingdoms or Provinces have been conquered, have ever been annexed to the Imperial Crown, of which Cozco is the chief City and Metropolis: But in regard I bear ſo tender an affection towards your Brother Atahualpa, that it would grieve me much to ſee him poor; I could therefore wiſh you would conſent to part with the Kingdom of Quitu, that ſo I might beſtow it upon him; for though the Inheritance in right be yours, yet conſidering that that Kingdom was the Patrimony of his his Fathers, and came by his Mother; and that I have added many Countries and Provinces to your Patrimony, you may the more eaſily condeſcend to my deſires in this; and ſo yielding Quitu to your Brother, whoſe Vertues deſerve a Royal condition, your intereſt will be fortified and ſtrengthened by the aſſiſtence of ſuch an Aſſociate, who being endeared the more by this obligation, will be able to recompence the favour, and ſerve you in the Wars for the Conqueſt of many other Countries, which are adjacent to your Frontiers, and pay you for the releaſe of this Kingdom by the acquiſition of many more; which if you think fit to grant, I ſhall then depart with contentment out of this World, when I go to reſt with our Father the Sun.

The Prince Huaſcar anſwered his Father with a chearfull frankneſs, telling him, that he was over-joyed of this opportunity, wherein he might demonſtrate his readineſs to obey his Father the Inca, in any thing which he might eſteem for his ſervice; and that if it were neceſſary for the better accommodation of his Brother Atahualpa, that he ſhould releaſe other Provinces, provided it may be to give his Father ſatisfaction he would, eſteeming nothing ſo dear and valuable as his pleaſure and contentment.

Huayna Capac having received this obliging Anſwer from his Son Huaſcar, gave him leave to return to Cozco, and then contrived the ways in what manner to ſettle his Son Atahualpa in the Kingdom of Quitu, adding other Provinces to his Crown and Dignity; he alſo beſtowed upon him ſeveral of his Captains of beſt experience, and furniſhed him with part of his Army; and, in ſhort, omitted nothing to render him great, though it were to the prejudice of the Prince, to whoſe right the whole Succeſſion and Inheritance appertained: And being a moſt tender and indulgent Father, and paſſionate in the love of this Son, he deſigned to be an Aſſiſtant to him in the Adminiſtration of all the affairs of his Kingdom, during the time of his life: the which reſolution was taken both out of care and favour to his Son, that ſo he might lay a good foundation to his Kingdom, and alſo that he might the better keep the new Conqueſts lately made upon the Sea-coaſt, and Inland Countries, in ſubjection; for the people there being warlike, barbarous, and beſtial, were ready upon all occaſions to rebell, and riſe in Arms againſt the Government of the Inca: For ſecuring of which Peace, it was the cuſtome and practice of the Incas to tranſplant the people from one Province to another, which was an approved courſe to make them quiet and peaceable, and much more obſervant and ſubmiſſive to their Kings, as we have at large diſcourſed in thoſe places where we have treated of Colonies, called by them Mitmac.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the two famous and great Roads in Peru.

IT were but justice to the Life and Memory of Huayna Capac, if we mention those two great Roads which run North and South through the whole Kingdom of Peru, because the making of them is attributed unto him: One of them passes along by the Sea-coast, and the other over the Mountains to the Inland Countries, which Historians describe with high Enlargements, though, in reality, the work exceeds the common fame: And in regard I cannot pretend to lay them down with such exactness as some have done, I shall therefore refer my self to their Relations, and begin with Augustin Carate, who in the 13th Chapter of his first Book speaking of the Original of the Incas, hath these words: "In a due "and orderly succession of these Incas, there was one called Guaynacava (which "signifies a rich young Man) who came to the Government, and encreased, and "greatly enlarged his Dominions; his business being chiefly to advance Justice "and Reason, he so far prevailed on the uncultivated understandings of that barbarous people, that he seemed to have worked Miracles in political conversation, having reduced them without the help of letters to Obedience and Rule, "and gained so far on the affection of his Vassals, that for his service they readily "applied their hands, and their hearts, to make and open a large Road in Peru, "which was so famous, that we cannot in justice omit to mention, and describe "it, in regard that amongst the seven Wonders of the World, there was none "made at greater expence and labour than this. When this Guaynacava marched "with his Army from Cozco to conquer the Province of Quitu, which are about "five hundred Leagues distant one from the other; he suffered many difficulties "in his passage, by reason of the inaccessible ways over Rocks and Mountains, "which he was to overcome: Howsoever, having passed and subdued that "Countrey, and being now to return again victorious and triumphant, the Indians broke a convenient way through the Mountains, which they made both "plain and wide, breaking the Rocks, and levelling the Ground which was ruff "and uneven; so that sometimes they were forced to raise it fifteen or twenty fathom in height, and in other places to sink it as far; and in this manner they "continued their work for five hundred Leagues in length. And it is reported, "that when this work was finished, the way was so plain, that a Cart or "Coach might be driven over it; yet afterwards, in the time of the Wars, all "this workmanship and labour was demolished by the Indians, to make the ways "and passes more difficult to the Christians. Now if we compare this work "with the short cut onely of two Leagues of Mountain, which is between Espinar, Segovia, and Guadarrama in Spain, and consider what charge and labour "hath been there employed, onely to make that way tolerably passable for the "Kings of Castile, when at any time they passed with their Equipage and Court "from Andaluzia, or Toledo, and travelled into parts beyond those Mountains; "which, as I say, if it were considered, what an immense and incredible work "must this seem to have been? Nay farther, the Incas were not content with "this, for this Guaynacava intending again to visit the Province of Quitu, for "variety in his Travels, he resolved to take his passage through the Plains, which "the Indians, though with no less difficulty, made as convenient as that of the "Mountains; for in all those Vallies which were watered with Rivers and Fountains, and were planted with Trees, which (as we have said elsewhere) did "commonly continue for a full League, they made a way almost forty foot wide, "with thick Mud-walls on each side, being four or five Frames, or Pannels, of "this Mud in height. And then entring out of these Plains into the sandy "ways, they drove in great Stakes into the ground on one side and the other,

" that ſo Travellers might not miſtake their way, or wander either on one hand, " or the other; and in this manner all was ordered for the ſpace of five hundred " Leagues, being the ſame diſtance as over the Mountains. But now the Stakes " fixed in the ſandy Grounds are in many parts broken, or plucked up by the " Spaniards, who in the times, as well of War as Peace, made uſe of them for " fuel; yet the Walls which are made in the Vallies remain entire unto this " day, by which we may conjecture and judge of the greatneſs of this work. " And thus did this Guaynacava go by one way, and return by another, being al- " ways covered with Boughs of Trees, and entertained with the fragrant ſmells " of ſweet Flowers. Thus far are the Words of Auguſtin de Carate.

Likewiſe Pedro de Cieça de Leon diſcourſing of this matter, and of the Road through the Mountains, hath theſe words in the 37th Chapter of his Book: " From Ypiales you travel to a ſmall Province called Guaca, and in the way thi- " ther you paſs that famous Road which the Incas made in thoſe parts, and may " be compared to that which Hannibal made over the Alpes, when he marched in- " to Italy; and indeed, conſidering the great Chambers and Store-houſes which " were made in that way, it ſeems a more difficult, and a more admirable piece " of work.

Of which Pedro de Cieça enlarges no farther; howſoever in the 60th Chapter of his Book, ſpeaking of the Road over the Plains; he hath theſe words: " That I may proceed in my Hiſtory with due method, I have thought it re- " quiſite, before I conclude, to mention ſomething relating to the Road over the " Plains, which, as I have touched in other places, is a work of ſingular remark " and importance: And therefore I muſt here denote ſomething of that high " Road over the Plains, half of which, at leaſt, is a way made by order of the " Ingas; the which, though now it is in many places broken down, and demo- " liſhed, yet the Ruines of it are durable evidences of the power of thoſe who " firſt commanded the ſame to be made. The Indians attribute this work to " Guaynacapa, and Topa Ynga Yupanque his Father, who deſcended by theſe Vallies " to the lower Provinces; though ſome report, that Inga Yupangue, the Grand- " father of Guaynacapa, and Father of Topa Ynga, was the firſt who diſcovered " that Coaſt, and paſſed thoſe Plains unto it; and that the Caciques, or chief Go- " vernours of thoſe parts, made the Road fifteen Foot broad by command and " direction of that Inga: on each ſide a very ſtrong Wall was built, adjoyning to " which, were fine groves of Trees planted; the Boughs of which did ſometimes " reach over the way, being laden with Fruit; and the floor, or the way under " foot, was ſmooth and eaſie; the Woods and Foreſts all along were inhabited " by Singing-birds, Parrots, and Fowls of all ſorts.

And farther, this de Cieça treating of the Store-houſes, and places of entertainment and proviſion, ſaith, " That theſe Walls reach all along the way, except- " ting onely thoſe ſandy deſarts which could not bear a foundation: Howſoever, " as proofs of the greatneſs of the Founders, and as ſigns and marks to direct " Travellers, great Timbers, in the manner of Piles, were driven into the ground " at ſuch a ſpace and diſtance as were eaſily ſeen from one to the other. And as " they were very carefull to keep the ways in the Vallies clear, and the Walls " in good repair; ſo alſo the like diligence was uſed to keep up the Poſts or " Stakes, in caſe any of them ſhould be blown down by the Wind, or over- " turned by any other accident: So that this Road was certainly a great piece " of Workmanſhip, though not ſo laborious in the making, as that of the Moun- " tains. In theſe Vallies alſo there were ſome Fortreſſes and Temples of the " Sun, which we ſhall ſpecifie in their due places. Thus far are the Words of Pedro de Cieça, which we have extracted verbatim.

Likewiſe John Botero Benes makes mention of theſe two Roads, and in his Obſervations denotes them for miraculous Works; and, in ſhort, ſays thus much of them: " From the City of Cozco there are two great Roads, or King's High- " ways, running at leaſt two thouſand Miles in length, one of which goes by the " way of the Plains, and the other leads by the Mountains: And in making " theſe ways in the manner they now are, being twenty five Foot broad, it was " neceſſary to raiſe the Vallies, level the Mountains, and cut through the ſolid " and living Rocks; which is a Work ſo great, as exceeds above any com- " pariſon, the Pyramids of Egypt, or the Roman Edifices. All which is extracted out of the Words of the three preceding Authours, who treat of these two famous Roads; every one of which exalts their praises to such a degree, as most pleases his fancy, though they all come short of that praise and admiration, which is due to the Greatness of so mighty a Work: For were there nothing more in the matter, than onely a continued distance of five hundred Leagues in length, it were much to be admired; but when we consider that this Road passes over ascents on the Mountains of two, three, and four Leagues high; it is then so strange, that nothing seems to be comparable to it. Besides all which, we must note, that on the highest tops of the Hills, from whence was the best prospect, there were erected certain Lodges, or Houses of Pleasure, which were seated on each side of the way, with Stone-stairs to go up to them, where the Chair-men which carried the Sedans did usually rest, and where the Incas did sit for some time taking the Air, and surveying in a most pleasant prospect all the high and lower-parts of the Mountains, which wore their coverings of Snow, or on which the Snow was falling, which certainly was a most pleasant view; for from the tops of some very high Mountains one might see sixty, seventy, eighty, or an hundred Leagues round; in which variety of prospect the piques of some very high Mountains were to be seen, that seemed to touch the Heavens, and other Chasms and Precipices so low and deep, as seemed to extend unto the centre of the Earth. Of all which Works, there is nothing remains but Ruines, and such as War and time have not been able to destroy. Onely in the Road by the Plains, and in the deserts of Sand, which are wide and vast, and where also are some Hills and Dales, there they have droven in their Piles, or Posts of Wood; which being placed in sight one of another, do serve for Marks to direct Travellers in their way, where there is no path, or beaten road, because it being all Sand, the track and footsteps are covered by the Sand so often as it is moved by the Wind: And therefore these Posts are so necessary to Travellers, as the Needle of the Compass is to direct a Ship through the floating Waves.

CHAP. XIV.

That Huayna Capac received News how the Spaniards sailed along the Coast of Peru.

Huayna Capac being busied and employed in the forementioned affairs, and residing in the Royal Palaces of Tumipampa, which are the most Magnificent of any in Peru, advices were brought him, that some stranger Nations, never before seen in those Countries, sailed along that shore to make a discovery of the Land; upon which intelligence Huayna Capac was much surprized, entertaining new fears and jealousies of an unknown people, of whom no account of their Nation, or the parts from whence they came could be given. But we are to note, that this Ship was Commanded by Basco Nunnez of Bilbo, who was the first that discovered the South-Sea, and the Seamen were Spaniards, who (as we have said before) were the first that gave the Name of Peru unto this Empire, which happened in the year 1515, the discovery of which Countrey being two years before. There is an Historian, who reports, that the Ship and Spaniards belonged to Don Francisco de Piçarro, and his thirteen Companions, who were the first Discoverers of Peru; in which there was a mistake between the first Discoverers, and the first Conquerours: There was also some errour as to the time, for there was fifteen or sixteen years difference between one and the other; for the first discovery of Peru, and the Name given to it, happened in the year 1515; and the year when Francisco Piçarro, and his four Brothers, with Don Diego de Almagro invaded that Countrey was 1531, and Huayna Capac died eight years before, being in the year 1523, after he had reigned forty two years, as is recorded by Blas Valera, and found in his loose and scattered Papers, wherein he writes as a curious Antiquary of the Original and Antiquity of those Kings.

Huayna Capac lived eight years after the News was brought him that the first Discoverers of those Countries coasted along his shore; during which time he kept an extraordinary watch on the Coast, and attended with greater care to preserve his people in Peace and Concord; not being willing to extend and employ his force into new Conquests, untill such time as he was well assured of the nature and condition of that people, who in a Ship frequented and visited his Ports. And herein he was the more troubled upon remembrance of the Prophecy of an ancient Oracle, which foretold them, that after such a Number of years, and after the Regin of so many Kings, there should arrive strange Nations, never before seen in those parts, who should take their Kingdom from them, and destroy their Government and Idolatrous Religion: the which Prophecy was fulfilled in this Inca, as we shall see in the sequel of this History.

And as a preparative hereunto, it happened out three years before this Ship was seen on the Coast of Peru, that a prodigious and ominous sight appeared at Cozco, which greatly affected Huayna Capac, and astonished all the Empire: the occasion was this: That whilst they were celebrating the solemn Festival, which was yearly dedicated to their God the Sun, a Royal Eagle (which they call Anca) was seen soaring in the Air, and pursued by five or six Kestrels, and other Hobbies, and smaller Hawks; of which some, for the rarity of them, have been brought into Spain, where they are called Aletos, and in Perú Huaman; the which exchanging their blows and strokes on the Eagle, would not suffer him to escape in his flight, but killed him with the flutters of their wings. The Eagle not being able longer to defend it self, fell down in the middle of the Market-place amongst the Incas, as if she had implored their defence and succour; and they willingly received her, and finding her body covered over with scurf, as with a scab, and plumed of all her smaller Feathers, nourished her with all the care imaginable; but nothing availing to doe her good, she died in a few days, not being able to raise her self from the ground. The Inca and his Ministers judged this to be a bad Omen of what was to succeed; and the Astrologers and Diviners interpreted the matter to presage no less than the destruction, and total ruine of their Empire and Religion; which also being followed by great Earthquakes in divers places, and such as were so extraordinary and violent, as to overturn many high Mountains; the Prodigies seemed terrible, and such as were the certain fore-runners of dismal Judgments. The Indians also, who inhabited the Sea-coast, observed that the tides in their ebbings and flowings did not keep their usual course, nor did the waters contain themselves within their due bounds: Comets also, and strange Apparitions were seen in the Air; and to encrease this terrour, the Moon was observed in a clear and bright night to be encompassed with three large Haloes, or Circles; the first was of a bloudy colour; the second of a blackish, inclining to green; and the third was like a mist, or smoak. A certain Magician (whom the Indians call Llayca.) having seen and considered these prodigious Circles about the Moon, entred with a sad and weeping countenance into the presence of Huayna Capac, and with tears in his eyes told him, and said, To you alone, Sir, it appertains to know, that the Moon your Mother, as a pious and tender Parent, makes known unto you, that the Pachacamac, who is the Creatour and Sustainer of all things, doth threaten your Royal Family and Empire with grievous Judgments, which he designs to send upon your people: For the first bloudy Circle prognosticates; that after you are gone to rest with your Father the Sun, that then most terrible Wars shall arise amongst those of your own Line and Family, which will open so large an effusion of Royal Bloud, as will be sufficient in a few years to extinguish your whole Race and Progeny. Which having said, he let fall such a floud of tears, that he was not able farther to utter his words: But at length having a little recovered himself, he proceeded, and said, The second Circle, which is black, threatens us your Subjects with a total destruction and subversion of our Religion and Government, caused by the Wars and Dissentions of your own Family; and that then your Empire shall be alienated and translated to another people, and all your Greatness vanquish into smoak and vapour, which is the signification of the third Circle. The Inca was greatly astonished with this dismal Prediction; howsoever, not to shew fear, and meanness of spirit, he bid the Magician begone, for these are (said he) but your last nights Dreams, which thou declarest to me for Revelations and Advices from my Mother the Moon. No, said the Magician, for that you may give better credence to my words, you may be pleaſed to come forth, and ſee the truth hereof teſtified by your own Eyes; and then if you think fit, you may be pleaſed to take farther information from the other Diviners, or Magicians, concerning theſe prodigious Apparitions. The Inca accordingly came forth from his Chamber, and having beheld theſe Signs in the Heavens, he called for all the Diviners and Prognoſticators which he maintained in his Court; amongſt which there being one of the Nation of Tauyu, who was much eſteemed above the reſt, and that having beheld and conſidered theſe Circles, gave the ſame judgment thereupon as the former had done. Howſoever Huayna Capac, though he entertained ſad apprehenſions and fears hereof within his own Breaſt, yet not to diſcourage his People, he ſeemed to make ſmall account of theſe affrighting Stories, telling the Magicians, that unleſs the Pachacamac himſelf ſhould reveal the ſame to him by his own Words, he would not give credit to ſuch Sayings; For is it poſſible, ſaid he, that my Father the Sun ſhould abhor and deteſt his own Bloud, and ſo far abandon them, as to yield them up to a total deſtruction? And ſo diſmiſſed his Prognoſticators. Howſoever reflecting within himſelf upon what they had ſaid, and conſidering how it agreed with the Prophecies of an ancient Oracle, and comparing paſt things with the prodigious Novelties of the preſent times, which appeared and ſhewed themſelves in every Element; as alſo the Ship which ſailed along the Coaſt, with a ſort of People never before ſeen in thoſe Seas; all theſe things being taken together, did greatly move and diſturb the Mind of Huayna Capac with inward fear and apprehenſion; for which reaſon he always kept an Army in a readineſs, compoſed of his moſt experienced Souldiers and Officers, which he drew out from the Garriſons of thoſe Provinces. He ordained alſo that many Sacrifices ſhould be offered to the Sun, and that all the Diviners and Magicians in their reſpective Provinces ſhould conſult their familiar Demons, and particularly the great Pachacamac, and the prating Devil of Rimac, who always gave anſwers to all demands; and to enquire and know of them whether thoſe ſtrange and new Apparitions in the Heavens, and in the Sea, did portend either good or evil to the Empire. The Anſwers from Rimac were ſo dubious and obſcure, that they could not promiſe themſelves any great good, nor yet did they ſeem to prognoſticate any affrighting evil. Howſoever all the Diviners preſaging nothing but ill, the whole Empire remained in terrour and fear of ſome approaching miſchief and calamity; yet in regard no conſiderable misfortune befell that people for the ſpace of three or four Years, the remembrance thereof began to wear out, every one returning to his uſual quietneſs, and ſetled way of living, in which they continued for ſeveral Years, untill the death of Huayna Capac. The relations of theſe Prognoſtications which we have mentioned, were, beſides the common report, delivered particularly by two Captains, who had formerly been of the Guard to Huayna Capac, and being each of them of the age of eighty years, were both baptized; the eldeſt of them was called John Pechuta, his own Name remaining for a ſurname after Baptiſm, as was common to the Indians; the other was called Chauca Rimachi, but his Chriſtian Name I have forgot: Theſe Captains, when they related the ſtories of theſe unhappy preſages, with the ſucceſſes of thoſe times, they would always burſt into Tears; ſo that it was neceſſary to divert them with ſome other Diſcourſe, before they would ceaſe their Tears and Lamentations. The Teſtament and Death of Huayna Capac, with many other particulars which afterwards ſucceeded, were delivered to us by an old Inca, whoſe Name was Cuſi Huallpa; but the cruelties which Atahualpa exerciſed upon all thoſe of the Bloud Royal, I received from the relation of my own Mother, and her Brother, who was called Don Fernando Huallpa Tupac Inca Yupanqui, who were in thoſe days, both of them Children of ten Years of age, and lived in the fury and rage of all thoſe troubles which continued for the ſpace of two years and a half, untill ſuch time as the Spaniards invaded that Countrey, as we ſhall relate in its due place, together with the manner how they, with ſome few others of the Royal Bloud, eſcaped from death, which Atahualpa had deſigned for them, which turned greatly to the advantage of the Enemy.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Teſtament and Death of Huayna Capac; and the Prophecy concerning the Invaſion made by the Spaniards.

Huayna Capac reſiding in his Kingdom of Quitu, an humour took him in one of the laſt days of his Life, to waſh and bath himſelf in a certain Lake, onely to pleaſe and recreate himſelf: ſo ſoon as he came out from the Water he was taken with a cold, and ſhivering, (which the Indians call Chuccu,) which was followed by a hot fit of a Fever; after which finding himſelf every day to grow worſe and worſe, he apprehended he ſhould die; the which he ſtrongly fanſied from a remembrance of certain Prognoſticks, which had ſome years before been delivered in reference thereunto; in which the Indians are very ſuperſtitious, eſpecially in thoſe which relate to the Royal Perſon of the King, which the Incas for the reputation of their Idolatry call Revelations from their Father the Sun.

Beſides theſe various Prognoſticks and Sayings delivered by their Oracles, many affrighting Comets appeared in the Air, and amongſt the reſt one with extraordinary Rays, of a greeniſh colour, very terrible to behold; and moreover a Thunderbolt fell in the Palace of the Inca himſelf; all which ſtrange and ominous matters being put together, did greatly trouble and puzle the Wiſedom and Art of their Magicians and Philoſophers, called Amautas, who were the Sages and Prieſts of that Religion, who being alſo converſant with familiar Spirits, preſaged the death of Huayna Capac, with the deſtruction of the Royal Family, and the total Ruine and Downfall of the Empire, with many other diſmal Calamities and Misfortunes, which their Nations in general, and every one in particular was to ſuſtain; howſoever theſe fatal Stories were not vulgarly publiſhed, leſt they ſhould diſmay and terrifie their people with utmoſt deſpair, who were naturally ſuperſtitious, and of a melancholy temper, apt to receive impreſſions of this nature.

Huayna Capac finding himſelf now ſenſibly to decay, and his end to approach, ſummoned all his Sons and Relations, with the Governours and Captains of the neighbouring parts to come to him, and declared to them, That he was then going to Heaven, to reſt with his Father the Sun, who had ſome time ſince revealed to him, that he would ſhortly call him from a certain Lake, or Fountain, or River. Now in regard that I am ſeized, ſaid he, with this Diſtemper by the chilneſs of the Water in which I bathed, it ſeems to me a certain token that I am called by my Father, and that this is the time of my Diſſolution. So ſoon as I am dead, I would have my Body opened, as is the Cuſtome of Kings; my Heart and Bowels I would have carried and interred in Quitu, as a Teſtament of my love to that Kingdom, but my Corps I would have carried to Cozco, there to be buried with my Kindred and Anceſtours. In a particular manner I recommend my Son Atahualpa, whom I love with a tender Affection, bequeathing unto him my Kingdom of Quitu, with whatſoever additions he ſhall gain and acquire thereunto by his own Arms; commanding and enjoining you that are my Captains to ſerve him with all Fidelity and Allegiance, as your true and natural Prince, requiring you to perform all Obedience towards him in every thing; for I ſhall illuminate him with Revelations from my Father the Sun. I farther recommend unto you, and deſire you to uſe Moderation, and exerciſe Juſtice towards our Subjects and Vaſſals, that ſo we may deſervedly continue the Title of being Lovers of the Poor, and that in every thing you behave your ſelves as Incas, who are the true Off-ſpring of the Sun. Having ended this Diſcourſe to his Children and Kindred, he ſummoned all the Captains and Curacas, who were not of the Bloud Royal, recommending to them faithfull and dutifull Allegiance to their King; and in the laſt place he told them, That there was an old Prophecy, derived by Revelation from his Father the Sun, That after the Reign of twelve Kings there ſhould come a new Nation, never before known in thoſe parts, that ſhould gain and ſubject all thoſe Kingdoms and Provinces, with many others, to their own Dominion: which I greatly ſuſpect to be thoſe who now ſail upon our Coaſt, being a valiant People, much ſurpaſſing ours in all points of Excellency. Likewiſe you are to obſerve, that in me the number of twelve Kings is completed; and I farther make known to you, that in a few Years after my departure out of this Life, that this new Nation will invade you, and then will be accompliſhed that which our Father the Sun hath revealed, that they ſhall become your Lords and Maſters. Wherefore I encharge you to ſerve them as Men, for they in every thing have the advantage of you; their Law is better than yours, their Arms and military Diſcipline more warlike, and more invincible than yours; and laſtly, I leave my Peace with you, for I am ſummoned by my Father the Sun to reſt and repoſe with him.

Pedro de Cieça in the 44th Chapter of his Book, touches upon this Prophecy which Huayna Capac had delivered, concerning the Invaſion of the Spaniards, and that after his Reign the Empire would be tranſlated to a ſtranger people, which was like thoſe that ſailed in the Ship. All which the Inca told his people in Tumipampa, which is a Countrey not far from Quitu, where, it is ſaid, the news was firſt brought of the Spaniards, who were the Diſcoverers of Peru. Franciſco Lopez de Gomara, in the 115th Chap. of his Book, relating the Diſcourſe which intervened between Huaſcar and Hernando de Soto, (who was afterwards Governour of the Florida,) and Pedro del Barco, ſaith, that when they two travelled alone from Caſſamarca to Cozco, (as we ſhall relate in its due place,) Huaſcar being then a Priſoner, amongſt other Diſcourſes which he recounts of him, reports farther of him in theſe Words which follow, " And laſtly he aſſured them, that he was " the true and lawfull Lord and Heir of theſe Kingdoms, and that Atabaliba was " a Tyrant and Uſurper; and that he would ſee the Captain of the Chriſtians, " and inform him ſo much, that ſo he might revenge his Injuries, and reſtore him " to his Liberty and Kingdoms; for that his Father Guayna Capac had at the time " of his Death commanded him to be a friend to the people who were white and " fair, wearing Beards, for they were to be Lords of thoſe Countries, &c. So that this Prophecy was commonly known in all Peru, as all Hiſtorians write.

All the preceding particulars delivered by Huayna Capac, were eſteemed to be his laſt Will and Teſtament, and held by the Indians in high eſtimation, and therefore they complied moſt punctually with his Commands. I remember that one day the old Inca formerly ſpoken of, diſcourſing before my Mother, and relating theſe particular matters, and of the coming in of the Spaniards, and how they gained the Countrey, I took an occaſion to ask him, how it came to paſs that this Countrey, being ſo rocky and mountainous as it is, and the people warlike, ſo that they could make Conqueſts of many Provinces, and form a mighty Empire, how, I ſay, it came to paſs that they ſhould ſubmit, and render themſelves to ſo ſmall and ſo inferiour a number as the Spaniards were? In anſwer unto which he repeated the old Prophecy concerning the Spaniards, telling me, that the Inca had commanded them to obey and ſerve them, as a people endued with many more Excellencies than they; and having ſaid this, he turned to me, and with anger in his face, reproved me for having termed them Cowards, and unwiſe; and in anſwer to my demand he told me, That the laſt Words which our Inca uttered, whereby he commanded us to reſign our Empire, and ſubject our ſelves to a ſtranger Nation, were much more powerfull and available than all the Force and Arms which your Father and his Companions brought into this Countrey, but this he ſaid to ſhew the validity which the Commands of their own Kings had with them; and how much more the Sayings and Injunctions of Huayna Capac, delivered at the hour of his Death, who was the deareſt and moſt beloved Prince to them of any.

Huayna Capac being dead, his Servants, in compliance with his Commands, emboweled and embalmed his Body, which they carried to Cozco, but his Heart they buried in Quitu. In all parts through which his Corpſe were carried they celebrated his Funerals with extraordinary Sorrow, crying and lamenting for the love and affection which all ſorts of people bore towards him; being arrived at the Imperial City, his Obſequies were celebrated in the moſt ſolemn manner, which according to the cuſtome of thoſe Kings continued for the ſpace of a whole Year. He left a numerous Race behind him of above two hundred Children, and as ſome ſay, three hundred, which ſerves to aggravate the Cruelty of Atahualpa, who murthered the moſt part of them. And now becauſe our deſign is to ſhew what Animals were not found in Peru, untill they were brought thither. We ſhall make it the Subject of this following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Mares and Horſes; and how they were bred at the beginning; and of the great price and value of them.

FOR the better Information and Satisfaction, as well of the preſent as of future Ages, it will be neceſſary to know what things were not in Peru at the time when the Spaniards firſt entred into Peru; and therefore I have thought fit to make a particular Chapter thereof, to enumerate how many things theſe people wanted, which we eſteem neceſſary for the wellfare and convenient living of Mankind, and yet notwithſtanding they lived happily, and contented without them. In the firſt place we muſt know that they neither had Horſes nor Mares for their ſervice in War, or for their delight and divertiſement, they had no Cows, nor had they Oxen to plow their Lands, and prepare them for the ſeed; neither had they Camels, nor Aſſes, nor Mules for their Carriages or Burthens; nor had they Sheep, as we have in Spain, which yield us both Food and Clothing; nor had they Hogs, which yield us Salt-fleſh, and Bacon, and Leather to make our Bottels; nor had they Dogs of any good race, ſuch as Grey-hounds, Beagles, Spannels, Water-dogs and Tumblers; nor had they Maſtiffs to keep their Flocks, or Lap-dogs for pleaſure of the Ladies, but onely a company of Curs of all ſorts and ſizes, which were good for nothing.

Nor had they Wheat, or Barly, or Wine, or Oil, nor Fruit, nor Pulſe, as we have in Spain; of all which things we ſhall treat diſtinctly, and of the manner how, and when they were brought out of Spain into thoſe parts. As to the Horſes and Mares, the Spaniards brought them over with themſelves, having been very ſerviceable and uſefull to them in making their Conqueſts in the new World, of which the Indians had no great neceſſity; for being born and bred in the craggy and ſteep Mountains, they became naturally hardy, and nimble of foot, being very active in climbing aſcents, and deſcending again down the ſteepeſt Precipices. All thoſe Horſes and Mares which are in the Kingdoms and Provinces of thoſe Indies which have been diſcovered by the Spaniards ſince the Year 1492. untill this time, are of the race of thoſe which were brought from Spain, and particularly from Andaluzia. The firſt were landed in the Iſle of Cuba, and St. Domingo, and the other Iſlands of Barvolento, as they were diſcovered and ſubdued; where they increaſed, and multiplied abundantly, and thence they were tranſported to Mexico and Peru, for their ſervice and uſe in thoſe Conqueſts. At firſt, for want of care in the Maſters, who put their Horſes out to paſture looſe, and into places without fences they could not eaſily be catched again; and ſo roving in the Mountains, they became wild, flying like Deer, at the ſight of a Man, and not being ſeized or preyed upon by any fierce Creature, they increaſed and multiplied in great abundance.

The Spaniards who inhabited the Iſlands, obſerving how neceſſary Horſes were for the Conqueſts; and their Countries produced ſuch as were very good, enhanſed the prices of them to a conſiderable rate. There were certain Men who kept thirty, forty, fifty Horſes in their Stables, as we have mentioned in our Hiſtory of the Florida. The way of taking the Colts was in a certain Park, which they had encompaſſed with Pales, raiſed at ſome convenient Avenues of the Mountains, where are Coves, called Cavanas, of three or four Leagues wide, where the Horſes and Colts deſcending towards the Evening to feed, ſome perſons who keep watch in Trees give notice thereof; and then fourteen or fifteen Men on Horſe-back, riding in amongſt them, drive them within the pale, which then they encloſe, and caſting Halters about the Necks of thoſe Colts which are about three or four Years old, they tie them to trees, letting the Mares go and eſcape as they pleaſe; the Colts remain tied in this manner for three or four days, jumping and leaping untill being weakned with wearineſs, and Hunger, they yield themſelves

to the Saddle and Bridle; but many, before they are thus broken, throttle themſelves with the Halter; but then on ſuch as become tame, they ſet Boys on their backs, leading them with the Bridle; in this manner they accuſtome them morning and evening, for fifteen or twenty days, untill ſuch time as they are thoroughly broken, and then they become very gentle, and ſerviceable to their Maſters; and in a few days are ſo well managed, that they can throw the Dart upon them, and prove moſt excellent Horſes. After all parts of the Weſt-Indies were ſubdued there was no ſuch occaſion for Horſes as before, nor encouragement given for breeding and managing of them, as formerly; ſo that the Inhabitants of thoſe Iſlands turned their Traffick another way, and began to trade and deal in Hides, as we ſhall declare in its due place. Conſidering often with my ſelf at how great a price good Horſes are held in Spain, and what an excellent race theſe Iſlands yield, both for their ſize, ſhapes and colour. I have much wondred at the reaſon why they have not been tranſported thence into Spain, though it were onely in acknowledgment of thoſe which Spain did firſt ſend thither, and which were the Sires and Dams of that new Race, eſpecially ſince they may be tranſported with ſo much facility and eaſe from the Iſland of Cuba, which is one great part of the way, and many Ships come empty thus far. The Horſes of Peru are much more forward than thoſe in Spain; for the firſt time that I darted on Horſeback in Cozco, was upon a Horſe newly broken, and which had ſcarce arrived to three years of age.

When the Spaniards were firſt employed in the Conqueſt of Peru, no Man would ſpare his Horſe, or ſet any price upon him; but in caſe it happened by the Maſter's Death, or his departure for Spain, that a Horſe was ſet to ſale, the price was four, five or ſix thouſand pieces of Eight. In the Year 1554. when the Mareſchal Don Alonſo d' Alvarado went in purſuit of Franciſco Hernandez de Giron, which was before the Battel of Chuquinca. A Negro Boy leading a very hanſome Horſe in his Hand, well managed, a certain rich Gentleman caſting his Eyes upon him, and being much taken with him, ſaid to the Owner of him, Sir, for the Boy and Horſe, as they now are, I will give you ten thouſand pieces of Eight, which is as much as twelve thouſand Ducats; but the Owner refuſed the Offer, telling him that he had occaſion for the Horſe to charge upon in the next Battel, which was ſhortly expected; the iſſue of which was, that the Horſe vvas killed, and the Maſter mortally vvounded: But that vvhich is obſervable herein is this, that he vvho vvould have bought the Horſe vvas rich, having a conſiderable Colony of Indians in the Countrey of the Charcas; and the Ovvner vvas a famous Souldier, vvho, to ſignalize himſelf in that day of Battel, refuſed to ſell his Horſe at any rate, though never ſo advantageous; I knevv them both to be Gentlemen, and Perſons of Noble Quality: But ſince that time the price of Horſes is much abated in Peru, becauſe the breed is much increaſed; ſo that a good Horſe may be vvorth three or four hundred Pieces of Eight, and an ordinary Jade may be ſold at tvventy or thirty. The Indians are very commonly fearfull of an Horſe, for when they ſee him gallop, or run in any Street where they chance to meet him, they are ſo affrighted, that they think they can never croud near enough to the Wall to avoid him, fearing leſt he ſhould run over them, and trample them under foot; wherefore when they meet a Horſe in the Streets, they will croſs the Street three or four times from one ſide to the other, and being ſo ſcared (as it were) out of their Wits, they have run blindly (as I have ſeen) into the very way of the Horſe, whom they have endeavoured to avoid, and have never thought themſelves out of danger, unleſs they could get a Spaniard to ſtand before them, nor would that guard neither acquit them from all fear; and though now by cuſtome and converſation the dread of them is not ſo great, yet never could any Indian be perſuaded to take upon him the Trade of a Blackſmith, becauſe he would not be concerned in ſhooing Horſes, though in all works of Metal they are excellent Artiſts. And though the Spaniards have bred up ſome Indian Boys, and taught them to dreſs and curry Horſes, yet I never knew or ſaw an Indian that durſt adventure to mount upon their Backs; if any of them were ſo bold as to lead a Horſe by the Bridle, it was ſome tame, gentle Jade, as quiet as a Mule; for indeed that which ſcared the Indians moſt, was to find moſt of the Horſes wanton and skittiſh; for as yet the Spaniards did neither uſe them to the Martingale, nor to covers, or, as they are called, Spectacles, for their Eyes, which was a great neglect, and was the cauſe of much more labour and trouble to the Maſter in the breaking and ma-nagery of them; for these Horses are of that docible and tractable Nature, that with good dressing and management they will in every thing incline to the will and pleasure of the Master. At the beginning when the Conquest was first made in Peru, the Indians believed that the Man and the Horse were all of one piece, or the same Creature, fansying, like the Poets, that they were Centaures. They tell me now, that some Indians have adventured to shoe Horses, but that there are very few so hardy. And having said thus much concerning Horses, let us now proceed to give an account of what other things were not found in my Countrey.

CHAP. XVII.

Of their Cows and Oxen.

IT is believed that Cows were brought into Peru presently after the Conquest, which soon increased, and multiplied in those numbers, that they supplied all the Kingdom; the same also is probable of the Hogs and Goats, for I remember to have seen numbers of them in Cozco when I was a Child.

It cannot be expected that a price should be set for a Cow in the first beginning when the Spaniards planted themselves, they being brought over onely for breed; but afterwards by increasing they became common, and were sold at moderate rates. The first Man in Cozco that was Master of Cows, was Antonio de Altamirano, the Father of two Sons, Peter and Francis, which he had by an Indian Woman, and were my School-fellows, and both dyed young, to the great sorrow of the whole City, by reason of the great hopes and expectation was of their Understanding and Vertue.

The first Oxen that I ever saw at plough were in the Valley of Cozco, about the Year 1550, belonging to John Rodriguez de Villalobos; they were in all but three, one they called Chaparro another Naranco, and the third Castillo: I was carried to see this sight, with great numbers of Indians, who flocked from all parts, with astonishment and wonder, to see this prodigious Novelty, which I amongst the rest did much admire. They said that the Spaniards who were drones, and would not work themselves, had made these great Animals labour, and doe that work which they ought to have performed themselves. I have reason to remember these particulars; for when I was a Boy, and plaid the Truant to see the Oxen Plough, it cost me two dozen of good stripes, one half of which I received from my Father, and the other dozen from my Schoolmaster; the piece of land which they ploughed was a very pleasant field, which is situated a little higher than that ground where now the Convent of St. Francis is built; the which part of the Convent, where the Body of the Church stands, was erected at the charge and cost of the aforesaid John Rodriguez de Villalobos, and dedicated by him to St. Lazarus, to whom he was greatly devoted; the remainder of the Church the Franciscan Friars purchased with the two pieces of Land some years after; for when the Oxen ploughed there was no House or Buildings there, either belonging to Spaniards or Indians, as we have at large declared in that part where we make a description of the City and situation of Cozco. The Ploughmen that tilled the Land were Indians, and the Oxen were taught and broken to the Yoke in a certain Inclosure without the City, and then when they had learned their work, they were brought to Cozco, where they had as many Spectators and Admirers that day, as had the Triumphs at Rome in its mightiest grandeur. When Cows were first brought to the Market, one might be worth two hundred Pieces of Eight, but afterwards, as they increased, and became more common, they fell by degrees to that price at which they are now valued. In the beginning of the Year 1554. a Gentleman of my acquaintance, called Rodrigo d'Esquivel, an Inhabitant of Cozco, but born at Seville, bought bought at Ciudad de los Reyes ten Cows for a thouſand Pieces of Eight, which makes one thouſand two hundred Ducats; then in the Year 1559. I have ſeen them ſold at ſeventeen Pieces of Eight a head; according to the ſame proportion the price of Goats and Hogs abated, as we ſhall mention hereafter, by which we may obſerve, how fruitfull this Countrey is: Since the Year 1590. they write me, that a Bullock bought ſingly in the Market is not worth above ſix or ſeven Ducats, and being bought in a Drove together, may be had cheaper.

The Cows in the Iſle of Barlovento running in the Mountains, became all wild, as alſo the Horſes and Mares, excepting onely ſuch Cows as they kept up in their Incloſures, for the conveniences and benefit of Milk, Butter and Cheeſe, which they made of them; but ſuch as ran wild in the Mountains, multiplied and increaſed to ſuch a number, as would be incredible, did not the Hides of them, which are yearly brought thence into Spain, give us clear and demonſtrative proofs thereof, as Acoſta verifies in the 33d Chap. of his 4th Book, wherein he reports, That in the Year 1587. there was then brought in the Fleet from St. Domingo, onely 35444 Hides; and in the ſame Year, from New Spain, 64350 Cow Hides, making in all 99794.

In St. Domingo, Cuba, and the other Iſlands, their increaſe would have been much more, had they not been worried and deſtroyed by Greyhounds and Maſtiffs, with which at firſt they did uſually take them, which alſo living in the Mountains, became wild as the Cows, and ſo fierce, that unleſs ten or a dozen Men went together, there was no ſecurity; and thoſe that killed thoſe Dogs received the ſame reward as for killing a Wolf. The manner of killing theſe Cows was this: They watched when they came down into the low Lands to feed, and then they ran upon them with their Horſes, and having an Iron with ſharp prongs, in form of a half Moon, with which they ſtruck them, and then with a Cord they enſnared them about the Horns; but the Horſeman who uſes this ſport, had need take care in what manner he goes to work; for if the Beaſt be before him, he muſt take the right ſide of him, and wound him on that ſide, or elſe, if he be on the left, to wound him on the left, but not to meet juſt before him, but turn as he turns, leſt he butt and wound the Rider with his Horns, and give him no time to avoid his blow. There are ſome Men ſo dextrous in this Art, that in one cariere of their Horſe, and twice diſcharging their Gun, they will kill and knock down twenty, thirty or fourty Beaſts; and therefore in theſe Iſlands which yield ſuch quantities of Beef, they might in my opinion victual the Spaniſh Fleet with ſufficient proviſions thereof for their Voyages, unleſs by reaſon of the heat and moiſture of the Countrey, which are the cauſes of corruption, the fleſh will not eaſily receive the ſalt and pickle which are to preſerve it. I hear now in theſe times that there are Cows in Peru, which wander about in the diſpeopled Countries, and that the Bulls are ſo fierce, that they will aſſault Men as they travel in the way, and that there are almoſt as many wild Cattel there on the Continent, as in the Iſlands; which in gratefull remembrance to Spain, for the benefit they received by the Stock of Cattel ſent from thence, do now, by the great numbers of Hides which yearly they ſend, make their due acknowledgments and returns for the ſame.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Camels, Aſſes, Goats; of the prices of them; and of their great Increaſe.

NOR vvere Camels in Peru at that time, and novv alſo there are very fevv; the firſt Man (and as I think the laſt) that brought them thither, vvas John de Reynaga, a Noble Perſon, born at Bilbo, I vvas vvell acquainted vvith him, vvhen he vvas Captain of a Foot Company againſt Francis Hernandez Giron, and his followvers, and did his Majeſty good Service in that Action; for one Male and ſix Female Camels Don Pedro Portocarrero gave him ſeven thouſand Pieces of Eight, vvhich make 8400 Ducats; but the Camels have made little increaſe there.

The firſt Aſs that I ever ſavv vvithin the Dominions of Cozco vvas in the Year 1557. he was ſold in the City of Huamanca for four hundred and eighty Ducats, and bought by my Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega, with intention to get Mules by him upon his Mares. In Spain ſuch an Aſs would not have yielded ſix Ducats, for he was lean and little; but afterwards Gaſper de Sotelo, with whom I had acquaintance, bought another, which coſt him eight hundred and fourty Ducats; but after that time many Mules of both Sexes have been bred there, which have been ſpoiled and jaded upon the ſharp rocks of thoſe ways.

At what price the Goats were valued, when they were firſt brought thither, I cannot tell, yet ſome years afterwards I remember they were ſold for an hundred and an hundred and ten Ducats a Goat; but theſe were not commonly brought to market, but ſold by one friend to another at their inſtance, and deſire to oblige them therewith; and then they would tie ten or twelve of them in couples together, that they might not ſtray from each other. That which I ſpeak of now was in Cozco, in the Year 1544. and —45. but ſince that time they have ſo increaſed, as to become of ſmall value, unleſs for their Skins; for the She-goats did often bring forth three or four Kids at a time, as I have ſeen; and a certain Gentleman, who lived in Huanacu, did aſſure me, that he had ſeen ſeveral that brought forth five Kids at one yeaning.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Hogs, and their great Increaſe.

AT the beginning Hogs were much dearer than Goats, though there was no ſet price made for them. Peter de Cieça in his 26th Chapter of the Remarks or Obſervations of the Provinces of Peru, ſaith, That the Mareſhal Don George Robledo bought amongſt the Goods of Chriſtopher de Ayala, a Sow and a Pig at the price of one thouſand ſix hundred Pieces of Eight. And farther he ſaith, That this Sow was eaten ſome few days after in the City of Cali, and was the chief Entertainment at a great Feaſt; and that it was ordinary to buy Pigs in the belly of the Sow at a hundred Pieces of Eight a Pig, and ſometimes more.

He that is deſirous to know the exceſſive prices which the Spaniards gave for things in thoſe days amongſt themſelves, let him reade the fore-mentioned Chapter, and then he will ſee at how mean a rate Gold and Silver were eſteemed in compariſon with the Commodities of Spain: which proceeded from the great affection which the Spaniards bore to their Native Soil, when firſt they planted themſelves in the New World; for then they never ſcrupled the giving any price for the things which came from Spain, that they might eat them, or breed them, as if they had been ſo neceſſary to humane life, that no ſubſiſtence could be without them.

In the year 1560, a good Hog was worth ten Pieces of Eight at Cozco, and now may be had for ſix or ſeven; and were it not for the Lard, which, they ſay, is good to cure the Scab, or Murrain, to which the Cattel in that Countrey are much ſubject, they would be much cheaper: And alſo the Spaniards, for want of Oil in thoſe Countries, have licence to dreſs their Meat with it on Fridays, and in Lent.

The Sows in Peru are ſtrangely fruitfull; for in the year 1558, I remember to have ſeen in the Market of Peru two Sows, with thirty two Pigs, each of them having brought forth ſixteen Pigs at one farrowing; and when I ſaw them, they might be of a Month old; and yet they were ſo fat and ſlick, that one would wonder how it were poſſible for the Dams to maintain and ſuckle ſo many of them in ſuch good plight and condition.

The Indians give the Name of Cuchi to the Hogs, which is a word they have framed from Coche, Coche which the Spaniards utter, when they ſpeak to their Hogs.

CHAP. XX.

Of Sheep, and Tame Cats.

THE Sheep of Caſtile, which we call ſo, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of Peru, to which the Spaniards improperly give the Name of Sheep, ſince they are neither like them in ſhape, nor colour, nor any thing elſe, as we have ſhewn in its due place: Theſe Sheep, I ſay, of Caſtile, I know not when they were firſt imported into Peru, nor by whom; the firſt that I ever ſaw were in the Fields about Cozco, in the year 1556, and were then ſold, one with another, at the rate of forty Pieces of Eight a head, and ſome of the prime ſort at fifty; and were bought then both for love and money, as the Goats at firſt were.

In the year 1560, when I departed from Cozco, Mutton was not as yet ſold in the Shambles by weight: but ſince by Letters from thence dated, in the year 1590, they write me that a Sheep was then ſold in the Market for eight Ryals of Eight, or ten at moſt; and in eight years time ſince, Sheep are fallen to four Ducats a head, and under; and now at preſent are ſo common, and in ſuch numbers, that they are worth very little; for an Ewe commonly brings forth two at a time, and often three: their Wool alſo is produced in that quantity, that it is of little value, and is not worth above three or four Ryals a quarter of a hundred; I know not if they have learned as yet to make Weathers of them. There are no Wolves in thoſe Countries, nor ever were; nor will they be thought worthy to be tranſported thither, unleſs they were more profitable, and better conditioned.

Nor had the Indians Houſe-Cats before the coming in of the Spaniards, though now they have them, and call them Micitu, which is a word they have framed from the Spaniards, whom they have heard to call them Miz, Miz. This, I ſay, to rectifie the miſtake of ſome Spaniards, who were of opinion, that the Indians had Cats before the time that the Spaniards came amongſt them, becauſe they had in their Language a proper Name for them: And in like manner a certain Hiſtorian argues, that they had Hens before the time of the Spaniards, becauſe they gave them the Name of Gualpa: And this would ſeem a moſt convincing Argument to ſuch who know not the deduction, or occaſion, on which this Name of Gualpa was given, which indeed is not Gualpa, but Atahualpa; and hereon depends a moſt pleaſant Story, which we ſhall recount, when we come to treat of Tame Fowl, which were not in Peru before the time of the Spaniards.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Conies, and Dogs of Game.

NOR had they Wild, or Tame Rabbets, as we have in Spain, for they have been brought thither ſince I departed from Peru: The firſt that brought them to Cozco, was one of the Clergy called Andrew Lopez, born in the Eſtremadura, but in what Village or Town I know not. This Prieſt brought over a Buck and a Doe in a Cage, and in paſſing over a ſtream, which is about ſixteen Leagues diſtant from Cozco, and runs through the Countrey of Chinchapuyu, where the Eſtate of my Lord and Father Garçilaſſo de la Vega lyes; it happened out, that whilſt the Indian which carried them, had ſet down the Cage to reſt himſelf, and eat a bit of bread, that the Doe eſcaped out through a hole of the Cage, where one of the Rods was broken, and ran out amongſt the Rocks and Mountains, and amongſt the Willows and Oſiers which grow by the banks of the River; the Doe being then big with Young, brought forth a great many, which being conſerved afterwards by the care of the Indians, have increaſed to that degree, that they have made a Warren, and now cover the ground with their Numbers. From thence they have ſtocked other Grounds in many parts; the Land being barren, and the Graſs ſhort, they have thriven ſo well, as to become of a larger ſize than ours; as have alſo other Conies which have been brought from Spain into other parts.

It was the fortune of that Coney to get looſe in a temperate Climate, which was neither over hot, nor very cold; but as they ſpread farther up the River, the Countrey grows cooler, untill at length they come to places of perpetual Snows: Such as took their downwards as the ſtream runs, thoſe were ſubject to greater heats, untill they came to the River Apurimac, which is the hotteſt Climate of all Peru. This Story of the Conies was told me by an Indian of my Countrey, who knowing that I was writing the Hiſtory of Peru, gave me this information; for the truth of which, I refer my ſelf to the banks of that River; which if they be ſo well ſtocked with Conies, as he relates, it may ſerve for an undeniable proof. In the Kingdom of Quitu there are Conies like thoſe in Spain, onely they are leſs, and of a darker colour, having a black ſtreak along the top of their backs, in every thing elſe they are like the Rabbets we have in Spain: they have no Hares, nor do I know whether they have brought any thither as yet.

The Dogs of game, or of good race, ſuch as we have formerly mentioned, were not in Peru, untill the Spaniards brought them thither. Maſtiffs were the laſt of any tranſported to thoſe parts, by reaſon, that having no Wolves, nor other beaſts of prey which might hurt their Cattel, they had no need of ſuch Dogs for their defence, or guard. Howſoever, when they were come thither, ſuch as were Maſters of great Flocks and Herds, would not want, or be without them, not that they had any need, or occaſion for them, but onely becauſe they would have their Flocks and Herds be like thoſe in Spain: And ſo paſſionately was their fancy at the beginning inclined hereunto, that in every thing they affected the Manners and Cuſtoms of Spain; for which reaſon, and not for any need, a Spaniard carried a Maſtiff Whelp, that was not above a Month and a half old, in a Wallet, which he hanged at his Saddle-bow, from Cozco to Los Reyes, which is a hundred and twenty Leagues through a mountainous and craggy Countrey, being every day troubled to find Milk for this Whelp; the which I ſaw, and can teſtifie, having been a Companion with that Spaniard in the Journey; who told me, that he carried that Whelp for a preſent to his Father-in-law, who was a Graſier, being Maſter of great Flocks of Cattel, and lived fifty or ſixty Leagues on this ſide of Ciudad de los Reyes, by whom he would be eſteemed as a Jewel of mighty value. Theſe and greater pains have the Spaniards taken at the beginning to procure ſuch Creatures as are uſed in Spain, which afterwards they have neglected and conſerved in little eſteem.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Rats, and to what Multitudes they have increaſed.

WE muſt ſpeak ſomething of the Rats which came over with the Spaniards, for before their time there were none in the Countrey. Francis Lopez de Gomara in his General Hiſtory of the Indies, (which was not very faithfully wrote) ſays, that untill the time of Blaſco Nunnez Vela, Rats were not known in Peru; but now they are in great numbers, and of ſo great a proportion and ſize, that no Cat dares to contend or deal with them: Howſoever they are not as yet come ſo high as to the Hilly Countries, by reaſon of the cold, and Snows, nor can they find covert, or ſhelter, under which they may convey themſelves thither.

Howſoever, they have great numbers of Mice, which they call Ucucha. In Nombre de Dios, Panama, and other Cities on the Coaſt of Peru, they have ſuch an infinite number of Rats, that they are forced to deſtroy them with Poiſon of Rats-bane, which they lay for them at a certain time of the year by agreement of all the Neighbourhood; when proclamation is made that every Houſe ſhould lay its Arſnick for deſtruction of the Rats, that ſo at this notice every perſon ſhould be warned to cover their Proviſions of meat and drink from the Rats, and eſpecially the water, for ſo ſoon as the Rat hath taken his doſe, he preſently runs to the water, and therewith burſts and dyes; and then every Houſe lays its baits of Fruits, of ſuch things as Rats commonly eat, which being empoiſoned with Arſnick, deſtroy them in infinite numbers.

When I arrived at Panama from Spain, preſently after the time that the poiſon had been laid, I remember that one Evening as I walked by the Sea-ſide, I found juſt at the brink of the water ſuch quantities of dead Rats, that they covered the ground for above a hundred Paces in length, and above three or four in breadth.

And now upon occaſion of this diſcourſe, concerning the infinite numbers of Rats, I ſhall adventure to tell a ſtrange Story of this kind, upon the credit of a Noble Gentleman, call'd Hernan Bravo de Laguna, one who was Lord of Indians in Cozco, and had the honour to be mentioned in the Hiſtory of Peru: the relation he made, which he atteſts to have ſeen, was this: A Ship ſailing from Panama to Los Reyes, touched in the way upon the Coaſt at a Port called Trugillo, where the whole Ships company agreed one day to go aſhore, and be merry, leaving onely one ſick Man aboard, who, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition, was not able to walk ſo far as from the Sea-ſide to the City, which was two Leagues. Nor need we here to wonder, that they ſhould leave their Ship ſo ill provided, for in thoſe Seas ſtorms and tempeſts do ſeldom ariſe, nor was there any fear of Pyrates, or Enemies, for as yet Sir Francis Drake had not opened the Navigation into thoſe Seas. Now ſo ſoon as the Rats perceived that the Ship was freed of its company, they all ſallied out to partake freely of the ſpoil, where finding the ſick Man upon the Deck, they all joined to give him battel, that they might kill and eat him: the which hath oftentimes happened in theſe Voyages, in which ſick Men have over night been alive, and next morning have been found dead in their beds, with the fleſh of their Faces, Armes, Legs and Thighs, gnawn and torn from the bones. In this manner this hungry crew would have dealt with our ſick Man, againſt whom they formed their Army, and came to combat him, who finding himſelf ſo hardly beſet, got up, and taking a Spit from the Cook-room, returned to his bed, not to ſleep, but to watch, and ſtand upon his guard; which he did that whole day, and the night following, and the day after, untill late in the Evening, when his Companions returned to the Ship; who having heard the Story, gave credit to it, when they found behind his Bed, and upon the Deck, and in corners of the Ship, ſo many of his Enemies ſlain, which appeared upon account to be three hundred eighty, and odd, which he had killed with his Spit, beſides others which had been wounded.

The ſick Man, either out of fear, or joy of his victory, recovered his health, being much pleaſed afterwards to recount the particulars of this ſucceſs. In divers places upon the Coaſt of Peru, and in divers years, untill 1572, and 73, there were great Deſtructions, and even Plagues, cauſed by the incredible multitudes of Rats and Mice; which ſwarming over all the Land, ate up the Seeds which were thrown into the ground, as alſo the Fruit-trees; which they pilled of their bark from the roots, to the very buds and ſprouts; ſo that the Trees dying, the Inhabitants were forced to make new Plantations in their places; and feared that they ſhould have been forced to abandon their Dwellings, had not God in mercy cauſed that Plague to ceaſe on a ſudden, when it was juſt at the extremity of deſtruction. The particulars of which incredible damages, we ſhall, for brevity ſake, omit.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of their Hens and Pigeons.

WE come now, in the next place, to ſpeak of Fowls, of which few others have been tranſported into Peru, unleſs Poultry, ſuch as Cocks, and Hens, and tame Pigeons, or Houſe-doves. As for Stock-doves, or Wood-Pigeons, I know not whether any have been as yet brought thither. As to Hens, there is a certain Authour, who writes, that they were found in Peru, before the time that the Spaniards conquered it; and for proof thereof he alledges, that the Indians have a proper Name for a Hen in their own Language, which is Gualpa; and for an Egg, which is Ronto; and that the Indians have the ſame propriety in their ſpeech for a Coward, whom they call a Hen, or Hen-hearted, as the Spaniards have: To which Argument we ſhall give this ſatisfactory anſwer.

We ſhall leave the Name of Gualpa untill the end of this Chapter, and ſhall begin with the word Ronto, or Runtu, which ſignifies an Egg, not of a Hen in particular, but in general of any Fowl, vvhether tame or vvild; and vvhen they mention an Egg, they add the Fovvl or Bird from vvhich it is produced, as of a Hen, Partridge, or Dove, &c. And ſo much for Runtu, or the Egg.

As to the expreſſion of Gualpa, or Hen, to ſignifie a Covvard, the Indians may have deduced, or taken it up, from the Spaniards, as is ordinary for people vvho have entertained a familiarity and converſation vvith another to borrovv their phraſes and proprieties of their Language; as is commonly ſeen, hovv our Spaniards, that travel into Italy, France, Flanders and Germany, do frequently make uſe of the Proverbs and Expreſſions vvhich they have learned from ſtranger Nations; ſo alſo the Indians have taken this vvord from the Spaniards to denote a Covvard, for othervviſe, in their ovvn Tongue, they vvant not vvords more ſignificant than this Spaniſh Saying; for they ſometime call him Huarmi, vvhich is Woman; and have the proper vvord Campa, vvhich ſignifies a Man of a puſillanimous Spirit, and one vvithout Heart or Courage, as alſo they have the vvord Llanclla; ſo that the Metaphor of a Hen is borrovved from the Spaniards; in vvhich I may be credited, conſidering that I my ſelf am an Indian.

The word Gualpa is corrupted by contraction of the Syllables, and is inſtead of Atahualpa, which doth not ſignifie a Hen, but was the Name of the laſt Inca that reigned in Peru, whoſe Life was ſo bloudy, as we ſhall relate in its due place, that he exceeded in cruelty all the fierce and wild Beaſts and Baſilisks in the World; for he being a Baſtard by ſubtile artifices and contrivances, Murthered his Elder Brother Huaſcar, who was lawfull Heir, and Uſurped his Kingdom; and ſo with cruel torments, never before known or invented, he deſtroyed the whole

Bloud-Royal, both Men, Women and Children, over which more tender Sex, that his cruelty might triumph, he subjected them to the most exquisite torments that his tyrannical malice could invent; and not satiating himself sufficiently with his own flesh and bloud, his unhumane rage proceeded to a destruction of all the Servants and Dependants on the Royal Court, which (as we have said) were very numerous; for Offices were not confined to single persons, but to Villages and Towns, which were obliged to serve in their turns, such as Porters at the Gate, Sweepers, Water-bearers, Gardiners, and the like; all which by their Villages and Communities being employed in these services, had their Habitations for the space of five, six and seven Leagues round Cozco, whom he totally destroyed; and not being contented with a Massacre of the Inhabitants, he demolished their Dwellings, and put all to a miserable devastation; and yet his cruelties had proceeded farther, had not the Spaniards, who in the furious progress of his Tyrannies, entred that Countrey, given a stop to his farther executions.

Now whereas the Spaniards in a short time after their coming took this Tyrant Atahualpa, and in the publick Market-place putting him to the Wrack, executed him before the people in the most exemplary manner of punishment; which when the Indians observed, they praised their God the Sun, who had sent the Spaniards to perform justice, and revenge himself of the Tyrant, who had destroyed his Children, and all those of his Bloud and Family: For which reason the Indians looking upon the Spaniards, as those who were sent from their God, did yield entire obedience to them, surrendring themselves absolutely to their disposal, which was a means to facilitate their Conquests; for they adored them as the Progeny which was descended from their God Viracocha, who appeared in a dream to one of their Kings, and therefore they gave the Name of Viracocha to the Spaniards.

On this false supposition they conceived this simple fancy, that when they heard the Cocks crow, which the Spaniards brought in, and were the first that were ever seen in Peru, they imagined that the Cocks pronounced the word Atahualpa in abhorrence of his detestable tyrannies; whence contracting the word, they called Cocks and Hens by the Name of Gualpa: And whereas the Indians recounted these Fables to their Children, whereby they descended by way of tradition to after Ages; the Boys, when they heard the Cocks crow, would answer in the same tone, crowing out, Atahualpa; and I must confess, when I was a Boy, that I used, amongst the other young Indians, to imitate the same tune when I ran about the Streets.

And thus we Children quavered out Atahualpa, imitating, as near as we could, the voice of the Cock: Nor did we onely tune his Name to our Song, but we brought the Names of his principal Captains into the Air of our Musick, as Challcuchima Quilliscacha: And Ruminavi, which signifies the Eye of a Stone, because he had a Pearl (as we call it) on one of his Eyes. Blas Valera having in his loose and scattered Papers given an account of the sudden Death of Atahualpa; farther saith, that though he had been cruel to his Relations, and those of his Bloud, yet in the Government of his own people he was endued with incomparable Excellencies, endearing them to him by many obliging circumstances, and at last in Elegant Latin uses these words: "Hence it was, that so soon as his Death was di-
"vulged amongst his Subjects, they would comfort themselves in saying, that the "very Cocks which the Spaniards had brought over would not suffer the Name of "so great a Person to perish, or be forgotten, lamenting in their dolefull tone the "Name of Atahualpa; and therefore they gave the Name of Atahualpa to all
"Cocks, which word the Indians of all Nations vulgarly received, as did also the "Spaniards and Preachers take up that word, when they would express the Name "of a Cock to the Indians. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera, who received this Relation in the Kingdom of Quitu, from the Subjects of Atahualpa, who were as well inclined to him, as good Subjects are to their natural King; And on the contrary, such as lived in Cozco, and were of a different faction, interpreted the crowing of the Cock with Atahualpa in his voice, to be by way of abhorrence and detestation of the many cruelties and tyrannies of which he was guilty. By which I suppose, that I have sufficiently now confuted the three former Conjectures; and that I have clearly proved, that there were no Cocks or Hens in Peru, before the Conquest which the Spaniards made of it.

As the Spaniards brought Hens and Pigeons first into Peru, so also they brought Peacocks thither from Mexico, for before that time none of that kind had been seen ſeen in my Countrey. It is a thing very remarkable, that Hens did not hatch their Chickens in Cozco, nor yet in the Vallies neighbouring to it, though they fed them with the beſt nouriſhment they could contrive to give them; which defect they attributed to the chilneſs of the Air. Such as have mentioned this particular, have given for a reaſon hereof, that Hens were ſtrangers in that Countrey, and their conſtitution and temperament not agreeable to the Climate; becauſe in parts more warm, as Yucay and Muyna, which are not above four Leagues diſtant from the City, the Hens hatch their Chickens as in other places; but in Cozco for above thirty years the Eggs proved all addle, and ſo continued in the year 1560, when I departed from that City: but ſome years afterwards, amongſt other advices, which a certain Gentleman called Garci Sanchez wrote me, I was informed that the Hens began to hatch Chickens in Cozco, as freely and plentifully as in other places.

In the year 1556, a Gentleman Native of Salamanca, call'd Don Martin de Guzman, who had been in Peru; returning from Spain a ſecond time thither, carried very fine furniture for Horſes with him, and other curioſities, amongſt which he had a little Canary-bird in a Cage, which ſang to admiration, and was the wonder of all, how ſo little a creature ſhould be able to endure the long Voyage over two great Seas, and the Travels by Land both in Spain, and in Peru, from the Sea to Cozco. Thus we mention ſmall and inconſiderable Birds, that ſo it may be an inducement to tranſport Birds and Fowl of greater benefit and uſe, ſuch as Partridges, and other tame Fowl, which we breed up in our Yards, and feed at our Barn-doors.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of their Wheat.

FRom the Relation of Birds and Fowl, we are next to paſs to Corn, Plants, Lentils, and ſuch other things as were wanting in Peru: And as to this point we muſt note, that the firſt perſon that imported Wheat into my Countrey (for ſo I call the whole Empire of the Incas) was a certain noble Lady, called Mary of Eſcobar, who was married to Diego de Chaves, both Natives of Truxillo; I was well acquainted with her, when I lived at my own Plantation, but many years after ſhe came to Peru, ſhe removed to Cozco; but her Husband I did not know, for he dyed at Los Reyes.

This Lady, worthy of all good fortune, was the firſt that imported Wheat to the City of Rimac in Peru; for which great benefit ſhe received no thankfull returns from my Countrey, though for a leſs valuable conſideration the Gentiles adored Ceres for a Goddeſs: I know not the year preciſely in which it was brought; but this I am ſure, the quantity was ſo ſmall, not exceeding half a Buſhel, that they ſowed the Corn three years for its increaſe, dividing it into ſmall parcels of thirty and forty Granes to a neighbour; which was given alſo for friendſhip ſake, that ſo every one might enjoy ſomething of the new Harveſt.

For this great benefit which this worthy Woman did to Peru, and for the many ſervices performed by her Husband, who was one of the firſt Conquerours, a Plantation of Indians was beſtowed upon her in the City de los Reyes. In the year 1547, Wheaten bread was not as yet eaten in Cozco, though there was ſome Wheat found in the Countrey: And I ſpeak it upon this ground, becauſe I do remember, that when Don Frayſolano Dominico, Biſhop of that City, fled from the Battel of Harina, he quartered in my Father's houſe with fourteen or fifteen of his Companions, and my Mother entertained them with Bread of Mayz; and the Spaniards were then ſo famiſhed with hunger, that they had not the patience to ſtay untill the Dinner was made ready, but taking whole handfulls of the raw Mayz, devoured them as if they had been ſugred Almonds. It is not certainly known who was the firſt that imported Barley, it is probable that ſome Granes of it being mixed with the Wheat, might grow up with it, for we obſerve that they are never purely and entirely ſeparated.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Vine, and of him who first planted Grapes.

HE who had the honour to be the first Importer of Noah's Plant was Francis de Caravantes, a Nobleman of Toledo, and one of the first Conquerours of Peru. This Gentleman considering the Countrey to be in some tolerable state of quiet and repose, sent for Vines to the Canaries, as being the neareſt place; from whence they brought the black sort of Grape, which produces a red Wine, but not of the deepest red, or Tent-colour; and though they have since planted several sorts of Vines, such as Muscatel, and others, yet there is none of a pale or whitish colour.

Bacchus was adored by the Gentiles, and worshipped for a God in reward of a lesser piece of service than this Gentleman had done for the Indians; for though Wine be now plentifull in Peru, yet the Natives thereof have so ungentile a palate, that they know not how to relish it, contenting themselves with their ancient Beverage made of Cara and Water. Moreover, I have heard in Peru, from the report of a Gentleman of good repute, that a certain Spaniard, who was very curious, and a great Virtuoso, had extracted a sort of Wine called Almacigo from Raisins which he had brought from Spain; and that having sowed some of the Raisinstones, they produced a kind of Vines, but were so tender, that he was forced to conserve them three or four years in Almacigo, untill such time as they were strong enough to be planted; and that from thence the Grapes have taken so high a colour, that all the Wine in Peru became like the Tent-wine in Spain, though not altogether of so deep a colour. It is probable that the Grapes of Peru have had their Original from both of these ways; for the Spaniards, who were always passionate for their Countrey, and desirous to see the same Fruits growing in the Indies, as were in Spain, did omit no experiments or trials to bring the same to their desired intent. Captain Bartholomew de Terrazas, who was one of the first Conquerours of Peru, and one of those who entred Chili under the Admiral Don Diego de Almagro, was the first that planted Grapes in his own Vineyard in the City of Cozco; I was well acquainted with this Gentleman, and esteemed him for a most generous person, and well accomplished in all points of most vertuous Endowments. He planted a Vineyard in his Lands, situated in the Province of Cuntisuyu, which he manured by Indians, being called Achanquillo; from whence in the year 1555, as an evidence and proof of his good Husbandry, and greatness of his liberal Soul, he sent thirty Indians laden with fair and goodly Grapes to his intimate and familiar friend Garçilasso de la Vega, my honoured Lord, with order that he should divide amongst the Gentlemen of that City an equal share and proportion, that every one might enjoy the fruit of his labours. It was indeed at that time a great curiosity to have the Fruit of Spain growing in that Countrey, and a clear evidence of his munificent and liberal Soul; for if he would have made merchandise of those Grapes, he might have sold them for four or five thousand Ducats. For my part, I did partake of those Grapes, for my Father having made me the Messenger to carry them, attended with two Pages, I delivered to every principal House two large bunches of them.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Wine; and of the first Man that made it in Cozco; and of the value of it.

ON the 21st of January, 1570. being upon my departure for Spain, I passed through the Plantation of Peter Lopez de Caçalla, a Native of Llerena, a place not far distant from Cozco, he had been Secretary to the President of Gasca, otherwise called Marcahuasi, about nine Leagues from the City, and there I met with a Portugal, called Alfonso Vaez, who was a great Husbandman, and skilfull in Agriculture, and a very honest Man; he shewed me all his Ground and Plantations, which were full of most rare and excellent Grapes, but would not suffer me to gather one bunch of them, which would have been very acceptable to a Traveller, as I was, and to one who loved them so well, but he was not pleased to shew me so much kindness; which when he perceived that I took notice of, he told me plainly, that I ought to pardon that piece of discourtesie, for that his Master had encharged him not to meddle with so much as one Grape, because he intended to make Wine of them, as he afterwards did, pressing them in a trough, because he had no other convenience wherewith to tread or press them out; and as a School-fellow of mine told me afterwards in Spain, that this Peter Lopez de Caracalla, resolved to gain the Jewel which Charles the 5th commanded to be given to the first Spaniard, who from any of the Spanish Plantations should produce, or be able to shew a certain quantity of Wheat, Barley, Wine or Oil, the which this great Emperour, and other Princes of glorious memory, were pleased to hold forth, as an encouragement to those who should well manure their Land, that it might produce the Fruits of Spain, which did not originally belong to that Countrey.

The quantity of Wheat or Barley which was required, was about a Seame, and of Wine, and Oil, about a hundred Weight of each, which is four Arrobas of Spanish Measure; and the Reward was to be of two pieces of Plate to the value of three hundred Ducats a piece; the gain and lucre of which was not the chief motive, that induced Pedro de Lopez de Caçalla to be thus industrious in his Plantations, but rather the Glory and Honour he conceived of being renowned to posterity, for being the first who made Wine from his own Vineyards near Cozco: and thus much shall serve as to the first Wines which were made in my Countrey, for other Cities of Peru, such as Huamanca and Arequepa, had them long before, but they were a sweet sort of Haloca, or Muscatel Wines. Discoursing once in Cordova with a Canon or Prebend of Peru, concerning these matters which we now relate, he told me that he was acquainted in the Kingdom of Quitu, with a certain Spaniard, who was a very curious Person, and one very skilfull in Husbandry, especially in the manuring of Vineyards; for he was the first that brought Vines from Rimac to Quitu, and had planted a spatious Vineyard along the Banks of the River Mira, which being under the Equinoctial Line, is extremely hot; and for the greater curiosity he shewed me twelve several Apartments, one of which he pruned every month in the year, and by that means had always fresh and ripe Grapes through all the months of the year. In all parts of Peru they water their Vines, because the Countrey is very hot, and the Weather always of the same temperature; so that when they would have their Vines produce their Fruit, they afford them Water, and when not, and that they would have the Sap fall to the root, they with-hold the Water, and afterwards having cast their Leaves, and again pruned them, they open the Water-banks, with which the root being refreshed, they spring, and bud, and produce their Fruit: In the same manner it passes in some Vallies with the Mayz, where one furrow is newly sowed, when another is half a foot high in growth, and another is in the ear, and ready to be reaped; all which is effected by the natural situation of the Climate, which makes makes no difference of Seaſons, and is indeed the effect of Nature, rather than of Curioſity, or any other good Husbandry.

In the Year 1560. vvhich vvas about the time that I departed from Cozco, and ſome vvhile after, it vvas not the cuſtome to afford Wine at the Table upon any invitation of the Neighbours, vvho vvere ſuch as vvere Maſters of Indians, and common Gueſts, unleſs one, or ſo, might require it for the ſake of his Health, being accounted a point of Luxury and Vice for any one to drink it for other cauſe than for neceſſity. For vvhen the Spaniards laid their firſt foundations of this Empire, they acted it vvith great ſobriety, and having began vvith hardſhip and temperance, they eaſily continued a moderate and frugal Table; ſo that their Gueſts, vvhen invited, vvould refuſe Wine, though it vvere offered them; for they knew the price to be very dear, being vvorth, vvhen cheapeſt, at leaſt thirty Ducats the Arrove, (vvhich is but tvventy five pounds vveight) and continued at the ſame price untill after the Wars of Franciſco Hernandez Giron. In the time of Gonçalo Piçarro, and before, it vvas vvorth from three hundred to five hundred Ducats the Arrove; and in the Years 1554. and 55. the Vintage ſo generally failed through the vvhole Kingdom; and ſuch ſcarcity there vvas of it in the City of los Reyes, that there vvas ſcarce ſufficient for the Sacrament vvhich is celebrated in the Maſs; vvherefore the Archbiſhop D. Jeronimo de Loayſa, ordered that half a Butt of Wine vvhich vvas found in a Houſe ſhould be conſerved for the uſe and ſervice of the Maſſes. In ſuch ſcarcity and want of Wine they remained for ſeveral Days and Months, untill a ſhip arrived in that Port, belonging to two Merchants of my acquaintance, (whom, out of reſpect to their Noble Families, I forbear to name,) importing two thouſand Barrels of Wine, part of which they ſold at firſt for three hundred and ſixty Ducats the Barrel, and the latter parcel for no leſs than two hundred. This account I received from a Maſter of one of the Veſſels on which I embarked in my Voyage from los Royes to Panama; for which reaſons Wine is not commonly drank. On a certain day a Gentleman who was Maſter of Indians invited another to dine with him, who was Maſter of none, and being in cheerfull converſation with five or ſix Spaniards more, he deſired a cup of Water to drink; upon which the Maſter of the Houſe ſent him Wine, but he refuſing it, ſaid that he drank no Wine; whereupon the Maſter replied, that if it were ſo, he ſhould deſire his company to eat with him every day; intimating that the charge of Victuals was inconſiderable, provided that the reckoning were not inflamed with Wine, which yet was not refuſed ſo much for the dearneſs of it, as for the total want there was ſometimes of it, being brought from ſo remote parts as Spain.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Olive Plants, and who brought them first to Peru.

IN the same Year of 1560. Don Antonio de Ribera; an Inhabitant of the City of los Reyes, who had been Procurator General of Peru, and lived some time there; and going afterwards into Spain, and returning back again, he brought with him from Seville several Olive Plants, which he carefully saved, and put up in two great Jars, and of above a hundred which he had brought, there were but three slips onely that were alive, the which he planted in a fruitfull Soil and Valley, wherein he having also other Fruits, such as Grapes, Figgs, Pomegranats and Oranges, Limes, and the like, with Pulse, and Seeds of Spain, he sold them publickly in the Market-place of that City, which being new Fruit, were bought up at any prices, and as I am informed for certain, that he made above two hundred thousand Pieces of Eight thereof. Don Antonio de Ribera having planted these Olive Trees in his own Land, would not afford so much as one Leaf of them to be planted in any other Ground than his own; and for security of them he guarded them with at least one hundred Negroes, and thirty Dogs, which watched his rich Plantations both by day and night; but it happening out that some persons, more watchfull than his Dogs, and perhaps by the connivance or consent of the Negroes, (as is to be suspected) stole away in the night time one of the three Olive Plants, the which, in some time after, was seen to flourish and grow in Chili, being above six hundred Leagues from the City of Los Reyes; and there for the space of three Years afforded many sprouts for divers Plantations, increasing with that prosperous success, that not the least twig was put into the ground, but which took, and in a short time became a fair Olive Tree.

Don Antonio de Ribera, for recovery of his Plants, having procured many Excommunications against the Authours of this Theft; at the end of three years it came to pass, that the same Tree was again restored, and replanted in the very same place from whence it had been taken, with that secrecy, and with that dexterity returned, that the Master could never detect the Person who had robbed him of it. The Olive-plantations have thrived better in Chili, than they have done in Peru; the reason whereof may be, because the Climate of Chili may be more agreeable to them, being situate from thirty to forty degrees, being almost of the same temperature with Spain; and in Peru they thrive better in the Hills than in the Plains. At first three or four Olives were a great Treat for a Stranger, but now at this time they bring Oil from Chili to Peru. And thus much shall serve to have spoken concerning the first plantations of Olives in my Countrey; let us proceed to other Plants, Pulse and Seeds, which were not originally in my Countrey.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of other Fruits of Spain, and Sugar Canes.

IT is moſt certain, that anciently in Peru there were neither Figs nor Pomegranates, nor Oranges, nor ſweet or ſower Lemons, nor Apples, nor Pears, nor Quinces, nor Nectarines, nor Peaches, nor Apricocks, nor Plumbs of any ſort, like thoſe in Spain; onely they have one ſort of Plumb different from ours, which the Spaniards call Melas, and the Indians Uſſun, nor had they Melons, or Cucumbers, nor Goards, which we dreſs and ſtew in our Diſhes. Of all theſe Fruits which I have named, and many others which I cannot call to mind, there was not any ſort found in Peru, when the Spaniards at firſt entred the Countrey, and yet now the abundance of them is ſo great, that they are not eſteemed; and like the Cattel, the number is ſo increaſed, that the Spaniards themſelves have admired the plenty.

When Pomegranates were firſt produced in the City of los Reyes, they carried one of them, of a prodigious greatneſs, in proceſſion, laying it upon the Pageant of the moſt holy Sacrament, when that was carried in triumph on the Feſtival day of Corpus Chriſti. I dare not deſcribe the bigneſs of it, leſt I ſhould be thought to tell a Traveller's Story, and offend the incredulity of ignorant People, who conceive the perfection of all worldly things to be contained within the compaſs of their own Village. Howſoever it would ſeem an imprudent caution, and too much nicety for a Man to forbear to relate the great Wonders of Nature, for fear of offending the ignorant ſort of Mankind; and therefore I ſhall take the boldneſs to report with confidence, that the Pomegranate, of which I ſpeak, was as big as the Veſſel in which they ordinarily carried Oil from Seville into the Indies; and many bunches of Grapes have weighed eight or ten pound weight, and Citrons half a hundred, and Quinces as big as a Man's Head. And thus much for the Fruit. Now as to other Trees and Plants, we ſhall deliver that which is as ſtrange and wonderfull as the former.

I ſhould gladly know the Names and Conditions of thoſe Perſons who were ſo curious and induſtrious as to import them into theſe parts, that ſo I might ſpecifie and record them in this Hiſtory, as worthy of due Praiſe and Honour. In the Year 1580. a Spaniard called Gaſpar de Alcoçer, who was a rich Merchant in the City of los Reyes, and had there a very fair Plantation, was the firſt that brought Cherries, and Mazards, into that Countrey, which, as they tell me, are all dead, by reaſon of the over great care they had of them, and the many experiments they tried to make them grow. Nor were there anciently Sugar-Canes in Peru, though now by the induſtry of the Spaniards, and the fertility of the ſoil, they are increaſed to a loathſome plenty; that whereas formerly they were highly they eſteemed, are now become of no value or eſtimation.

The firſt Sugar Works of Peru were made in Huanacu by the contrivance of a Gentleman, with whom I was well acquainted; a Servant of his who was a ſubtile and ingenious Perſon, obſerving the great quantities of Sugar which were imported from Mexico, by reaſon of which the Sugar of that Countrey would not ſell to any Account, adviſed his Maſter to ſend one Ship's lading of his Sugar into New Spain, that they ſeeing thereby the plenty of that Commodity in Peru, might forbear to ſend any more thither; the project ſucceeded according to expectation, and now Sugar-works are erected in many places of that Countrey.

I have been told, that ſome Spaniards, who have been curious in Husbandry, have engrafted the Fruits of Spain, upon the wild Stocks of Peru, to the great admiration of the Indians, who have been aſtoniſhed to ſee one of their own Trees to bear two, three, and four ſorts of Fruit in one year, which being a curioſity beyond the ſcantling of their Underſtanding, they have contented themſelves with the admiration of it, without farther ſearch into the cauſe. I am of opinion that

Olives

Olives might be engrafted on thoſe Trees which the Indians call Quiſhuar, for both the Wood and the Leaf is much like an Olive; and I remember when I was a Boy, that I have often heard the Spaniards ſay, that Olives and Oil did proceed from Trees like them; but the truth is, that Tree is barren, for though it caſts out a Leaf like the Olive, yet it ſoon withers and falls: for want of Canes we did uſually in Cozco make our Darts of that Wood; for Canes will not grow in ſo cold a Countrey as that.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of their Garden-Herbs, and other Herbs, and of the greatneſs of them.

OF all the common Herbs, and Plants, and Roots, which are eaten in Spain, there was none in Peru; that is to ſay, Lettuce, Radiſhes, Turnips, Garlick, Onions, Beets, Spinage, Goards, Garden-Carduus, Aſparagus, and the like, which grow in Spain, onely there was Purſloin and Pennyroyal; nor of Seeds had they Peaſe, or Beans, or Lentils, or Anniſeed, or Muſtard-ſeed, or Carroways, or Rice, or Lavander, nor many other Herbs and Plants; nor had they Roſes, or Gillyflowers of various ſorts, as we have in Spain, nor Jaſmines, nor other odoriferous Flowers.

Of all theſe Herbs and Flowers which we have already named, and many others, which I cannot now call to mind, there are now ſuch great quantities, and which do now abound to that degree, that they are cumberſome and pernitious to the ground, having ſo ſpread and rooted themſelves in ſome Vallies, that they cannot be eradicated and deſtroyed by the Art and Induſtry of Mankind; and having ſo over-run ſome Vallies, that they have rooted out the ancient name, and cauſed them to take that of the prevailing Weed, witneſs that of Rucma, which is now called the Valley of good Herbs upon the Coaſt. In the City of los Reyes the firſt Spinage and Endive which they ſowed grew to that prodigious height, that a Man could not reach the top of it with his Hand, and ſo thick, that a Horſe could not paſs through them; and all other Herbs grew to the like rankneſs and largeneſs at the beginning; in like manner Wheat in many parts yields three hundred Buſhels for one.

In the Valley of Huarcu, lately peopled by a Colony which the Vice-king Don Hurtado de Mendoça ſent thither, the like abundance was obſervable; for in the Year 1560. being upon my Voyage into Spain, one of the Inhabitants of that Colony, called Garci Vazquez, who had been a Servant to my Father, carried me to his Houſe, where at Supper he gave me ſome Bread, and told me, that it was of that Corn which had yielded him three hundred for one; and ſo much I tell you, ſaid he, that you may report it of a truth in Spain; which when I ſeemed to admire, Garci Vazquez aſſured me that I might believe it, for that upon the Faith of a Chriſtian he had ſowed no more than two Buſhels and a half of Wheat, and that they had produced 680 Buſhels, which were heaped in his Granary, and that he thought he had loſt as much more for want of people to gather it in.

Once I remember, that telling this ſtory to Gonçalo Silveſtre, of whom we have made mention in our Hiſtory of Florida, and ſhall have farther occaſion to name him, when we ſhall have deduced our matter to his time, he confirmed the ſame, and farther aſſured me, that in the Province of Chuquiſaca, which is near to the River of Pillcumayu, and where he hath ſome Lands, that the firſt Year he ſowed Wheat, it yielded him four hundred Buſhels for one. In the Year 1556. when Don Garçia de Mendoça went Governour into Chili, and taking the Port of Arica in his way, it was told him, that in a certain Valley, near to that place, called Cu- çapa, there was a Turnip to be ſeen of that prodigious bigneſs, that five Horſes might be tied to the top branches of it, and that if he pleaſed, they would carry him to ſee it. Garçia willingly accepted the profer, and went thither purpoſely that he might ſay he had ſeen ſuch a ſight, which when he ſaw, he found the report true, for the Turnip was ſo big, that a Man could ſcarce encompaſs it with both his Armes; and ſo tender, that being brought to Don Garçia's quarters, many people ate of it. In the valley which is called the Vale of good Herbs, there are ſome Herbs of two Yards and a half long, for I keep the meaſures of ſome of them, and upon that aſſurance I give this Relation.

In the Year 1595. and in the Month of May, being in the Cathedral Church of Cordova, and there diſcourſing with Don Martin de Contreras, and telling him, that being now to write theſe particulars in my Hiſtory, I was a little ſcrupulous to deliver the truth of the ſtrange increaſes of Corn, and the prodigious growth of Herbs in my Countrey, leſt to many, who had never gone out of their own, it ſhould ſeem incredible, or that I took the privilege of a Traveller, which is to lye; but he deſired me not to forbear to give a true account on ſuch conſiderations, leaving to them to believe what they pleaſed; for my part, I can teſtifie that I was an Eye-witneſs of the great Turnip in the Valley of Cuçapa, where I was that day with Don Garçia de Mendoza, and upon the Faith of a Gentleman I ſaw the five Horſes tied to the tops of the Turnip, and that afterwards I ate ſome of it with ſeveral others; and farther I can add, that the ſame day I ſaw in the Valley of Yca a Melon which weighed an hundred and three pounds weight, the truth of which was atteſted before a publick Notary; and in the Valley of Yucay I ate of one Root of Lettuce, which weighed ſeven pounds and an half. Many other things of the like kind concerning Corn, Fruit and Herbs, this Gentleman related to me, which I omit to mention, that I may not ſeem tedious to the Reader.

Acoſta, in the 19th Chapter of his 4th Book, where he treats of the Greens, Herbs and Fruits of Peru, hath theſe very Words, which I have extracted verbatim: "I have never heard, ſaid he, that the Indians ever had Gardens for Herbs, "onely that they digged ſome little pieces of ground to ſow Herbs, Peaſe, Beans "and Fitches; nor have I learned, that ever any kind of theſe ſeveral ſorts of "Pulſe which grow in Europe were found in Peru, untill they were firſt imported "by the Spaniards, which ſince have grown and increaſed in a wonderfull manner; "for the fertility of thoſe Countries far exceeds the ſoil of Spain, as we have given "an example of the Melons which grow in the Valley of Yca in Peru, which are "not ſown every year like ours, but take a root which produces Melons for "many Years, and are cut and pruned at the Seaſons like a Tree, which is a thing "that never happened in any part of Spain, &c. Thus far are the Words of Acoſta, upon whoſe Authority I adventure with much confidence to report the great fruitfulneſs of this Countrey; and how wonderfully at the beginning the Fruits of Spain thrived and increaſed to an incredible greatneſs; to which alſo I ſhall add another Excellency which Acoſta mentions, which is, that the Melons did all prove good, provided that time were given them to ripen, which gives a farther indication of the fertility of this Soil. And in regard the firſt Melons which were ſeen in the parts adjacent to los Reyes, gave occaſion to a pleaſant ſtory which we ſhall not omit in this place, becauſe it is a farther evidence of the ancient ſimplicity of the Indians, which is this: A certain Inhabitant of the City of los Reyes, who was one of the firſt Conquerours, and a Perſon of Noble Bloud, named Antonio Solar, having a Plantation in Pachacamac, about four Leagues diſtant from the City, maintained a Spaniard for his Baily, to overſee and manure his land; who ſent two Indians, laden with five Melons apiece, being ten in all, to his Maſter, that he might taſte the fruit of his ground; and therewith ſent a Letter in one of the Baskets, telling them, that in caſe they ate any of them, that Paper would diſcover it. With this charge they departed, and being half a days Journey on their way, they ſate down to reſt, and repoſe themſelves; during which ſtay, one ſaid to the other, Let us taſte of this Fruit which we carry to our Maſter, but the other made ſome ſcruple, ſaying, The Paper will diſcover all, as our Steward told us; but the other replied, that if they threw the Paper behind the Hedge, it could not ſee them, nor ariſe up in witneſs againſt them; which contrivance pleaſed the Companion, and the Paper being laid aſide, they cut the Melon, and devoured it. For the Indians at firſt not underſtanding the Myſtery of Letters, imagined that Papers were Messengers, to whom the Spaniards had declared their minds, and spoken those words which were delivered to them, and that they were as Spies to tell whatsoever they saw in the way where they travelled; and therefore when they fell to their treat, they laid the Paper behind a bank, that it might not see them. As they travelled on their Journey, he that carried the five Melons said to him that had the four; if we go with this odd number, our Master will suspect that we have eaten one, and therefore let us eat another, to make them equal; this witty Counsel pleased well, and so by agreement they sate down and ate the other: And being now come to their Master, they presented him with eight Melons onely, who reading the Letter, asked them what was become of the other two Mellons, for that the Letter specified ten. No Sir, said they, the Steward gave us but eight. Why do you lie, said Antonio Solar, for the Paper speaks of ten! Wherewith the poor Fellows became so affrighted and confused, that they knew not what to reply, but onely to confess the truth, saying, that with great reason the Spaniards were called Viracocha, since they were able to penetrate into such hidden Secrets. A Story of the like nature Gomara relates to have happened in the Island of Cuba, when it was at first possessed by the Spaniards; and indeed it is no wonder that the same ignorance should be common in all parts of the new World; for the simplicity of the Indians was such, as that whatsoever was new, and not seen to them before, could never enter into their capacities, and onely served to fill them with wonder and admiration; for whatsoever they observed to be extraordinary in the Spaniards, such as running on Horseback, breaking Oxen to the Yoke, and ploughing the ground with them, making Mills, and building Arches for Bridges, shooting with Guns, and killing at an hundred and two hundred paces, and the like, were all such miracles to them, as could not be effected by other means, than some Divine Power; and for that reason they called the Spaniards Gods, as they did in the evidence which the Paper gave against them.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Flax, Asparagus, Visnagas, with which they cleanse Teeth; and Anniseeds.

NOR was there Flax in Peru at first, but Donna Catalina de Retes, who was a Native of St. Lucar, and Mother-in-law to Francis de Villafuerte, a noble and religious Lady, and one of the first Nuns of the Convent of St. Clare in Cozco, expected in the Year 1560. to receive some Flax Seed from Spain, to sow in that Countrey, together with Looms and Instruments to spin and weave Linen for their Houses; but in the Year that I departed from Peru, I cannot say that those things were as yet brought; but since I came from thence, I have heard that considerable quantities of Linen are made there, though I cannot avouch how great Spinsters the Spanish Women have been, nor how good Huswives my Countrey Women are; for I did never see them spin Linen, though I have seen them sow, and weave Cotton and fine Wool, which the Indian Women span with great curiosity, though they combed it with their Fingers, for want of Cards wherewith to card it, and therefore they may be excused, if they be not as yet become such excellent Spinsters of Linen as our Spanish Housewives are.

But to return to our former Discourse, relating to the great esteem which the Fruits and Commodities of Spain had gained in the Indies at first, when the Spa- niards had newly planted themſelves in Peru; I remember that in the Year 1555. or ---56 Garçia de Melo, who was then Treaſurer for his Majeſty in Cozco, ſent to my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega a preſent of three Aſparagus, where he had them, or where they grew, is not known; onely he deſired him to accept and eat that curioſity of Spaniſh Fruit; the Aſparagus were very fair ones, two of which were as big as a middle Finger, and the third of a yard long; the other was thicker, but ſhorter, but all of them ſo tender, that they were eaſily broken. My Father, that he might doe the greater honour to this Spaniſh Plant, ordered that the Aſparagus ſhould be boiled on a Pan of Coals in his own Chamber, in preſence of ſeven or eight Gentlemen, who were at Supper with him. When the Aſparagus were boiled, and a ſauce for them made with Oil and Vinegar, Garçilaſſo divided the two largeſt among the Gueſts at his Table, and the third he took wholly to himſelf, deſiring them to pardon him for that time, if he carved himſelf the largeſt portion of the Spaniſh Fruits. In this manner the Aſparagus were eaten with great chear and mirth, as if the Phenix had been to be divided amongſt them; and though I ſerved then at the Table, yet nothing thereof fell to my ſhare.

About that time alſo Captain Bartholomew of Ferrazas ſent my Father three Viſnaga ſtalks, (which grow like our Fennel Seeds, and are for picking the Teeth,) the which being brought from Spain, were accepted with much thankfulneſs, and were ſerved at the Table to a Stranger after Dinner, one of the Straws being given him with much Ceremony.

About this time alſo Anniſeeds were produced in Cozco, and ſtrewed in all their Bread, which was of greater eſteem than all the Nectar or Ambroſia which the Poets mention; at this rate the inconſiderable things of Spain were eſteemed in Peru at the firſt, which may ſerve to pleaſe the curioſity of after Ages, when they reade the Hiſtory of the firſt actions and humours of their Forefathers. Howſoever I do not find that either Aſparagus have thrived, or that Viſnagas have been produced in that Countrey, though other Plants, Corn, Herbs and Cattel have multiplied in exceeding abundance.

In like manner they have planted Mulberry Trees, and brought over Silk-Worms, which before that time were not in Peru; but the Silk which they produce will not hold Winding, or Spinning, by reaſon of ſome great defect in it.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the new Names given to distinguish their several Tribes, or Generations.

BUT the best and most to be esteemed of all those things which were transported into the Indies, were the Spaniards themselves, and the Negros which are their Slaves and Servants. From these two Nations others have been derived, which are a compound of these, and different mixtures which are distinguished by divers Names. And though in our History of Florida we have mentioned this particular, yet it being to our present purpose, it may be convenient to repeat it again in this place: the matter is this: A Spanish Man, or Woman, born in Spain, and come into that Countrey, is there called a Spaniard, or a Castilian; but the Children born in the Indies from Spaniards, are called Criollos, which signifies one born in that Countrey; which word was made by the Negros, for so also they call their own Children born in those parts, and thereby distinguish them from those of Guiny, who are of more esteem for having been born free in the Countrey of their Fathers, than those who were born in the land of Bondage; so that the Name of Criollos is common to the race of the Spaniards, and of the Negros: the bloud of a Negro, and an Indian, being mixed together, is called a Mulata, or Molata: To the Children of this kind of mixture they give the Name of Cholo, which is a word framed in the Isles of Barlovento, which is as much as a Dog, and not a Dog neither of the best kind or race, but of a Cur, or Mongril, giving them the most detestable, and most villanous Name they could invent; but the Children between a Spaniard and an Indian they call Mestizos, which signifies such as come of Spanish and Indian bloud, which is a word formed and framed by our Forefathers the Spaniards, who first conquered this Countrey; and for this reason I am not ashamed to own that honourable denomination, and with a full mouth pronounce my self to be one of them; though in the Indies they take it for a great disparagement for any Man to say to one of them, Thou art a Mestizo, or he is a Mestizo, and for that reason they take it to be a more honourable Name to be called a Mountanier, which at first was given them for an affront or disparagement, in regard that Mountanier is one born and bred in the Mountains: But afterwards in consideration that those who live in the Mountains of Biscay and Asturias, do under the Title of Mountainers assume to themselves great Honours and Privileges, the Mestizos were pleased with that Appellation, though indeed it is onely honourable to those who are Natives of those Provinces of Spain, and not to those who are born in the Mountains of Peru; as Antonio de Lebrixa attests, to whom Spain owes much for the Eloquence of his Latine Tongue. In the vulgar Language of Peru, Sacharuna signifies a Mountainer, and which more properly is a Salvage; and so when they called them Mountainers, it implied that they were a kind of Beasts, or wild Men; though our silly Parents not understanding the true propriety of the word, were pleased, and gloried in their own ignominy: the Children of Mestizos they call Quatraluos, which is to say, that they are three parts Spanish, and but one Indian; but the Children of a Mestizo, with an Indian Woman, they call Tresalvus, which is three parts Indian, and but one Spanish. All these Names, and many others, which for brevity sake I omit, were framed in my Countrey for distinction of the several generations, and mixtures of bloud, which have been compounded since the time of the Spaniards, and who were the Authours of them, as they were of many other particulars which we have formerly noted. And so let us return again to our History of the Incas, who were descended from Huayna Capac the Great, whose memorable Actions require our attention.

Huayna Capac being dead, the two Brothers reigned peaceably together for four or five years in quiet possession of their respective Jurisdictions, without invading the Rights, or Limits, of each other, or attempting new Conquests. For the King Huascar had his Territories bounded to the North with the Kingdom of Quitu, which belonged to his Brother; and all the other three quarters were already subjected to his Dominion, as far as from the lofty Mountains of the Antis, to the Sea-coast, which extend East, West and South, comprehending therein the Kingdom of Chili. The Inca Atahualpa on the other side lived peaceably, not aspiring to new Conquests, but onely inclined to enjoy himself, and consult the good and benefit of his people, but Dominion and Rule can admit no Rival or Equal; so this Tranquillity continued not for above five years before that Huascar repenting of his easie assent to the desire of his Father, imagined that he had, to his own great damage quitted his Right to the Kingdom of Quitu unto his Brother Atahualpa; for besides the prejudice he suffered by having so considerable a branch lopped off from his Empire, he also found himself disenabled from farther progress in his Conquests, or making additions to his Dominions, being shut up on that side by his Brother, where onely there was way to farther Conquests; the glory of which were now onely belonging to the fortune of Atahualpa: And in regard, that as by such acquisitions he was in a possibility of making his Empire greater than his, so it was probable he might become equal, if not superiour to him: And seeing that this his Brother was of an ambitious, and an unquiet Spirit, he had just cause to suspect, that finding himself strong and powerfull, he would attempt to take the Diadem from his own Head.

These melancholy Considerations increasing daily in the breast of Huascar, he grew so sad and pensive, that not being able to support longer the burthen of his jealousie, he dispatched a Messenger to his Brother Atahualpa; giving him to understand, that according to the ancient Constitution and Canon of the First Inca Manco Capac, which had been observed by all generations descended from him, the Kingdom of Quitu, and all the dependencies belonging to it, were properly, and of right inherent in the Crown, and Imperial Seat of Cozco. And though he had quitted his claim thereunto, in respect to that forced obedience he owed to his Father, yet by the strict Rules of Justice he was not obliged thereunto, nor was any such Resignation lawfull, being to the damage of his Crown, and to the right of his Successours, which his Father had neither power to enjoin, nor he to perform: But in regard his Father had so commanded it, and he assented, he was willing to confirm the same Grant to him on two Conditions: First, that he do not add one Foot of Land to his present Dominions, for that all his Conquests do of right belong to the Empire; and, secondly, that as a Feudatory he perform towards him Homage and Vassalage.

This Message Atahualpa received with all the submission and humility imaginable; and having taken three days time to return his Answer, he with all the feigned affection, and subtile dissimulation, he could contrive, made this Reply: That he had always in his heart entertained obedient thoughts towards his Lord and Sovereign the Capac Inca; and that as an evidence thereof, he would never attempt to encrease, and enlarge his Dominions of Quitu, but by the order, and with the consent of his Majesty, to whose pleasure he was so entirely devoted; that in case he should think fit to dispose otherwise of his Kingdom, he would willingly resign all to his command, and live as privately in his Court, as any of his Uncles and Kindred, serving him both in Peace and War with faithfulness and diligence.

diligence. This joyfull Anſwer from Atahualpa, the Meſſenger returned with all expedition by the Poſt, remaining ſtill at the Court of Atahualpa in expectation of Inſtructions from the Inca of what farther to act and negotiate therein. The Inca receiving this ſoft Anſwer with great joy and ſatisfaction, replied again, That he did not in the leaſt repine at the Poſſeſſions which his Father had beſtowed on Atahualpa; for that he did again confirm them to him, provided, that he did always within ſuch a term of years repair conſtantly to Cozco, and perform the Homage he had agreed. To which Atahualpa returned anſwer, That he was very happy to know the Will and Pleaſure of his Lord the Inca, but much more to perform it; which that he might doe, he would ſpeedily repair to the place appointed, to take the Oath of Allegiance; and for the doing thereof in the moſt ſolemn manner, he deſired his Majeſties licence and permiſſion, that all the Provinces of his State might attend him thither, to join with him in the ſolemn celebration of the funeral Obſequies of his Father Huayna Capac, according to the cuſtome obſerved by the Kingdom of Quitu, and the Provinces depending on it; and that having accompliſhed that ceremony, both he, and all his Subjects, would take the Oath of Allegiance and Fealty. Huaſcar Inca eaſily conſented to this grateſull Propoſition, which his Brother had made to him, giving him to underſtand, that he might take his time of coming to Cozco, when it ſeemed moſt convenient, and that he gave him leave to celebrate the rites of his Father's Funeral according to the cuſtome of his Countrey: And ſo both the Brothers appeared ſatisfied; the one rejoycing at the good correſpondence he had with his Brother, little ſuſpecting the malitious deſign that lay concealed under it of bereaving him of his Life and Empire; and the other pleaſed himſelf with the thoughts and contrivance of his damnable Plot, which he had laid to make himſelf Maſter both of one and the other.

CHAP. XXXIII.

THings being thus prepared, the King Atahualpa publiſhed a Decree through all his Kingdom and Provinces, that all people who were able to travel unto Cozco, ſhould within the ſpace of ſo many days prepare themſelves to take a Journey thither, that they might according to the ancient cuſtome of their Nation celebrate the Funeral Rites of the Great Huayna Capac his Father, and take the Oaths of Homage and Allegiance to their Supreme Monarch Huaſcar Inca; and that for the greater glory and ſplendour, every one ſhould appear in his beſt Ornaments and Garments befitting ſuch a Solemnity; but ſecretly he intimated his inſtructions to his Captains, that in their reſpective Diviſions they ſhould take care to chuſe ſuch ſelect Men as were Souldiers, and better armed for War, than accoutred for performance of the Obſequies; and that they ſhould march in divers Diviſions of five and ſix hundred in a Squadron, and ſo diſguiſe the matter as to appear in the outward ſhew, rather like Servants and Attendants, than like Souldiers; and that every Diviſion ſhould march at two or three Leagues diſtance each from the other.

And moreover, he gave Orders to the Captains, who led the Van, that when they were come within ten or twelve days March of Cozco, that then they ſhould ſhorten their pace, that the Rere might come up to them, who were commanded to double their March, that ſo they might overtake thoſe in the Van. In this order the Troops of Atahualpa, conſiſting of above thirty thouſand ſelect Men, moſt being old veterane Souldiers, proceeded in their March; who alſo were Commanded by those famous and experienced Captains which his Father had left, and recommended to him; two of which Officers were especially famous above the rest, one of which was called Challchucima, and the other Quizquiz; and Atahualpa gave out, that he would himself in Person bring up the Rere.

Huascar placing great confidence in the words of his Brother, and much more in that untainted Loyalty which the Indians had ever born to their Incas; a testimony of which faithfulness is given by Acosta, in these words, taken out of the twelfth Chapter of his sixth Book: "Without doubt, said he, great was the "reverence and affection which this people shewed to their Incas, it having ne-"ver been known that any one of them was ever guilty of High-Treason, &c. For which reason Huascar suspecting nothing less than such a faithless and treasonable design, did with all freedom and generous liberty give order, that they should be supplied with all Provisions in their way, and all kind treatment shewed them, as befitted Brothers, who were travelling to perform the Funeral Rites of their Father, and to take the Oaths of Fealty and Allegiance. Thus both Parties moved on different considerations, that of Huascar with all the simplicity and sincerity imaginable, and the other of Atahualpa, with all the subtile artifice and cunning that could be contrived and learned in the Schools of Malice.

For Atahualpa being inferiour in Power and Strength to his Brother Huascar, durst not adventure on an open War; but covertly managing his designs, made sure of his game, which he had certainly lost, had he professed an open enmity.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Huascar being advised of the Treason, assembles his Forces.

IN this order the people of Quitu marched for the space of four hundred Leagues, untill they came within a hundred Leagues of Cozco: In which March, several experienced Governours of Provinces through which they passed, observing that the order which these people kept, looked more like the Discipline of an Army, than the Rule of Mourners going to a Funeral, or of Vassals going to take the Oaths of Fealty and Allegiance; for that on either of these occasions five or six thousand Men were sufficient; and that for giving Fealty, the intercourse of Captains and great Men was onely requisite and necessary, rather than such a croud and multitude of common Souldiers: And farther reflecting on the turbulent and unquiet temper of Atahualpa, which was always false, and his humour Martial, they could not but suspect, that there was something more intended by this warlike Preparation, than what tended to Peace, and the professions of a Brother and a Subject; on which suspicion and jealousie they dispatched secret intelligence to Huascar, beseeching him not to trust to his Brother Atahualpa, who certainly came with other designs than what he outwardly pretended.

Upon this information Huascar awakening himself from that dream of security in which he slept, dispatched Messengers with all diligence possible to the Governours of the Provinces of Antisuyu and Collasuyu, commanding them immediately to march to Cozco with what Forces they were able to levy: But to the Division of Chinchasuyu, which was of the greatest extent, and which was the most warlike Nation of all the others, he omitted to send his Orders, because they were already joined with the Enemies Army as they passed through their Countrey. The people of Atahualpa growing confident, and emboldned by this negligence and security of Huascar, and his Subjects, arrived within forty Leagues of Cozco; and then those in the Van shortning their days Marches, as the others enlarged them, they came at length, in a few days, to make a body of twenty thousand Men, and to pitch their Camp at the bank of the River Apurimac, which they passed without any opposition; and thence began to proceed like declared Enemies, with open Arms in their hands, and their Colours flying: And thus they marched fair and softly in two Divisions or Squadrons, being the Van-guard of the Army, untill the Rere-guard over-took them, consisting of ten thousand Men more, and then proceeded in a body untill they came to the top of the Hill of Villa cunca, being but six Leagues distant from the City; but Atahualpa kept himself within the Confines of his own Kingdom, not daring to adventure his Person farther, untill he had proved the success of the first Battel, in which he had placed all his hopes, availing himself much on the security and negligence of his Enemies, and on the Prowess and good Conduct of his experienced Captains.

The Enemy being thus near approached, Huascar made all the Levies of Souldiers, which the shortness of the time would admit; but the greatest number of his Army being to be fetched from the remote parts of Collasuyu, which was at least two hundred Leagues distant, could not possibly be brought together in time to make any resistence; and those of Antisuyu were but few in number, by reason that that Countrey being mountainous, is very ill peopled; but Cuntisuyu being a Province more compact, was very populous, so that the Curacas came in in great numbers, forming a Body of thirty thousand Men: But these being all new raised Men, and by reason of the long Peace unexperienced in War, they were timorous, and unable to fight and contend with an Army of veterane Souldiers. The Inca Huascar, with his Brethren and Relations, and as many as he could assemble, consisting in all of about ten thousand Men, marched forth to join the other Body of his Army, which came from parts lying Westward from the City; and having met them, they staid together in expectation of farther recruits.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Battel fought between the Incas, the Victory of Atahualpa, and his Cruelties.

THE Atahualpians, who were the best Souldiers, considering that delays were dangerous, and might hazard the success which quick execution would secure, marched with resolution to meet Huascar, and give him battel before his other Troops were joined with him; and finding him encamped in an open Plain, about two or three Leagues to the Westward of Cozco, they assailed him with all their power; against which he on the other side made such stout resistence, that fortune seemed doubtfull unto which she should give the victory; the Atahualpians excited with the glory of taking Huascar Prisoner, fought with spight and malice; and his own Subjects being great Lovers of their King, contended with equal courage to defend and preserve him, so that the Battel continued that whole day with great slaughter on both sides: Howsoever, at length for want of the Collas, and by reason that the people of Huascar were a raw Militia, and unexperienced in War, so that one Souldier of Atahualpa's was worth more than ten of those of the other party; it came to pass that the Atahualpians gained the victory: In the pursuit of which, aiming above all things to take Huascar, for that their victory would signifie little, in case his Person escaped their hands, they attacked his Lifeguard of about a thousand Men, which surrounded his Person, and fighting in defence thereof, were all cut to pieces in his presence, most being slain by the Enemy, and others seeing their Inca Prisoner, killed themselves: besides whom, many other Curacas and Sovereign Lords were taken with great numbers of Captains and Officers; the multitudes of common people which remained alive, fled, and ſtrayed abroad like ſheep without a ſhepherd; and many of them wandring about, and not knowing where to go, ſurrendred themſelves to the Enemy, not being willing to enjoy their freedom when their Inca was a Priſoner.

With this victory and ſucceſs, and with ſo great a Trophy of it, as the Perſon of Huaſcar, the Atahualpians were highly exalted; and for ſecurity of the prize, they committed him to the cuſtody and charge of four Captains, and other Souldiers of great fidelity, who ſo narrowly watched him, leſt he ſhould make an eſcape, that he never was out of their ſight either by night or day.

And now Huaſcar being in their hands, it was thought neceſſary to publiſh and blaze his Impriſonment through the whole Empire, that ſo in caſe any People or Armies ſhould be coming to his aſſiſtence, or ſuccour, they might upon ſuch advices be diverted from their proceedings; but principally the news hereof was diſpatched with all diligence to the King Atahualpa.

This was the ſum of the moſt material paſſages of this War between the two Brothers, who were the laſt Kings of Peru; as to other Battels which the Spaniſh Hiſtorians relate, they were but Skirmiſhes which paſſed on the Confines of one Kingdom and the other, on occaſion of Incurſions, which the Captains and Governours of Garriſons made: And as to the Impriſonment of Atahualpa, it was a ſham, or a falſe report, which he himſelf had given out to amuſe his Brother Huaſcar and his Subjects, as was alſo that which he had divulged in ſaying, that when he was in Priſon, his Father the Sun had turned him into a Serpent, that ſo he might eſcape by creeping through a hole, which was in the Chamber: which was onely the Story of a Miracle broached and framed to introduce his Father the Sun for an Authour and Favourer of his Tyrannies; the which report eaſily gained belief in the ſimple minds of that people, who were credulous of any thing which was mentioned in favour of that concernment which the Sun had towards his own Off-ſpring. The uſe which Atahualpa made of this victory, was with all the cruelty and treachery imaginable; for publiſhing in all places, that his intentions were to reſtore Huaſcar again to the Government of his Empire; but yet under certain cautions and reſtrictions, which were to be agreed and capitulated between them, he ſummoned all the Incas of the whole Empire, together with the Governours, Major-Generals, Captains and Souldiers, to appear at Cozco at ſuch a certain time, that ſo they might be Witneſſes to thoſe Articles which ſhould be conſerted between theſe two Kings for the mutual peace and quiet of each others Subjects. With theſe fair pretences and allurements all the Incas of the Bloud-Royal being deceived, failed not to make their appearance; which they performed with that readineſs of mind, that neither ſickneſs, nor old age, nor far diſtance did debar, or hinder their coming; nay, even thoſe who might have excuſed themſelves by reaſon of the remoteneſs of their Countrey, and which might have retarded their Journey by ſlow and dilatory Travels; and which were ſuſpicious and jealous of what afterwards ſucceeded; yet even theſe againſt their own fears and inclinations, ſuffered themſelves to be taken in the open and appearing ſnare: For ſo ſoon as Atahualpa had gotten them into his power, he commanded, that they ſhould all be put to death; which Sentence was executed by various ſorts of cruelty, which ſerved to ſecure his Empire from all Inſurrections, or Plots againſt him.

CHAP. XXXVI.

The Causes which moved Atahualpa to exercise all his Cruelties, and the fatal effects of them.

BUT before we proceed farther; we are first to enquire into the Reason which moved Atahualpa to commit all those cruelties which he acted on those of his own Bloud and Family. To understand which, we must know, that according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of that Kingdom, observed from the time of the First Inca Manco Capac, untill the end of the Reign of Huayna Capac the Great; Atahualpa his Son was as uncapable of inheriting the Kingdom of Quitu, which, like all the other Conquests, appertained to the Imperial Crown, as he was of the Kingdom of Cozco; for that the Inheritance of both indispensably appertained to such an Heir, as was descended from a lawfull Wife, who was to be Sister to the King; for that the Title to that Kingdom came as well by the Woman, as the Man's side: And if in case this strictness were not observed; yet to gain him some tolerable pretension, he ought at least to have been the Son of a Palla, that was descended of Royal Bloud, for such were esteemed capable of the Succession; but those who had any mixtures of Foreign Bloud, could never, without prophanation of all their holy Sanctions, be entitled to any share, or part, of the Empire.

Now Atahualpa being conscious to himself, that he wanted all the qualifications which might render him truly and legitimately an Inca; for he was neither the Son of a Coya, which signifies a Queen, nor yet of a Palla, which is a Lady of the Royal Bloud; but the Son onely of a Whore, that was a Native of Quitu; the which Kingdom neither, could not of right be dismembred from other parts of the Empire. Wherefore considering all these difficulties, and that though at present he were victorious, yet when with time that things were quieted and appeased, matters would return again to their ancient course, and the people set up one of the legitimate Line and Race in despight of him, or his posterity: For the opinion of legal Succession being fixed in the minds of the Indians, by their ancient Idolatry, and vain Religion, and taught and preached to them by that Doctrine which the Inca Manco Capac first instituted, and had ever since, to all Ages, been maintained; he concluded impossible to be unriveted from them, but by an utter extirpation of that whole Race; which therefore he resolved upon, and not onely to destroy and extinguish the true and legitimate Issue, but even those of Bastard Families, lest they standing in the same capacity of Inheritance with him, should be induced by his example to become Rivals with him for the Empire.

To prevent which, no other remedy appeared, than that onely which Tyrants and Usurpers have commonly used, which is to cut off all such who can have a Title, or lawfull Pretension, to the Crown; so that neither the People can cast their eyes upon any other Prince, nor yet the Usurper himself have obligations in conscience or justice to make restitutions: With many examples and testimonies of which, in the like nature, both ancient and modern Histories furnish us, which, to avoid tediousness, we omit; it being sufficient to use that single instance of the Ottoman Family, whose common custome it is to secure the Empire to themselves and their posterity, by the Death of their Brothers, and their other near Relations.

But greater, and more thirsty of the Bloud of his own Family, than any exercised by the Ottoman Kings, was the cruelty of Atahualpa, who not being sufficiently satiated with the Bloud of two hundred of his Brethren, who were the Sons of the Great Huayna Capac, he proceeded to wade through deeper streams of all the Bloud, shed from the Veins of his Uncles, Cousins, Parents and Relations, who were descended by the direct, or indirect, Lines, even to the fourth degree;

ſo that not one, whether Legitimate, or Baſtard, eſcaped the cruelty of his Executioners; for he killed and deſtroyed them by various kinds of Deaths: of ſome he cut the Throats, others he Hanged, others he threw into Rivers and Lakes with weights about their Necks, that they might not ſave themſelves by ſwimming, others were thrown down Rocks and Precipices; all which was acted with the greateſt diſpatch and diligence imaginable by the Executioners; for this Tyrant could never think himſelf ſecure, untill he had ſeen them all deſtroyed, or heard that they were dead; for notwithſtanding all his Victory, he durſt not untill then paſs beyond Sauſſa, which the Spaniards call Xauxa, being ninety Leagues diſtant from Cozco: But as to the poor Huaſcar, they kept him ſtill alive, reſerving him for the ſuppreſſion of inſurrections, or tumults, which might ariſe againſt Atahualpa; for they well knew that the Word and Command of Huaſcar was ſo prevalent, and of that authority with his Subjects, that it was able to quell and calm any mutinies, or diſturbances, amongſt them: Howſoever, for his greater mortification, they would often bring this unfortunate Prince from his confinement, to be a Spectatour of the ſlaughter and maſſacre of his Kindred, which afflicting ſight was a more ſenſible torment to him than Death it ſelf.

Nor did his Cruelty contain it ſelf within theſe bounds, but extended to all the Priſoners, leſt they being Curacas, and Men of intereſt in the Empire, and affectionate to the cauſe of Huaſcar, ſhould contrive means for his delivery: Wherefore bringing them all forth with their hands tied into an open Plain in the Valley of Sacſahuana (where the Battel was afterwards fought between the Preſident Gaſca and Gonçalo Piçarro) they were ranged in order on each ſide, and the poor Huaſcar cloathed in Mourning with his hands tied behind him, was made to paſs between them, with a Rope about his Neck; which when the miſerable Captives ſaw, and their Prince in that deſpicable condition, they lifted up their cries to Heaven, and proſtrated their bodies on the Earth, adored and worſhipped him, which was all the honour they could teſtifie, or help they could give him in that unhappy ſtate: In puniſhment for which reſpect they killed them all, either with Pole-axes, or ſhort Clubs, which they call Champi; for a bigger ſort of Clubs and Pole-axes they uſe in Fight, which they wield with both hands. In this manner they killed all the Curacas and Captains in preſence of the King, that ſcarce any Noble Perſon eſcaped their Tyranny and Cruelty.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Atahualpa having destroyed all the Men of the Royal Family, together with all the Curacas, Commanders and Subjects, of any note belonging to Huascar; his Cruelties, which were never satiated with humane flesh and bloud, proceeded with new thirst and appetite to devour the Children and Women, being the unhappy Relicts of the Royal Race; and though the tenderness of their Sex and Age was sufficient to move compassion, and plead in their behalf; yet so obdurate were the Bowels of this Tyrant, that he made search in all places for the Women and Children of the Royal Race, (excepting onely the Wives of the Sun, which conserved themselves within the Walls of their Convent) and having gathered them together without the City, they practised such torments upon them, that they died with lingring deaths. After which these damnable Ministers of Cruelty made the strictest search they could through all the Dominions, for those of the Royal Bloud, that so not any of them might escape their hands; so that in all parts they had collected great numbers both of Men and Women, as well illegitimate, as legitimate; for that the Incas having a greater liberty and licence granted them in the free use of Women, than any others, their Family became the most numerous and extensive of any in the whole Empire. And having thus collected these people, they ranged them in a Plain, which lyes about a League distant to the Northward of the City; which Field hath been called Yahuarpampa, or the Field of Bloud, ever since the Fight which happened in that place between the Chancas, and the people of Cozco, as we have declared formerly in its due place.

These poor wretches being in this manner Prisoners in the Field, they encompassed them with three Files; the first was of Souldiers, who were to be a guard about them, and to oppose any Insurrection in case the City of Cozco should attempt it, and serve to bridle and subject their Enemies; and then the other two Files were Sentinels and Guards, lest any should escape, or any others enter in amongst them to bring them relief. Upon these sad wretches they practised their Cruelties in several manners; to some they gave onely a little raw Mayz to eat, and a few crude Herbs, making them to continue the strictness of such a Fast as their Religion enjoyned them for a few days; the Wives, Sisters, Aunts, Cousin-Germans, and Mothers-in-law of Atahualpa they hanged upon Trees, the tallest and most lofty that they could find; some they hanged up by the hairs of the head, others under the armes, and others in that unhandsome manner, as becomes not our modesty to report; to some of them they delivered their Infants to hold in their armes, which when they fell from them, they knocked them on the head with Clubs; some they hanged by one arme, some by both, and others by the waste, that so they might be long in dying, for to kill them at once, seemed too much mercy, and which these poor wretches implored with their last cries and groans. The Boys and Girls they killed by degrees, bringing out a number to death at every quarter of the Moon, using them with no less cruelty than they had exercised towards their Parents; and amongst their other torments, starving was one way of killing. Diego Fernandez in his History of Peru, touching briefly on the Cruelties which Atahualpa used, hath these words: "Between Guascar "Inga, and his Brother Atabalipa, there happened a great dispute and contro- "versie concerning the Government, and him who was to be the Supreme "Monarch. Guascar Inga residing in Cozco, and his Brother Atabalipa in Caxa "Malca. Atabalipa dispeeded two of his principal Captains, called Chalcuchiman, "and Quizquiz, who being valiant and stout Men, raised a great Army, and "therewith marched against Guascar, with design, that having overcome and ta- "ken him Prisoner, Atabalipa should be declared King. In this March they sub-

" dued many Caciques and Indians, reducing them all to the obedience of Atabalipa; of which, when Guaſcar received intelligence, and of what they had acted, he preſently put himſelf into a poſture of defence, and with what force he could aſſemble in ſo ſhort a time, he marched from Cozco to Quipaypan, which is about a League diſtant from thence, where joyning Battel with Atabalipa, Guaſcar was overthrown, and taken Priſoner. The Fight (as is ſaid) was ſo bloudy, that a hundred and fifty thouſand Indians were ſlain in the Battel; and afterwards Atabalipa entring victorious into Cozco, they killed Man, Woman, and Child, ſparing none who declared themſelves for Guaſcar, and moſt eſpecially made ſearch for the Children of Guaſcar, and his Wives and Women, who were with Child by him: Howſoever one of his Wives called Mama Varcay made an eſcape with her Daughter Coya Cuxi Varcay, who is now Married to Xayre Topa Inga, of whom we have made mention in this Hiſtory, &c. Thus far are Words of this Authour; and then afterwards in the ſequel of this Story, he recounts the cruel treatment and hard uſage of poor Huaſcar, during the time of his impriſonment, together with the dolefull complaints he uttered, which we ſhall rehearſe in their due place. This Coya Cuxi Varcay, which he ſays, was the Wife of Xayre Topa, was called Cuſi Huarque, of whom we ſhall diſcourſe hereafter. The Field where this Battel was fought was called Quipaypan by corruption, though properly it had the Name of Quepaypa, which ſignifies a Trumpet, as if from thence the Triumph of Atahualpa was trumpeted, and ſent its ſound into all parts of the Empire. I remember, that when I was a Boy, I went three or four times into thoſe Fields with other Boys, who were my School-fellows, where we enjoyed the recreation of Hawking with ſome Hawks, which the Indian Faulconers managed for us.

In this manner, as we have related, was all the Bloud-Royal, and Family of the Incas, extinguiſhed and extirpated in the ſpace of two years and a half; and though they might in a much ſhorter time have exhauſted the veins of Royal Bloud, yet to prolong their pleaſure in Cruelty, they reſerved ſome on which their appetites might feed, and ſtill be delighted in new exerciſes of torment. The Indians ſay that the Field where the great effuſion of this Bloud was made, was called Yahuarpampa, or the Field of Bloud; and that it rather took its denomination from the Bloud of the Incas, than from that of the Chancas; for though the quantity of the Bloud of the Chancas was greater, yet the quality of the Incas made theirs much more eſtimable; and the death of Women and Children being of tender ſex and age, rendered the many Murthers more tragical and execrable.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

How some of the Bloud-Royal escaped the Cruelty of Atahualpa.

SOme, notwithstanding all this, escaped out of the City, some came not within their power, and others by the connivance of the people of Atahualpa, who being satiated with this slaughter, and touched with some remorse to see that bloud so plentifully shed, which they once adored for Divine, connived at the escape which some of them made out of the circle in which they were encompassed; and not onely so, but some gave them opportunity to change their Apparel, which was the badge and distinction of an Inca, for disguises after the Habit of common Indians: For, as we have said before, the Incas were distinguished by their Garments; but those whom they permitted to make an escape were Infants, and Children under the Age of ten or eleven years, amongst which my Mother was one, together with her Brother Don Francisco Hualipa Tupac Inca Yupanqui, with whom I was acquainted, and who, since my abode in Spain, hath wrote me several Letters: besides which I knew very few who escaped from this miserable Outrage, from whom I received the Relation of all that I report concerning this execrable slaughter. I knew also two Auquis who were Princes, being Sons of Huayna Capac, the one called Paullu, who was one of those who escaped, as we have mentioned; the other was called Titu, and being a Child then, was afterwards baptized, whose Christian Name we have formerly signified. Paullu left a Son which descended from Spanish Bloud, whose Name was Don Carlos Inca, he was my School-fellow, and afterwards Married with a Noble Lady born in that Countrey, and from Spanish Parents, by whom he had Don Melchior Carlos Inca, who in the last year, which was 1602, came into Spain to see that Court, but chiefly by the advice of some friends, who perswaded him, that he should receive great rewards for the Services which his Grandfather had performed towards the Conquest and Settlement of Peru, and afterwards for the resistence he made against those Usurpers and Tyrants, of whom we shall speak in our History of the Empire: but a more especial respect was due to him, for being the Great Nephew of Huayna Capac, and descended by the Male line, so that he is the Head, and chief Family of those few which remain of the Bloud-Royal. He now at present resides at Valladolid in expectation of rewards; which though they may be great and considerable, yet can scarce be such as may equal his merit.

I know not whether Titu had any Issue; but I remember two Nustas, or Princesses, which were the lawfull Daughters of Huayna Capac, one of which was called Beatriz Coya, and was afterwards Married to Martin de Mustincia, a Noble Person, who was Accountant of the Revenue of the Emperour Charles the Fifth in Peru; they had three Sons which were called the Bustincias, and another called John Sierra de Leguizano, who was a fellow Student with me at School; the other Nusta was called Donna Leonor Coya; the first time she Married was with a Spaniard called John Balsa, with whom I was not acquainted, being then young; they had a Son of the same Name, who went also to School with me: But her second Marriage was with Francis de Villacastin, who was one of the first Conquerours of Peru, as also of Panama, and other Countries. There is a Story which goes of him, worthy to be noted, which I found in the History of Francis Lopez de Gomara, which is, " That this Villacastin was the first that planted Colonies in Pedrarias, " Nombre de Dios and Panama; that he opened a passage, and made a Road from " one Town to another, with great pains and charge, through Rocks and Moun- " tains, in which were infinite numbers of Lions, and Tygers, and Bears; and " such multitudes of Monkies of all sorts and sizes, that being disturbed, they " would make such a hideous noise, as was sufficient to make Travellers deaf, and " would climb up Trees with great Stones, to let them fall on the heads of such

" as came within their reach. Thus far are the Words of Gomara. But I have ſeen ſome Marginal Notes in a Book wrote by one of the Conquerours of Peru; in which is this paſſage: " That a Monky threw a ſtone at a perſon armed " with a Croſs-bow, named Villacaſtin, and beat out two of his Teeth; he was " afterwards one of the Conquerours of Peru, and Lord of a great Countrey, cal- " led Ayaviri; but being taken Priſoner, he dyed in Cozco; he was one who took " part with Piçarro in Xaquixaguana, where one that owed him a diſpleaſure gave " him a cut over the face after he yielded to quarter: He was an honeſt Man, " and did good to all, though he dyed poor, after he was deſpoiled of his Indi- " ans, and of his Eſtate. This Villacaſtin killed the Monky with his Croſs-bow, " he chancing to ſhoot at the ſame time that the Monky threvv his ſtone. Thus far are the Remarks of the Conquerour; the vvhich I can in part confirm, becauſe I knevv the perſon, and ſavv that he vvanted tvvo Teeth in the upper rovv of his Mouth; and it vvas the common report in Peru, that they vvere beaten out by a Monky. I have thought fit to inſert this Story as I do others of like nature, for the truth of vvhich I refer my ſelf to divers Witneſſes. Other Incas and Pallas I knevv, to the number of tvvo hundred, vvhich vvere all of the Royal Bloud, but of leſs note than thoſe vvhich I formerly mentioned, vvho vvere the immediate Sons of Huayna Capac. My Mother vvas his Brothers Daughter, vvhoſe Name vvas Huallpa Tupac Inca Yupanqui.

I vvas acquainted vvith one Son and tvvo Daughters of King Atahualpa, one of them vvas called Angelina, of vvhom the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro begat a Son, called Franciſco, vvho vvhen vve vvere of the Age of eight or nine years, vvas a great Antagoniſt and Competitor vvith me for running and leaping, his Uncle vvas Gonçalo Piçarro. This Marquis had alſo a Daughter called Franciſca, vvhich vvas very beautifull, and Married aftervvards to his Uncle Hernando Piçarro; her Father begat her upon a Daughter of Huayna Capac, called Ynes Huallas Nuſta, vvho vvas aftervvards Married to Martin de Ampuero, an Inhabitant of the City of los Reyes. The Son of the Marquis, and another of Gonçalo Piçarro, coming into Spain, dyed young, to the great grief of thoſe vvho knevv them, being the hope- full Off-ſpring of ſuch renovvned Fathers: But as to the other Daughter of Ata- hualpa, I may miſtake her Name, vvhich vvas either Beatriz or Iſabel, ſhe Mar- ried vvith a Spaniard called Blas Gomera; and Wedded a ſecond time vvith a Gen- tleman, who was of Spaniſh and Indian Bloud, called Sanco de Rojas, but his Son was called Franciſco Atahualpa, he was a very handſome Youth, well ſhaped, and of a lovely countenance, as were all the other Incas and Pallas, but he dyed young. We ſhall ſhortly mention him on occaſion of a Story which my old Uncle, the Brother of my Mother, told me, when he related the Cruelties of Atahualpa. There was another Son of Huayna Capac remaining, with whom I was not ac- quainted, he was called Manco Inca, and was the lawfull Heir to the Empire, for Huaſcar dyed without Iſſue Male, of whom we ſhall make mention hereafter.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of what farther Cruelty was used towards the Servants of the Court.

BUT to return to the Cruelties of Atahualpa, who not content with the death and slaughter of all the Royal Family, together with the Lords, Captains and Nobility, proceeded to Massacre all the Servants of the Court, who were Domesticks within the House; of whose Function and several Ministeries we have given a particular in its place, for these were not particular persons, but whole Villages, to whose care it belonged to provide Servants for the Court, and to change and alter them according to their times of waiting; with these also Atahualpa had a quarrel for the Relation they had to the Court, as also because they bore the Name of Inca, which was conferred on them by that privilege and favour which the first Inca Manco Capac conferred on them. Upon these Atahualpa vented his Cruelties, but with more exquisite torment on such who were more near Attendants on the Person of the King, such as Porters, Keepers of the Wardrobe, and Jewels, Butlers, Cooks, and the like; with whose lives not contenting himself, together with the bloud of their Wives and Children, he proceeded to burn and destroy their Houses and Villages which they inhabited; but such as were Servants at a farther distance, such as Cleavers of Wood, and Drawers of Water, were more gently treated; for some of those they decimated, killing every tenth or fifth Man, in some places every third Man; so that all the Villages within six or seven Leagues of Cozco suffered a particular and extraordinary Persecution, besides the general calamity in which the whole Empire was involved, being filled in all places with Slaughter, Fire, Robberies, Rapes and Violences, with what other miseries and devastation the licence of an unbridled Souldiery can exercise upon a Nation. Nor were the Cities and Towns which were remote from Cozco exempt from the like calamities; for so soon as Atahualpa heard of the Imprisonment of Huascar, he entred all the Countries which were bordering on his Frontiers with Fire and Sword, and particularly that which is called Cannaris, because at the beginning they refused to yield him Obedience: In revenge for which, so soon as he gained power he treated them with all the severity imaginable; which Augustin Carate in the 15th Chapter of his Book, expresses in these Words: "Coming into the Province of Cannaris he assassinated sixty thousand Men, being "they had made opposition against him, and putting all to Fire and Sword, he "laid wholly waste the Plantation of Tumibamba, which is situate in a Plain, and "watered with three streams; and thence proceeding in his Conquests, left not "one Man alive of all those who defended themselves, &c. the like Francisco Lopez reports almost in the same Words. But Peter de Cieça is more large in his Relation, saying that the want of Men, and the abundance of Women in his time belonging to the Province of Cannaris, was the cause, that in the Wars of the Spaniards, the Writers thereof mentioned Indian Men for Indian Women, for to them they gave Commands in the Army. And in giving the reason for it, he useth these Words in the 44th Chapter of his Book. "Some Indians tell us, saith he, "that by reason of the great numbers of Women which remained, after that "Atabalipa had destroyed all the Men of this Province, whom he unhumanely "butchered; and after he had routed and destroyed in the Countrey of Ambaro, "the Brother of Guascar, called Antoco, who was the Captain-General of that "people; and had put to death all the Men and Children of that Province, coming "with green Boughs and Palms in their hands to implore his Mercy; yet not being moved with such a spectacle of compassion, he with a cruel and severe countenance commanded his Captains and Souldiers to fall upon them, and slay them "all, by which a miserable slaughter was made of multitudes of Males, as we "have related in the third Part of this History; so those who are now living

" ſay, that there are fifteen Women in that Countrey to one Man. Thus far are the Words of Peter de Cieça; with which we ſhall end this unpleaſing Story of the Cruelties of Atahualpa for the preſent, and reaſſume the particulars again in their proper places. And now occaſionally upon theſe Cruelties, I was put in mind of a Story of Don Franciſco, the Son of Atahualpa, who dyed ſome Months before I went for Spain, which is this: The day after his Death, very early in the Morning before his Burial, thoſe few Incas, who were remaining, made a viſit to my Mother; and amongſt the reſt came the Old Inca, whom I have formerly mentioned; who inſtead of condoling and ſaying, I am ſorry for your loſs, becauſe the party deceaſed was my Mothers Brothers Son; he ſaid to my Mother, I am glad that the Great Pachacamac, or Maker of the Univerſe, hath conſerved you unto this day, in which you have ſeen the end and deſtruction of all your Enemies; adding many other expreſſions full of joy and contentment on this occaſion: But I not well underſtanding the meaning of this Drollery, replied to him, and ſaid, Uncle, why ſhould we rejoice for the Death of Don Franciſco, ſince he was our Kinſman and Acquaintance? With which turning towards me with great anger and paſſion, and taking the end of his Mantle, and biting it with his Teeth, as the manner is amongſt the Indians, when they are in a rage, retorted upon me, and ſaid, What, you have a mind to be a Kinſman to an Auca, the Son of another Auca (which ſignifies a Tyrant and Traytour) who deſtroyed our Empire, and killed our Inca; who exhauſted our Bloud, and extirpated our Family; who committed ſo many outrages unnatural to our Kindred, unknown and abhorred by our Forefathers: Give me but this dead Raſcal into my hand, and you ſhall ſee me eat him raw without Pepper or Salt. Oh that Traytor his Father was ſurely no Son of Huayna Capac our Inca, but ſome mean Baſtard of an Indian of Quitu, with whom his Mother plaid the Whore, and abuſed our King; for if he had been an Inca, he could never have been guilty of thoſe horrid Cruelties and Abominations he committed, nor could ſuch execrable deſigns have entred into his imagination; for conſidering that it was a fundamental Doctrine of our Anceſtours never to doe hurt or damage unto any, no not ſo much as to their Enemies: What Monſter then of iniquity muſt this Man be, who violating all the Rules of Humanity, hath imbrued his hands in the bloud of all his Relations? Then do not ſay, that this perſon can be deſcended from our Lineage, whoſe diſpoſition was unnatural, and different to the temper and conſtitution of our Forefathers. Conſider what an injury you doe to them, to us, nay to your ſelf, in ſtyling us the Kinſmen of a moſt cruel Tyrant, who from the degree of Kings reduced thoſe few of us, who eſcaped his outrageous hands to the condition of ſervitude and ſlavery. All this and much more this Inca uttered with ſuch rage, moved by a ſenſible remembrance of thoſe deteſtable cruelties which Atahualpa had committed, that the ſatisfaction they received by the Death of Don Franciſco was changed into woe and lamentations. And indeed this Franciſco, during the time of his Life, was ſo ſenſible of the common hatred of Mankind towards him, which avoided his converſation, flying from him, as from the Peſtilence, that he with ſhame abſconded himſelf, and lived retired within his own doors: the like alſo did his two Siſters, who hearing all places reſound with Auca, which properly ſignifies Cruelties, Tyrannies, and Misfortunes, were filled with ſhame and confuſion.

CHAP. XL.

What remains ſurvived of the Incan Family.

A Long time after I had finiſhed this ninth Book, I received Advices from Peru (out of which I have framed this Chapter) concerning the Reliques of the Incan Bloud, which being greater than I thought, I have added as pertinent to this Hiſtory. For in the year 1603, they all joined in a Letter directed to Don Melchior Carlos Inca, Son of Don Alonſo de Meſa, who lived near Cozco, and likewiſe to my ſelf, deſiring us that we would intercede in their behalf with his Majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to exempt them from Tribute, and from thoſe grievous Exactions with which they were charged in common with other Indians; for performance of which, they delegated all and every of us with full Power and Authority from them particularly named, deſcended from ſuch and ſuch a King; and for better proof of their Lineage, they ſent a Royal Tree of their Pedigree, drawn out upon a Yard and half of white Taffity, made of the Bark of the China Tree, deſcending from Manco Capac to Huayna Capac, and his Son Paullu; the Chief Incas being all curiouſly painted in their ancient Habits; upon their Heads they wore the coloured Twiſt or Wreath, in their Ears their great Earings with Parteſans in their hands in the place of Sceptres, being painted from their Breaſts upwards. The Papers were directed to me, which I addreſſed to Don Melchior Carlos Inca, and Don Alonſo de Meſa, then reſiding in the Court at Valladolid, becauſe my other affairs would not permit me to attend this cauſe, in which I ſhould otherwiſe have gladly employed both my time and life. This Letter which was ſubſcribed by the Incas, was wrote by one of them in a very fair Character; the phraſe, or ſtyle, was partly Indian, and in part Caſtillian, they being all now much conformed to the Spaniſh Mode, and it was dated the 16th of April 1603. I did not think fit to inſert a Copy thereof here, becauſe it is too ſad and tragical, recounting the dolefull eſtate into which they were fallen. The Addreſs is penn'd with ſuch aſſurance of his Majeſty's favour, that (as we all believe) whenſoever his Catholick Majeſty ſhall be informed, and made ſenſible thereof, he will not onely eaſe them of their burthens, but beſtow ſuch privileges on them as are decent and becoming the Royal Off-ſpring of Kings.

The Scheme vvhich they drevv of their Pedigree vvas exactly framed, for the Kings vvho vvere Incas vvere painted in their ſeveral Figures, denoting on each ſide the deſcendencies from them, vvith this Inſcription, Capac Ayullu, vvhich is the Royal Off-ſpring, and is the Title in common to all, ſignifying thereby, hovv all of them vvere derived from the firſt Inca Manco Capac; then the Pedigree of every King hath its particular diſtinction vvith different Names; by vvhich appears, hovv every one deſcended from ſuch and ſuch a King. The Iſſue, or Progeny, of Manco Capac they call Chima Panaca, from vvhich forty Incas are ſucceſſively deſcended. That of Sinchi Rocca they call Raurava Panaca, from vvhence proceeded ſixty four Incas. That of Lloque Yupanqui the third Inca, they call Hahuaniva Ayllu, from whence deſcended ſixty three Incas. That of Capac Yupanqui they call Apu Mayta, from whence are fifty ſix. That of Mayta Capac the fifth King, they call Uſca Mayta, from whence are thirty five. That of Inca Roca they call Vicaquitau, from whence are fifty. That of Yahuar Huacac the ſeventh King, they call Aylli Panaca, from whence are ſixty nine. The Iſſue of Inca Pachacutec, and his Son Inca Yupanqui, being joined together, are called Inca Panaca, and make up a double number of ninety nine. The Off-ſpring deſcended from Tupac Inca Yupanqui, they call Capac Ayllu, which ſignifies no more than the Royal Progeny, which confirms what we have declared before concerning that Title; and of this branch there are onely eighteen. The Off-ſpring of Huayna Capac they call Tumipampa, in remembrance of that ſolemn Feſtival which he inſtituted in honour of the Sun, and celebrated, in that wide and open Field, which is ſituate in the Province of Cannaris, where he erected Royal Palaces, and Store-houſes, for ſupport and accommodation of the Souldiery, together with a Monaſtery for the Select Virgins, and a Temple of the Sun; all which were ſo magnificent and ſtately, and ſo full of Riches, and repleniſhed with Proviſions, that Pedro de Cieça in the 44th Chapter of his Book, commends them above the Skies; and fearing leſt he ſhould fall ſhort in his commendations, concludes, that it was impoſſible for him to expreſs the wonderfull Riches, which were contained within theſe Royal Palaces of the Incas.

In memory of the aforeſaid Feſtival, Huayna Capac determined to ſtyle his Off-ſpring with the Name of Tumipampa, that ſo that Solemnity might give a Name to his Off-ſpring, of which there were no more remaining than twenty two. And whereas Huayna Capac, and his Father Tupac Inca Yupanqui were neareſt allied in the Tree of the Royal Lineage, Atahualpa was the more carefull and diligent to extirpate and deſtroy them than the others; by which means very few of them eſcaped his malitious cruelty, as appears by the Liſt of ſuch as ſurvived; all which being ſummed up together, make the number of 567 perſons; and it is obſervable, that they were all deſcended by the Male, and not by the Female line; for, as we have ſaid before, the Incas made little eſteem of the Female race, unleſs they were ennobled by the Bloud of the Spaniards, who had been the firſt Conquerours of that Countrey, and eſteemed Incas, and ſuch as were deſcended from their God the Sun. The Letter which they wrote to me was ſigned by eleven Incas, according to the eleven deſcents; the Chief of every one of which ſubſcribed for himſelf, and thoſe of his Lineage, by their Chriſtian Names and Surnames of their Anceſtours. The Names of all the branches, excepting the two laſt, are unknown to me in their ſignifications, becauſe they are Names proper to that Language which the Incas exerciſed amongſt themſelves, and were not common to the whole Court. We have now onely farther to ſpeak of Don Melchior Carlos Inca, the Nephew of Paullu, and Grand Nephew of Huayna Capac, who (as we have ſaid) came to Spain in the year 1602, in expectation of receiving great favours and rewards from the Court; which accordingly ſucceeded in the year 1604, when after conſideration had of his Worth and Merits, it was determined that a Largeſs ſhould be made him of 7500 Ducats of yearly Rent, and ſetled for ever on him and his Heirs, and to be raiſed out of his Majeſty's Revenue iſſuing from the City of los Reyes; and that an additional ſupply ſhould be granted to him for bringing his Wife and Family into Spain: Moreover, he had the Honour of the Habit of Santiago conferred upon him, with promiſes of Lodgings in the King's Court: And that for the Indians, of which he was Lord in Cozco by right of Inheritance from Father and Grandfather, they were transferred to the poſſeſſion of the Royal Crown, he not being permitted to return to the Indies. The which information was wrote me from Valladolid; what hath paſſed ſince from the laſt of March, I have not been adviſed. And having ſaid thus much, we ſhall paſs to our tenth Book, which treats of the Heroick and incredible Actions of the Spaniards, who gained that Empire.

Royal Commentaries.

CHAP. I.

Of the three Spaniards of Noble Quality, who undertook the Conqueſt of Peru.

IN the 9th Book of the firſt part of theſe our Royal Commentaries, we have ſhewed how the reſolute Atahualpa pleaſed himſelf with the thoughts of having by Tyranny and Cruelty ſecured to himſelf the Empire, little dreaming that a ſtrange and an unknown Nation (who were the Spaniards) ſhould in the moſt calm and proſperous time of his Enjoyments knock at his Gate, and by the ſame methods of cruelty caſt him from his Throne, and deprive him of his Life and Empire. That we may proſecute this Hiſtory with the moſt even thread; it is neceſſary for us to look ſome years back, and take our matters from their firſt ſource and beginning.

The Spaniards therefore, after they had diſcovered this new World, were ſtill deſirous more and more of new and farther diſcoveries, and though the Countries they had already poſſeſſed were rich and proſperous, yet not being contented with their preſent Enjoyments, nor wearied with their Labours, and Travails, nor diſcouraged with the ſufferings of Hunger, Dangers, Wounds, Sickneſſes, nor with the bad Days, and worſe Nights, which they had endured both by Sea and Land, yet ſtill thirſting after new Conqueſts, and great Enterpriſes, they arrived at length to that pitch of greatneſs, which hath for ever eternized their Fame and Memory. For ſo it happened in the Conqueſt of Peru, That Francis Piçarro, a Native of Truxillo, living at Panama, one of a Noble Family, and Diego de Almagro, a Native of Malaga, or (as Carate will have it) of the Town of Almagro, which is moſt probable, a Perſon (as we may believe) of like noble Extraction; for though his Family be unknown, yet if we may know the Tree by its Fruit, the greatneſs of his Actions, and the glory of his Enterpriſes have rendred his Birth and Family illuſtrious. They were both indeed rich and famous, for the bravery of their paſt actions, eſpecially Piçarro, who had been a Captain, and in the Year 1512. had been Lieutenant Governour of the City of Urava, of which he was afterwards made Lieutenant General by the Governour Alonſon Hojeda, having been the firſt Spaniſh Captain which entred that Province, where he performed many brave Actions, labouring under many Difficulties, and Dangers, which Pedro de Cieça compendiouſly relates in theſe Words: "After (ſays he) that "this had happened, the Governour Hojeda planted a new Colony of Chriſtians "in that part which they call Urava, of which he made Francis Piçarro his Lieu" tenant Governour, and of which he was afterwards made Governour and " Marquiſs; and living in the City of Urava with the Indians, he endured much " Famine and Sickneſs, for which Services his memory will ever be eſteemed. Thus far are the Words of de Cieça. He was alſo in company with the famous Captain Baſco Nunnez, when diſcovery was made of the South Sea, and when Nombre de Dios and Panama were ſubdued, he was then with the Governour Peter Arias de Avila, as Gomara reports in his Hiſtory of the Indies.

But neither Piçarro nor Almagro being ſatiated with their former Glories, thirſted ſtill after greater Actions; and incited with the report they had received of the ſimple and mean condition of the People of Peru; theſe two great Heroes made an agreement together for the Conqueſt of it; joining with them Hernando de Luque, a Schoolmaſter in Panama, who was Lord of Taboga. Theſe three ſolemnly ſwore in publick, and entred into Articles under Hand and Seal, never to forſake each other in any Dangers or Diſcouragements whatſoever, that ſhould happen untill they had made an entire Conqueſt of Peru; and that vvhat Riches or Booty they ſhould gain, ſhould be friendly and amicably divided between them. It was agreed, that Hernando de Luque ſhould remain, and be their Agent at Panama, to order and provide for their Affairs, ſo as to yield them ſuccours; that Piçarro ſhould be employed in the Diſcovery, and that Almagro ſhould go and come with ſupplies of Men, and Horſe, and Ammunition, for relief of their Companions, who were immediately employed in the Conqueſt. This School-Maſter they called Hernando the Fool, or Coxcomb, and the ſame might be ſaid of all the three; for who cannot but blame ſuch Men as theſe, who having endured great Travails and Labours in the World, and already entred into years, ſo that the youngeſt of them paſſed fifty, and all of them rich and commodious in the World, yet that Men under theſe circumſtances ſhould engage themſelves in new Adventures, full of uncertainty, without knowledge of the Countrey, whether it were rich or poor, and without conſideration of the hazards and difficulties of it, ſeems the Work and Deſign of raſh and adventurous Fools. But the good fortune of thoſe who now enjoy the Benefit of their Labours, was that which called them to this Enterpriſe; or rather the Mercy and Providence of God towards thoſe Gentiles, who was pleaſed to make uſe of thoſe means for propagation of the Goſpel in thoſe parts, which he confirmed by ſuch ſigns and Wonders, as very much conduced to the eaſineſs of the Conqueſt.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the excellent Fruit and Advantages which have reſulted from the Union and Agreement of theſe three Spaniſh Cavaliers.

THis triple accord which theſe three Spaniards made at Panama, puts me in mind of that confederacy which the three Roman Emperours made at Layno, a place near Bologna; but yet in comparing them one with the other, they are ſo different in their ſeveral circumſtances, that they ſeem to hold no agreeable compariſon or ſimilitude; for on the one ſide thoſe were Emperours, and theſe but private and poor Perſons; thoſe treated of the Diviſion of the old World, which had been the Prize and Conqueſt of their Roman Anceſtours, and which they deſired to enjoy with peace and plenty; but theſe engolfed themſelves into Toils and Labours, to gain the Empire of a new World, which was ſo unknown to them, that they were ignorant both of the difficulties they were to ſuſtain in the Conqueſts, and of the value of their Victories when acquired. If alſo we conſider the intentions and effects of one and the other, we ſhall find the ſame diverſity, for that Triumvirate, compoſed of three Tyrants, was concluded and eſtabliſhed on no other ground, than to exerciſe a tyrannical Power over all the World, and to afflict and deſtroy; but this was a deſign of three generous Gentlemen, each of which deſerved an Imperial Crown, having no other end than to enrich the World with unknown Treaſures, as every days experience proves, and as will be made manifeſt in the following Chapters. Moreover the intention of that Triumvirate was to betray their Allies, Friends and Parents into the hands of their Enemies, but this was to ſacrifice themſelves for the advantage of others, that they might acquire a benefit equally profitable to Enemies, as well as Friends; all which appears by thoſe immenſe Riches which daily iſſue from the Bowels of the unknown World, and are communicated not onely to Chriſtians, but even to the Gentiles, Jews, Moors, Turks and Hereticks, who enjoy the benefit of theſe generous Labours. But that which we ought primarily to conſider, that by our Triumvirate Chriſtianity was firſt introduced into the great Empire of Peru, and a Gate opened to the preaching of the Goſpel, by which many faithfull Souls have been gathered into the boſome of the Church; ſo that who is it that can ſufficiently admire or expreſs the greatneſs of this Enterpriſe. Oh thou great Name and Family of the Piçarros, how much are all the Nations and Inhabitants of the old World indebted unto thee, for thoſe vaſt Riches they have extracted from the new; and how much more do thoſe two Empires of Mexico and Peru owe to thee, for thoſe thy two Sons Hernando Cortes, and Francis Piçarro, and for thy Brothers, Hernando Piçarro, John Piçarro, and Gonçalo Piçarro, by whoſe indefatigable labours thoſe poor Indians have been drawn from the darkneſs of obſcure Ignorance to the true light and knowledge of the Goſpel. How much therefore is this Triumvirate to be approved, and applauded above that of the three Roman Emperours; of which Guichiardin, in his Hiſtory of Florence, gives this Cenſure. Laino, a place famous for the League contracted between Marcus Antonius, Lepidus and Otavianus, who under the term and notion of a Triumvirate contrived, and executed ſuch abominable pieces of Tyranny, as had never before been practiſed, or named at Rome; but our Triumvirate deſerves a quite different Character, as the Writings of Lopez de Gomara, Auguſtin de Carate, and other modern Hiſtorians will abundantly prove, whoſe Books and Relations we ſhall as often quote, as our ſubject matter on which we treat ſhall require a confirmation from their Authority.

CHAP. III.

Of the little Money which was in Spain before the Conqueſt of Peru.

TO make more evidently appear the great Riches which this Triumvirate purchaſed to the World, we muſt make a large digreſſion from our deſign in hand; and for the more clear elucidation hereof, we muſt make uſe of the Authority of ſome Hiſtorians, who have noted and deſcribed the Revenue of certain Kingdoms, which before the Conqueſt of Perú were vaſtly ſhort of that Income, which they yield at preſent. Bodinus in his Book of Commonwealths ſhews both in general, and particularly ſpecifies the Revenues of ſome Commonwealths and Princes, to have been of inconſiderable value before the Conqueſt of Peru, in compariſon of their preſent improvements, and inſtances in ſeveral Eſtates which were mortgaged, or ſold at mean prices; he tells us how ſmall was the pay of Souldiers, and the wages which Princes gave to their Servants, and at how cheap a rate all things were ſold; and in ſhort, that what was formerly valued at an hundred Crowns a year, is now worth a thouſand; and that all Lands and Houſes are riſen twenty times in the value of their rent. Farther he inſtances in the ranſome which Lewis the 9th. King of France, paid for his own Perſon to the Soldan of Egypt; which he ſays amounted to no more than five hundred thouſand Florins, and this he compares with the ranſome of three Millions, which Charles the firſt of France paid to the Emperour, Charles the 5th. for his ranſome. Farther he adds, that in the Reign of Charles the 6th. which was about the Year 1449. the yearly Revenue of the whole Crown of France did not amount to above four hundred thouſand Franks, and yet in the Year 1574. when Charles the 9th dyed, the ſame Revenue was improved to fourteen Millions, and the like proportion of increaſe was advanced in all other Kingdoms and Governments, which Examples ſerve ſufficiently to demonſtrate in what manner all the World hath been enriched by the Treaſures of Peru. And in regard that Our Spain hath been eſpecially obliged to that Countrey, by the vaſt effluxes of its Wealth from thence, vve need not ſeek or borrovv proofs hereof from other Countries, but onely conſider our ovvn; nor need vve to look many Ages back, but onely from the time of King Ferdinand, ſurnamed the Saint, vvho regained Cordova and Seville, of vvhom the General Hiſtory of Spain, written by Don Alonſo the wiſe, makes mention; and tells us, that Don Alonſo the 9th. King of Leon, who was Father of King Fernand the Saint, made War upon him; and that his Son wrote him word, that as an obedient Child he was reſolved never to reſiſt him, and that he would gladly appeaſe his Anger with any ſatisfaction that he ſhould require of him; to which Don Alonſo replied, That he required of him the payment of ten thouſand Maravedis, which he owed him, which when he had performed, he would then ceaſe his Wars, and enter into Amity with him. The whole Copy of the Letter, written at large, we have omitted to recite for brevity ſake; onely we have thought fit to repeat the Anſwer, which was wrote in this manner: That the cauſe of his War was for the recovery of ten thouſand Maravedis, which the King Don Enriquez owed for the high way which he had made to Santivannez de la Mota, and that paying this Money, the Quarrel ſhould end; whereupon the King Fernando not being willing to wage War with his Father for ten thouſand Maravedis, preſently made him ſatisfaction; the which is related in the general Chronicle of Spain, and in the particular Life of King Fernando.

Thirty ſix Maravedis make ſix pence.

About the ſame time a certain Knight, who wore the red Croſs as a badge of his Pilgrimage unto the Holy Land, named Ruy Dias, began to commit many inſolences before his departure; for which Offences divers complaints coming againſt him, he was cited to appear before the Courts of Juſtice, to make anſwer to thoſe Accuſations which were laid againſt him; upon which ſummons Dias making his appeaappearance at Villadolid, where the Court then reſided; but being informed of the many complaints which were there formed againſt him, he in a rage and fury departed thence, without giving any Anſwer thereunto: At which the King Fernando being highly diſpleaſed, immediately by proceſs of Law baniſhed him the Countrey; howſoever Dias maintained himſelf within his Caſtles and Fortreſſes, untill ſuch time, that by Agreement with the King, to pay him fourteen thouſand Maravedis, all matters were compounded, and the Fortreſſes were conſigned into the hands of the noble King Don Fernando. The ſame Hiſtory alſo makes mention of this following paſſage, namely, That when King Fernando had poſſeſſion of one part onely, and not of the entire Kingdom of Leon, he left Manſilla, and went to Leon, which was the principal City of that Countrey, where he was received with great joy and magnificent entertainment, and there crowned King of Leon by the Biſhop of that City, and being in the preſence of all the Nobles and Citizens, ſeated in the Regal Throne, Te Deum was ſolemnly ſung, with the common ſatisfaction and rejoycing of the people, and from that time he had the Title of King of Caſtile and Leon, both which Kingdoms were his lawfull Inheritance, deſcended to him from Father and Mother; for theſe two Kingdoms had formerly been divided, and beſtowed by the Emperour to his two Sons, that is Caſtile to D. Sancho, and Leon to Fernando, and afterwards came to be again united together in the Noble Perſon of Don Fernando the third. After this the Queen Tereſa the Mother of Tancha and Dulce, the Siſters of D. Fernando, ſeeing that her Son was become Maſter of the whole Kingdom, and that ſhe was not able to make farther reſiſtence againſt him, ſhe diſpatched an Ambaſſadour to D. Fernando, demanding ſome ſhare and convenient ſubſiſtence; which being granted, was much diſpleaſing to ſome degenerate Spirits, who were in hopes of making a benefit to themſelves by the Wars between Caſtile and Leon; of which Embaſſy the Noble Lady Berengaria, Mother of Fernando, being informed, ſhe laboured much to bring matters to an accommodation, being very apprehenſive of the many Troubles and infinite Ruines which are cauſed by a Civil and inteſtine War; and for that reaſon labouring on both ſides, ſhe at length produced a Peace between her Son the King Fernando, and his Siſters the Ladies Sancha and Dulce, and prevailed with the King to ſtay at Leon, whilſt ſhe made a viſit to the Queen Tereſa, and her Daughters, then reſiding at Valentia. And then it was that Berengaria prevailed with Tereſa, and her Daughters, to quit all their Title and Intereſt to the Kingdom of Leon; in conſideration of which King Fernando did oblige himſelf to give a yearly Annuity to each of theſe Siſters of thirty thouſand Maravedis of Gold. To confirm this Agreement the King came to Benevente, where he met his Siſters, and there ſigned and ſealed a Writing to them, to pay them the thirty thouſand Maravedis of Annuity; making them Aſſignment on the places where to receive their Money, which was afterwards the Foundation of a happy Peace.

After this King Fernando being married to Queen Joan, he went in Progreſs to viſit ſeveral parts of his Kingdom, and being at Toledo, he underſtood that Cordova, and other remote Cities of his Kingdom, were in great penury and diſtreſs for want of Proviſions; for ſupply of which he ſent them twenty five thouſand Maravedis to Cordova, and the like ſum, to other Garriſons. All which ſmall ſums are particularly recorded in the Chronicles which write of the Life of Don Fernando the Saint.

CHAP. IV.

The Authour proceeds in his Diſcourſe concerning the ſmall quantity of Money which was in ancient days, and how much there is now in theſe.

THE which Treatiſe being of the ſame nature with the preceding Chapter, to avoid tediouſneſs to the Reader, we have thought fit to omit. And ſo proceed unto the next Chapter.

CHAP. V.

Shewing how little the Conqueſt of the new World coſt unto the Kings of Caſtile.

BEing come now to our ultimate Argument to prove the ſmall quantity of Money which was then in Spain, before the time that the Conqueſt of my Countrey was effected; we cannot give a more pregnant inſtance, than by demonſtrating how little the moſt rich Empire of Peru, and all the new World, not before known, coſt the Kings of Caſtile. Francis Lopez in his General Hiſtory of the Indies, having recounted many remarkable paſſages, we ſhall faithfully recite ſuch of them as are moſt pertinent to our purpoſe; as namely, That Chriſtopher Columbus treated with Henry the 7th, King of England, about the Diſcovery of the Indies, as alſo with Alfonſo the 5th King of Portugal, with the Dukes of Medina Sidonia, and Medina Celi, who not receiving with good approbation the Propoſals made them, Friar John Perez, and Friar Francis de la Rabida, which laſt was the King's Coſmographer, encouraged him to make his Applications to the Court of Spain, where they believed his Propoſitions might find a gratious reception: By theſe means Columbus was introduced into the Court of Caſtile, in the Year 1486. where he delivered his Propoſals and Petition to Fernando and Iſabella, King and Queen of Spain, but they being embroiled at that time in their Wars againſt the Moors in the Countrey of Granada, had little leiſure to convert their thoughts to Projects of this nature. And Columbus being but a ſtranger, and poor in habit, and without other Credit or Intereſt than that of a poor Friar, whom they would neither vouchſafe to lend an Ear unto, much leſs to believe, was the cauſe of great Diſcouragement and Affliction to Columbus. Onely Alonſo de Quintanilla, who was Auditor General, gave him his Diet at his Caterer's Houſe, taking great pleaſure to hear him diſcourſe, and promiſe high Matters, and Riches, which were to be fetched from unknown Countries; and therefore to keep up his Spirits, he gave him hopes one day to prevail with his Catholick Majeſty in his behalf; the which he accordingly effected for him, by introducing him firſt to the knowledge of Cardinal de Mendoça, Archbiſhop of Toledo, who had a great power and authority both with the King and Queen of Spain. This Noble Perſon having maturely examined and conſidered of the Propoſals which Columbus made, procured him an Audience with the King, to whom at firſt his Propoſitions

ſeemed vain Projects, and without foundation, howſoever he received good Words, and hopes of a favourable diſpatch, ſo ſoon as the War with Granada ſhould be concluded. With this Anſwer Columbus conceived ſome ſatisfaction and began to be eſteemed in the Court, for untill that time the Courtiers turned all his Project into ridicule, and derided it as a Dream, or a melancholy fancy. Granada being at length taken, Columbus renewed his Negotiation with ſuch ſucceſs, that he obtained his Demand, and a Commiſſion to go into the new World for Gold, Silver, Pretious Stones, and other rich and valuable Commodities, and to receive and take unto himſelf the twelfth part of all ſuch Riches, Royalties and Rents, which he ſhould diſcover and acquire in thoſe unknown Countries, without Damage or Prejudice howſoever to the Right which the King of Portugal pretends to thoſe parts. All which Articles of Agreement were made, granted and concluded at Granada on the 30th of April, in the year when that City was taken and ſubdued, and confirmed in virtue of the holy Faith, and with all the Privileges and Graces of the Royal Favour; but in regard the King had no Money wherewith to furniſh Columbus on this expedition, Lewis de St. Angel, Clerk of the Exchequer, lent ſix Millions of Maravedis to him, which make the ſum of ſixteen thouſand Ducats. And now here are two things particularly obſervable, one of which is, that with ſo ſmall a ſum as this all the Riches of the Indies accrued to the Royal Crown of Caſtile. That ſo ſoon as the Conqueſt over the Moors was perfected, the Wars with whom had continued for the ſpace of eight hundred years, the Conqueſt over the Indians was begun, that ſo it may appear how zealous the Spaniards have ever been to exerciſe, and employ their Arms againſt the Enemies of the Faith of Chriſt. By which it appears, that by the continued and conſtant ſolicitations which Columbus uſed at the Court for the ſpace of ſeven or eight years before he could procure his diſpatch, together with the help of ſixteen thouſand Ducats, all Spain, and the whole World hath been enriched. And having now treated of the Royal Aſſent, we ſhall deſcend to more common and particular matters, to evidence the truth of this whole Hiſtory.

CHAP. VI.

The Value of common things before the Conqueſt of Peru.

WHerein the Authour enlarging himſelf by particular inſtances, at how cheap a rate all things were valued in Spain, in the ſame manner as in the 2d, 3d, and 4th Chapters, we have, for brevity ſake, thought fit to omit, and for better divertiſement to the Reader we proceed to

CHAP. VII.

Wherein two Opinions are declared concerning the Riches of Peru, and the beginning of that Conqueſt.

HAving already deſcribed to what ſum the Revenue of Spain did amount in former times, it would now be very ſatisfactory, if we could give an account to what a value it is amounted and improved in theſe days; but I muſt confeſs, that that would prove too difficult a work for me, who have no intereſt or communication with the Officers of the Royal Exchequer, nor ſuch intimacy with them, as to obtain ſo great a favour from any of them; and indeed I am perſuaded, that if I had, yet the vaſt quantities of Riches which paſs through their Hands are almoſt incomprehenſible, and ſuch as they cannot number, how much leſs am I inſufficient for this matter, who have no skill or knowledge of that Wealth, or, as I may uſe our own Saying, who know not what colour Flower or Meal bears. Onely this we may aver, as a matter clear and manifeſt, that all the charge and expence for equipping out the Fleet againſt England, in the Year 1588. was all charged on the Wealth of Peru; beſides which Philip the 2d. King of Caſtile, received eight Millions of Ducats from thence in the ſpace of ſix years, beſides all other branches of his Royal Revenue; the which ſum was commanded afterwards to be paid in the term of every three years. It is farther manifeſt and apparent, that ſoon after Philip the third came to the Crown, that the Kingdom offered another increaſe of his Revenue to eighteen Millions, payable in the ſpace of ſix years; the which continues to theſe times, beſides all other Rents and Duties paid to the Crown: By theſe, and other particular inſtances before mentioned, we may collect and imagine the great improvement hath been in the King's Revenue; the ſeveral branches of which being much more various than thoſe of private Eſtates, and there having in every one of thoſe branches been a conſiderable advance and improvement; the ſum thereof is become ſo prodigious and vaſt, as can ſcarce be valued by the Skill of our Arithmetick. By which we may conclude, that if that Man is to be eſteemed poor, who can value his Riches, Pauperis eſt numerare pecus, how much muſt we be plunged in our account, when we come to reckon, and ſum up the Revenue of that Monarch, in the circumference of whoſe Territories (as Coſmographers deſcribe) the Sun never ſets? All which Riches and Grandeur are to be attributed to the ſucceſs and labours of this our Triumvirate.

And though it be true what we have ſaid before, that we had little acquaintance or communication with the Officers of His Majeſties Royal Exchequer; yet at length, by the friendſhip which I gained with John de Morales, a Native of Madrid, who was a very honeſt and intelligent Gentleman; I procured ſome account of the King's Revenue, with which he was pleaſed to oblige me, for the better advance of this Hiſtory, which I now write; the which was ſo difficult a work to him, that he kept me three months before he could ſatisfie me therein; and at laſt he delivered me this following account, which I have extracted verbatim from his own Paper. " Your Worſhip was pleaſed to deſire of me, that to ſerve a " particular occaſion of yours, I would ſet down in writing the rents and value of " all his Majeſties Revenue; the which is a buſineſs ſo difficult, that I cannot " ſumm within any tolerable compaſs of certainty. And indeed, though the " King hath deſired it, and commanded it to be given in, for the better direction " and meaſures of his Council of the Treaſury, and ordered all to be put into a " Book, yet that work is not as yet begun, nor do we know when it will be be- " gun, much leſs when it will be ended, for there are ſuch vaſt Riſes and Falls, " ſuch Advances and Abatements, that nothing can be delivered with any certain- " ty, every thing running in ſuch different chanels, as is impoſſible to reduce them " to any coherence of method; but in the bulk or lump, we may affirm, that the

" the Revenue of the King is a prodigious Maſs of Wealth and Treaſure. Thus far are the Words of Morales, which we have willingly alledged in confirmation of the truth of what we have ſaid, being deſirous not to write any thing but that which we can avouch on good ground and authority. And for farther proof of this difficulty, and how hard a thing it is to ſum up the Revenue of this King of Spain, now Emperour of the new World, I ſhall produce the Teſtimony of John Botero, a great and an univerſal Hiſtorian, who, after he had made a calculate of the Revenue of the King of China, and of the Rents which Galizia, Aſturias and Portugal anciently yielded to the Roman Empire; with what was the Revenue of the Kings of Navarre, France, the Emperour, Poland, England, Duke of Lorrain, King of Scotland, Swedeland and Gothland; as alſo what was the Income of the Houſe of Auſtria, of the King of Narſinga, the Neriffe of Egypt, and of the Gran Signor; yet coming to the Revenue of our King of Spain, he is there ſilent; for which I can render no other reaſon, than becauſe this Authour coming to this Account, he found himſelf ſo plunged and immerſed therein, that he durſt not adventure to fathom the ſame; not having, as I imagine, numbers ſufficient to ſum up the Tribute of his many Kingdoms, and with them the immenſe Riches imported from Peru.

And in confirmation of the great Treaſure with which Peru hath enriched all the World, I have this farther Teſtimony to offer from the moſt Reverend Father Don Paulo de Laguna, who was Preſident of the Council of his Majeſty's Exchequer, and afterwards Preſident of the Council of the Indies, and Vice-king of the New World, and in the Year 1603. was elected Biſhop of Cordova; this great Perſon diſcourſing one day with his Confeſſour, and others, concerning the immenſe Riches of Peru, did confidently affirm, that from one Mountain onely of Peru, there had been tranſported into Spain, untill the Year 1602. two hundred Millions of Pieces of Eight, which had been regiſtred; and that at leaſt one hundred Millions more had been imported without Regiſter; And I can farther add, (ſaid he) that twenty five Millions in Gold and Silver have been brought into Spain by one Fleet in my time. The Standers-by hearing this, anſwered, We could never believe it, my Lord, but that we receive it from ſo authentick an Authour as your Lordſhip. What I ſay, replied the Biſhop, I know for a certain truth; and moreover I aſſure you, that all the Kings of Spain, joined together from King Pelayo to theſe times, have not been Maſters of ſo much Money as King Philip the 2d. hath been. After which teſtimony from ſo great a perſon, we ſhall not need to add, or require farther proofs for what we have alledged.

But ſuch as look on the Riches of Peru with more than a common Eye, are of opinion, that they have rather been hurtfull than good or beneficial to Mankind; for that Riches have been the cauſe of Vice, and not of Vertue, having inclined the Nature of Men to Pride and Ambition, to Gluttony and Luxury; for enjoying an affluence of Fortune, they have given themſelves up to Sloth, and Effeminacy, becoming neither fit for Government in the times of Peace, nor yet for Hardſhip and Labour in the times of War, employing their whole thoughts and time in contriving new Diſhes, and Liquours, to pleaſe their Appetite, and fantaſtical Faſhions for their Clothing; in which they are arrived to that height of extravagance, that they ſcarce know what to wear, and are come to that undecency of Dreſs, that their Habit is more correſpondent to Women than to Men. And as the Rents of the Rich have been raiſed to maintain the Luſts and riotous Living of great Perſons, ſo have the Poor been oppreſſed, and reduced to Rags, and Famine, to ſupport the Pride and Luxury of their Landlords. And the truth is, the Poor are become much more poor than formerly; for the quantity of Money being increaſed, which is all accumulated into the Coffers of the Rich, hath enhanſed the price of Proviſions and Commodities to that degree, that the Poor ſtarve by the abundance of the Rich; and though the Rich have a plenty of Money, and may out of their great ſtores enlarge their Charities towards the Poor; yet their Alms do not anſwer the price of Proviſions which the plenty of Money hath raiſed in the World; ſo in ſhort they conclude, that the Riches of the new World not having increaſed the Proviſions neceſſary for the ſupport of humane Life, but rather ſerved to make them dear, and Men effeminate, having enfeebled them in their Bodies and Underſtandings, and debauched them in their Habits and Cuſtoms of living, the generality of Mankind is become much worſe, and leſs contented, and having been formidable, and dreaded in ancient times by all the World, are now rendred mean and effeminate by the corruption of their Riches.

Now as to these two Opinions, I leave every one free to follow that which seems best to him. For I being a party, and biassed by affection to my own Countrey, dare neither pretend to favour that which applauds the grandeur and glory which Peru hath brought to Spain, nor yet oppose the other, lest I should seem partial, and too affectionate to my own Cause. And so we shall proceed and take the thread of our History, passing by divine favour through the beginning, middle and end of this famous Triumvirate.

We say then, that these three great Men having entred into an Agreement and Society together, and assigned to each other his several and distinct Charge and Office. The first thing they did was to build two Ships, upon one of which Francis Piçarro, in the Year 1525. departed from Panama with an hundred and fourteen Men, by license and permission of the Governour Peter Arias de Avila, and having sailed about an hundred Leagues, they arrived at a Countrey very mountainous, and subject to Rains: The Natives were as fierce and rugged as the Countrey they inhabited, and in great numbers sallied forth to join Battel with the Spaniards, of which they killed some; and in four Skirmishes Piçarro received seven wounds with Arrows, but he being well armed, none of them proved mortal; howsoever they were forced to leave the Countrey, to their great discouragement, repenting now of the design they had undertaken. Almagro soon afterwards departed from Panama, in quest of Piçarro, and coming to the same Land which was appointed for their Rendezvous, were entertained with the like treatment; for the Indians being fleshed by the success of the late Skirmishes, sallied out against the Spaniards with like courage, and having killed many of them, and beaten out one of the Eyes of Almagro, he was forced likewise to leave the Countrey; but what land or part this was, the Spanish Historians do not tell us: At length Almagro going in search of Piçarro, joined with him at Chinchama, where they agreed again to land their Men, but this Countrey proving as mountainous, and as subject to Rain as the other, and the People no less fierce and warlike, sallying out upon them in great numbers, forced them again to retreat unto their Ships, bestowing on them a thousand Curses and Reproaches at their departure. All which is related at large by Lopez de Gomara, to whom I refer the Reader, in case he desires to know more particulars of that Expedition.

CHAP. VIII.

How Almagro returned twice to Panama for Succour and Recruits.

After this ill success Almagro returned to Panama for new Recruits, and brought with him eighty Men; and yet for all this force the two Captains durst not attempt the Conquest of any Countrey, by reason that the Natives made a bold and stout resistence; howsoever sailing along by the Sea Coast, they came at length to a Countrey called Catamez, which was plain and level, without mountains, and abounding with such quantities of Provisions, that they furnished themselves with all things necessary for humane sustenance; and there observing that the Indians wore great Studs and Plates of Gold on their Faces, with fine Emeralds and Turquoises, the Spaniards became again elevated in their hopes, not doubting now but to make a good Voyage, and to gain Riches and Wealth to their full satisfaction. But soon after the Spaniards lost the hopes and expectation of all their imaginary Wealth, so soon as they saw the Indians come down upon them in great numbers, with good Orders, and with desire and courage to fight; with which the Spaniards became so discouraged, that they durst not engage with them; and though they were at least two hundred and fifty Men, yet by common conconſent they departed, and landed at a certain Iſland, called the Cock Iſland; where having remained for ſeveral days, ſometimes in hopes, and again depreſſed with fear, as their different Rencounters and Succeſſes were promiſing, or adverſe, they began for the moſt part to deſpond, and wiſh they had never adventured on the Enterpriſe; onely the Captains and Commanders remained firm and conſtant to their firſt Deſign, reſolving either to overcome, or dye in their Enterpriſe: With this determination they agreed that Piçarro ſhould continue in the Iſland, and that Almagro ſhould return to Panama, to fetch Proviſions, and more Recruits; but many of the Souldiers growing weary and timorous, deſired to return with him; which Almagro refuſed to admit, or to carry Letters, leſt the Souldiers adviſing the dangers and hazards they had ſuſtained to their Friends at Panama, ſhould bring a Diſreputation and Diſcouragement on their whole Deſign, which they had formerly magnified, having cried up the vaſt Treaſures of thoſe unknown Countries: In purſuit of which the reſolute Conſtancy which theſe Chiefs had ſhewed enhanſed the eſtimate of thoſe hidden Riches.

But whatever the Captains could doe to hinder the Intelligence which the Souldiers might give of their Diſaſtures to Panama, they could not prevent or diſappoint the Advices, which Men in Diſtreſs contrived to ſend for their Relief; for a certain Perſon, who was a Native of Truxillo, and for being of the ſame Countrey with Piçarro, had greater Obligations to follow the Fortune of his Leader, found out a way to fold up a Paper within a bottom of Cotton Yarn, made up in the bigneſs of an Egg, in which Writing all the Diſaſtures, and ill Succeſſes of their adventure were related, being directed to a certain Friend, ſubſcribed by many of the Souldiers, giving an account of ſuch as were dead, and ſlain, and of the preſent ſtraits and neceſſities they were in, as alſo of their Confinement, not being ſuffered to return to Panama; at the foot of which Advice, or Intelligence, theſe four Verſes were written,

Good Mr. Governour,
We pray you conſider,
That there goes the Fetcher,
And here ſtays the Butcher.

I remember, that when I was a Child I often heard theſe Verſes repeated, whenſoever Diſcourſes occaſionally were made concerning the Conqueſt of the New World, which became afterwards like a Proverb, or old Saying, frequent in the Mouth of every one; and in reality they proved very prejudicial to theſe Chiefs, whoſe Deſign was wholly loſt, and all the Money they had ſpent, and Labours they ſuſtained, came all to nothing: When afterwards I came into Spain, and found thoſe Verſes inſerted in the Hiſtory of Lopez de Gomara, I was much pleaſed to ſee them there recorded, becauſe I remembred to have heard them in the times when I was in the Indies.

CHAP. IX.

Piçarro is forſaken by all his Souldiers, onely thirteen Companions remain with him.

WHen Almagro returned to Panama, it was then about a year ſince this Enterpriſe was firſt begun, at which time he found a new Governour, called Pedro de los Rios, a Gentleman of Cordova, who having received and peruſed the Petition of the Souldiers, he ſent a certain Judge, called Tafur, to the Cock Iſland, with Commiſſion to free all ſuch as ſhould be deſirous to return unto Panama. This Report being rumoured abroad, ſuch as before had engaged themſelves to go with Almagro, began to withdraw themſelves, ſaying, that ſince thoſe who were already on the place, were weary of their Employment, and deſirous to return home, it would be to little purpoſe for them to take up the Cudgels which the others had laid down; the which misfortune Almagro greatly lamented, having loſt all his hopes; and Piçarro, when he found himſelf abandoned, and forſaken of all his Men, without regard to that Faith and Engagement of Articles by which they had aſſociated themſelves with him, he remained perplexed, and diſtracted with great confuſion of Mind; at length plucking up his courage, that he might diſtinguiſh who were for him, and who were againſt him; he laid his hand upon his Sword, and drew it, and with the point thereof he drew a Line on the ground, towards Peru, and turning to his Men, ſaid to them:

" Fellow Souldiers, This Line ſignifies the Labours, Hunger, Thirſt, Weari-
" neſs, Wounds, Sickneſſes, and all other Dangers and Hazards which are to be " ſuſtained to procure this great Conqueſt, even to the loſs perhaps of Life it-
" ſelf: Whoſoever finds himſelf endued with Courage ſufficient to undergo this " great Trial, and whoſe Heroick Soul is capable of the generous Thoughts of " this Noble Conqueſt, let him, in token, and for evidence of his brave Spirit,
" paſs on the other ſide of this Line, which ſhall ſerve for a Teſtimony between
" me and them of their Faith and Reſolution; and let ſuch as find in themſelves
" a Cowardly Spirit, and a Soul too mean for ſo ſublime an Action, let them
" return to Panama; for my part, I will force no Man, being reſolved to remain
" here my ſelf with thoſe few that will be my Companions, not doubting but " that God, for the Glory and Honour of his moſt holy Name, will ſo aſſiſt us " with his Divine Providence, that we ſhall find no want of thoſe who out of " Fear and Cowardiſe forſake us.

The Spaniards having heard the concluſion of this Speech, immediately haſted aboard with all ſpeed imaginable, leſt any unlucky accident ſhould prevent their return to Panama; for as the difficulty and fear of Labour is always more prevalent in mean and poor Spirits, than the thoughts of Honour, or hopes of Riches, ſo theſe vile and abject Souls forſook their generous Captain, who would have conducted them to the height of eternal Fame, to return ignominiouſly with their Judge. Howſoever thirteen remained for Companions with Piçarro, who could not be corrupted or diſcouraged by the ill examples of the Fugitives, but rather having their Hearts and Spirits more enflamed with Diſdain againſt the cowardly and baſe, they courageouſly paſſed the Line which Piçarro had drawn with his Sword, and there renewed their Vows and Proteſtations, of Conſtancy and Faith, promiſing to live and dye with their Captain and generous Leader.

Piçarro having returned them Thanks, and promiſed them the Prizes and Rewards of their Conqueſts, they paſſed over in a Boat to another Iſland, called the Gorgona, where they endured great want of all Proviſions, living for ſeveral months and days on no other ſuſtenance than with Sea-weeds, and great Serpents, and other creeping Creatures, of which that Iſland yields great abundance; and is miſerably infeſted with Rains, and ſubject to terrible Lightnings and Thunder;

in which ſad and diſmal place and condition they ſuffered Miſeries beyond expreſſion. Of all theſe thirteen brave Heroes Gomara makes mention but of two onely; I know not his reaſon for it, or why he omits to name the other eleven; but now I think on't, I have obſerved that it is the common omiſſion and defect of Spaniſh Writers, not to reckon particularly the Heroes of their Countrey by name, for they ought to declare their Names and Surnames, their Families, Countries and Parentage, that the memory of ſuch Perſons, famous in their Generation for the Conqueſt of a new World, may be conſerved unto all Ages, and their Families boaſt in the honour of being allied to ſuch Anceſtours. The two which Gomara mentions are Peter de Candia, who was not a Spaniard neither, but a Greek, and Bartholomew Ruyz de Moguer, a Native of Moguer, and Pilot in this Navigation and Voyage. But Carate was more accurate in his Relation, for beſides the two former he names ſeven others, viz. Nicholas de Ribera, John de la Torre, Alonſo Briſeno, all Natives of Venavente, Chriſtopher de Peralta, a Native of Baeça, Alonſo de Truxillo, Francis de Cuellar, a Native of Cuella, and Alonſo de Molina, born at Ubeda. Beſides which recited by this Writer, there was another Ribera, companion to the former, whoſe Name I have forgotten, perhaps it might be Jeronimo or Alonſo, but to diſtinguiſh them one from the other, they uſually called them Ribera the Senior, and Ribera the Junior; not that one was much elder than the other in years, but by reaſon of their ſeniority in the Society with Piçarro, for one of them was in the number of the firſt Adventurers which came from Panama, and the other was of the ſecond or third Expedition, which came thence with Almagro; all which particulars I learned in my own Countrey from thoſe who diſcourſed of thoſe times, and were for the moſt part Eye-witneſſes of the matter of fact; both which Riberas had their Shares and Diviſions of Indians made to them in Ciudad Real, where they left Sons and Daughters, educated with all Goodneſs and Vertue. He whom Carate calls Alonſo Truxillo, was James, for I was well acquainted with him, and know that he had Lands and Poſſeſſions given him in Cozco, and that in the Year 1560. when I departed from that City, he was ſtill living. Moreover Francis Rodrigues of Villa Fuerte near Cozco, was another of the thirteen, and one of the firſt which paſſed the Line, which, as we have ſaid, Almagro drew with the point of his Sword, and was living in the year aboveſaid, onely two are wanting of the thirteen, whoſe Names we know not. And thus much we have ſaid to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of Carate, in honour to thoſe Families, whoſe Off-ſpring may well boaſt to have been deſcended from ſuch famous Anceſtours. The like particulars I ſhall mention in other paſſages, where I find that Spaniſh Writers have been defective, that ſo the Reader may receive entire ſatisfaction in this Hiſtory.

Francis Piçarro proceeds in his Conqueſt.

P*Içarro* and his thirteen Companions remained many Months in the Iſland of Gorgona, enduring great hardſhips in that Countrey where are perpetual Rains, without Houſe or Tent, or any thing to cover them, and where the beſt and choiceſt of their food was nothing but the fleſh of great Serpents; ſo that it ſeemed, as if God had ſuſtained them by a miracle; and indeed the Divine Providence appeared moſt wonderfully in putting it into the Hearts of all, beſides theſe thirteen, to return, to demonſtrate unto the World, that this Conqueſt was not effected by Humane, but by Divine Aid; for it is hardly conceivable how, humanely ſpeaking, it ſhould enter into the minds of thirteen Men onely, to adventure on the Conqueſt of Peru. Of which therefore we can give no other Account, than onely that the Divine Mercy compaſſionating the Miſeries and Ignorances of thoſe Gentiles, was pleaſed to incite and inflame a fire of Courage in the Breaſts of thoſe Spaniards, fitted for ſuch an Enterpriſe; for as God did under the Old Teſtament infuſe ſtrength and virtue into the Locks of Sampſon, ſo now he was pleaſed by ſuch weak means as theſe to bring Light out of Darkneſs, and make way for the effuſion and ſpreading of his Holy Goſpel.

At the end of many Months (for a diſpatch could not be ſooner made) the Ship arrived which Almagro ſent with Proviſions, but without Men; a misfortune ſo diſcouraging, that one might believe they would rather have been induced to return home, than perſiſt in their reſolution. But God ſo influenced their Minds with ſtrange hopes, that they figured unto themſelves a concurrence of all happy Omens in their favour, for they no ſooner ſaw the Ship, than that they reſolved to proceed in their Voyage, and diſcover at leaſt what Countrey and what People they were, who inhabited under the Equinoctial, a Region as yet unknown to the Spaniards: With theſe Intentions they embarked, and at length with much labour they got out of the Golf in which they were embayed; for both the South wind, which always blows in, and the Current, which always ſets from North to South, made it very difficult to ſurmount both one and the other; for indeed it is a wonderfull thing to ſee, and it were well if it were deſcribed in our Maps, for the benefit of Navigation, in what manner, and with what rapidneſs thoſe Streams run; for with the violence of the Waves, and force of the Current, they make ſuch a noiſe, and raiſe ſuch a froth, as is moſt terrible to behold, and is dangerous to Ships, which being ſucked in by thoſe Whirlpools, are certainly loſt. Many of theſe Currents caſt up the earth and ſlime from the bottom, that the Waters are very thick and turbid, others are clear and limpid; ſome are large and broad, and others narrow, but that which is moſt ſtrange to ſee, is the vaſt difference of one Water from the other, that is of one Water which runs with a ſwift Stream from that which is ſtill, or runs ſlowly; the Waters on each ſide are quiet, and ſeem like a Wall to the rapid Stream which runs in the middle, the reaſon of which I cannot comprehend. It is ſufficient for our purpoſe to tell you, that their Navigation over ſuch Currents, and in an unknown Sea, for many Days and Months, was very difficult; and therefore we cannot ſufficiently applaud the courage of theſe thirteen Companions, who would ſtill adventure, and ſtruggle under all theſe Diſcouragements. They ſuffered much by hunger, for being but few in number, they were cautious of hazarding themſelves amongſt the Indians, onely they ſometimes watched an opportunity to get Food and Proviſions by ſtealth and robbery, rather than by force of Arms, or open appearance.

CHAP. XI.

How Piçarro, and his thirteen Companions, arrived in Peru.

AT the end of two years, after they had quitted the Iſland of Gorgona, for ſo long they had been in making their Diſcoveries on the Coaſt, not knowing well whither they went, during which time we will leave the Reader to conſider what Diſtreſſes and Hardſhips they ſuſtained, all which other Hiſtorians omit, not counting the ſteps, and degrees by which theſe Adventurers proceeded. At length I ſay, they arrived at Tumpiz, where it pleaſed God to work a Miracle, that thoſe people might receive, and embrace the Catholick Faith, which was this; the Ship being here arrived, the Spaniards obſerved that the Countrey was well peopled, and adorned with many good Houſes, and more ſtately Buildings, than any they had ſeen in other parts, became very deſirous to make a farther diſcovery; but how to contrive it was very difficult, for they were fearfull to ſend one man ſingly, leſt he ſhould be killed by the Indians, nor durſt they adventure in a Body, for fear of the like fate; at length to end the Diſpute, Peter de Candia being full of Courage and Chriſtian confidence, offered himſelf on this Adventure, telling his Companions, that in caſe he were killed, their loſs would not be much, conſidering that he was but a ſingle perſon, and that if he came well off, the greater would be the Wonder and the Victory; which having ſaid, he immediately covered his Body with a Coat of Mail, which reached to his Knees, and put on a Helmet of the beſt and braveſt ſort, he girt his Sword by his ſide, took his Target of Steel in his left hand, and in the right he bore a wooden Croſs of about a yard and a half long, which being the ſignal of his Redemption, he confided more therein than in his Arms of Steel or Iron. This Peter of Candia was a very tall Man, and though I did never ſee him, yet his Son, with whom I went to School at Beaba, ſhewed me the proportion of his Father in himſelf; for being a Boy, but of eleven or twelve years of age, was as big as another of twice that age. In this dreſs Peter de Candia left his Companions, deſiring their Prayers and Recommendations of him unto God, and then with a grave and ſerious Countenance and Pace he walked towards the Inhabitants, with as much Majeſty as if he had been Lord Paramount of all that Province. The Indians, who were in great confuſion at the Arrival of the Ship, were much more affrighted when they ſaw a Man ſo tall, and of ſo vaſt a proportion, covered all with Iron, with a Beard on his Face, which had never been known or ſeen before amongſt them. Thoſe who met him in the Fields ran away, and gave an Allarm to their People, and all taking Arms, ran into their Caſtle or Fortreſs, which was ſpeedily filled with crowds; but Peter ſtill continued his grave Countenance, and Pace towards them, which when they ſaw, they were in great admiration, none daring to hurt him, for they believed that he was ſome divine or heavenly Apparition; but to prove what manner of thing he was, the Curacas, or Lords, agreed to try him with the Lion and Tyger which Huayna Capac had recommended to their Cuſtody, (as we have already related in the Hiſtory of his Life,) which when they had let looſe, they expected that they ſhould kill and tear him in pieces; but this ſtory is briefly related by Peter de Cieça, in the Account he gives of the Conqueſts and Actions of Huayna Capac in this great Province of Tumpiz, the which I thought fit to tranſcribe word for word, that ſo I might have the Teſtimony of a Spaniſh Authour, in confirmation of the truth of what I have wrote, and with the ſame occaſion deſcribe the beauty of that pleaſant Valley of Tumbiz, for ſo that Authour writes. " In regard, ſaith he, " that the Inhabitants of the Iſle of Puna were always at variance with the Natives

" tives of Tumbez, the Captains of the Inga built a Fortreſs, which perhaps they " deſigned with intention to employ the People, and divert their Minds from " their unreaſonable Wars and Debates. So ſoon as this Fortreſs was finiſhed " Guayna Capal came thither, and commanded that a Temple ſhould be built, " and dedicated to the Sun, near to the Fortreſs of Tumbez, and that two hun- " dred Virgins, choſen out of the moſt beautifull Ladies belonging to Noble " Families of that Countrey, ſhould have their Lodgings therein. In this For- " treſs (of which there remain ſome Ruines to this day) Guayna Capac did, by " his Deputy gather and collect the Tributes of the People, and laid them up " there, with many pretious Jewels, as alſo all Proviſions for the Souldiers of the " Garriſon, and for thoſe which marched that way; alſo they report, that in " this Fortreſs the Lion and Tiger were kept, which had been ſent thither by " Guayna Capac, and were the ſame which they let looſe upon Pedro de Candia, " with intent that they might tear him in pieces, at that time when Francis Pi- " çarro came firſt to this Countrey, with his thirteen Companions, to make a " Diſcovery of Peru. In this Fortreſs of Tumbez were many Silver-ſmiths, which " made Veſſels of Gold and Silver, and other pieces of rare Workmanſhip for " ſervice and ornament of the Temple, which they eſteemed holy and ſanctified, " as alſo for ſervice and honour of the Inca; and for his perpetual Fame " and laſting Memory, they plated all the Walls of this Temple with panes of " Gold and Silver. And the Women which were dedicated to the ſervice of " the Temple had no other employment than to ſpin, and weave the fineſt ſort " of their Wool, which they performed with great curioſity. And in regard " we have in the ſecond Part of this Hiſtory related as much as we could under- " ſtand, or had reaſon to believe, concerning the Kingdom of Peru, from the " time of Mango Capac, who was the firſt to the time of Guaſcar, who was " the laſt King that deſcended by lawfull Succeſſion; we ſhall add no farther in " this Chapter, than what will ſerve to illuſtrate this Hiſtory.

Thus far the Words of Peter de Cieça, collected out of that part of his Hiſtory, wherein he treats of the great Riches of Tumpiz, and of the wild Beaſts which they ſet upon Peter de Candia, but proceeds no farther, reſerving the remainder of his Story to be related in the third Part of his Works, which have not as yet been publiſhed to the World.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Miracle which God wrought in Tumpiz.

BUT to return unto our purpoſe: We ſay, That thoſe wild Beaſts beholding the Chriſtian, and the Croſs which he held in his hand, immediately loſt their natural fierceneſs, and as if they had been two Dogs which he had bred up, came and fawned upon him, and caſt themſelves at his Feet. Peter de Candia conſidering this Miracle which God had wrought for him, took courage, and ſtroked them on the Head and Sides, laying the Croſs upon them; whereby theſe Gentiles might underſtand, that by virtue of that Standard the ſavage Beaſts had loſt their ferocity, and were made tame. The Indians ſeeing this Wonder, conceived that Peter was no mortal Man, but deſcended from Heaven and from the Sun, and therefore with common conſent adored him as a Child of their God the Sun, bringing him into their Temple, which was lined with broad plates of Gold, that ſo he might be informed in what manner they honoured and worſhipped his Father in that Countrey.

And having ſhewed him their Temple, with the Veſſels of Gold and Silver, and other Ornaments and Riches which were for the ſervice of it, they conducted him to the Royal Lodgings of his Brothers the Incas, whom they eſteemed alſo for Children of the Sun. Then they lead him through all the Palace, that he might ſee the ſquare Halls, the Chambers, and Antichambers, together with the furniture of Gold and Silver; they ſhewed him alſo all the Veſſels which were for ſervice of the Inca, ſuch as Jars, and Cups, and Pots, all which, even to the Shovels and Tongs of the Kitchin were all of Gold and Silver. Then they brought him into the Gardens, where he ſaw Trees, and leſſer Plants, and Herbs, and wild Beaſts, and creeping things, ſuch as we have ſaid were placed in the Royal Gardens, which were all made in Gold and Silver, at which the Chriſtian was as much aſtoniſhed, as the Indians were to ſee a Man ſo ſtrange, and wonderfull as he appeared unto them.

CHAP. XIII.

Peter de Candia informs his Companions of what he had ſeen, and therewith they all return unto Panama.

Peter de Candia being abundantly ſatisfied with what he had ſeen, returned with all Joy imaginable to his Companions, taking much larger ſteps back, than his gravity allowed him in his march towards the people. He then informed them of all which had paſſed, and what immenſe Riches he had ſeen, at which his Companions remained with aſtoniſhment, being ſcarce able to give credit to his Relation; howſoever being ready to believe what they ſo much deſired, they were abundantly ſatisfied with the Labours they had formerly ſuſtained in queſt of thoſe mighty Treaſures, and Riches, promiſing unto themſelves the poſſeſſion and enjoyment thereof, had they but the fortune to entice and perſuade Men to adventure for them. And having thus diſcovered what they deſired, and more than they expected, they returned to Panama, having not force ſufficient to proceed farther. Auguſtin Carate reports, that three Spaniards remained on the place, after the others were departed; or, as Lopez de Gomara ſays, but two, who out of a curioſity of ſeeing thoſe Riches which Peter de Candia had mentioned, or out of a covetous deſire of gaining ſome of them, in caſe they were ſuch as were reported, refuſed to return with their other Companions. But it is not known what afterwards became of them, the Spaniſh Hiſtorians ſay, that they were killed by the Indians, but that is not probable, becauſe they were worſhipped and adored by them as deſcended from the Sun; but it may rather be ſuppoſed that they dyed of Sickneſs, that Coaſt being very unhealthfull for the Bodies of Strangers; and theſe being thoſe who periſhed from the number of the thirteen, dying, as is believed amongſt the Indians, their Memory was forgotten, and no mention made of them in the Exploits recounted of the other Companions. Theſe thirteen Spaniards conſumed at leaſt three Years in the diſcovery of Peru, as the Spaniſh Authours teſtifie. Auguſtin Carate, in the 2d. Chapter of his firſt Book, hath theſe Words: " Having made theſe Diſcoveries in the ſpace of three Years, they re" turned to Panama, during which time they ſuſtained much hardſhip, and under" went many Dangers; they endured Want, and Hunger, and received Wounds
" in their Skirmiſhes with the Indians; but moſt of all, their greateſt diſappoint-
" ments proceeded from their own civil Diſcords and Diſſentions, the which Pi-
" çarro did often by his prudence and gentleneſs accommodate and appeaſe; giving " them great encouragement by the aſſurances he made them of the faithfulneſs
" and diligence of Almagro, who was making proviſions of Victuals, of Men, " Horſe and Arms; and indeed Almagro and Piçarro were both ſo cordial, and " zealous in this Deſign, that they ſpared neither their Eſtates, nor their Lives in " this Adventure, having made themſelves poor and indebted, who were before " the richeſt of their Countrey. Thus far are the Words of Carate; likewiſe Go- mara avouches the like in this manner. " Francis Piçarro ſpent three years in this
" Diſcovery of Peru, having undergone great Hardſhips, and Labours, with Hun" ger, Perils, Fears, and many other ſtraits. And ſo concludes the Chapter.

Amongſt the many acute and witty Sayings which are recounted of this famous Captain Francis Piçarro, and that which he would often uſe, when he perceived that his Companions were wearied, and diſcouraged with various Labours they ſuſtained in this Diſcovery, and alſo afterwards, when they were entred on the Conqueſt, he would often ſay, Miſerable are we who haraſs and wear out our ſelves to gain ſtrange Empires and Kingdoms, which neither we our ſelves, nor our Children, but we know not who, ſhall enjoy them. This Saying I have often heard reported from the mouth of thoſe who were Ear-Witneſſes thereof, and who vvere Companions vvith him in thoſe Exploits. Likevviſe thoſe very Conquerours vvould often repeat that ſaying, vvhen after the Conqueſt the civil Wars aroſe betvveen Gonçalo Piçarro

Piçarro and Francis Hernandez Giron, in which moſt of them were ſlain; and in regard that Saying appeared a moſt univerſal Truth, every one would take it for his own; but certain it is, that it was the true prediction of Captain Francis Piçarro, to the truth of which I alſo am able to give an Atteſtation.

CHAP. XIV.

Piçarro makes a Voyage into Spain, and demands Aid for the Conqueſt of Peru.

Francis Piçarro returning with all poſſible diligence to Panama, acquainted Diego de Almagro, and Hernandez Luque, the Schoolmaſter, his two Fellow-undertakers, with the immenſe and incredible Riches which they had diſcovered; with which News being overjoyed and encouraged, they agreed that Francis Piçarro ſhould make a Voyage into Spain, to deſire a Commiſſion from the Emperour, Charles the 5th. for the Conqueſt and Government of that Countrey which they had diſcovered. But theſe three Aſſociates had ſo waſted and conſumed their Eſtates in this late Undertaking, that they had nothing remaining of all their own Fortunes, but were forced to borrow, and take up a thouſand Crowns in Gold to defray the charge of this Voyage. Francis Piçarro delivered in to the Council of the Indies a relation in writing, wherein he gave information to His Majeſty of all that he had ſeen, ſupplicating, that in conſideration of his former Pains and Labours in the Diſcovery, and alſo of the Hazards and Expences he was for the future to undergo and ſuſtain in the Conqueſt, adventuring the Bloud and Riches of his Kindred and Friends, to gain an addition of new Kingdoms and Treaſure to the Imperial Crown of His Majeſty, He would be graciouſly pleaſed to grant him the Government of that Countrey. Many that heard Piçarro publiſh and boaſt of ſuch immenſe Riches and Treaſure, did believe that it was onely a Sham, or a Decoy to invite Men to adventure with them, but a few years after verified the truth of his whole Narrative. In anſwer to this Petition His Majeſty was pleaſed to confer upon him all thoſe Countries which he ſhould conquer, with Title of Lord Lieutenant of Peru, as alſo of Captain General, and Governour of all thoſe Countries which the Spaniards ſhould conquer in Peru, which then they called New Caſtile, to diſtinguiſh it from thoſe parts which were named New Spain, both being gained after the ſame manner; that is, as Strangers ſay, at the coſt of Fools, and Madmen, and deſperate Fellows.

Francis Piçarro, to whoſe Name hereafter we will add the Title of Don, becauſe in the Commiſſion from His Majeſty that Honour is inſerted; for in thoſe times the Title of Don was onely prefixed before the Names of Noble Perſons, and was not half ſo common as it is now, when every little fellow aſſumes it, and the very Indians, whether Noble, or not, in imitation of the Spaniards, give themſelves that Title, and are called by it. We ſhall alſo hereafter call Diego Almagro Don Diego, for having been a Companion with Piçarro in his Enterpriſes, and equal to him in all his Undertakings, we cannot in Juſtice deny unto him a ſhare of his Honours.

Don Francis therefore having received his Commiſſion, and fitted all things neceſſary for his Voyage; and being accompanied with four of his Brothers, and many other Perſons of Quality of the Province of Eſtremadura, he embarked at Seville, and having a quick and proſperous paſſage, he happily arrived at Panama: But Don Diego was much diſſatisfied to underſtand that Don Francis had appropriated all thoſe Titles and Honours unto himſelf, and not made him a ſharer with him in thoſe Offices, and Places of Truſt, which were conferred by Commiſſion from his Majeſty, forgetting that he had equally ſuffered with him in all the Labours and Dangers which offered in the Diſcovery: And in regard that Don Diego had ſpent more Wealth than he, having been much richer, and loſt an Eye in the Service, he appeared not onely equal, but to have greater Merit than Piçarro.

Theſe diſguſts were heightned by others, who aggravated the unkindneſs and neglect of Piçarro towards his Companions, alledging, that from a natural Ambition he had appropriated all the Truſts and Dignities to himſelf; for which cauſe theſe two Companions became much eſtranged one from the other, untill ſome Friends interpoſing between them, ſo reconciled matters, that they both agreed, and proceeded in their Enterpriſe; howſoever the Quarrel was not ſo well made up, but that there remained ſome reliques of it; for that though the Proviſions were made, and all things put into a readineſs; yet Don Diego could not ſo forget his Injuries, as to apply his mind with that zeal and warmneſs in his Office of making Proviſions, as he had formerly exerciſed, which Hernando Piçarro more reſenting than any other, and being a Man of a hot and fiery temper, did utter more harſh Language againſt Don Diego than any other, reproaching his Brother, and often charging him to be the cauſe of all the Wants and Hardſhips they ſuſtained; to which Almagro's Brother replied, That Don Diego had reaſon to be remiſs in his Supplies, and that it could not be expected that he ſhould be ſo diligent in their concernment, who had been ſo baffled and neglected; and that though it were true, that according to Articles he was to ſhare in one moiety of the Conqueſt, yet being a Gentleman, and of a generous Soul, he more eſteemed of Honour and Government, than of all the Wealth and Treaſure in the Univerſe. From whence aroſe ſuch a mortal Hatred between Hernando Piçarro and Don Diego de Almagro, which was never appeaſed, untill one killed the other. Howſoever the Difference for the preſent was ſalved up by the Interceſſion of ſome ſober Perſons, whom Don Franciſco Piçarro, and his other Brothers, who were Men of a more cool and gentle Temper than Hernando, deſired to interpoſe, and make a Reconciliation, by reaſon that they were well aſſured, that without the Aſſiſtence and Friendſhip of Almagro, the Deſign would be ruined. Amongſt ſeveral others who were inſtrumental in this Reconciliation, was Antonio de la Gama, with whom I was acquainted at Cozco, and who had there a Diviſion of Lands planted with Indians. Alſo Don Francis Piçarro did promiſe to renounce his Title of Lord Lieutenant to Don Diego, and to beſeech His Majeſty, that he vvould be pleaſed to confer that Honour upon him. With vvhich Don Diego being appeaſed, he gave almoſt a thouſand Ducats in Gold to his Companion, vvith all the Victuals, Arms and Horſes vvhich he had provided, together vvith tvvo Ships to tranſport them.

CHAP. XV.

Of the great Hardſhips the Spaniards endured in their Voyage from Panama to Tumpiz.

Don Franciſco Piçarro with his four Brothers, together with his Men and Horſe, which were as many as his Ships could contain, ſet Sail from Panama, with intention not to touch any where untill they came to the Countrey of Tumpiz; but the Southerly Winds always blowing in that Sea, which were contrary to the courſe they ſteered, they were forced to land a hundred Leagues ſhort of Tumpiz; ſo that ſending their Ships back again to Panama, they reſolved to march all the way by Land, eſteeming it much eaſier than to turn to Windward for ſo many Leagues.

But in their Journey by Land they ſuffered much more than they would have done by the contrary Winds by Sea; for entring into a barren Countrey, void of all Victuals and Proviſions, they endured hunger, and want of all things; and the way being long and tedious, over Mountains and Rocks, and their paſſage ſtopped by wide Rivers, they contrived to paſs them with Floats, which they made of Timber, and Canes, and Ruſhes, which they faſtned together, and with large Goards which they bound one to the other.

The chief Guide and Pilot over theſe Ferries was Don Franciſco himſelf, who was well acquainted, and experienced in matters of this nature; the which he ſuſtained with ſo much courage and patience, that for better example to his Companions, he would carry the ſick and tired perſons on his own ſhoulders over Brooks and Fords, which might be waded over.

After all theſe difficulties, they came at length to that Province which they call Conqui, where they found plenty of Proviſions, and many Emeralds of the fineſt ſort, of which they broke many; for being not skilfull Jewellers, they had an opinion, that the true Emeralds would not break, and therefore for a trial they proved them with Hammers upon the Anvil. The like they afterwards did in Tumpiz, where they broke many Emeralds of three or four thouſand Ducats price: But not onely theſe Spaniards fell into this errour, but likewiſe others, who afterwards came to this Countrey under the Command of the Lord Lieutenant Don Pedro de Alvarado, who deſtroyed many Emeralds and Turquoiſes of an ineſtimable value. But beſides theſe diſaſtures, the people of Piçarro were afflicted with a loathſome diſeaſe, which at firſt appeared with a ſwelling on their Heads and Faces, like Warts, and on ſeveral parts of their Body; but afterwards, when they came to a maturity, they were of the colour of ripe Figs, and about the bigneſs of them, hanging down as it were by a ſtring, from whence great quantities of bloud iſſued; the which were not onely loathſome, but very ſore; and it was very ugly to behold ſuch filthy Warts, or Wens, appearing on their Foreheads, Eye-brows, Noſes and Ears, for which they knew no remedy or cure. But this diſeaſe was not ſo mortal, but that many of them who were ſeized with this diſtemper, recovered, though ſeveral dyed; and though the diſeaſe was Epidemical to the Natives of Peru, yet it was not ſo to the Spaniards, many of which eſcaped the Evil. Many years after that time I ſaw three or four Spaniards at Cozco, who lay ill of that diſtemper, but they recovered; and it may be attributed to ſome bad influence which was tranſient, for ſince that time, that ſickneſs hath not been known. With all theſe Labours, Diſeaſes, and Death of his Companions, Don Franciſco was not diſmayed, always ſhewing himſelf as forward to adventure himſelf firſt in dangers, as he was carefull in the cure of his Friends and Souldiers. To Panama he ſent twenty four or twenty five thouſand Ducats of Gold to ſupply Don Diego de Almagro with Money, that ſo he might be enabled to furniſh thoſe neceſſary ſuccours of which they had occaſion; part of which Gold he gained by War, and part by the ranſome of ſuch whom he had taken Captives. Thus proceeding forwards to Tumpiz, he overtook another party of Spaniards, who being moved with the report and fame of the mighty Riches of Peru, came from Nicaragua to that Countrey; their Captains, or Leaders, were Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, and John Fernandez; with which happy rencounter Piçarro was highly pleaſed, by reaſon that his own numbers were eſteemed inſufficient for that Conqueſt. Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar was by the Name of his Family properly called Moyano, but he rather choſe to take his Appellation from his Countrey; he was a Twin of three, that is, two Sons and one Daughter, born at the ſame Birth: His Brother was called Favian Garcia Moyano, and his Siſter Anaſtaſia; they were both valiant and courageous, as was their elder Brother, and eſpecially the Siſter. This Relation I received from a Friar of the Order of St. Francis, who himſelf was a Native of Belalcaçar, and was well acquainted with the whole Family of Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar. The which Relation this Friar the more willingly gave me, becauſe he knew that I was Writing this Hiſtory, wherein I was glad to relate the extraordinary Birth of this famous Souldier.

CHAP. XVI.

The Spaniards make themſelves Maſters of Tumpiz, and the Iſland of Puna.

Don Franciſco Piçarro being well recruited with Spaniſh Souldiers, adventured on the Conqueſt of Puna, where Fame would have it, that there was much Gold and Silver, and great Riches; to this Iſland, which was twelve Leagues within the Sea, they paſſed over on Floats with great hazard; and being arrived on the Land, they had many Battels with the Natives, who killed four Spaniards, and wounded divers others, amongſt which was Hernando Piçarro, who received a hurt on his Knee; but the Spaniards prevailed with great ſlaughter on the Indians; and with that Victory gained great ſpoils of Gold, Silver, and Cloths, which they immediately divided amongſt themſelves; before the people which Hernando de Soto brought from Nicaragua, could come up to them, for he had been diſpatched from that place by Almagro to carry Succours of Men and Horſe to Piçarro: Of which booty Soto having received advice, he made ſuch haſte, that he arrived with them at the time when they were removing their Camp thence. Piçarro being re-inforced with theſe ſupplies, thought himſelf ſtrong enough to adventure on Tumpiz; and firſt to ingratiate himſelf with the Inhabitants, he ſent them by the hands of three Spaniards, in quality of Ambaſſadours, a Preſent of ſix hundred of their own Countreymen, whom he had taken Captives in the Iſland of Puna, in expectation by ſuch an atonement and piece of generoſity to gain peace and friendſhip with them; hoping that thoſe people, in gratitude for their liberty, and kind treatment, would have given ſo kind a report of them, as might have induced them to a commerce, and good underſtanding: But this ungratefull people finding themſelves amongſt their own Friends, altered the report which formerly they had promiſed to give, and repreſented the Spaniards as covetous and thirſty after Gold and Silver; and more to incenſe their Countreymen, they reported them to be laſcivious Adulterers, and ſuch as would defile their Wives and Daughters. The people of Tumpiz being ill affected, and prepoſſeſſed with this evil report, did preſently, and without ſo much as hearing the three Spaniards ſpeak, deliver them into the hands of their Executioners, who having put them to death, ſacrificed them with fury and rage to their Gods: the which Story is confirmed by Gomara, and Auguſtine de Carate; but Blas Valera, who was a very credible Authour, ſays, that it was onely conjectured, and believed to be ſo, becauſe they never appeared more. But the Governour of that Countrey ſaith, That one of theſe theſe Ambaſſadours was drowned going over a River, and that the two others dyed of natural ſickneſſes, to which that Climate is very ſubject, and unhealthfull to the bodies of ſtrangers; for it is not probable that the Indians, who had obſerved with what ſubmiſſion the Lion and the Tyger had crouched in a miraculous manner to Pedro de Candia, ſhould ſlay, or ſacrifice them, whom they eſteemed for Deities. Piçarro in his paſſage over the Waters on Floats and Rafts, was in great danger, as were all his people, of being caſt away by the ſtreams, which in thoſe parts are very fierce and rapid, for their Floats were very unruly, and uneaſie to be governed; howſoever in deſpight of all, they leaped on ſhore, and marched boldly towards the people, with whom, after many Battels, the Spaniards remained Conquerours; and thereby the Enemy being become cowed and diſmayed by the many ſlaughters which were made of them, they entirely yielded: And ſuppoſing that theſe deſtructions were Judgments of the Sun inflicted for their Sins, they endeavoured to pleaſe and pacifie their Enemies by Preſents of Gold, Silver, and Jewels, which they had obſerved to be Commodities pleaſing to them, and the Motives which had incited them to all their labours and dangers; and moreover, the Curaca came with all humility to ſubmit and ſurrender his Eſtate and Perſon into their hands.

The Spaniards conſidering how proſperouſly their affairs ſucceeded by the fortune of this one Battel, reſolved to ſettle their firſt Colony in theſe parts, which they called St. Michael, being founded on the day of his Feſtival; and in this firſt and ancient Colony they planted ſeveral of their Companions in the year 1531, to receive and give entertainment unto all ſuch who were ſhortly expected from Panama and Nicaragua.

From this place Piçarro diſpatched his three Ships back again to Panama to bring him more recruits of Men, and ſupply of Proviſions; and to give more life to the deſign, he ſent above thirty thouſand Ducats in Gold and Silver, beſides Emeralds, as the fruits of his Labours, and as an evidence of the vaſt Riches of that Countrey. But we ſhould have told you before, that Piçarro (amongſt the many other favours which he received from his Majeſty in Spain) had the honour and privilege granted him to entertain a Guard of twenty four Halbardiers, for protection of his Perſon, and greater authority of his Office and Government: Wherefore having ſubdued and maſtered Tumpiz, he deſigned to make choice of ſuch a Guard wherewith he might with more oſtentation and pomp, than he had formerly ſhewn, make his entry into that Countrey. But he could not with all the promiſes he could make, perſuade any of all his company to ſubmit ſo low, as to accept of that Office; for it is not onely incident to the humour of the Spaniards to be haughty, and fanſie I know not what high and ſublime matters; but even thoſe who are humble, and would accept of any mean and low employment in other parts, do no ſooner enter into theſe Countries, but are immediately elevated with a new generoſity and greatneſs of Soul, that they ſcorn to accept of ordinary preferments: But thus much I ſhould not have adventured to have ſaid, had I not received this report from Spaniards, who find the like inclinations within themſelves. Howſoever, there were two of all the number who accepted the Halberts, with whom I was acquainted, who both in the Conqueſt of that Countrey, and afterwards in the Civil Wars behaved themſelves like brave Souldiers, and in reward thereof the honour of Military Commands were beſtowed upon them, with a ſhare of Lands and Juriſdiction over the Indians; they were both killed in the War, though their Names I have thought fit to conceal for ſeveral reſpects. After Piçarro the Governour had quieted and ſetled Tumpiz, and the dependencies thereunto belonging, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the Riches, he reſolved to proceed to Caſſamarca, and make a viſit to King Atahualpa, the fame of whoſe treaſure was extremely inviting; and the report thereof the more probable, by the apparent Riches which were found in Tumpiz. In their March thither they paſſed a Countrey uninhabited, and of dead and barren Sands, extremely hot and dry, without Water; with which, for want of knowledge of the Countrey, they had not provided themſelves; but at length they came to certain pleaſant and fruitfull Vallies, where they vvere relieved vvith all things neceſſary for their refreſhment. At this place the Governour received an Embaſſy from the unfortunate Huaſcar Inca, but hovv and vvhich vvay it came from him, is doubtfull, in regard (as vve have ſaid) he vvas kept a cloſe Priſoner under ſevere cuſtody: But it is probable that this Meſſage might be ſent by ſome Curaca out of com-compaſſion to the true and legitimate Prince of that Empire, vvho vvas detained and oppreſſed by tyrannical hands: the ſum of this Meſſage vvas, to implore vvith all humility, the Juſtice, Righteouſneſs, and Protection of the Sons of the God Viracocha, vvhich he did not doubt to receive from thoſe vvho publiſhed and gave out in all parts, that their deſigns vvere to relieve and ſuccour the oppreſſed: To vvhich the Governour anſvvered, that he vvas novv on his vvay to adminiſter relief unto the unhappy Inca, and to ſuccour all others vvho vvere under vvrong and oppreſſion.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Embaſſy and Preſents which the Inca ſent unto the Spaniards.

TWO days after this the General received another Embaſſy more ſolemn than the former, from the King Atahualpa, brought by a Brother of his own both by the Father and Mother's ſide, called Titu Aautachi, who in few words declared, that the Inca had ſent him to give a hearty welcome to the Sons of his God Viracocha; and in token of the good will he bore them, and of his deſire to ſerve them with all his power, he had ſent them a Preſent of ſuch things as their Countrey afforded, deſiring them to refreſh and enjoy themſelves with the plenty of ſuch Proviſions as he had made for their Journey, for that both he and all his Subjects were deſirous to ſee his Kinſmen, who were related with him to their common Father the Sun, whom therefore they honoured, and to whom they promiſed all obſequiouſneſs and allegiance. And having expreſſed thus much in behalf of the Inca, he afterwards (for ſuch were his inſtructions) made this Speech from himſelf: Inca Viracocha, ſaid he, thou Progeny of the Sun, ſince it hath been my fortune to carry you this happy Meſſage, I preſume with this occaſion to beſeech you, that you would gratiouſly be pleaſed to grant me theſe three Requeſts: In the firſt place, that you would eſteem my Inca, and King Atahualpa, for your Friend, and enter into a perpetual League of peace and friendſhip with him. Secondly, that you would forgive, and pardon what crime or fault ſoever our people have either out of ignorance, or want of due conſideration, committed againſt you: And laſtly, I beſeech you, that the puniſhment which by Command of the great God your Father Viracocha, you have inflicted on thoſe of the Iſland of Puna, and thoſe of Tumpiz, and other parts, you would moderate and remit towards thoſe of Caſſamarca, and ſuch others whom you ſhall meet; and that in regard you are an Inca, and deſcended from the Sun, that you would pardon and exerciſe that Clemency, which is one of your divine Attributes. And having ſaid thus much, he commanded that the Preſents ſhould be delivered to the Governour, and the other Spaniards his companions; the which Preſents were Goats, Sheep, dried ſlices of the fleſh of wild Beaſts, ſuch as of the Huanacu, the Vicunna, Stags, Elks, and fallow Deer; of which they brought many alive, that ſo they might ſee of what ſort of Beaſts thoſe ſlices of dried fleſh were: they preſented them alſo with tame and wild Conies, Partridges both dead and alive, with Water-fowl, and with innumerable ſmaller Birds; likewiſe with Mayz in the grane, and ſome made up in Bread; as alſo with Fruit both dry and green, Honey in the Combs, and in Pots, with Indian Pepper, which they call Uchu, and great quantities of drink made of their Wheat, and of that grane which they call Mulli. Moreover, they preſented many Veſtments of the fineſt ſort, ſuch as thoſe with which the Incas were cloathed, beſides Parrots, Monkies, Apes and Marmoſets, and other Animals and ſtrange Inſects, which, as we have ſaid, were common in that Countrey: As alſo many Veſſels of Gold and Silver to drink in, with Plates and Diſhes for the Table, with many Emeralds and Turquoiſes. And as a particular ſignal of reſpect to the General, they brought him a pair of ſuch Hoſe as the

the Inca himſelf wore, with two Bracelets of Gold, which they call Chipana; the which two were for variety and change, becauſe the Inca wears but one at a time, and that is on the Wriſt of his left Arme; which is a ſignal of Military Honour, which none are qualified to receive, but thoſe of the Bloud-Royal, or Captains, or Souldiers, who had ſignalized themſelves by ſome notable Acts of bravery; in reward of which, the King conferred that Ornament with his own hand; and on both theſe reaſons and reſpects Don Franciſco was eſteemed worthy of this ſignal favour: For in the firſt place, he was believed to be a legitimate Iſſue deſcended from the Sun, and their God Viracocha; and ſecondly, his Acts of Valour and Bravery did beſpeak and proclaim him for a famous and renowned Captain. And thus having made their Preſents to the Governour, and his Spaniards, Titu Atauchi deſired them to pardon this preſumption, of having made ſo mean and low an Offering to the Children of the Sun, unto whom hereafter they would endeavour to make amends by their future obſervance, and dutifull performances. The Governour and Captains taking very kindly their obliging Complements, and much more their Preſents, returned in the firſt place their thanks to the Inca, and then to his Ambaſſadour: but when they underſtood that he was Brother to the King, they ſhewed him extraordinary honour and reſpect according to his quality; and having given him a ſhort Anſwer to his Embaſſy, he returned fully ſatisfied, and with high contentment. Their Anſwer, in ſhort, was this, That the Spaniards were come by Order and Commiſſion from the Pope, or High Prieſt, to turn them from their Idolatry, and to inſtruct them in the true Religion of the Chriſtians: They were alſo come from him who was Emperour, and King of Spain, who was the greateſt Prince of the Chriſtians, to enter into a League of Friendſhip, and a perpetual Peace, and to make an Alliance with the Inca and all his Empire, and never to doe them hurt, or offer them any violence, beſides many other things which they would more at their leiſure communicate to the Inca; but neither Gomara, nor Auguſtine de Carate make any mention of theſe rich Preſents, nor of an Ambaſſadour, who was Brother to the King, nor of any Anſwer made by the Governour; onely they ſpeak of ſome Hoſe and Bracelets, which they brought to the Commander in chief, and of ſome Ruffles or Cuffs for Shirts, but theſe Authours did not conſider that the Indians in their natural Habit do not wear Linen. The King Atahualpa ſent that Meſſage and Preſents to the Spaniards, with an opinion, that thereby he might appeaſe the Sun, whom they fanſied to be angry, and diſpleaſed by reaſon of the reſiſtence, which the Indians of the Iſle of Puna, and the Valley of Tumpiz had made againſt the Spaniards, of whom ſome of them (as we have ſaid) being killed, they feared a thouſand judgments and puniſhments for their Rebellion againſt thoſe who were deſcended from the Sun, and their God Viracocha: To the terrour of this apprehenſion, the Prophecy which his Father Huayna Capac had delivered, came freſh into memory: which was, that after his time a ſtrange Nation, which was not ſeen or heard of before, ſhould enter their Countrey, ruine their Empire, ſubvert their Government, and deſtroy their Idolatry. And now the King Atahualpa did really believe that the time for accompliſhment of this Prophecy was come; for that unleſs theſe few Spaniards had been aſſiſted by the power of the Sun, who was angry with his people, it were impoſſible that ſo ſmall a handfull of Men ſhould be able to make ſuch ſlaughters as they had done at Panama, Puna, Tumpiz, and other parts. And now fearing the like at his own home, he ordered his Brother the Ambaſſadour to make thoſe three Requeſts, before mentioned, in his own Name; for though Atahualpa was unwilling to diſcover any ſuch fear, or timorouſneſs in himſelf; yet the apprehenſion and dread of theſe things were ſo fixed in the mind of Atahualpa, that his ſpirit and courage, which was formerly brave and aſpiring, was now become cowed and low with theſe imaginations, and became ſo intimidated, that he never durſt make any reſiſtence or oppoſition againſt the Spaniards. Thoſe who conſider well theſe matters, have a large ſcope to make reflexions thereupon; ſome attribute theſe Judgments to the Juſtice of God in puniſhment of their Idolatry, and Cruelties exerciſed on the true Family of the Incas; but others perhaps may with more reaſon interpret this Invaſion of the Spaniards to be directed by the gratious Providence of God, who out of compaſſion to the ignorance and obſcurity in which theſe Gentiles lived, was pleaſed by theſe means to introduce the light of the Goſpel into thoſe dark and unknown parts of the World.

So ſoon as the Ambaſſadours were returned back again to their King, the Spaniards made many reflexions, and put divers interpretations on the Meſſage and Preſents which were ſent: Some were of opinion, that thoſe Gifts and Offerings, by how much the more rich and magnificent they were, by ſo much more they were to be ſuſpected; fanſying that they were deſigned with intention to amuſe and lull them into a kind of ſecurity and confidence in their faith and ſimplicity, and ſo ſurprize and kill them with more eaſe and advantage; and therefore looking on theſe Preſents as fallacious, and deſigned for traps and ſnares, it was argued that they ſhould be the more watchfull and circumſpect in all their proceedings: Howſoever the other Spaniards, who were the greateſt number, being of a leſs ſuſpicious nature, were of opinion that theſe Gifts and Offerings were onely evidences of the good will of the Indians: And that though the Rules of Military Diſcipline did oblige them to be always vigilant and cautious in an Enemies Countrey, yet they could not but applaud and eſteem the Magnificence of the Inca, the ſuavity of his Words, and the Majeſty of his Embaſſy; which to render more honourable, he was pleaſed to perform it by the hands of his Brother, whoſe courteſie and diſcretion were very viſible both in his Reaſons, and in his Comportment; though for want of a good Interpreter to underſtand the Language of Cozco, much of his ſenſe and words loſt their true force and vigour: the which appeared in his Speech, which ſeemed to be uttered in long Sentences, with their due Accents, Pauſes and Periods; but in the rendering of them, the Interpreter delivered them in ſuch broken Speeches, without coherence or ſenſe, that they were ſcarce intelligible to the Spaniards; but howſoever they took all in good part, that which was wanting in the words, being ſupplied by the better effects of Preſents. That night, and ſeveral other days after, they cheered themſelves with the Preſents of Atahualpa, and ſo marched towards Caſſamarca, where though they found not the Inca, as was expected, yet they were received there by the Indians, who, by order of the King, had aſſembled both Nobles and Commoners to feaſt and treat the Off-ſpring of the Sun, and Children of the God Viracocha, ſtrowing all their Chambers and Lodgings with Flowers, and ſweet-ſmelling Herbs; likewiſe they entertained them with plenty of Meat and Drink; the care and charge of all which was committed to Cullqui Human, who was the Curaca, or Lord, of Caſſamarca, and who in obedience to the Commands of his King, did endeavour to exceed in all points of civility and reſpect towards the Spaniards. But amongſt the many Services which the Indians ſhewed to them, there was one of ſingular remark; which was, that they obſerving that the Bits and Curbs which the Horſes had in their mouths, were made of Iron, they preſently imagined that the Iron was their Meat; and therefore not to be defective in any point of Service towards the Spaniards, they readily brought ſeveral Ingots of Gold and Silver, which they laid in the Mangers before the Horſes, deſiring them to eat of thoſe Metals, which were much more delicate Meat than the Iron; the Spaniards who obſerved and laughed at this ſimplicity of the Indians, commended their kindneſs to the Horſes, telling them, that they could not oblige them more, than by giving them good ſtore of that Provinder.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Governour ſends an Ambaſſadour to King Atahualpa.

THE day following the Governour held a conſultation with his Brethren and Captains, touching an Embaſſy to be ſent to the King Atahualpa, whereby to inform him of his intentions to make him a viſit, that ſo he might communicate to him the matters encharged to him by the Emperour, and by the Pope; for that to be ſilent, and make no returns, would ſavour of ingratitude, and little ſenſe of the preſents and kind treatment they had received. Wherefore they agreed, that ſince the Inca had ſent his Brother on this Embaſſy, that they ſhould correſpond in the like manner by the Brother of the Governour, qualified with the ſame character of Ambaſſadour: Accordingly Hernando Piçarro, and Hernando de Soto were ſent to the Court of the Inca, not far diſtant from Caſſamarca, where he had a Royal Palace, and commodious Baths, and where was at that time a numerous concourſe of the Nobility and Souldiery, which flocked from all parts to celebrate certain Feſtivals agreeable to their Religion, and with that occaſion to reform ſeveral corruptions and abuſes, which by the licentiouſneſs of the Wars were crept in amongſt them; and for the better ſecurity and conſervation of his own Perſon, and advancement of his own Tyrannical Power and Authority, he enacted and eſtabliſhed other Laws and Statutes, pretending that they were tranſmitted to him by revelation from the Sun: For the truth is, though Atahualpa had Murthered as many perſons of the Bloud-Royal, as he was able, yet he was ſtill jealous, and fearfull of thoſe few which ſurvived, leſt any Pretender ſhould on the pretext of Religion advance one of the right line to be the true and legitimate Heir; to which end he formed new Laws, pretending that they were derived from the Sun, to equalize and balance againſt the ancient Canons and Statutes of Religion. Theſe two Ambaſſadours were in this manner diſpatched with their Interpreter Philip, who though he was a Native of the Iſle of Puna, and ill verſed in one or the other Language, yet he was a neceſſary inſtrument; and ſuch, as for want of a better, was very uſefull. With theſe two Spaniards the Curaca of Caſſamarca ſent two hundred Indians to attend and conduct them with greater ſtate and pomp to the preſence of their King, encharging them upon their lives to perform whatſoever they ſhould command. So ſoon as theſe Ambaſſadours had paſſed Caſſamarca, they ſent an Indian of Quality out of thoſe who attended them to the King Atahualpa, to acquaint him of their coming, and to demand his licence, that they might appear in the preſence of his Highneſs: To which Meſſage the Inca made anſwer, that they ſhould be extremely welcome, for that their Arrival had been long deſired and expected; and preſently commanded one of his Major-Generals with a great number of his Men to go forth and meet thoſe Deſcendants from the Sun, and perform towards them all that Worſhip and Veneration which appertained to them. This kind Anſwer of the Inca eaſed the Spaniards of all the fear and ſuſpicion they had conceived upon the rumour, that the Inca was encompaſſed with a Guard of thirty thouſand Men; and ſo with great confidence taking their way towards the Royal Baths and Palaces, they met about the middle of their Journey in an open Plain with thoſe Companies of Souldiers which were ſent out to receive them; which ſo ſoon as Hernando de Soto eſpied, he ſet Spurs to his Horſe, and boldly rid up to them with a full cariere, giving them to underſtand, that if they had been Enemies, as they were Friends, he alone had been ſufficient to encounter with them; and then turning and carveting with his Horſe, he came and ſtopt near the Commander in chief. And here the Spaniſh Hiſtorians recounting this paſſage, tell us, that this Commander in Chief was Atahualpa himſelf, and that Soto came up to his very Chair pranſing with his Horſe; at which though Atahualpa ſeemed not to be diſmayed, or altered, yet ſeveral of his people, who ran away and fled to avoid his Horſe, he cauſed to be put to death: But this Authour was miſ-informed in the Relation he made, for neither was Atahualpa

there preſent, nor whoſoever he was, did he put any to death; for if their retirement was onely to give way or place to the Horſe in his cariere, as was probable, it was ſo far from being a fault, or to deſerve puniſhment, that it was a piece of civility and reſpect, which they deſired to ſhew unto thoſe whom they eſteemed to be Children of the Sun; and to have done otherwiſe, or to have obſtructed the way and paſſage of theſe ſtrangers, would have ſeemed a piece of impiety and prophanation towards thoſe whom they confeſſed to be of Divine Race, and deſcended from the Heavens. Nor was Atahualpa ſo ſtupid in his underſtanding, as to ſlay his own Indians in the preſence of the Ambaſſadours whom he had employed to pay Honour and Worſhip to them, and to aſſure them of all ſecurity and protection. Nor is it probable that Hernando de Soto would have been ſo rude and diſcourteous as to ride up to the very Noſe of the King, with whom he came to treat in behalf of the Emperour and the Pope: By all which, it is greatly to be lamented, when we conſider with how little care Men give Relations of paſſages which occur in thoſe remote parts, without regard to the reputation of that people. The Inca Atahualpa (as we ſhall declare more particularly hereafter) ſhewed himſelf very generous and real towards the Spaniards; and therefore it may be lawfull for us to render a character of his abilities, diſcretion and underſtanding with which Nature had endued him: For in regard we have made mention at large of all the Tyrannies and Cruelties which he committed, the rule of Hiſtory doth oblige us not to conceal the mixtures of Vertue which appeared in him, unleſs we would approve our ſelves falſe by writing a Romance in the place of true Hiſtory. That which I report, proceeds from the relation of many Spaniards who were preſent at all the action, being ſuch as I received from their own mouths, at thoſe times of converſation which they paſſed in my Father's family, when a great part of their entertainment was to recount the many paſſages and accidents which occurred in this Conqueſt; the ſame I have heard confirmed from ſeveral Indians, who at the viſits which they made to my Mother, did frequently diſcourſe of thoſe Actions, and particularly of what happened in the Reign of Atahualpa to the time of his Death, attributing all the misfortunes which befell him to the Judgment of God, for the Tyrannies and Cruelties he committed upon his own family.

And farther I am able to confirm the truth of theſe particulars from the reports ſent me by my School-fellows, who took the trouble to extract them out of the Hiſtorical Annals of their reſpective Countries where their Mothers were born, as I ſaid in the firſt Part of this Hiſtory. To theſe Relations I have the Authority farther to add of that curious and accurate Father Blas Valera, who was the Son of one of thoſe who was a fellow Priſoner with Atahualpa, and was born and bred on the Confines of Caſſamarca, and ſo might have advantages to extract the Records from their Originals, as he himſelf doth atteſt; and indeed he hath been very large in deſcribing the ſucceſſes and paſſages which occurred in that Kingdom, and which by comparing them with other Relations, I have found agreeable to the trueſt reports. And farther I do aver, that I ſhall trace the ſame way that the Spaniſh Hiſtorians direct me, making uſe of their Commentaries in ſuch matters wherein they may be uſefull to me, and ſhall add and enlarge in what they come ſhort, or are deficient, as in many things they may be, for want of reading and knowledge of Hiſtorians.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Reception which the Inca gave to the Embaſſy of the Spaniards.

BUT now to reaſſume again the Thread of our Hiſtory, We ſay, That the Major General which was ſent out to receive Hernando Piçarro, and Hernando de Soto, having performed his Complements, and adored them with profound Veneration, turned to his Captains, and Souldiers, and declared to them, that theſe were the Sons of their God Viracocha; at which the Indians made them a low Reverence, beholding with great admiration their Aſpect, Habit and Voice, and ſo accompanied them to the Preſence of the Inca: The Spaniards being entred, were much aſtoniſhed to behold the greatneſs and Riches of the Royal Palace, and the number of the King's Family, and Attendants; and ſuch was the wonder of both parties, that it is not to be determined which was the greater: The Ambaſſadours made their Obeiſance after the Spaniſh Faſhion, with low Reverence to the Inca, who was ſeated in a Chair of Gold; with which the King was highly pleaſed, and ſtanding up, he embraced them with much kindneſs, ſaying, Capac Viracocha, Thou art welcome to my Dominions; the which words Blas Valera repeats in the Indian Language, being very skilfull in that Tongue, the which I omit as not neceſſary. Then the Inca ſate down, and Seats were brought alſo of Gold, which were prepared by order of the Inca for the Ambaſſadours; for they being eſteemed for Kindred of the Sun, it pleaſed the Inca to make no difference between himſelf and them, and more eſpecially, becauſe one of them was Brother to the Governour: When they were ſate, the Inca turning his Face towards his Kindred who attended him, Behold, ſaid he, the very Face, Countenance, and Habit of our God Viracocha, in the ſame manner and form as the Inca Viracocha, our Anceſtour deſcribed, and reported to have appeared to him. As the Inca was ſaying theſe things, two young Maidens, very handſome, and of the Royal Bloud, (which they called Nuſta,) entred into the Chamber, each of them carrying two ſmall Cups of Gold in their Hands, filled with ſuch Liquour as the Incas uſually drink; and theſe were attended with four Youths of the ſame Kindred, though not of the lawfull Line, in regard their Mothers were Natives of the Kingdom of Atahualpa. The Maidens having bowed before the Inca, delivered one of the golden Cups into his Hand, and the other to Hernando Piçarro, as the Inca directed. And then Titu Atauchi, who was the King's Brother, and he that was ſent on this Embaſſy to the Spaniards, told Philip, the Interpreter, that he ſhould acquaint them, that the Inca was deſirous to drink with them, which, according to the cuſtome of their Countrey, was an evidence of Reſpect, Peace and everlaſting Friendſhip: Hernando Piçarro having underſtood the Words of the Interpreter, made a low Reverence to the Inca, took the Cup and drank: Then the Inca having drunk twice, or thrice, of his own Cup, gave the remainder to his Brother, Titu Atauchi: Then he took one of thoſe Cups which the other Maiden brought, and ordered the other to be given to Hernando de Soto, who did the ſame thing as his Companion had done before him, and the Inca having drank twice, or thrice, as before, gave the remainder to his Uncle, called Choquehuamam. Having thus drank, the Ambaſſadours began to declare their Meſſage, but the King deſired them to deſiſt for a while, that he might behold and admire the form and figure he ſaw in them of his God Viracocha; and at that inſtant ſix Boys, and ſix Girls, very well habited, came in, bringing green and dry Fruits, of ſeveral ſorts, with their fineſt Bread, and Wine made of the Seed of the Tree Mulli, and with them they brought very fine Towels made of Cotton, becauſe Flax did not grow in their Countrey; then one of the Maidens

Maidens, called Pillcu Ciça Nuſta, made a Speech to the new Gueſts, and ſaid, O you who are Sons of Capac Inca Viracocha, taſte of theſe things which we bring you, which will be a great contentment and ſatisfaction to us. The Spaniards admired much to ſee ſuch Civility and Courteſie in a people whom they reputed barbarous, and to live in all beſtiality and filthineſs; wherefore, that they might not ſeem to contemn or ſlight that Courteſie which they ſo freely offered, they ate ſomething of what they had ſet before them, and then ſaid it was ſufficient, with which the Indians were highly ſatisfied.

CHAP. XX.

The Speech of the Ambaſſadour, and the Anſwer of the Inca.

Silence being now made, Hernando Piçarro deſired Hernando de Soto to ſpeak and deliver his Meſſage, for that more time was not to be loſt, and likewiſe that he would be as ſhort and ſuccinct as he could, that ſo they might return again that night, and lodge with their Companions, for that it was not prudence to confide much in thoſe People, who were Infidels, and who perhaps might ſhew them ſuch Courteſie the more eaſily to enſnare and betray them: So then Hernando de Soto riſing up, made his Reverence after the Caſtilian manner, and uncovering his Head, ſate down again, and then ſaid.

" Moſt ſerene Inca, You are to underſtand, that in this World there are two " ſupreme Princes, one is the Pope, who is High Prieſt, and ſits in the Place " and Tribunal of God, the other is Emperour of the Romans, called Charles " the 5th. King of Spain, who having underſtood the blind Ignorance in which " the Natives of theſe your Kingdoms live, deſpiſing the true God, who is " the Maker of Heaven and Earth, beſtowing the Worſhip due unto him " upon his Creatures, and upon the Devil himſelf, who deceive and delude " them, have ſent their Governour and Captain General, Don Franciſco Piçarro, " with his Companions, and ſome Prieſts, who are the Miniſters of God, to " teach your Highneſs, and your Subjects, the Divine Truth, and his holy Law; " and for this Reaſon it is, that they have undertaken this long Journey to your " Countrey; where having received effects of your Bounty from your liberal " Hand, they entred yeſterday into Caſſamarca, and this day they have ſent us to " your Highneſs, with Offers of Peace and Concord, which ſhall endure for ever " between us, that ſo receiving us under your Faith and Protection, we may " have leave to preach our Law, and that your Subjects may hear and underſtand " the Goſpel, which will be of great Honour, as alſo of Benefit and Salvation " to your Souls.

And on this occaſion Blas Valera, who was a very religious and zealous Man for the Salvation of thoſe poor Gentiles, doth very much lament that thoſe important Words of Hernando de Soto ſhould fall to the ground for want of a good Interpreter, learned in both Languages, and one who was affected with ſuch inward Charity, as might have moved his Heart with efficacy to have explicated the force of thoſe Words. But, alas, it was the misfortune of that Empire, and of the firſt Conquerours to have no better an Interpreter than this Philip, who was ſuch an ignorant Sot, as not to be able to render the ſenſe either on one ſide, or the other, but rather gave things to be underſtood in a different manner, and with that barbarity as ſpoiled the Honour and Dignity of the Embaſſy, of which both the Inca and Standers-by were ſenſible, finding that the Words of the Interpreter were of a contrary ſenſe to the matter diſcourſed, which cauſed the Inca to ſay, This ſtammering Fellow runs from one word to another, without underſtanding, and from one errour to another, that his Silence were better than his Words. Which Expreſſions of the Inca were more ſignificant in the Indian than in the Spaniſh Language. And alſo the Captains and Lords being ſenſible of the Defects of the Interpreter, did attribute the ill Expreſſions, and want of Senſe to his Ignorance, and not to want of Underſtanding in the Ambaſſadours, whom they eſteemed for Gods, and adored them for ſuch, and accordingly the Inca returned this Anſwer to the Ambaſſadours.

" I am much pleaſed, (ſaid he) Divine Lords, that you and your Companions " are in my days come into theſe remote Countries, that ſo I might ſee thoſe " Prophecies and Prognoſtications fulfilled which our Anceſtours have left us; " though in reality my Soul hath much more reaſon to be ſad, when I conſider " that the end of our Empire approaches, of which, according to ancient Pre- " dictions, your coming is a Forerunner, and yet I cannot but ſay that theſe " times are bleſſed, in which our God Viracocha hath ſent ſuch happy Gueſts, " which ſhall transform the State of our Government into a better condition, of " which Change and Alteration we have certain aſſurance from the Tradition of " our Anceſtours, and the Words of the laſt Teſtament of our Father Huayna " Capac; for which Reaſon, though we had certain Intelligence of your entrance " into our Countrey, and the Fortifications you made in it, and of the Slaughter " you committed in Puna, Tumpiz, and other parts, yet neither I, nor my Cap- " tains, have entred into any Conſultation, how, or in what manner, we might " expell you from hence, becauſe we hold and believe, that you are the Sons of " our great God Viracocha, and Meſſengers of the Pachacamac; for which cauſe, " and in confirmation of what my Father delivered us, we have made it a Law, " and publiſhed it in the Schools of Cozco, that none ſhall dare to take up Arms " againſt you, or offend you; wherefore you may doe with us as you pleaſe, it " being Glory ſufficient for us to die by your hands, whom we eſteem the Di- " vine Meſſengers of God, by whom you muſt be ſent, conſidering the Actions " you have already performed: Onely I deſire to be ſatisfied in one doubt, How " comes it to paſs, as you ſay, that you come to treat of Friendſhip, and a perpetual " Peace, in the Name of the two before mentioned Princes, and yet on the other " ſide, without ſo much as any Summons, or ſending to treat with us, or know our " Will or Pleaſure towards you, you have committed ſuch outrages and ſlaughters " in the Countries through which you have paſſed? I conceive that the two " Princes which employed you, have given you ſuch Commiſſion to act with " ſuch ſeverity againſt us, without any fault of ours; and I imagine that the Pa- " chacamac hath ſo commanded them to proceed, wherefore I ſay again, Doe " your pleaſure with us; onely I beſeech you to have compaſſion upon my poor " Relations, whoſe Death and Misfortunes will grieve me more than my own.

The Inca having ended his Speech, all his Attendants which ſtood round about him, were ſo affected with his laſt Words, which declared the loſs of the Empire, that they ſhed many Tears, with an abundance of Sighs and Groans, for what the Inca had now pronounced concerning the Deſtruction of his Empire, he had at other times formerly repeated. And whereas his Father Huayna Capac had uttered this Prophecy, and mentioned the time to be ſhort, and ready to be fulfilled; Atahualpa thought of nothing elſe, but concluded the Fate unavoidable, and the Decree of the great Pachacamac not to be reſiſted; the which ſuperſtitious opinion being fixed, and impreſſed in his Mind, was the cauſe that the Spaniards ſo eaſily conquered and ſubdued his Countrey, and debaſed his Soul and Spirit at the preſence of the Spaniards; amongſt the reſt of the Company, which was preſent with the Inca, were two Accomptants, or Hiſtorians, who with their Knots made certain Ciphers, deſcribing or figuring all the paſſages of that Audience, with the Words of Hernando de Soto, and with the Anſwer of the Inca, though all was very ill expreſſed by the Interpreter.

The Ambaſſadours were much aſtoniſhed to ſee the Lamentations, and hear the Cries of the Lords and Captains there preſent, and yet obſerved a ſteaddineſs and conſtancy in the Countenance of the Inca, and not knowing the cauſe and reaſon reaſon of ſo much ſadneſs, were touched with compaſſion and ſorrow for them. And here Blas Valera much bewails the want of a good Interpreter, that might, by a true and faithfull underſtanding of all that was ſaid, have given better ſatisfaction, both to the Indians, and to the Spaniards; for when the Ambaſſadours, heard talk of the Slaughters and Outrages committed in Puna, and Tumpiz, they were apprehenſive that the Inca had entertained ſome thoughts of Revenge; for the Interpreter neither knew how to render the Words of the Inca, nor the Anſwer of the Ambaſſadours.

And now the Ambaſſadours deſired leave of the Inca to depart, and return to their Companions; which was readily granted them, the Inca ſaying, That they might depart in peace, and that he would ſpeedily go into Caſſamarca, to viſit the Sons of the God Viracocha, and the Meſſengers from the Pachacamac. The Spaniards departing out of the King's Palace, could not but again admire the Riches of it, and the Adoration and Worſhip which the people ſhewed towards them; for as they were going to mount their Horſes, two Curacas, with their Servants, came to them, deſiring that they would not diſdain to accept a ſmall Preſent, though unworthy the acceptance of ſuch Gods, or Godlike Men, as they were, laying before them Riches of like quality as before, though in much more abundance, ſuch as Veſſels of Gold and Silver, with Ingots of Gold, and Wedges of Silver unwrought.

The Spaniards being ſtrangely aſtoniſhed at this exceſs of Courteſie, began to quit all fears and ſuſpicions of any ill Deſigns of the Indians towards them, blaming again the ignorance of their Interpreter, who for want of Expreſſions had betrayed them to many Errours, as he did afterwards to many others, as will appear in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

CHAP. XXI.

How the two Spaniards returned again to their Companions, and how they prepared themſelves to receive the Inca.

THE two Ambaſſadours being returned, made a relation of all the Riches and Greatneſs they had ſeen in the Palace of the Inca, and of the Courteſie they had received, which appeared by the Preſents, of which a ſhare was divided to every Perſon. Notwithſtanding all which, like good Souldiers, and cautious Men, they prepared their Horſes and Arms, not knowing the occaſion they might have for them the day following; and though they well knew the multitudes which accompanied Atahualpa, yet like brave Spaniards, they were not in the leaſt diſmayed, but prepared to receive them; wherefore ſo ſoon as it was day, the Cavalry ranged themſelves in three Diviſions, of twenty in a Troop, for they were not in all above ſixty in number; the Commanders, or Captains of them, were Hernando Piçarro, Hernando de Soto, and Sebaſtian de Betalcaçar, who at firſt concealed themſelves under two old Walls, that ſo their ſudden Sally might give the greater fear and ſurpriſe to the Indians. The Governour himſelf was ſupported with an hundred Foot-Souldiers, which in all exceeded not that number, and for their better encouragement, he put himſelf in the Head of them, on the ſide of the Tampu, which was like a great field, where they placed themſelves to expect the coming of the King Atahualpa, who ſoon after appeared, being carried in a Chair of Gold on the Shoulders of his People, with ſuch pomp, and Majeſty both of Servants and Courtiers, as evidenced his greatneſs in Power, and War; before fore his Chair came great multitudes of People, who gathered up the Stones, and cleared all the ways of Rubbiſh, or Impediments, which might hinder his Chair-Men in the way, or cauſe them to ſtumble; with him alſo came great Attendants of the Nobility. His Guards were divided into four Squadrons, conſiſting of eight thouſand Men; the firſt Diviſion, which was the Van-guard, marched before the King, like Scouts, or Officers, to clear and ſecure the ways; two others marched on each ſide, like the Wings of an Army, as Guards of his Perſon; and a fourth marched in the rere: The Captain, or Commander in Chief of them, was called Ruminnavi, which ſignifies an Eye of Stone, from a Pearl or Catarack which grew in his Eye. In this order Atahualpa marched for the ſpace of a League, which was the diſtance between his Palace and the Quarters of the Spaniards; in going of which he was more than four hours, and came not, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, with an intention to fight, but to underſtand the ſubſtance of the Embaſſy, which was brought to him from the Pope, and the Emperour. Atahualpa was informed, That the Spaniards were not able to walk up any aſcent, or ſteep Hill, and that their Footmen either got up behind the Horſes, or held faſt by the Pectorals of the Saddles, and ſo were drawn, as it were, whenſoever they attempted to mount any ſteep Aſcents; and that they were not able to run like the Indians, or endure any labour or fatigue like them; with this opinion, and with a fancy that the Spaniards were of Divine Race, Atahualpa marched without any jealouſie or ſuſpicion of that which afterwards ſucceeded. When the King ſaw the Spaniſh Infantry in ſo ſmall a number, and that, as if they had been fearfull, they had taken advantage of a Rock to defend themſelves, he ſaid to his People, Theſe are the Meſſengers of God, to whom we muſt be carefull to give no Offence, but rather receive and treat them with all Courteſie and Reſpect: Which being ſaid, a certain Dominican Friar, called Vicente de Valverde, taking a Crucifix in his hand, approached the Inca to ſpeak to him in the Name of the Emperour.

CHAP. XXII.

Wherein is repeated the Speech which the Friar Vicente de Valverde, made to the Inca Atahualpa.

BLas Valera, who was a faithfull and curious Collectour of all Paſſages and Tranſactions of thoſe times, repeats unto us the whole Speech at large, which Friar Vicente made to Atahualpa; the Speech conſiſted of two parts, and, as Valera ſaith, that when he was at Truxillo, he ſaw it tranſlated into Latin, and writ with the proper Hand-writing of Friar Vicente; which afterwards Diego de Olivares, who was one of the Conquerours, had gotten; and he being dead, it came to the hands of a Kinſman of mine; ſo that having had opportunity often to read it, I got it by heart, and by my memory am able to inſert it here in the ſame form as Blas Valera writes it, who hath ſet it down more at large, and more diſtinctly than any other Hiſtorian: Wherefore to proceed; when Friar Vicente came near to ſpeak to the Inca, Atahualpa did much admire to ſee ſuch a Figure of a Man, ſo different in Habit from all the others, his Beard and Crown being ſhaven, after the Faſhion of Friars; it ſeemed ſtrange to him alſo, to ſee him acoſt him with a Croſs of Palms, and a Book in his hand, which ſome ſay was a Breviary, others a Bible, others a Miſſal. The King, that he might be informed of the manner how he was to treat this Friar, asked one of thoſe three Indians, to whom he had committed the charge to provide the Spaniards with all things neceſſary, of what quality this Friar was, whether he was greater, or inferiour, or equal with the other Spaniards? to which the poor ſimple Indian knew to make no other reply, than that he ſeemed to be a Captain or Guider of the Word, (he might mean perhaps a Preacher) or Miniſter of the ſupreme God, or Meſſenger of the Pachacamac, and that he was of different quality to the others. Then Friar Vicente having made a low Obeiſance and Reverence, according to the manner of Religious Men, with permiſſion of the King, he made him this following Speech.

IT is neceſſary for you to know, (moſt famous and powerfull King) and alſo for all your Subjects, who are deſirous to learn the Catholick Faith, that you and they both hear and believe the things which follow.

Firſt that God, who is three, and yet one, created Heaven and Earth, and all the things which are in this World. That he gives the Reward of Eternal Life to thoſe that doe well, and puniſhes the evill with everlaſting Torments. That this God at the beginning of the World made Man of the Duſt of the Earth, and breathed into him the Spirit of Life, which we call the Soul, which God made after his own Image and likeneſs; by which it appears, that the whole Man conſiſts of Body, and a rational Soul.

From the firſt Man, whom God called Adam, all Mankind, which is in this World, is deſcended, and from him we take the original and beginning of our Nature. That this Adam ſinned, by breaking the Commandment of his Creatour, and in him all Men that have been born ſince his time are under ſin, and ſo ſhall be to the end of the World; for neither Man, nor Woman, is free from this original Sin, nor can be, excepting onely our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who being the Son of the onely true God, deſcended from Heaven, and was born from the Virgin Mary, that ſo he might redeem and free all Mankind from the Subjection of Sin; and finally he dyed for our Salvation upon the Croſs, which was a piece of Wood, in form of this which I hold in my Hands, for which reaſon, we that are Chriſtians do adore and reverence it.

This Jeſus by his own power aroſe from the dead, and forty Days after he aſcended into Heaven, where he now ſits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty. After which he left his Apoſtles upon the Earth, who were his Succeſſours, who by their Words and Admonitions, and other holy means, might bring men to the Knowledge and Worſhip of God, and Obſervation of his Laws.

Of theſe Apoſtles St. Peter was conſtituted Chief, as are alſo his Succeſſours of all other ſucceeding Apoſtles, and of all Chriſtians, and as St. Peter was God's Vicar, or Vicegerent, ſo after him were all the Popes of Rome, who are endued with that ſupreme Authority which God hath given them; and which they have, and do, and ſhall for ever exerciſe with much ſanctity and care, for propagation of the Goſpell, and guiding Men according to the Word of God.

FOR which reaſon the Pope of Rome, who is the High Prieſt now living, having underſtood that all the People and Nations of theſe Kingdoms, leaving the Worſhip of the true Maker of all things, do brutiſhly worſhip Idols, and the Images of Devils; and being willing to draw them to the knowledge of the true God, hath granted the Conqueſt of theſe Parts to Charles the 5th, Emperour of the Romans, who is the moſt powerfull King of Spain, and Monarch of all the Earth, that ſo he having brought the Kings, and Lords, and People of theſe parts, under his Subjection and Dominion, and having deſtroyed the rebellious and diſobedient, he may govern and rule theſe Nations, and reduce them to the knowledge of God, and to the obedience of the Church.

And though our moſt potent King be employed in the Government of his vaſt Kingdoms and Dominions, yet he received this Grant of the Pope, and refuſed not the trouble for the good and for the ſalvation of theſe Nations; and accordingly hath ſent his Captains and Souldiers to execute his Commands, as he did for the Conqueſt of thoſe great Iſlands and Countries which are adjoining to Mexico; and having ſubjected them by force of Arms, hath reduced them to the acknowledgment of the true Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, for the ſame God hath commanded, that ſo it ſhould be.

For which reaſon the Emperour Charles the 5th. hath choſen for his Ambaſſadour, and Lieutenant Don Franciſco de Piçarro, (who is here preſent) that ſo the Kingdoms of your Highneſs may receive all the benefits of Religion; and that a firm Peace and Alliance may be concluded and eſtabliſhed between His Majeſty and Your Highneſs; on condition that your Highneſs, and all your Kingdom become Tributaries, that is, paying a Tribute to the Emperour, Thou maiſt become his Subject, and delivering up your Kingdom, and all the Adminiſtration and Government thereof, Thou ſhalt doe as other Kings and Lords have already done, and have the ſame quarter and conditions with them. This is the firſt point: Now as to the ſecond: When this Peace and Alliance is eſtabliſhed, and that thou haſt ſubmitted either voluntarily, or by conſtraint, then thou art to yield true and faithfull Obedience to the Pope, who is the High-Prieſt, and thou art to receive and believe the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt our God. Thou art alſo to reject and totally to abandon the abominable Superſtition of Idols, which being done, we ſhall then make known to you the Sanctity and Truth of our Law, and the Falſity of yours, the invention and contrivance of which proceeded from the Devil. All which, O King, if Thou wilt believe me, Thou oughteſt to receive with readineſs and good-will, being a matter of great importance to thy ſelf, and to thy people; for if thou ſhouldſt deny, and refuſe to obey, Thou wilt be proſecuted with the Fire and Sword of War, untill we have conſtrained thee by force of Arms, to renounce thy Religion; for willingly or unwillingly Thou muſt receive our Catholick Faith, and with ſurrender of thy Kingdom pay a Tribute to our Emperour; but in caſe thou ſhouldſt contend, and make reſiſtence with an obſtinate mind, be aſſured, that God will deliver thee up, as he did anciently Pharaoh, who, with his whole Army, periſhed in the red Sea; and ſo ſhalt Thou, and all thy Indians, periſh, and be deſtroyed by our Arms.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Difficulty there was to interpret the ſenſe and meaning of this Speech of Friar Vicente de Valverde.

UPon this Speech Blas Valera makes ſome Reflexions, in order to the better underſtanding of his Hiſtory; ſaying, that the Hiſtorians which treat of theſe matters make mention of this Speech of the Friar, but howſoever with ſome variety, for ſome leave out the firſt part, and others the ſecond, and ſome have abbreviated it in their Relations. But howſoever Blas Valera ſaith, that John de Oliva, and Chriſtopher de Medina, who were Prieſts, and skilfull in the Indian Language, and ſeveral other Writers, have ſpecified this Speech at large in both parts, as ſpoken by Friar Vincent; and they all agree, that it was a moſt tart and rude Speech, without any mixture of ſweetneſs or allurement whatſoever, and that the Interpretation thereof was much worſe, as we ſhall ſee hereafter; and theſe Authours do much more approve the Speech which Hernando de Soto and Piçarro made to Atahualpa, being more gentle, and modeſt, than the ſharp, and ill-natured Speech of Friar Vincent.

And now as to the Interpretation which was made to King Atahualpa of theſe Words, we may believe it was very imperfect and corrupt; for this Philip the Indian, who was all the Interpreter they had, was a Native of the Iſland of Puna, and born of common and blockiſh Parents, and was ſcarce arrived to the age of twenty two years, and was not onely ill learned in the Spaniſh, but alſo in the general Tongue, ſpoken by the Incas at Cozco, which is different from that uſed in Tumpiz; for as we have ſaid at the beginning, the Language of Cozco is more refined, in reſpect of all other Indians, whoſe Language is barbarous and corrupt. And moreover this Interpreter had learned his Spaniſh of himſelf, without Rule, and ſome Words onely which he had gotten up amongſt the Souldiers, and lewd People, ſuch as zounds, and dammee, and the like; and beſides he was but a Servant to the Spaniards, and learned onely to ſpeak like the Negroes, and though he had been baptiſed, yet he was ignorant of all the Principles of Religion, having neither knowledge of Chriſt our Lord, nor of the Apoſtles Creed.

This was all the Education and Learning which our firſt Interpreter had in Peru, and accordingly the Tranſlations he made out of Spaniſh were all imperfect, and of a contrary ſenſe; not that he made his miſtakes voluntarily from malice, but from ignorance, ſpeaking, like a Parrot, things that he did not underſtand; as for example, when he was to declare, and explain the nature of the Trinity, as that God was three, and yet one, he would ſay, God was three, and one, that is four, the which appears by their Quipus, which is their Knots uſed in the Countrey of Caſſamarca, where theſe Affairs paſſed; and indeed he was much to blame, if we conſider, that in the Peruvian Language they have no words to expreſs the Trinity, the Holy Ghoſt, Faith, Grace, the Church, the Sacraments, and other Words of the like Myſteries; for which reaſon the Spaniards, who ſtudy that Language in our times, and endeavour to expreſs their myſtical Notions, are forced to coin new words moſt accommodated to the reaſon of this people, and to the manner of Expreſſions of the moſt intelligent Indians, who having underſtood ſomething of the Spaniſh Language and Learning, have of themſelves framed new Words to ſupply the defects of their Speech, whereby the Preachers are now able to expreſs any thing in conformity to the underſtanding of their Auditory. We have upon divers occaſions given ſeveral Inſtances of the Barrenneſs and Defects of the Peruvian Language; and therefore we ought not to lay the ſole blame on our firſt Interpreter; for even in theſe our Days, which are twenty nine Years, ſince that time, there are almoſt as many groſs miſtakes made by our preſent Interpreters, as were by Philippillio, who never converſed with the Spaniards in other Language than his own. In ſhort, I ſay, that I never knew an Indian who ſpake good Spaniſh, but but two Youths onely, who were my School-fellows, and from their childhood went to School, and learned to reade and write Spaniſh: One of which was called Carlos, the Son of Paullu Inca; beſides theſe two, I have obſerved ſo little curioſity in the Indians to learn the Spaniſh Tongue, that I never knew any of them who addicted himſelf to the ſtudy either of writing or reading thereof, and never exerciſed any other means than what came by mere converſe, and common diſcourſe; nor were the Spaniards on the other ſide more ſtudious in learning the Indian Tongue; which neglect was ſo great both in one and the other Nation, that thoſe Indian Boys, who were educated with me, did never arrive to any farther knowledge, than of common and familiar words; and when any thing was to be taught them of higher matters, I was conſtrained to expreſs them in the natural terms of their own Language.

And if the ignorance and little improvement in the knowledge of theſe Tongues was to be blamed in both Nations, after twenty nine years converſation and acquaintance one with the other, how little blame then ought we to object unto this Interpreter, for want of skilfulneſs in the Tongues, when firſt the Spaniards entred into theſe Countries: Nay how little ought Philipillio, and the good Friar Valverde, to be reproached for their unskilfulneſs in theſe Tongues at the beginning, when now after eighty years that the Indian Empire hath been ſubdued, there ſtill want words in the Indian Language to expreſs the Myſteries of our Holy Faith. As appears by a Catechiſm which Friar Diego de Alcobaça printed and publiſhed in the year 1585, in three Languages, viz. in Spaniſh, in the general Language of Cozco, and in the Tongue peculiarly belonging to the Province of Aymara; whereby it appears, that neither of the two laſt Tongues had words ſufficient to expreſs Theological terms without uſing the Spaniſh, making them terms of Art adjoyned to the Indian: As for example, in the ſecond Queſtion of the Catechiſm; Art thou a baptized Chriſtian? the common Tranſlation hath it, Batizaſcha Chucanqui? Whereby it appears, that the word Canqui is the onely Indian word, but the word Batizaſca is made Indian out of the Spaniſh. In like manner the fourth Queſtion is, Doſt thou know the Chriſtian Doctrine? the word do you know is Indian, but the other two words are formed from the Spaniſh. Beſides which there are innumerable other words in the Indian Tongue derived from the Spaniſh, which for brevity ſake we omit; and therefore we ſhall inſtance in theſe few words onely, which are taught to the Indians in the proper Spaniſh words; and are theſe: God Jeſus Chriſt, Our Lady, an Image, the Croſs, a Prieſt, Domingo, a Feaſt or Holy-day, Religion, the Church, Repentance, to Communicate, to Pray, to Faſt, Married, a Batchellour or ſingle Perſon, amancebado, or one who keeps a Woman, with many other like words in the Catechiſm. And though it be true that ſome of theſe words, and others of the like nature, might be expreſſed in the Indian Tongue, as the Name of God, &c. Howſoever it was with great prudence, and religiouſly determined in charity to the Souls of theſe people, to cover the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, with Chriſtian words; leſt theſe people, being newly converted from their Gentiliſm, and being taught Chriſtianity in their own words, ſhould retain the ſame ſuperſtitious notions of God, and other things according to the primary impreſſions of their Idolatry; and therefore it was judged neceſſary to inſtruct them with new words, that ſo, if poſſible, the very Memory of their ſuperſtitions might be totally aboliſhed.

Having thus excuſed Philipillio, and Friar Valverde, from blame for their bad interpretation; we muſt add, that the interpretation he made of the Friar's Sermon, ſerved rather to obſcure than elucidate his ſenſe; for when he came to explicate the Generation of Mankind, and original Sin by Adam's fall; that inſtead of ſaying, That all the World ſinned in Adam, he would ſay, That all the World heaped their Sins upon Adam. And then ſpeaking of the Divinity of Chriſt our Lord, he ſaid, He was a great Perſon, who died for Mankind: And then when he would ſpeak of the Virginity, Purity, and Sanctity of our Lady the Virgin Mary, he ſaid nothing to the purpoſe, interpreting every thing almoſt in a contrary ſenſe to the Catholick Doctrine.

Coming to the ſecond Part of the Speech delivered by Valverde, he made ſome fewer errours and miſtakes than in the firſt, becauſe that the matter concerned more exteriour things, ſuch as War and Arms, which were more obvious to the ſenſe; on which occaſion he extolled the Power and Magnanimity of the Emperour, and his induſtry in ſending Captains and Souldiers to conquer the World; the the which was ſo ill expreſſed, that the Indians believed he was Superiour to all, as well in Heaven as on Earth. Many other things he declared, which were as ill underſtood as thoſe preceding, which for brevity ſake we paſs by and omit. And here Blas Valera takes notice of a moſt certain and obſervable truth; that to this day, though the Indian Children which are bred up and educated with our Youth, ſo that Spaniſh is become almoſt their natural Language, or at leaſt as eaſie to them as the Indian; and are very well inſtructed and catechiſed in the Principles and Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, yet dare not preſume to explicate the Doctrines of our Religion to the Indians in their own Language, for fear leſt the barrenneſs of their Tongue ſhould not be able to reach the height of our myſterious Faith, and thereby adminiſter occaſion to them of many errours and miſtakes. So that if in theſe late days, wherein Men are both inſtructed in our Learning, and practiſed in both Languages, ſuch difficulties do ariſe in this matter; what incongruities, what nonſenſe, and what Chimeras may we imagine, were at firſt uttered, when Men endeavoured to expreſs ſublime Myſteries with a babling and an imperfect Tongue?

CHAP. XXIV.

The Anſwer which Atahualpa gave to the Friar's Speech.

WHen Atahualpa underſtood the concluſion of the Speech, which was, That by fair means, or foul, he was to renounce and quit his Kingdoms, and to remain a Tributary Prince, for ſo was the command of the Pope, and the pleaſure of the Emperour; and when they threatned him with fire and ſword, as appeared by the ſigns they made, by brandiſhing their Arms; and that it ſeemed as if nothing was prepared but ruine and deſtruction for himſelf and his Army, like that of Pharaoh, he became extremely ſad and melancholy, believing that thoſe whom they called Viracochas (for they conceived that the Spaniards were Gods) were turned from them, and become their mortal Enemies; and therewith he fetched a deep ſigh, and cried Atac, which is as much as Oh moſt unhappy and miſerable; which wofull groan was an evidence of the ſorrow he conceived at the concluſion of the Friar's Sermon: But at length recollecting himſelf, he anſwered in the manner following.

Though you have denied me all the requeſts I made to your Meſſengers, yet it would be a great ſatisfaction to me, to grant me the favour onely to expreſs your ſelves by a more skilfull and faithfull Interpreter, becauſe the Manners and political Lives of Men are better underſtood by diſcourſe, than by ſigns or actions; for though you may be Men endued with extraordinary vertues and abilities, yet unleſs you make them appear to me by words and diſcourſe, I ſhall never be made capable to underſtand them by outward ſigns and geſtures: For if there be a neceſſity of a common Language between Nations, who deſire commerce and converſation together, much more is it requiſite between people ſo remote as we are; for indeed to treat by Interpreters ignorant of both Tongues, is like the inarticulate ſound of domeſtick Animals; and ſuch, O Man of God, ſeems this diſcourſe thou haſt made me by this Interpreter. And now, ſo far as I underſtand, methinks the diſcourſe ſeems much different to what your Ambaſſadours lately propounded, for they treated of nothing but Peace and Friendſhip, of Alliance and Conſanguinity; but now all the Words of this Indian are nothing but Menaces of Wars, and Death, and Fire, and Sword, with the Extirpation and Baniſhment of the Incas, and their Progeny; and that I muſt voluntarily, or by force, renounce a right to my Kingdom, and become Tributary to another. From whence I collect one of theſe two things; that either you and your Prince are Tyrants, and rove about to plunder the World, and to diſpoſſeſs others of their Kingdoms, killing and ſpoiling thoſe who owe you nothing, and have never offered you injury or violence; or otherwiſe you are the Miniſters of God (called by us Pachacamac) camac) whom he hath ſent to viſit us with vengeance and deſtruction. And if it be ſo, both I and my Vaſſals do offer our ſelves to death, and to what puniſhment ſoever you will inflict upon us; not for fear, or out of any dread we have of your Menaces or Arms, but in compliance with the Commands enjoyned us by my Father Huayna Capac at the time of his death; which was, that we ſhould ſerve and honour a Nation with Beards like your ſelves, which were to enter into theſe parts after his days, and of which he propheſied ſome years before your Ships coaſted about our Countrey, and whom he declared to be Men of better Laws, of more refined Cuſtoms, more wiſe and more valiant than our ſelves.

Wherefore to fulfill the Prophecy and Teſtament of my Father, we ſtyle you Viracochas, underſtanding thereby, that you are the Meſſengers of the Great God Viracocha, whoſe Will and Pleaſure, juſt Indignation, Arms and Power, we are unable to reſiſt; and yet we are aſſured, that he is all Goodneſs and Mercy: And for that reaſon you, who are his Miniſters and Executioners of his Will, ought to abſtain from ſuch Robberies, Slaughter and Violences, as you have committed in Tumpiz and the adjacent Countries.

In the next place, your Interpreter acquaints me of five great Perſonages, whom I am to acknowledge, The firſt is God, who is three and one, that is four, whom you call the Creator of this Univerſe; which perhaps may be the ſame, whom we call Pachacamac and Viracocha. The ſecond is the Father of all Mankind, on whom all other Men have heaped their Sins. The third you call Jeſus Chriſt, who was the onely Perſon excepted, who did not caſt his Sins on the firſt Man, but that he dyed. The fourth you name is the Pope. The fifth is Charles, whom, in compariſon with others, you call the moſt Powerfull Monarch of the Univerſe, and the Supreme Lord of all: But then if Charles be the Prince and Lord of the World, what need was there for the Pope to give a new Grant, and another Commiſſion to make War upon me, and Uſurp my Kingdoms? for conſequently the Pope muſt be a greater Prince than he, and the moſt powerfull of any in the World. But I cannot but moſt admire at what you ſay, that I am obliged to pay Tribute to Charles onely, and not to others; the which you alledge without giving me any reaſon, and indeed I cannot conceive on what ſcore I am obliged to pay it; for if I were bound to pay Tribute and Service to any, methinks it ſhould be to that God, who, you ſay, created all things, and to that firſt Man, who was the Father of all Mankind, and to that Jeſus Chriſt who had no Sins to impute unto him; and, in fine, if Tribute were to be given, it ſhould rather be unto the Pope, who hath Power and Authority to diſpoſe of my Kingdoms, and my Perſon. And if you ſay that I owe nothing unto any of theſe, I ſhould imagine that I owe much leſs unto Charles, who was never Lord of theſe Countries, nor ever ſaw them. And if the Pope's Grant and Conceſſion be obligatory to me, it were juſt and reaſonable to declare it to me, before you threaten me with War, and Fire, and Sword, and Death; for I am not ſo void of underſtanding and ſenſe, as not to obey the Pope, in caſe you can ſhew me reaſon, and juſtice, and cauſe for it.

Moreover, I deſire to be informed who that good Man Jeſus Chriſt was, who, you ſay, never laid his Sins on another, but that he dyed. I would gladly know, whether he dyed of a natural death, or by the hands of his Enemies; and whether he was numbred amongſt the Gods before his death, or afterwards.

And farther I deſire to be informed, whether theſe five which you highly honour, are adored by you for Gods; for if it be ſo, you hold more for Gods, than we, who acknowledge no other than the Pachacamac, who is the Supreme, and the Sun, who is inferiour to him, and the Moon, who is his Siſter and Wife. In which doubtfull Queſtions I heartily deſire to be truly reſolved by ſome other more able and faithfull Interpreter, that ſo I may be made more capable thereby to know and obey your Will and Commands.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the great tumult and diſturbance which happened between the Indians and the Spaniards.

THE Inca obſerving the inability of the Interpreter, endeavoured to aſſiſt him in expreſſing his Anſwer: Firſt, by uttering his Speech by ſhort periods, cauſing him to expreſs one thing, before he proceeded to another; and, ſecondly, he ſpake in the Language of Chincaſuyu, which the Interpreter underſtood better than the Language of Cozco; by which means Philippillio did better expreſs the ſenſe and intention of the Inca, though he did it in a moſt barbarous manner. So ſoon as the Inca had ended his diſcourſe, the Keepers of the Quipus were commanded to note the ſenſe and particulars of all things delivered by their Knots, which were the onely cypher they had whereby to conſerve their traditions to future Ages.

By this time the Spaniards growing weary of this long and tedious diſcourſe, began to quit their places, and come up cloſe to the Indians, to fight with them, and rob them of their Jewels of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, with which they had that day decked themſelves, that in a ſolemn manner they might appear in their finery, to receive the Embaſſy which was ſent them from the Univerſal Monarch of the World: Some Spaniards alſo climbed a little Tower to plunder an Idol, which they had adorned with Plates of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones; the which outrage cauſed great noiſe and tumult amongſt the Indians; which when the Inca perceived, he cried out with a loud voice to his people, that they ſhould neither hurt, nor offend the Spaniards, though they ſhould take or kill their King himſelf. On which paſſage Blas Valera takes occaſion to ſay, That as God by the preſence of Queen Eſther mollified the Spirit of King Ahaſuerus; ſo by means of the Holy Croſs, which the good Friar Valverde held in his hand, he charmed the Spirit of this Cholerick and Warlike Prince Atahualpa, not onely to a degree of gentleneſs, and quiet temper, but even to an entire ſubmiſſion, and humble reſignation: the which we ought to attribute to a Miracle of the divine Mercy; for God deſigning to reduce this people to a knowledge of the true Doctrine of the Holy Goſpel, was pleaſed by this, and other miraculous inſtances, which we ſhall find ſcattered in divers places of this Hiſtory, to operate on the Spirits of this barbarous people. Some Writers blame Friar Valverde for this diſorder, ſaying, that he moved the Spaniards thereunto, and encouraged them to lay hands on their Weapons, requiring them to doe juſtice, and take revenge for the affront which the King had given them, by throwing the Book on the ground which the Friar had put into his hand; and ſome ſay this could not be the cauſe, for that neither the Friar delivered a Book into the hands of the King, nor did he receive it: But the truth of all was this, Friar Valverde ſtartled at a ſudden out-cry of the Indians, aroſe up on a ſudden from the ſeat on which he ſate, diſcourſing with the King; and running in haſte, his Book, and the Croſs which he held in his hand, fell on the ground; and then catching them up again, he ran with ſpeed, crying to his Companions, that they ſhould offer no hurt to the Indians, for that Atahualpa was kind and well affected towards them, and that he obſerved by his Anſwers, and demands his good intentions, to ſatisfie them in all matters according to his capacity; but the noiſe and out-cry of the people was ſuch, that the voice of the Friar was not heard amongſt them. And here it is to be noted, that it is not true what ſome Hiſtorians report of Atahualpa, that he ſhould ſay, " You believe that " Chriſt is God, and that he died: I adore the Sun and the Moon, which are immortal: " And who taught you, that your God created the Heaven and the Earth? To which " Valverde made anſwer, This Book hath taught it to us: Then the King took it in " his hand, and opening the Leaves, laid it to his Ear; and not hearing it ſpeak " to him, he threw it upon the ground. Upon which, they ſay, that the Friar

p. 456

" ſtarting up, ran to his Companions, crying out, that the Goſpel was deſpiſed, " and trampled under foot; Juſtice and Revenge upon thoſe who contemn our " Law, and refuſe our Friendſhip. In like manner, it is fabulous what they write
" of the Inca, that he ſhould ſay that he was free, and owed not Tribute to any,
" for that he knew no King ſuperiour to himſelf. I ſhould be glad to be a friend " to the Emperour, who hath evidenced his Power and Greatneſs in ſending Ar" mies into Countries ſo remote; but as to what you mention of Obedience to " the Pope, I cannot underſtand the Reaſons which ſhould oblige me to a ſubjec-
" tion unto him: For he who pretends to transfer another's right unto his friends,
" and commands me to quit and renounce the Kingdom, which I hold by Inheri" tance, to I know not whom, ſhews himſelf a Man of little underſtanding, and " leſs juſtice. And as to the change of my Religion, of which I am in my con-
" ſcience ſatisfied, and believe to be Holy; it would be diſhonourable, and a
" folly in me to queſtion the truth thereof, which by ancient tradition, and un" doubted teſtimony, hath been approved by my Anceſtours.

All which I ſay was falſe, and framed by the miſtakes and flattery of Writers; for Atahualpa never queſtioned the right of paying Tribute, but onely inſiſted on the Reaſons why, and wherefore it was due, and expected from him; which demands, or queſtions, put the Indians into a combuſtion. The Commander in chief of the Spaniards and Captains under him, ſent notwithſtanding the former relation which they had forged unto the Emperour, and forbid all people under ſevere penalties to make any other report or narrative of what had paſſed in this particular: the truth of which is, as I have related it, and which may be proved not onely by the Hiſtorical, or Hyeroglyphical Knots of the Province of Caſſamarca, but by the teſtimony of ſeveral of thoſe Conquerours, who were then preſent at thoſe tranſactions. Blas Valera ſaith, That one of them was his own Father, from whom he hath often heard it confirmed. In ſhort, we ſay that 5000 Indians were killed that day, 3500 of which were ſlain with the Sword, the reſt were old and infirm Men, and Women, and Children, which were trampled and trodden under foot, for an innumerable number of all Ages, and both Sexes, were gathered together to ſee the Solemnity of this ſtrange and unheard-of Embaſſy. Moreover a great number of Indians periſhed under the Ruines of a Wall, which fell by force of the violent crouds of people, which preſſed under the ſhelter of it. Two days after this defeat, the Croſs was found in the ſame place where Friar Valverde had let it fall, for no Indian durſt approach near it, becauſe perhaps it was like that which the Indians adored in Tumpiz, believing that there was ſome Divinity, or myſterious Power in that piece of Wood; and being ignorant of the Religion of Chriſt our Lord, they asked pardon for thoſe offences by which they had provoked him to anger.

And now the Indians began to call to mind the ancient Prophecy, delivered by Tradition from their Inca Viracocha, whereby he not onely foretells the change of their Laws, People and Government, but alſo that their ſuperſtitions and religious Rites and Ceremonies ſhould be conſumed, and periſh by fire. And in regard they were ignorant of the time when theſe things were to be accompliſhed, whether now or hereafter; both the King and his People were ſtrook with ſuch aſtoniſhment, that they knew not what to determine; nor did they reſolve on any thing either defenſive to themſelves, or offenſive to the Spaniards, onely they conſidered and worſhipped them as Gods, and Meſſengers of the Great Viracocha, whom they adored under this denomination and belief. Thus far this Relation is extracted out of the Papers of Blas Valera, which I ſhall willingly quote hereafter in ſeveral parts of this following Hiſtory; for he was not onely a religious Man, but one very curious in finding out the truth, and ſincere in laying down matters as they really were acted; in which he was not ſatisfied by his Enquiries from Spaniards, but likewiſe took his Informations from the Indians themſelves: For which reaſon, whereſoever I find any thing of his tending to our purpoſe, I ſhall quote them as authentick for their authority; and in the mean time, cannot but much lament his loſt leaves, and ſcattered fragments.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Authour compares his own Writings with the Hiſtories of Spaniards.

NOW to compare what we have ſaid with the Writings of Spaniſh Hiſtorians, we ſay, that the Diſcourſe of Friar Valverde, and the Anſwer of Atahualpa, are delivered very brief, and in few words, in all the printed Hiſtories: For the truth is, the General and Captains were not very ſincere, or faithfull in the Narrative they gave of paſſages which occurred; for to put the beſt gloſs and colour they could on their actions, they left out all their cruel and unjuſtifiable proceedings, and added whatſoever they judged to have the beſt appearance. What we have alledged concerning Atahualpa, how that he ordered his Subjects to reſiſt the Spaniards, is confirmed by the authority of ſeveral Hiſtorians, and particularly by Lopez de Gomara, who in the 113th Chapter of his Book, hath theſe Words: "It is very obſervable (ſaith he) that though the Indians came all armed, yet not a Man lifted up his hand, becauſe the word of Command was not given, nor the Signal ſhewed for Fight, as was agreed, in caſe that matters ſo required; for it is probable the ſurprize was ſo ſudden, and the affrightment ſo great by the ſound of the Trumpets, the Vollies of the Muſquets, and roaring of the Cannon, the ruſhing of the Horſes, and clattering of Armour; things ſo unknown to theſe poor people, as diſtracted them, and put them beſides their underſtandings and reaſon. And a little farther he adds: Great numbers of them periſhed, becauſe they did not fight, whilſt ours killed them with their Daggers, ſlaſhing and ſtabbing them; for Friar Valverde adviſed them not to uſe their Swords, leſt in that ſervice they ſhould be either blunted or broken. Thus far are the Words of Gomara; the which is likewiſe confirmed by other Authours, who report, that the Indians fled ſo ſoon as they ſaw their King taken Priſoner, and that Atahualpa commanded them not to reſiſt the Spaniards: The which we may attribute to a Miracle of God's Providence, who was pleaſed to conſerve the Chriſtians, and not ſuffer them to periſh, whom he had deſigned to preach the Goſpel: For if the Inca had not commanded them not to fight, certainly they would never have endured to ſee their Prince overthrown and taken; for having Weapons in their hands, they would rather have died all in his defence, than have ſuffered 160 Spaniards (whom they were able to have ſubdued with ſtones) to commit ſuch Outrages upon them; inſtead whereof there was not one Spaniard either killed or wounded, unleſs it were Franciſco de Piçarro, who received a little hurt in his hand by one of his own people, as he went to ſeize Atahualpa. The truth is, the Indians did not fight, becauſe they held every Command of their Inca to be a part of their Religion, and of the divine Law, though it were to the loſs of their Lives and Eſtates. And as to what Hiſtorians report of Friar Valverde, that he himſelf uſed his Weapons, and encouraged the Souldiers to kill and deſtroy the Indians, and ſtab them with Daggers to ſave their Swords, and conſerve them to another opportunity, is a falſe report of thoſe who wrote theſe paſſages into Spain, where they might eaſily at 3000 Leagues diſtance obtrude what ſtories they pleaſed on the minds of Men; for otherwiſe it is not to be imagined, that a religious Friar, a good Catholick, and a Divine, would utter ſuch outragious words of Cruelty, which became a Nero, rather than a Perſon of his Coat and Profeſſion; and one who deſerved the Dignity of a Biſhop, in that he died by the hands of the Indians, for preaching the Catholick Faith: Which having ſaid, let us return to the Series of our Hiſtory.

CHAP. XXVII.

How the Spaniards took the King Atahualpa.

THE Spaniſh Horſe ſallying forth, attacked the Squadrons of the Indians, and ran them through with their Lances, without any oppoſition, and at the ſame time D. Franciſco Piçarro, and his Infantry, aſſailed Atahualpa with all their fury; for they imagined, that in caſe they could once make themſelves Maſter of that Jewel, (which was the King) they ſhould ſoon gain all the Treaſures of Peru; but the Indians with great numbers encompaſſing the King's Chair, did not offend the Spaniards, but onely endeavoured to defend and cover their King from hurt and miſchief: Howſoever the Spaniards wounded them on all ſides, and lanced them through the ſides, though they defended not themſelves, onely interpoſed their bodies between the King and the Spaniards; in fine, with much ſlaughter they opened their way to the King; the firſt that came up to him was D. Franciſco Piçarro, who laying hold on his Veſtments, fell with him to the ground, though ſome Hiſtorians ſay that he took him by the Locks, which were very long; but that was a miſtake, for the Incas wear very ſhort Hair. In ſhort, the Spaniards having overthrown Atahualpa, they took him Priſoner: In confirmation of which truth, Gomara hath theſe words: "There was not one Spaniard either killed or "wounded, onely Franciſco Piçarro received a ſmall hurt in his hand by a blow of "one of his own Souldiers, who ſtrook at Atahualpa to knock him down; "whence it is reported, that it was not Piçarro, but another which took the King "Priſoner: With which Words Gomara ends his 113th Chapter.

Now to add unto his Hiſtory what he hath omitted, (as we have declared we would) we aver, that this Souldier was called Michael Aſtere, who afterwards lived in the City of Huamanca, where he poſſeſſed ſome Lands, and commanded over the Indians. When Atahualpa was fallen, this Souldier took off the coloured Wreath which encircled his Temples, the which was as his Crown or Laurel of Royalty, and kept it for his prize; which gave occaſion for the report, that Atahualpa was taken Priſoner by the Souldier, and not by Piçarro; but be the matter how it will, ſince both vvere ſo near together, and the thing doubtfull, the Honour ought to be given to the chief Commander: Hovvſoever Michael Aſtere kept the coloured Wreath by him, untill the year 1557, vvhen he beſtovved it on the Inca Sayritupac, vvho then deſerted the Mountains to vvhich he vvas retired, as ſhall be related in its due place.

The Indians ſeeing their King taken, and the Spaniards ſtill purſuing them with wounds and ſlaughter, ſtaid no longer, but all put themſelves to flight; but not being able to make their eſcape by the way, (for the Horſe had poſſeſſed themſelves of that paſs) they made towards a certain Wall, built of freezed Stone, in the time of the Great Inca Pachacutec, when he had conquered Caſſamarca; and being in great multitudes, and many hands, they over-turned above a hundred paces of the Wall, and climbed over the Ruines, over which the Horſe not being able to follow them, they eſcaped into the Plains. And here a certain Authour ſaith, that the Stones of theſe Walls were more tender and compaſſionate, than the hearts of the Spaniards; becauſe that being charmed with pity for the miſeries of the poor Indians, they trembled and fell, to make way for their flight and eſcape. Some Hiſtorians ſay, that the Spaniards not ſatisfied to ſee them fly, purſued and maſſacred them, untill the night put an end to their cruelty: And then afterwards taking the plunder of the Field, they divided the ſpoil which conſiſted of Jewels, Gold, Silver, and many pretious Stones. And Lopez de Gomara giving a relation hereof in the 114th Chapter of his Book, ſaith, "That in "the Palace and Bath of Atabaliba onely they found five thouſand Women; "which though ſorrowfull and deſtitute, yet they put on a chearfull counte-"nance when they ſaw the Chriſtians treating them with Preſents of fine Gar" ments, with Towels, and other domeſtick conveniences, as alſo with Baſons " of Gold and Silver, one of which belonged to Atabaliba, and weighed eight " Arroves of Gold (which makes two hundred weight Engliſh) and was to " the value of a hundred thouſand Ducats; but poor Atabaliba in the mean time " being much incommoded by his Chains, deſired Piçarro, that ſince it was his " misfortune to fall into ſuch miſery, that at leaſt they would treat him well, and " eaſe him of that burthen. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, which I have extracted almoſt verbatim, and which are of the ſame ſenſe with that which is delivered by Auguſtine Carate. To which Authours I refer my Reader, in caſe any perſon deſires to reade theſe matters more at large.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Atahualpa, or Atabaliba, promiſes a great Ranſome to obtain his Liberty; and what Endeavours were made for him.

THE Nobility which eſcaped from the ſlaughter of Caſſamarca, underſtanding that their King was alive, returned to perform their Services to him in Priſon; onely a certain Commander called Rumminavi, who was of a different opinion to all the reſt, and never aſſented to have Peace with the Spaniards, or to truſt them, remained behind with the Souldiers under his Command; and being enraged to find his Counſels rejected, fled with his people into the Kingdom of Quitu, with intention to make preparations for a War againſt the Spaniards, and ſuch proviſions as were moſt conducing to his own ſafety: But his real deſign was to levy a War againſt Atahualpa himſelf; who having been a Rebel to his own Prince, he thought it no crime to follow his example. To which end being entred into the Kingdom of Quitu, he immediately ſeized on all the Sons of Atahualpa, on pretence of defending and protecting them againſt the Spaniards; but in a ſhort time he killed them all, together with Quilliſcacha, who was Brother to Atahualpa both by Father and Mother, called by the Spaniards Yllaſcas; and moreover, he killed Challcuchima, and other Captains and Curacas, as we ſhall declare in their due place.

The Inca Atahualpa being now in Priſon, and bound with Chains of Iron, treated with the Spaniards for the price of his Liberty, and offered for his Ranſome as many Veſſels of Gold and Silver, as ſhould cover the floor of the Chamber wherein he was; and perceiving that the Spaniards ſhrugged their ſhoulders at it, as either not believing him, or thinking the propoſal too mean (as Gomara reports) he immediately profered to fill the Room to a certain red line which he had drawn on the Wall, ſo far as he could reach with his hand, provided that they neither put one Veſſel within the other, nor battered, or beat them cloſe, but onely heaped them one on the other, untill they aroſe to the mark and line which he had drawn. And thus much we have extracted out of the 114th Chapter of Gomara's Hiſtory. But not to enlarge on the Particulars related by the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, to whom we refer our ſelves; we come, in ſhort, to that which immediately concerns the Life and Death of thoſe Kings, the Incas, and the utter deſtruction of them, which was the firſt deſign and intention of this Treatiſe; and then afterwards, in its due place, we ſhall relate all the moſt curious and notable paſſages which occurred in the Civil Wars ariſen between the Spaniards themſelves: But now to proceed.

Atahualpa ſent for much Gold and Silver for payment of his Ranſome, which though amaſſed in great quantities, yet wanted much of ariſing to the line which was drawn; ſo that it ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to comply with the promiſes which Atahualpa had made; wherefore the Spaniards murmured, and ſaid, That ſince the Priſoner had not complied with the promiſes he had given within the time prefixed, they could not but ſuſpect that theſe delays were made on deſign to aſſemble greater numbers of Souldiers, who might be able to maſter and kill them, and then free and reſcue their King. The Spaniards being jealous of ſome ſuch project, appeared angry and diſcontented; which Atahualpa perceiving by their countenance, for he was very quick of apprehenſion, demanded the cauſe of that trouble which appeared in their faces: which when he had underſtood from Franciſco Pizarro; he anſwered, that if they were informed of the great diſtance of the places from whence he was to fetch his Veſſels of Gold and Silver, they would not entertain ſuch hard thoughts of jealouſie concerning his intentions; for the greateſt part of his Ranſome was to be brought from Cozco, Pachacamac, Quitu, and ſeveral other Provinces, the neareſt part of which was Pachacamac, and that was at leaſt eighty Leagues diſtant; that Cozco was two hundred Leagues off, and Quitu three hundred; and that if they doubted of the truth of what he affirmed, they might, if they pleaſed, ſend Spaniards into thoſe parts to ſee and ſurvey the Treaſure which was there, and in all places of that Kingdom; and being ſatisfied with the quantity thereof, might pay themſelves with their own hands. But the Inca perceiving that the Spaniards doubted of their ſecurity with thoſe whom he would employ to conduct them to theſe Treaſures; he told them, that whilſt he was in Chains, they were ſecure, and needed not to fear or doubt of their ſafety: Upon which Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, Native of the Town of Lobon, reſolved to travel as far as Cozco. When Atahualpa underſtood that Hernando would leave him, he was much troubled; for having been the firſt Chriſtian he had ſeen, he entertained a particular kindneſs for his Perſon, believing that on all occaſions and emergencies he would prove his Friend and Protectour. Howſoever, he durſt not ſay any thing againſt his going, leſt it ſhould beget a jealouſie, and contradict the profer he had made, and which the Spaniards had accepted: Beſides theſe two Spaniards, four others reſolved to travel into other Provinces for diſcovery of the Treaſures which they yielded; one therefore deſigned for Quitu, another for Huayllas, another for Huamachucu, and a fourth for Sicillapampa; all which, beſides their primary intention of diſcovery, received Inſtructions to obſerve whether any Levies were making for reſcue of their King Atahualpa from his Priſon; but he, poor Man, being far from ſuſpecting the Faith and Promiſes which the Spaniards had given him, buſied his thoughts on no other contrivances, than the ways to amaſs ſuch quantities of Gold and Silver as he had bargained with the Spaniards for his Ranſome, not doubting but upon the delivery thereof, to have his Chains and Shackles knocked off. Upon which ſuppoſition the Inca ordered publick Proclamation to be made in all his Kingdoms, to receive and treat the Chriſtians, travelling ſingly into remote parts with joy and kind treatment in all places where they ſhould arrive: In virtue of which Command from the Inca, and out of an opinion which the Indians entertained, that the Spaniards were Gods, and Meſſengers of the moſt High God, (as they themſelves reported and publiſhed in all places) and were confirmed in a belief thereof from the action of Peter de Candia, who killed the wild Beaſts (as we have ſaid) in Tumpiz, they received them in their Towns and Villages with all the honour, joy, and kind treatment that they were able to expreſs. They preſented them with Gifts, and ſuch curioſities as their Countrey yielded, and offered Sacrifices to them; for out of their abundant ſimplicity and ſuperſtition they eſteemed of the Spaniards, as Gods: And though they were not ignorant of the great ſlaughter they had committed upon the Indians in Caſſamarca, and on thoſe which endeavoured to make their eſcape, yet ſtill they maintained an opinion, that they were Gods, but cruel and terrible, and ſuch as were to be appeaſed with Sacrifices; and though theſe angry Deities were never to be perſuaded into that gentle Mood of doing good to them, yet perhaps they might be atoned, and reſtrained from doing them farther miſchiefs.

Hernando

Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, with the four other Spaniards, were by order of the Inca carried in Hammacks upon Mens ſhoulders for their more convenience and expedition. Now a Hammack is a word uſed by the Indians in the Iſle of Barlovento, and ſignifies a Net made of the Leaves of a Palm, or of other Trees, which in thoſe hot Countries is much more cool than thoſe made of Cotton, which are uſed by the poorer and meaner ſort of people: Theſe Hammacks are hanged at the four corners with Ropes about a Yard from the ground, and are much more cool than lodging upon Quilts. In imitation hereof, the Indians of Peru did uſe to faſten a Blanket at both ends to a Staff of about three or four Yards long, on which he that was to ride Poſt laid and ſtretched himſelf at length, ſo that the Bearers ſeemed to carry a dead Corpſe: This Blanket was ſupported by two Indians, who changed with others after a certain diſtance of travel, for twenty of them being deſigned perhaps to carry one Man, they often relieved one the other; and coming to a certain Stage, or Poſt, they found as many others ready to eaſe and diſcharge them of their burthen; which was the way and manner of the Indian Poſts. This ſort of Biere on which Men are thus carried, is called Huantu, or Rampa, called by the Spaniards Hamaca, being like their Cama, which ſignifies a Bed.

In this manner theſe two courageous Spaniards, Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, travelled the diſtance of two hundred Leagues, which is between Caſſamarca and Cozco, with more ſecurity and better treatment than they could have found in their own Countrey: In like manner the other four were received and careſſed in all places where they paſſed, and with ſuch welcome joy, and hearty entertainment, as was incredible, and which the Spaniards, when they returned, had ſcarce the confidence to relate unto their companions.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Travels of Hernando Piçarro to Pachacamac, and of what befell him in that Journey.

SOon after the departure of Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, Hernando Piçarro being moved with the fame of the vaſt Riches of Pachacamac, reſolved to viſit that Temple; but not knowing what might happen in this Journey, he took with him a party of Horſe for his better ſecurity and convoy: The Spaniards in this Journey travelling one day over a certain Mountain, diſcovered from the top of it on the ſide of another Hill, ſomething that gliſtered with a brightneſs like Gold, and the rays of the Sun darting upon it, almoſt blinded the eyes of the Beholders. The Spaniards proceeded towards it with great admiration, and being come near, they perceived it to be a heap of Pots, and Jars, and Kettles, and Pans, and ſuch like Utenſils made of Gold and Silver, which the Brother of Atahualpa, called Quilliſcacha, (whom we have already mentioned) had amaſſed together towards payment of the Inca's Ranſome, being to the value of two Millions; though ſome Hiſtorians report, that all did not amount, in the whole, unto more than three hundred thouſand pieces of Eight: but this muſt be ſome errour in the account, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, when we come to reckon up the ſeveral particulars; howſoever the Mountain ſeemed to ſhine with Gold, becauſe the Indians, who carried thoſe Veſſels up the Hill, had laid them down to eaſe, and reſt themſelves for a while, and ſo had over-ſpread therewith all the way upwards. This Narrative I received in my own Countrey from the mouth of one who was then preſent; and the ſame was afterwards confirmed to me in Spain by that worthy Gentleman Don Graviel Piçarro, who was an Officer of the Inquiſition at Cordova; and and another Gentleman called Don John Piçarro, who accompanied Hernando Piçarro in this Journey, made a like report of the golden Hill.

We have already said, that so soon as this Quilliscacha was come to Cassamarca with the aforesaid Treasure, he immediately advised his Brother Atahualpa to come with all speed to the Kingdom of Quitu, to prevent the Insurrection, which the Commander Rumminavi was designing to make; which Plot Atahualpa having formerly suspected, had sent his Brother in pursuit of him.

This Rumminavi had formerly been an Assistant to Atahualpa in execution of all his cruelties, and tyrannical practices; so that he was acquainted with his natural temper, and well forewarned of his treachery and false dealings; and suspecting no less from Quilliscacha, he received him like the King's Brother, and informed himself of the Inca's imprisonment; and the bargain for his ransome, to obtain which, they both agreed to amass all the Gold and Plate that was to be found in that Kingdom. And though Rumminavi desired nothing less than the liberty of the Inca, yet like a false and perfidious Traytor he served, and treated Quilliscacha with much kindness, as if he had been a most faithfull and loyal Subject; and carried this fair outside untill such time as occasion offered, to put in practice his villanous design.

Hernando Piçarro permitting Quilliscacha to pass before him, proceeded on his Journey to the great Temple of Pachacamac, whose immense riches, and multitude of people, which inhabited the Valley round about, surprized the Spaniards with strange admiration; but much more were the Indians astonished to see the Fashion, the Habits, the Arms and Horses of their new Guests: the Novelty of which, and the Command of their Inca caused them to adore them for Gods, and to receive and treat them with such kindness and respect, as passes all imagination, or expression; and so silly were these poor people, that observing the Horses with Bits and Bridles in their mouths, they imagined like those in Cassamarca, that the Iron was their food; and pitying to see the poor Beasts with no better Victuals, they brought them Gold and Silver, desiring them to eat those Metals which were much more pleasant and delicate than the Iron. The Spaniards were much pleased at the ignorance of the Indians, and cherishing them in that opinion, told them (as they had done to those in Cassamarca) that they should bring much of that fodder to their Horses, and lay it under the Grass and Mayz, for they were great devourers, and would soon dispatch and eat it all; which the Indians believing, did as they desired. Of the Gold which was in the Temple, Hernando Piçarro took as much as he could carry with him, leaving his Command to carry all the rest to Cassamarca for ransome of their King; on which belief the people readily brought all, not concealing or embezling any part thereof.

Whilst Hernando Piçarro was at Pachacamac, he received advice, that about forty Leagues from thence there was a certain Captain of the Army of Atahualpa, called Challcuchima, who had gathered great Forces to him; upon which Hernando sent to him to come, and meet him, that they might treat of matters conducing to the publick peace and quiet of those Kingdoms; but the Indian refusing to come where the Spaniards were, Hernando adventured with great hazard of his own Person, and of the lives of his companions, to pass unto him, being a Journey not to be performed without much labour and danger both in the going, and in the return; for not onely the roughness of the way, and craggy Mountains were incommodious, but the broad Rivers gave them much obstruction; for in passing over the Bridges of Osier, (which we have formerly described) the greatest difficulty was how to Ferry over the Horses. Wherefore this attempt was esteemed very rash and inconsiderate by the other Spaniards, to whom it appeared a vain confidence to put themselves into the hands of an Infidel, in whom, according to common report, was no faith, and into the power of a person who was surrounded with an Army. Howsoever the reliance which this Spanish Commander had on the promises of Atahualpa, which at his departure he had expressed by signs, and had given him some tokens which might serve him for a Pass-port, in case he should meet with any Commander or General in his Journey, so animated Hernando, that he marched boldly towards Challcuchima; and having met, he persuaded him to leave his Army, and to accompany him to the place, where he might see and discourse with his King: The Indian suffering himself to be overcome by his importunity, attended Hernando; and to make the Journey more short, they cut off a great part of their way, by crossing over some snowy Mountains, where they had had all periſhed with cold, had they not been relieved by the Indians, and conducted to ſome warm caves, whereof there are many in that paſſage, which were hewen out of the Rocks for reception of Travellers.

The Spaniards not having been acquainted with the ruggedneſs of the ways, had not provided themſelves with Shoes for their Horſes, nor Smiths to nail them; for want of which their Horſes had ſuffered much, had not the Indians melted ſome of their Gold and Silver, and therewith forged Shoes of Gold, inſtead of Iron, for the uſe of their Horſes. Gomara at the end of the 114th Chapter of his Book, mentions this paſſage in theſe words; For want of Iron, ſome ſhod their Horſes with Silver, and ſome with Gold.

After many ſuch difficulties and hardſhips as theſe, Hernando Piçarro and Challcuchima arrived in Caſſamarca; where Challcuchima being about to enter into the place where the Inca remained, and having firſt put off his Shoes, and taken ſomething on his ſhoulders in token of ſervitude, he with much tenderneſs burſt out into tears ſo ſoon as he ſaw his King in Chains, and laden with Iron, attributing his Impriſonment by the Spaniards to his own default and abſence. But the Inca replied, that his abſence was not to be blamed, nor could any other cauſe be aſſigned hereof, than onely the Decree of the Pachacamac, of which many Prophecies and Prognoſtications had for many years paſt preceded, foretelling their Invaſion by new and unknown Nations, who ſhould deſtroy their Religion, and ſubvert their Empire; as his Father Huayna Capac had foretold at the hour of his Death. And for better aſſurance of the truth hereof, ſo ſoon as he was taken, he ſent to Cozco to conſult with his Father the Sun, and with the other Oracles, which reſolved Queſtions and Demands in his Kingdom, and particularly with the prating Idol in the Valley of Rimac, which notwithſtanding its former readineſs of ſpeech was become ſilent; and what was moſt to be admired, was, that the hidden Oracle in the Temple of Pachacamac, which had undertaken on all occaſions to anſwer the doubts and queſtions which were made concerning the ſucceſſes of Kings and great Men, was alſo become dumb, and made no anſwers. And though it was told to that Oracle that their Inca was held in Chains, and was conjured by them to adviſe a remedy for his releaſe, he became deaf and ſilent: And moreover the Prieſts, and ſuch as formerly entertained free and familiar diſcourſes with the other Oracles, reported, that they were not able to obtain an anſwer, or ſcrew out the leaſt word from them; for which cauſe Atahualpa ſaid, that he was greatly troubled and diſtracted in his thoughts, fearing, leſt his Father the Sun had abſolutely abandoned him; for otherwiſe he would not have tied up the mouths of his Idols on a ſudden, which he had formerly cauſed to be free and familiar with devout perſons, not ſuffering them to adviſe, and yield them comfort in their ultimate diſtreſs: All which were certain and unevitable ſignals of their approaching miſery, and alienation of their Empire. Theſe and ſuch ſad apprehenſions Atahualpa uttered with extreme grief of heart to his General Challcuchima in the Priſon where he was, beginning then to feel the pangs of conſcience for his Treaſon and Rebellion againſt Huaſcar; in reward of which, and of all other the Tyrannies and Cruelties he had committed againſt him and his family, he confeſſed himſelf to be now juſtly puniſhed with the like troubles and anguiſh in his own Soul.

CHAP. XXX.

How the Devils of Peru were ſtrook dumb by the Sacraments of the Holy Mother the Church of Rome.

IT is moſt certainly true, that ſo ſoon as the Sacraments of our Holy Mother the Church of Rome were brought into Peru, namely the Conſecration of the Hoſt, or of the Body and Bloud of Chriſt our Lord, as is performed in the Maſs, and celebrated on ſuch days as the Spaniards had time and leiſure to hear it; and that ſome Indians, who had entered themſelves into the Service of Spaniards, received the Sacrament of Baptiſm; and that likewiſe the Sacraments of Marriage and Penance were practiſed; ſo ſoon, I ſay, as theſe four Holy Myſteries were made known, and appeared, (for the other three were not as yet introduced into thoſe Countries) the Devils became dumb and ſilent, and loſt that familiar diſcourſe and converſation in publick which (as we have ſaid) they formerly uſed and practiſed with thoſe Gentiles, onely they whiſpered ſometimes in ſecret, with the famous Magicians, who were ſaid to have a greater power and influence upon them. And though at firſt the party of Huaſcar gave out, that this ſullen reſervedneſs and ſilence of the Oracles was cauſed by the anger and diſpleaſure of the Sun for the tyrannies and cruelties committed by Atahualpa; yet at length they were convinced of a more over-ruling cauſe, which affected the Indians with a general fear and conſternation, believing that the entrance of theſe new Gueſts into their Countrey, had over-awed and ſilenced their Oracles: the which opinion ſerved to augment the dread and reverence they had of the Spaniards, and confirm the Name which they gave them of Viracocha, who is the God eſpecially adored by them, and held in more eſteem and worſhip, than all their petty Huacas; of which we have already given a more large relation.

CHAP. XXXI.

Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, having travelled above a hundred Leagues, came at length to Sauſa, where the Captains of Atahualpa held Huaſcar in impriſonment; of which the Spaniards being informed, they deſired to ſee him; and the Inca being in like manner deſirous thereof, though he was kept under cloſe cuſtody, yet at length they obtained admiſſion: What diſcourſe paſſed between them at that time, was not well underſtood for want of an Interpreter; nor could they expreſs themſelves in any other manner, than by ſigns. Onely afterwards it was reported, That Huaſcar being informed by the Indians, that the principal deſign of the Spaniards was to doe juſtice, and to relieve Men under oppreſſion and violence, which pretence (as the Spaniſh Writers affirm) was always in a ſpecious manner publiſhed by the Spaniards from the time of their firſt Invaſion of thoſe Countries, and which at all times they boaſted in purſuance of the Commands of his Majeſty, who enjoyned them to hurt none, and to render unto every one his due: Of which (as we ſay) Huaſcar being aſſured, he with more aſſurance of redreſs, complained of the tyranny, cruelty and injuſtice, which he had received from his Brother Atahualpa, who not content to deſpoil him and his Heirs of his Kingdom and Dominions, reſolved to bereave him of his life, and to that end had impriſoned him under ſtrict and watchfull Guards: Wherefore with all earneſtneſs he conjured them, not to abandon and leave him in that condition, but to take him with them out of the hands of that Guard, which deſigned (ſo ſoon as they were departed) to put him to death. And whereas they had publiſhed and made known unto all perſons, that their intentions were to eaſe and relieve the oppreſſed, he was well aſſured, that ſo ſoon as they had received true information from the Captain-General of the juſtice of his cauſe, they would reſtore him again to his Liberty and Kingdom: Upon which condition he promiſed them not onely to fill the Chamber with Veſſels of Gold and Silver unto the line drawn by his Brother, but that he would raiſe and pile them up unto the very ceiling; for the performance of which, he eſteemed himſelf much more able than his Brother; in regard that he was well acquainted with the places where ſecret Treaſures of his Father were concealed, and where his Anceſtours had amaſſed immenſe Sums and Riches, which his Brother would have embezled, and much diminiſhed, to build Temples and Altars for accompliſhment of his Vows; in which he had been ſo profuſe, that he was become poor, and unable to comply with the Ranſome which he had promiſed. In anſwer whereunto, Hernando de Soto, and Peter del Barco, gave him to underſtand by ſigns, that in obedience to the Command of their Captain-General, they were obliged to proceed as far as Cozco, and for that reaſon could not ſtay with him, but at their return they would perform whatſoever might tend to his ſervice and advantage: After which they departed, leaving poor Huaſcar more ſad and diſconſolate than before; for having once entertained ſome hopes and expectation of relief by their coming, he became abſolutely deſperate, and deſponding of life and comfort; believing, as it afterwards happened, that their viſit and diſcourſe was a prelude to his death.

CHAP. XXXII.

How these two Spaniards arrived at Cozco, where they found Crosses in the Temples and Royal Palaces.

THese two Companions proceeding on their Journey towards Cozco, arrived on the high Promontory of Carmenca, from whence they took a survey of the Imperial City, and much admired the neighbouring Towns and Villages which encompassed, or were adjoyning to it. The people coming forth to meet them, received them with joy and mirth, with Musick and Dances, erecting Triumphal Arches in the ways, crowned with Flowers and Garlands, and strowing the streets with Rushes, and lodged them in those Royal Apartments, which were called Amarucancha, belonging to Huayna Capac; for being in their estimation persons of Divine Race, they allotted those Chambers for them, which appertained to their greatest and most beloved King. At the entrance thereunto was a very fair Tower, being four Stories high, each of which had a cieling of Timber, in such manner as covered the Royal Chambers, and which were so lofty, that to speak in compass, the Turret above was as high as any Spire in Spain, unless that of Seville. The top thereof was in form of a Globe, as were all the Chambers; and above all, in the place of a Weather-cock or Vayne, (which the Indians did not understand) they had erected a Ball, which added much to the height, and was so large, that the hollow of it contained above sixty Foot in compass, called by them Sunturhuaci, which signifies as much as the rare piece of Architecture, there being no other building adjoyning thereunto to support or hide it. In my time it was thrown down or demolished, to make the Market-place more large and airy; though the truth is, it took not up much place, and now in lieu thereof the Jesuits have erected a high Coloseo, or Pyramid, as we have mentioned in the first Part of this History. The next day after the Spaniards arrived, the Indians carried them in several Palanchines, or Seats, placed on Mens shoulders to see and view the City; and as they passed, the people adored and worshipped them after the manner of their Gentilism and Religion. Nor were the Spaniards less surprized to see the Majesty of Cozco, with the Grandeur and Riches of the Palaces and Temples; which though much defaced, and despoiled of their ancient beauty, by reason of the late Wars between the Incas, and the Imprisonment of Huascar, yet they could not but much admire the excellent Architecture of the Royal Palaces, which were built without those Instruments and Engines, which are necessary for the erecting such mighty Fabricks: But above all, they were much pleased with the rare Pavements, which were curiously in-layed with divers Figures on each side of the stream, which runs for above a quarter of a League through the City; and the multitude of people, and the numbers of Merchants (though the Commodities not many) were so great, as much pleased them to behold; especially observing the gentile behaviour of the Nobles, and the courtesie of the Commonalty, who were all desirous to serve them, and gain their favour; and had it not been for the late Wars between the two Brothers, all things would certainly have appeared in much more beauty and splendour: But above all, they much admired to see Crosses erected on the top of the high Pinnacles of their Temples and Palaces; the which, it seems, were introduced from the time onely that Pedro de Candia being in Tumpiz charmed, or made tame those wild Beasts which were let loose to devour him, and which onely by virtue of the Cross which he held in his hand became gentle and domestick: All which was recounted with such admiration by the Indians, who carried the news of this Miracle unto Cozco, that when the Inhabitants of the City had understood it, they went immediately to their Sanctuary, where a Cross of Jaspar-stone, as clear as Chrystal, remained, as we have before mentioned; which when they had brought forth, they with loud Acclamations adored and worshipped it, conceiving that though the Sign of the Croſs had for many Ages been conſerved by them in high eſteem and veneration, yet it was not entertained with ſuch devotion as it deſerved, becauſe they were not as yet acquainted with its virtues. Wherefore now with ſtronger aſſurance believing, that as the Sign of the Croſs had tamed, and ſhut the mouth of the wild Beaſts, ſo as that they could not hurt Pedro de Candia; ſo alſo they imagined, that it had a like power to deliver them out of the hands of theſe New-come Gueſts: On which conſideration having adored the Croſs, they erected ſeveral of them in their Temples, and in the Royal Palaces, like Tutelar Gods to defend their Kingdom from the violence of Enemies.

Whence it is to be noted, that theſe Gentiles who were Idolaters, did entirely, and with an implicit faith, devote themſelves to the Croſs, and therewith to the belief of the whole Chriſtian Doctrine before the Goſpel was preached to them. It is moſt certain, that after the Death of Huayna Capac (as we have mentioned at the end of his Reign) the Indians remained in great fear and conſternation, apprehending that the time approached in which their Idolatrous Religion was to be at an end, and therewith their Empire, Greatneſs and Dominion was to expire. And though many years paſt many Predictions were uttered of this nature by their Southſayers and Magicians, the which were confirmed by their Oracles, and divers Prodigies; yet they were delivered in ſuch obſcure terms, that nothing was clear, or intelligible, from thence, untill ſuch time as Huayna Capac, by I know not what Spirit, explained and interpreted thoſe Prophecies with ſuch clearneſs, as evidently pointed at the coming of the Spaniards, and the propagation of the Goſpel, declaring that the Empire of Peru was to end with his Life. And this is the true reaſon why the Indians adored and worſhipped the Spaniards for Gods, with ſuch humility and ſubmiſſion, as we have declared, being certainly aſſured, that theſe were the people in whom the Prophecy of their King was to be accompliſhed.

Of all theſe matters Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, gave due intelligence to their Captain-General, with farther information of the incredible Riches found in that City, which were beyond all imagination, as alſo of the kind treatment, duty and reſpect, which they had received from the Indians, by virtue of that Edict and Command which Atahualpa had cauſed to be proclaimed in all parts of his Dominions in favour of the Spaniards. In like manner the other four Spies, or Diſcoverers, which were ſent into other parts, diſpatched their Informations of all things they had ſeen, and which had happened to them. All which news declaring the immenſe Riches, and the adoration which was paid to their Companions, the other Spaniards received with great joy and ſatisfaction: But as to the Prophecies of Huayna Capac, they eſteemed them for no other than Witchcrafts and Sorceries of the Indians, of which they made no account or eſteem.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of the Subtilty of Atahualpa, and the Death of the King Huaſcar Inca.

Auguſtin de Carate having related the Diſcourſe which Huaſcar Inca had entertained with Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, (which was the ſame that we have already related) and how they had left him in a ſad and deſpairing condition, he farther proceeds in the ſixth Chapter of his ſecond Book in this manner.

" And ſo (ſays he) they proceeded on their Journey, which was the cauſe of " the Death of Huaſcar, and the loſs of all that Gold which he had promiſed; for " the Captains to whoſe Cuſtody he was committed, immediately gave intelli- " gence to Atabaliba by the Poſt, of all that had paſſed; which when he had " well conſidered, and that if once the Injuſtice which he had done to his Bro- " ther ſhould come to the knowledge of the Spaniſh Governour, together with " the Promiſes and Intimation which Huaſcar had given of a greater abundance of " Gold than he could engage for; he greatly feared that his offers would be ſo " prevalent with the Chriſtians, (whom he obſerved to be covetous and thirſty " of Gold,) that they would not onely take the Kingdom from him, and tranſ- " fer it to his Brother, but, to free themſelves from all other troubles of competi- " tion, might alſo deprive him of his Life, for which they had ſo juſt an occaſion " on the ſcore of his Brother, whoſe Kingdom he had traiterouſly uſurped, with " the Death and Slaughter of all his Kindred; for which reaſon he reſolved to " kill Huaſcar: But in regard he feared to commit that Murther, becauſe he had " heard the Chriſtians frequently ſay, that one of their principal Laws was, That " he who ſhed Man's Bloud, by Man ſhould his Bloud be ſpilt; he therefore, " before he would enter upon this Attempt, thought fit to try the Mind of the " Spaniſh Governour, in what manner he would be concerned for an Act of this " nature. To perform which with the more Subtilty and Diſſimulation, he " feigned himſelf one day to be very ſad and dejected, weeping, and ſighing, and " refuſing to eat, or ſpeak. And though the Spaniſh Governour was very im- " portunate to know the cauſe and reaſon of his Melancholy, at length with much " adoe he made Anſwer, that he had received information, how that one of his " Captains had killed his Brother Huaſcar, in the Hands of thoſe to whoſe " Cuſtody he had committed him; the which he deeply reſented, for that he " was his Elder Brother, and his Father; and though he detained him a Priſo- " ner, and under reſtraint, yet it was not with any intention to doe him hurt, " but onely to ſecure him in ſuch a capacity, as might diſenable him from " making any Attempts on his Kingdom of Quitu, which did not at all ap- " pertain unto him; for that Province having been obtained by his Father's Con- " queſts, was conferred and bequeathed by Teſtament to himſelf, being no part " of the Inheritance which belonged to the Elder Son. In Anſwer hereunto the " Governour bid him be of good chear and comfort, for that Death was natural " and common to all; and that ſo ſoon as the Countrey was quiet and ſettled, he " would enquire into this Murther, and puniſh thoſe who ſhould be found guilty " of that great Crime. Atabaliba obſerving that Marquis Piçarro was little con- " cerned for the matter, reſolved to kill his Brother, and accordingly his Com- " mands were put into Execution with ſuch ſpeed, that it was hard to diſtinguiſh " whether Huaſcar was put to Death before or after the time that he teſtified his " Sorrow in preſence of Piçarro. The fault of this unhappy accident is common- " ly objected againſt Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco; for that they being " Souldiers, ought not to have been ignorant of the Duty and Reſpect they owe " to the Commands of their General, which are not to be diſpenſed with on any

pretence

" pretence or occaſion whatſoever, without expreſs Order to the contrary. The " Indians report, that when Huaſcar ſaw that there was no remedy, but that he " muſt dye, he uttered theſe Words with great paſſion. I have been Lord of this " Countrey but for a ſhort time, but as to my Brother that Traitor, by whoſe Command, I " that am his natural Lord, am put to death, he ſhall enjoy his Government for a much " ſhorter time than I have done. Wherefore when the Indians had heard that Atabaliba was afterwards put to death, (as ſhall be related in the following Chapter,) " they believed Huaſcar to have been of the true and legitimate Progeny of " the Sun, who had illuminated him with a prophetick Spirit, touching the Fate " of his Brother. And likewiſe Huaſcar farther declared, that when his Father " gave him his laſt farewell, he enjoyned and commanded him, That when a " People, or Nation, which were white, and had beards, ſhould invade his Do- " minions, that he ſhould labour to make a friendſhip with them, for that they " were to become Lords of that Kingdom. Thus far are the Words of Auguſtine Carate.

For my part, when I find the Spaniſh Writers to relate things fairly, and with the truth, and gravity of Hiſtory, I am more pleaſed to make uſe of their words verbatim, than my own; for as I am an Indian, and not a Spaniard, their words and expreſſions muſt be more proper than mine; the which Rule we ſhall always obſerve, unleſs it be where the Spaniſh Hiſtories are defective, and want Additions.

But to return unto the Relation which Auguſtin de Carate hath given; It is to be noted, that he briefly touches many particulars, which we have more at large related in this our Hiſtory, as namely, that which concerns the Tyranny, the Craft and Diſſimulation of Atahualpa, when he proved the Mind of Francis Piçarro, how, and in what manner he would take the Death of Huaſcar; for in reality had the Spaniard been as wary and as ſagacious as was this Indian, and had preſently replied upon him, and told him plainly, that I know, and am well aſſured, that it was you that killed this Perſon, and that therefore I ſhall inflict ſuch puniſhment on you as your Crime deſerves; it is moſt certain, that he would then have been better adviſed, and never have adventured on this Murther of his Brother; but when on the contrary, he perceived an indifferency in the Governour, who little ſuſpected ſo much evil in a perſon of that ſimplicity; he then took courage and reſolution to put his wicked Intention into practice againſt the Inca his natural King; which conſummated all his other cruelties; Nor did he onely put him to Death, but killed him barbarouſly, cutting his Fleſh into ſlices, and throwing them none knows where; but the Indians report, and believe, that they ate his Fleſh out of mere rage and malice againſt him. Acoſta ſaith that they burnt him. And Carate mentions, that the diligence and ſpeed, uſed in ſending the Diſpatches for his Death, were not by the Poſts, but by Fires or Beacons, which the Chaſquis, or Poſtmaſters, were ordered to make both by night and day, for greater expedition, when any matter required extraordinary haſte. In like manner this Authour touches on the Prognoſtication which Huayna Capac had left, concerning the Invaſion which the Spaniards were to make into thoſe Countries, and of which they were to become Maſters. He alſo farther proceeds, and tells us, that Hernando de Soto and Peter del Barco were not blameable for not remaining with Huaſcar, as he deſired, and for not hearkening to the propoſition he had made to them, which imported three times the Treaſure, which his Brother had promiſed, becauſe in reality they did not underſtand him; for otherwiſe no doubt, but thoſe Men, whoſe buſineſs was neither Conqueſt, nor their Embaſſy matter of War or Peace, but onely to ſee that the Promiſe made by Atahualpa for his ranſome, were complied with, would have readily embraced the more advantageous Offer of three times the value made by Huaſcar. And thus theſe two Spaniards excuſe and clear themſelves from what was objected againſt them, touching the Death of Huaſcar.

Thus this unhappy Inca, the laſt of the Monarchs of that Empire fell and ended his Days, having been a Spectator of all thoſe Cruelties and Murthers which his Brother had exerciſed upon his Vaſſals, Servants, Uncles, Brothers and Sons; and as to his own Perſon, had been uſed with ſuch Hardſhips and Severity in Priſon, as were inſupportable, and which Diego Fernandez relates to have been in this manner:

" The two Captains of Atabalipa returning to their Lord, carried Huaſcar Priſo-
" ner with them; to whom in their Journey they gave nothing but Urine to " drink, and no other Food to eat than Worms, and other filthineſs. Whilſt
" theſe things paſſed, Francis Piçarro, with other Chriſtians his Companions, en-
" tred the Countrey, and took Atabalipa Priſoner in Caxamal. Thus far are the Words of this Authour, who, in another place, ſays that they killed Huaſcar in Andamarca, and Atabalipa in Caxamarca, that is Caſſamarca, which is the Countrey or Province of Froſt, for Caſſa ſignifies Froſt, and Marca a Countrey; likewiſe Andamarca ought to be wrote Anta Marca, for Anta ſignifies Copper, and Anta Marca the Copper Countrey.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Don Diego de Almagro comes to Caſſamarca; and what Fears and Apprehenſions Atahualpa conceived before his Death, by Comets and Apparitions in the Heavens.

After the Death of poor Huaſcar, which happened in the manner as before related, Atahualpa did neither thereby obtain the liberty of his Perſon, nor ſecure his Life; but on the contrary, in a few days afterwards, orders were given to put him to death, the manner of which is related by Auguſtin de Carate, and Lopez de Gomara, both which agree in the particulars of this paſſage, as they doe in other matters of this Hiſtory.

Heaven often puniſhes thoſe who truſt more in their own Plots and Artifices, than in the ways of Reaſon and Juſtice; for God ſuffers their Miſchiefs and Contrivances to fall upon their own Heads, an Inſtance of which we ſhall ſpeedily give in the ſequel of this Hiſtory. For now we muſt know, That Don Diego de Almagro was departed from Panama, on a very good Ship, carrying with him freſh Men, and good Supplies, in order to a farther Conqueſt; and his Enemies report, that his Deſign was to advance farther to the Southward than Piçarro, whoſe Government, as yet, was not extended more than two hundred Leagues to the South, from the Equinoctial Line; and that he intended to ſet up for himſelf, and act on his own Foundation; the which, as is reported, was diſcovered by the Secretary of Almagro to Piçarro, whom his Maſter hanged for his Treachery. But be it as it will, this is certain, that Almagro being on his way, and receiving intelligence of the Impriſonment of Atahualpa, and of the incredible Riches which he offered for his Ranſome, reſolved to change his Deſign, and to join himſelf with his victorious Companion; for that according to Articles of Agreement between them, one half of the Benefits and Profits appertained unto him. Accordingly Almagro, with his Souldiers, arrived in Caſſamarca, greatly wondring to ſee thoſe heaps of Gold and Silver which they had amaſſed together. But in a ſhort time afterwards the Souldiers of Piçarro plainly told the People of Almagro, that in regard they had not been preſent at the taking of Atahualpa Priſoner, no ſhare of thoſe Riches and Spoils belonged to them, which were already gained, nor no part of that which was wanting to reach the Line which Atahualpa had drawn, and promiſed in payment of his Ranſome. Which when the Almagrians had heard, and conſidering the largeneſs of the room, believed that if all the Gold and Silver of the World were amaſſed together, it would never arrive or reach to the height of the Line, they preſently cried out, that the Inca ſhould be killed, ſo that they might receive their ſhare of what ſhould be collected after his Death. Theſe and the like reaſons were ſufficient to arraign and execute this great Prince Atahualpa, who obſerving the Quarrels amongſt the Spaniards, and their inceſſant noiſe, and wranglings, he

he ſadly ſuſpected that the Fury of thoſe Jars would at laſt turn to his deſtruction; the which Fear and Apprehenſion was increaſed by the Oracles, which were now become ſilent to all his Queſtions and Demands, and by the reports which the Indians gave him of new Stars, and Comets, which appeared, all which, in times of leſs Extremity than the preſent, were ever interpreted as bad Omens, and ſignals, and, according to their ſuperſtitious Obſervations, were eſteemed to portend utter Deſtruction and Ruine.

But that which above all things appeared fatal to him, was a certain great Comet of a darkiſh green colour, little leſs in breadth than the Body of a Man, and of a yard in length, which ſhewed it ſelf at night, being much of the ſame ſize and ſhape as that which appeared before the Death of his Father Huayna Capac, of which when Atahualpa had notice given him, he was extremely troubled, and deſired the Spaniards to give him the leave and liberty to be brought forth, that he might ſee it with his own Eyes; which when he had done, he was ſo ſtruck with ſadneſs and melancholy, that, as formerly, he became ſullen and ſilent, and would entertain no converſe with any Perſon whatſoever; the reaſon of which, when Piçarro had preſſed very earneſtly to know, Atahualpa to ſatisfie him gave him this Anſwer. Apu, ſaid he, (which is General) I am now aſſured that the time of my Death approaches, being certified thereof by the appearance of this Comet, for that another of the like nature with this ſhewed it ſelf not many days before the death of my Father; and in regard that ſuch Prodigies in the Heavens do always precede the Death of Kings, and portend nothing but Calamities, and the Subverſion of Empires, I cannot but imagine my ſelf concerned, being to leave my Kingdoms before I have enjoyed them. Indeed when I ſaw my ſelf firſt in Chains, I thought there would be little diſtance between my Impriſonment and my Grave, of which I am now fully certified by this Comet; and now I have given you the real Cauſe of this my ſadneſs.

The Governour, to comfort him, bid him be of good courage, and not to truſt or confide in ſuch ſignals, to which no Credit was to be given; for that on the contrary he might ſhortly expect to be freed from his impriſonment, and reſtored to his Kingdom. Howſoever Atahualpa, whoſe Faith was placed in the ſuperſtition of his Gentiliſm, gave no belief to the aſſurance of Piçarro, but remained in his Dumps, and diſconſolate as before. Peter de Cieça, in the 65th Chapter of his Book, mentions the ſame concerning this Comet, and tells us how ſuperſtitious thoſe Indians were in theſe Aſtrological Obſervations.

Atahualpa giving entire credit to theſe Preſages, wholly ſunk in his Courage, and deſpaired of his Liberty, not being able to put the thoughts of Death out of his mind; the which accordingly happened fifteen days after the appearance of the Comet, as Cieça confirms in the aforeſaid Chapter.

Hernando Piçarro returns to Spain, to give an Account of what had ſucceeded in Peru.

THE Governour, Don Franciſco Piçarro, not regarding the fears and apprehenſions of Atahualpa, was elated in his Hopes and Expectations, by thoſe favours which good fortune had caſt upon him; and reſolving to follow and improve his ſucceſs, he judged it convenient and neceſſary to render an account to His Majeſty of all matters, which unto that time had occurred in Peru; the which Intention being moved to Almagro, his Companion, and his Brothers, it was agreed by them to diſpatch Hernando Piçarro into Spain, with Advices to His Majeſty of what had happened, that ſo their Services might be rewarded according to their Merit. And in regard Hernando Piçarro was employed as a publick Perſon in behalf of the Commonalty, or the whole Company, it was ordered that ſo much ſhould be taken out of the heaps which were already collected for the Ranſome of Atahualpa, as would ſerve to defray his Charges; and moreover that he ſhould carry with him the value of two hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight in Gold, and one hundred thouſand in Silver, for that fifth part which appertained to the King, on account of the Ranſome of Atahualpa; the which Gold and Silver were as the firſt Fruits, and as an earneſt of that Treaſure and Riches which they have already, and are yet to carry from my Countrey to His Majeſty. The Silver, as Auguſtin Carate reports, was carried in pieces of maſſy Plate, a Relation of which he gives in theſe Words:

" They agreed (ſaid he) to ſend Hernando Piçarro to give a Narrative to His " Majeſty of their proſperous Succeſſes, which had occurred untill that time; but " whereas as yet they could not make a juſt computation of what ſhare His Ma- " jeſty was to receive out of the Collections already made, they took from their " Heaps the value of two hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight in Gold, and twenty " thouſand Marks in Silver; for which they choſe the moſt fair and weighty " Pieces of Plate, for the better ſhow and appearance in Spain. All which were " weighed out, and the Jars, Pans, Figures of Men, and Women, and Sheep, " were all caſt into the Scale to make up the full weight and value already men- " tioned. With this Prize Hernando Piçarro embarked, to the great grief of Ata- " baliba, who had a great kindneſs for him, and entertained ſuch confidence in " him, that he freely communicated all his thoughts to him, wherefore at his de- " parture he ſaid to him: And do you go, Captain, I am troubled for it at my very heart, " for when you are gone, I am ſure that fat Fellow, and that blind Raſcal, will ſoon make " an end of me; meaning Almagro, who, as we ſaid before, was blind of one Eye, " and Alonſo Requelme, His Majeſty's Treaſurer, whom he had obſerved to mur- " mur and quarrell about him on the occaſion before related. And ſo indeed, " it happened, for no ſooner was Hernando departed, than that immediately " they contrived his Death by means of their Interpreter Philipillio, who was " an Indian, &c. And Gomara confirms what we ſhall more at large here- after relate, That Hernando Piçarro carried the fifth part of what appertained to His Majeſty on account of the Ranſome of Atahualpa, and he farther adds theſe Words.

" The Truth of what paſſed is this: Hernando Piçarro carried no more with " him from Caſſamarca than what is before mentioned; but ſoon after his depar- " ture followed the Death of Atabaliba, and then a Dividend was made of his " Ranſome; untill which time his Execution was rather deferred, than his Life

" granted, or Freedom intended. Afterwards ſixty of theſe Adventurers retur" ned into Spain, having made a Diviſion of their Spoils, which amounted to " forty or fifty thouſand Pieces of Eight a Man, beſides the fifth which appertai-
" ned to His Majeſty. Theſe Perſons departed after Hernando Piçarro, and over" took him at Nombre de Dios, where they embarked, and returned altogether in " company to Spain. Thus we ſee how all Authours agree together in the ſame Relation of this matter.

Soon after the Departure of Hernando Piçarro, Hernando de Soto and Pedro del Barco returned from Cozcō, giving a Report of the Riches which they had ſeen in that City, as alſo in the Temples of the Sun, and in the Palaces of the late Kings, in the Fortreſs, and in the Sanctuaries, and private Cells, where the Devil entertained Diſcourſes with their Wizards, Prieſts, and others his Votaries; all which places being eſteemed ſacred, were adorned with Gold and Silver; the like report was alſo brought by the other four Diſcoverers. The Spaniards being highly pleaſed with this News, were impatient untill they could take poſſeſſion of theſe Treaſures; which that they might haſten with the more convenience and ſecurity, they ſpeedily determined the Death of Atahualpa, to prevent the inſurrections of the People, that with the more eaſe, and with the leaſt oppoſition, they might ſeize the Gold and Silver which was lodged in the Imperial City, and in other parts. Both the aforeſaid Authours agree in all the material circumſtances relating to the Death of Atahualpa; wherefore we ſhall repeat the very Words of Lopez de Gomara, ſpecified in the 119th Chapter of his Book, the Title of which is as followeth.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of the Death of Atahualpa; and how he was arraigned by Juſtice, and upon the falſe Information and Teſtimony which was given againſt him.

THE Death of Atabaliba was forwarded by a means, the leaſt expected, for " Philipilio, the Interpreter, falling in love with one of the Wives of Ata-
" baliba, whom he intended to marry, after he was dead, raiſed a report, that " Atabaliba had ſecretly, and under hand, given order to raiſe Men, whereby " to overcome the Chriſtians, and free himſelf. So ſoon as this report came " to be ſpread, and noiſed amongſt the Spaniards, their Jealouſie created a Be" lief; ſo that ſome cried out to have him killed, for ſecurity of their own Lives,
" and of thoſe Kingdoms; others were of opinion, that they ſhould not imbrue
" their Hands in the Bloud of ſo great a Prince, though never ſo faulty, but ra" ther that they ſhould ſend him to the Emperour: This certainly had been the
" beſt courſe, but the other prevailed by means (as ſome report) of that party " which came with Almagro; for they conceiving that no ſhare of the Spoil " would appertain unto them, during the Life of Atabaliba, and untill the condi" tions were complied with, which, according to Agreement, were made for his
" ranſome; and Piçarro being alſo of opinion, that his Death would free the Spa- " niards of much trouble, and render the Conqueſt and Poſſeſſion of the Countrey " much more eaſie, a reſolution was taken by general conſent to put him to " Death. In order to which, that things might appear with a better face of Ju-
" ſtice, an Endictment was brought againſt him for the Murther of his Brother Huaſcar

" Huaſcar, King of thoſe Countries, and for deſigning to raiſe War againſt the " Spaniards; though this laſt was a falſe and malitious ſuggeſtion of Philipillio, who " brought the Indians for Witneſſes, making them to ſay what he pleaſed; and " in regard the Spaniards underſtood not the Language, whereby to croſs exa- " mine the Witneſſes, all that Philipillio alledged paſſed for current, and good " Teſtimony; howſoever Atabaliba ſtifly denied it, ſaying, That ſuch an Accu- " ſation could have no ground of Reaſon in it, conſidering that he remai- " ned under ſuch Guards, and Chains, that it was impoſſible for him to make " an eſcape; wherefore he perſiſted in his Denial, threatning Philipillio, and " deſiring the Spaniards to give no credence to his Words. After Sentence of " Death was paſſed upon him, he complained much of Franciſco Piçarro, for " that having promiſed him his Life upon payment of the Ranſome agreed, " he afterwards faltered with him, and put him to Death. Wherefore he " earneſtly intreated him rather to tranſport him into Spain, than to imbrue " his Hands in the Bloud of a Perſon who had never offended him, but " rather enriched him, and done him good. As they carried him to Exe- " cution, thoſe who attended to comfort him, adviſed him to deſire Bap- " tiſm before he dyed, for that without that they threatned to burn him " alive: Whereupon being baptized, he was bound to a Poſt; and there " ſtrangled. His Burial was celebrated according to the Manner and Rites of " Chriſtians, Piçarro alſo put himſelf into mourning, and performed his Fu- " nerals with Pomp, and Solemnity. As to thoſe who were the cauſes of " his Death, Divine Vengeance overtook them for this ſin; ſo that in a " ſhort time afterwards they came all to unhappy ends, as will appear in the " ſequel of this Hiſtory. Thus Atabaliba dyed by a violent Death, before " which he ordered his Body to be carried to Quitu, and there buried a- " mongſt the Kings, his Anceſtours by the Mother's ſide. If the Baptiſm he " deſired was from his heart, moſt happy he, but if not, the Murthers and " Bloud he was guilty of will be ſet to his Account in the World to come. " He was naturally of a good Diſpoſition, wiſe, courageous, frank and open " hearted. He had many Wives, and left ſome Children: Though he uſur- " ped the Dominions of his Brother Huaſcar, yet he would never aſſume the " purple Wreath, or Diadem, untill he was impriſoned; nor would he ever " ſpit upon the Ground, but, for Majeſty and State, (when he had occa- " ſion) he would ſpit in the Hand of a principal Lady, whom he loved. " The Indians were in great admiration, when they heard of his untimely " Death, which they eſteemed for an accompliſhment of the Prophecy of " Huaſcar, who being of the true and legitimate Off-ſpring of the Sun, was " divinely inſpired to foretell the coming of his ſpeedy Fate. Thus far are the Words of Lopez de Gomara.

But to return now to the Remarks which this Authour makes on the ill Interpretation of this Philipillio, and how he ſuborned the Indian Witneſſes to teſtifie whatſoever he deſired; he concludes that the fault was chiefly his, in regard that the Spaniards wanting Language, could neither examine the matter, nor dive into the Truth of it. And hence we may collect what falſe and imperfect Notions he muſt have rendred to the Indians of the Catholick Faith: So that as for want of a true underſtanding of the Indian Language, Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, abandoned Huaſcar, and expoſed his Life to the ſubtilty of his Brother; ſo alſo Atabaliba dyed, and both theſe powerfull Kings incurred the ſame fate for want of true underſtanding, and faithfull Interpretation of all matters.

Atahualpa ordered his Body to be enterred in Quitu, amongſt the Relations of his Mother, rather than in Cozco, with the Anceſtours of his Father; for though the Funerals of Kings were much more pompous and ſtately in Cozco, than the Solemnities uſed by the Caciques in Quitu, yet conſidering how deteſtable his Memory would be to the People of Cozco, for the Cruelties and Murthers he had committed on their natural Kings, he believed that his Body would be abuſed, and his Aſhes never ſuffered quietly to repoſe in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtours; and for that reaſon he choſe rather to be buried amongſt his own People with obſcurity, than with greater Ornament and State by the angry and incenſed Citizens of Cozco. It is moſt certain that Atahualpa did not bind his Head with the coloured Wreath, untill he had taken his Brother Huaſcar Priſoner; for before that time that Enſign of Regality belonged to his Elder Brother, who was his Sovereign Lord; but after he was taken, and impriſoned by him, he then proclaimed himſelf for the univerſal Lord, and with his Dominions he uſurped all the Marks of Power which belonged to them, as we have before related.

But now to conſider that an Indian, who was an Idolater, and who had been guilty of ſuch horrible Cruelties, as Atahualpa had been, ſhould receive the Sacrament of Baptiſm at the hour of his Death, can be eſteemed no otherwiſe, than as an Effect of the infinite Mercy of God towards ſo great Sinners as he was, and I am. At his Baptiſm Atahualpa was named Don John. Blas Valera ſays, That Friar Vincent de Valverde laboured many days before his death to teach and inſtruct him in the Articles of the Catholick Faith; during which time the Inca finding himſelf in Priſon, and Chains, and without other Society or Attendance of Indians, excepting a Youth, who was his Kinſman, and permitted to ſerve him, he was ſtruck with ſuch a dump of Melancholy on his Spirits, that he remained almoſt inſenſible. Upon which the Spaniards brought him out of the Priſon, and called the principal Indians to his Aſſiſtance, who ſeeing their Lord in that condition, immediately ſent for their Chief Herbaliſts to eaſe and cure him. So ſoon as thoſe Phyſicians came, they felt his Pulſe, to diſcover the nature and force of his Fever; but not as our Doctours, who try the Pulſe at the Wriſt, but laid their Fingers on the top of the Noſtrils, and under the Eye-lids; after which they gave him a Drink, made of the juice of certain Herbs, of great Virtue; what they were, is not known, unleſs that onely which is called Payco. Moreover he ſaith, that this Drink put him into a violent ſweat, and cauſed a long and ſound ſleep; after which his Fever left him, and being returned again to his Senſes, he was carried back to Priſon. When warning was given him of his Death, he was commanded to receive Baptiſm, for without it they threatned to burn him alive, as they had done Huahutimoc at Mexico, who was King of that Empire; and to affright him into Baptiſm, the Pile of Wood was kindled, when they notified this Sentence to him. At length he ſaid that he was contented to be baptized, after which Proclamation being made of the Crimes for which he died, he was tied to a Poſt, and ſtrangled. In all which particulars the Spaniſh Hiſtorians agree, and alſo that he remained three months in Priſon.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the Information and Proceſs which was given in, and made againſt Atahualpa.

THE Trial of Atahualpa was long and ſolemn, though Gomara touches upon it in ſhort. But the manner was this:

The Governour himſelf was Lord Chief Juſtice of the Bench, and with him preſided Don Diego de Almagro, his Companion; the Clerk of the Court was Sancho de Cuellar; there was alſo an Attorney General appointed in behalf of the King, and Council allowed for Atahualpa; and others were aſſigned to bring in the Witneſſes, and take their Teſtimonies upon twelve ſeveral Interrogatories; there were alſo two other Judges named, to be Aſſiſtants, and give their opinions in the Caſe, whom, for reſpect, I think not fit to nominate, though they were ſufficiently known to me.

The firſt Interrogatory was this: Did you know Huayna Capac and his Wives? and how many had he? The 2d. Was Huaſcar Inca his lawfully begotten Sun and Heir of this Kingdom? and was Atahualpa illegitimate, and a Baſtard, and not Son of the King, but of ſome Indian of Quitu? The 3d. Had the Inca other Sons beſides thoſe before mentioned? The 4th. Did Atahualpa inherit this Empire by virtue of his Father's Teſtament, or did he uſurp it by Tyranny? The 5th. Was Huaſcar diſinherited of his Kingdom by his Father's Teſtament, or was he declared Heir? The 6th. Was Huaſcar ſtill living, or was he dead? or did he dye a natural Death, or was he killed by order of Atahualpa? and when was it, either before or ſince the coming of the Spaniards? The 7th. Was Atahualpa an Idolater? and did he command his Subjects to ſacrifice Men and Children? The 8th. Did Atahualpa raiſe unjuſt Wars? and was he guilty of the Bloud of much People? The 9th. Did Atahualpa entertain many Concubines? The 10th. Did Atahualpa receive the Tribute of the Empire ſince the Spaniards took the poſſeſſion of it? and did he conſume and embezle it? The 11th. Do you know that ſince the coming in of the Spaniards that Atahualpa hath given Preſents or Gifts out of the Royal Treaſury to his Kindred and Captains? and how, and in what manner hath he embezled and waſted the Wealth of the Publick? The 12th. Do you know that King Atahualpa hath ſince his Impriſonment treated with any Captains and Souldiers to rebell, and raiſe War againſt the Spaniards? and what Levies of Men, and what Preparations of Arms have been made for War? Upon theſe Interogatories they examined ten ſeveral Perſons; ſeven of which were Servants to the Spaniards, and three of them were not, that ſo they might not appear to be their Creatures; yet they all declared whatſoever Philipilio put into their Mouths, as Gomara affirms. Onely there was one Witneſs, who was none of the Servants belonging to the Spaniards, called Queſpe, who was Captain of a Company, being the laſt that was to be examined, ſuſpecting that the Interpreter would ſay ſomething which he had not teſtified, he, to prevent it, anſwered in ſhort, either in the Affirmative, or in the Negative, ſaying either Y, which is yes, or Manam, which is no. And leſt the Interpreter ſhould falſifie theſe Words, which were not well underſtood by the Perſons preſent, when he ſpake in the affirmative, he would nod with his Head two or three times, and when in the negative, he would ſhake with his Head and his Right-hand, at which the Judges much admired, being pleaſed with the ſubtilty of the Indian. Howſoever the Death of Atahualpa being determined, Sentence was paſſed upon him, and accordingly he was executed, as we have already declared, though many of them, as well ſuch as belonged to Piçarro, as thoſe who came with Almagro, who were of a generous Spirit, diſſented, and proteſted againſt the Fact. The Names of the moſt eminent amongſt them were Franciſco de Chaves, and Diego de Chaves, who were Brothers, and Natives of Truxillo, Franciſco de Fuentes, Pedro de Ayala, Diego de de Mora, Franciſco Moſcoſo, Hernando de Haro, Pedro de Mendoça, Juan de Herrada, and Alonſo de Avila, and Blas de Atiença, with many others; all which were of opinion, that it was not lawfull to put a King to death, who had treated them kindly, and had never done them any Injury; and if in caſe he were guilty of any Crime, they ſhould tranſport him into Spain, there to be tried by the Emperour, and not by themſelves, who had no Power or Juriſdiction over Kings. That they ſhould conſider the Honour of the Spaniſh Nation, which muſt greatly ſuffer in the Reputation of the World, and be branded with Tyranny and Cruelty, whenſoever it ſhould be objected againſt them, that they had put a King to death, during the time that they had given their Parole to the contrary, and were under Obligations of Treaty, and Articles, for his Ranſome, of which they had already received the greateſt part. That they ſhould be cautious how, and in what manner they ſtained their great Atchievements with an Act ſo foul and inhumane as this; that the fear of God ſhould reſtrain them, who, after ſo barbarous an Action, could not expect Bleſſings, or Succeſſes agreeable to their happy beginnings, but, on the contrary, Misfortunes, and Ruines, and an unhappy end to all thoſe who had a hand in this Wickedneſs. That it was not lawfull to put any Man to death, without hearing what he could ſay in his own Defence; that they appealed from their Sentence to the Emperour Charles the 5th. and in the mean time conſtituted Juan de Herrada Protectour of the Perſon of King Atahualpa. Theſe and many other particulars of this nature, they uttered not onely in Words, but alſo in Writing, ſolemnly proteſting before the Judges againſt this Fact, and againſt all the evils which might be the conſequences thereof. Nor were thoſe on the other ſide leſs bitter and violent againſt thoſe who favoured Atahualpa, calling them Traitors to the Royal Crown of Caſtile, and the Emperour their Sovereign, the augmentation and enlargement of whoſe Dominion, they had endeavoured to prevent. That by the death of this Tyrant they might ſecure their own Lives, and the entire Dominion of that whole Empire, all which by the contrary would run great danger and hazard. Of all which, and of the Mutinies which theſe Diſſenters cauſed, they would inform His Majeſty, that ſo he might diſtinguiſh between ſuch who were his loyal Subjects, and faithfull to his Service, and thoſe who were Traitors, and mutinous; and obſtructive to the enlargement of his Dominions. Thus were the Diſcords enflamed to ſuch a degree, that they had broken out into a Civil War, had not ſome more moderate Men, and leſs paſſionate, interpoſed between both Parties, and repreſented how deſtructive and fatal ſuch Differences might prove to both ſides, and to the ſucceſs of the Deſign in hand, in caſe that Chriſtians, on the ſcore of Infidels, ſhould enter into a Civil War. They moreover repreſented to thoſe who maintained the Cauſe of Atahualpa, that they ſhould conſider how they were no more than fifty in number, and inferiour to the contrary party, which conſiſted of three hundred and fifty; ſo that in caſe they ſhould pretend to decide the controverſie by Arms, the Iſſue would be their own deſtruction, and the loſs of that rich Kingdom, which now they might ſecure by the Death of this King. Theſe Reaſons and Conſiderations abated the Spirits of thoſe who protected Atahualpa, ſo that they concurred with the others in his Sentence of Death, which was accordingly executed.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of the Wit and Subtilty of Atahualpa; and of the Treasure which was collected towards his Ranſome.

Atahualpa (as we have ſaid) was of a quick and ready Underſtanding, an Inſtance whereof we have in this paſſage, which indeed haſtned his Death; for he obſerving the Spaniards to read and write, did believe that it was a Gift natural to them, and born with them, to try which he deſired a Spaniard, who came to viſit him, or that was one of his Guard, that he would write the Name of God on the Nail of his Thumb; the Souldier having vvrote, as he deſired, he asked three or four Souldiers, one after another, vvhat that Word meant, they all told him, that it vvas the name of God. At length Don Franciſco Piçarro came in, vvith vvhom after he had diſcourſed a vvhile, he asked him the meaning of thoſe Letters vvhich vvere vvrote on his Nail: Novv Piçarro not knovving either to vvrite or read, anſvvered that he could not tell, by vvhich he collected, that the knovvledge of Letters vvas acquired, and not natural; and from that time ever after he conceived a meaner eſteem of the Governour than before; for that (as vve have ſaid) the Incas, in their Moral Philoſophy, vvere taught, that the Royal Family, Nobles and Gentlemen, ought to exceed their Inferiours in knovvledge and Vertues, as appears in the Trial of Novitiates, (as vve have formerly related) vvho vvere to run through all Exerciſes and Hardſhips, vvhich might try and approve them; ſo vvhen Atahualpa had diſcovered the Ignorance of Piçarro, vvho being the Governour, and Chief, vvas, according to his Rule, to have excelled all his Inferiours in Learning and Vertues, he conceived a meaner Opinion of him, which when the Governour had obſerved, he grew angry and offended with him, which haſtened the Death of Atahualpa. This paſſage I have heard from thoſe who were then preſent, which may be a caution, and an advertiſement to Noble Perſons in the Education of their Sons; for that for want of Reading, and Writing, and a little Latin, they may fall into Diſgraces, and be ſubject to Affronts; though indeed in thoſe times ignorance was more excuſable than in this preſent age, which affords many Maſters in Spain, where all Sciences and Learning flouriſh, and where Noble-men value themſelves not more on their honourable Birth, than on their vertuous Education, which yields a Luſtre like pretious Stones enchaſed with Gold.

Another thing is reported of Atahualpa, for an Inſtance of his Wit and good Underſtand, which was this, that amongſt many other things, which the Spaniards brought to truck and barter with the Indians, or, as ſome ſay, wherewith to cheat them, there was one who had a Glaſs Cup, of the fineſt ſort of Metal, which was made at Venice. The Merchant of it hoping for a good Reward, preſented it to the King Atahualpa, who received it ſo kindly, that (though he was then a Priſoner) he ordered ten of his Cups of Gold, and Silver, to be given the Spaniard in return thereof. The Inca looking and admiring much the curioſity of the Workmanſhip, asked one that ſtood by, if any other beſides the Kings of Caſtile were ſerved in ſuch Veſſels; to which he that made the Anſwer, ſuppoſing that he meant the Glaſs, and not the Workmanſhip, replied, that not onely Kings and Nobles, but the Commonalty of Spain, made uſe of thoſe Glaſſes: which when Atahualpa heard, he let it fall from his Hands, ſaying, that things ſo common, were not worthy the eſteem of a King. At which Words of an Indian all Perſons then preſent did much admire.

Thus was Atahualpa put to Death by formal proceſs of Juſtice, (as is related) and before the quantity of Gold and Silver which he had promiſed for his Ranſome was fully completed, becauſe time was not given him to make due compliance; though ſome report, that they put him to death after he had paid the entire quantity: but whatſoever that was, the Spaniards divided to every Man his Share

Share, in the nature of Spoils taken in War. But what the value of this Ranſome was, Auguſtin de Carate, and Francis Lopez, who wrote in thoſe days, variouſly report. I ſuppoſe that their Errours were in the heap or maſs, I ſhall mention ſome particulars thereof, that we may make a better judgment of the whole matter. Carate, in the 7th Chapter of his ſecond Book, hath theſe preciſe Words. " There was due to His Majeſty for his Fifths, thirty thouſand Marks " of pure, fine Plate, wrought and emboſſed; and in Gold an hundred and " twenty Millions of Marks, &c. Gomara, in the 118th Chapter, ſaith, That Franciſco Piçarro, after he had made an Eſſay of the Gold and Silver, he cauſed them to be weighed, and found fifty two thouſand Marks in good Silver, and a million and three hundred and twenty ſix thouſand and five hundred weight or Ducats of Gold.

In caſe we compare theſe two Authours together, we ſhall find that Gomara comes ſhort of the Sum which Carate mentions, at leaſt one hundred thouſand Marks of Silver; becauſe that to make the King's Fifth to amount unto thirty thouſand Mark, the principal muſt conſiſt of one hundred and fifty thouſand, the like Errour, and much more, there is in the Gold; for whereas Carate ſaith, that His Majeſty's Fifth of the Gold amounted unto an hundred and twenty millions of Marks, which muſt be a plain Errour in the Print; for if according to the value we multiply every Mark of Gold at ſeventy two Ducats, the ſum will become ſo vaſt and immenſe, that there will ſcarce be numbers in Arithmetick ſufficient to contain the account. And if by Marks they mean Maravedis, the Errour will be as low on that ſide, as it was exceſſive in the other, becauſe an hundred and twenty millions of Maravedis make onely three hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats; which likewiſe is more evident, as will hereafter appear by the account of Diviſion, which theſe Authours make, in the ſhare and proportion which belonged to every ſingle Perſon out of the Ranſome of Atahualpa, whereby they make the value of the Gold, reduced into Silver, to amount unto ſeven hundred and eighty ſix thouſand and ſix hundred Ducats. According to which I am inclined to make out every Man's ſhare and proportion of Gold and Silver, rather than to follow an opinion of ſuch incredible Sums as are before mentioned. And herein I am more willing to give credit unto Carate (who was Accountant General) in ſuch Sums as he ſets down preciſely, than to the reports of Goers and Comers, who ſpeak at random: Onely as to the quantity of Silver which was divided, I follow that which Gomara relates, becauſe Carate is ſilent in that particular, as alſo in the proportions divided to each Captain, as appears by his Hiſtory; onely the ſhare which appertained to the General we have taken upon the information of thoſe who were preſent. Both Authours agree, that the Horſemen were ſixty in number, and the Foot, or Infantry, one hundred and fifty. Though Cieça de Leon, ſpeaking of Caſſamarca, where Atahualpa was impriſoned, ſaith, that thoſe who took him were ſixty Horſe, and an hundred Foot; in which report concerning the Foot, I rather follow this Authour than Gomara; for beſides that he was actually in Peru, when he wrote of theſe matters, I am alſo much more apt to keep within the compaſs of Accounts, and ſet down ten too little, rather than five too much.

Theſe Authours alſo differ much about the ſhares which every Souldier received; for to the Souldiers they allot ſix parts in Gold, and one in Silver; and to the Governour, and his Captains, and the People with Almagro, they give three parts in Gold, and one in Silver. Why in thoſe times the Gold ſo much exceeded the quantity of the Silver, (the contrary to which now appears in all parts of the World) the true Reaſon is this: Becauſe that the Incan Kings were always Maſters of more Gold than Silver, of which they made no other uſe than to adorn their Temples, and Royal Palaces, not eſteeming them in the place of Riches, or Treaſure. Moreover there was much more difficulty in digging Silver, than in finding Gold. For Silver, as we ſee in the Mines of Potoſi, is fetched from the Bowels of the Earth, into which they ſink ſometimes two hundred fathoms, as Acoſta reports in the 8th Chapter of his 4th Book, which ſuch as have the curioſity may read and learn with what incredible labour that Metal is extracted, for which cauſe the Incas would not exact their Tribute from the People in that Metal, but Gold is procured with much more eaſe, being found on the Surface of the Earth, being waſhed down from the Mountains with ſudden Rains, and with the fall of the Waters is found in Brooks, and on the Banks of Rivers; and generally in all parts of Peru, though more in ſome parts than in others; this Metal, when the Indians find, they waſh it, and ſift it as Goldſmiths do their Cinders, and afterwards made Preſents thereof unto their Kings.

But to return again unto our purpoſe, which is to determine what the value was of that incredible Ranſome, for our better judgment wherein, vve ſhall ſet dovvn the ſeveral particulars mentioned by the aforeſaid Authours. As to the value and difference betvveen Gold and Silver, there vvas in thoſe days, as vvell as novv in Spain, about tvventy per Cent. in the eſteem of Gold above that of Silver, and rather more than leſs; but for more plainneſs, vve vvill reduce the Weights of Gold and Silver to Ducats of Caſtile, of eleven Ryalls and one Maravedis to a Ducat. Novv to come to the Diviſion, Carate ſaith, that the ſhare to every Horſeman came to 12000 Weight, that is Ducats in Gold, beſides Silver; for every Horſeman had a fourth part more than a Foot-man, and yet notvvithſtanding Atabaliba had not complied vvith the fifth part of vvhat he had promiſed for his Ranſome. And in regard that no ſhare of this Ranſome belonged to Almagro and his Souldiers, becauſe they vvere not then preſent vvhen Atabaliba vvas made a Priſoner, hovvſoever the Governour beſtovved a thouſand Ducats on every Souldier, as a Gratuity, and an Encouragement: This Carate affirms. Gomara ſaith, that the ſhare to every Horſeman amounted to 370 Marks of Plate, beſides Gold; and to the Captains thirty or forty thouſand Ducats a-piece. And now after we have ſummed up the whole, which theſe Authours put to account, of every parcel, let us ſubtract the fifth, and then we ſhall eaſily compute what the ſumm total amounted unto, and how much belonged to every Man for his ſingle ſhare and proportion.

To the Governour they divided 200000 Ducats, of which 150000 was in Gold, and 50000 in Silver; beſides the Chair in which the Inca was carried, weighing 25000 Ducats of Gold, which being thrown into the Heaps amongſt the other Riches, appertained to him, as Captain General. To the three Captains of Horſe their proportion was 90000 Ducats in Gold, and 30000 in Silver. To the four Captains of Foot the like ſumm was proportioned of 90000 Ducats in Gold, and 30000 in Silver. To the hundred Foot Souldiers their ſhare amounted unto 900000 Ducats in Gold, and 195000 in Silver. To the two hundred and forty Spaniards which came up with Almagro, a largeſs was given of 80000 Ducats in Gold, and 60000 in Silver. And to Almagro himſelf 30000 Ducats in Gold, and 10000 in Silver, beſides the Allowance which his Companion made him out of his own ſhare, as ſhall hereafter be more particularly mentioned. The fifth of all which, deducted from theſe ſeveral parcels in Gold, amounted unto 546250 Ducats, and the fifth from the Silver unto 15750 Ducats. And in regard, as Hiſtorians report, that the Silver was purified, and much finer than that which we call Standard, and was by four Ryalls per Mark better, or of more value; we ſhall add the ſumm of 38160 Ducats unto this Account, being for ſo much as this Silver was more refined and better than the common Standard. And not to weary the Reader farther with theſe long Accounts of every particular ſumm, we ſhall caſt up the total, with allowance of twenty per cent. advance, in the value between the Gold and the Silver; with twenty per cent. difference between the Piece of Eight and the Ducat; ſo that an hundred Peſos in Gold are worth an hundred and forty four Ducats, according to which we ſhall eaſily make up the ſeveral ſumms in Gold. And in regard that Hiſtorians do not mention whether the Gold was fine, as they do that the Silver was refined and purified, we ſhall ſuppoſe that the Gold was worth twenty two Quilats and an half, as in the Standard in Peru, and not twenty four Quilats, as in Spain, for then we ſhould add to the whole value of the Gold 218500 Ducats, which ariſes on the Quilat and an half of Advance; but becauſe the Spaniſh Writers do not mention that difference, we ſhall likewiſe leave it out in this Account, leſt we ſhould ſeem to inſert any thing without good Authority. As to the Silver, there is no other difference than of twenty per cent. between the Piece of Eight and the Ducat. We ſay then that the Gold, which fell to the ſhare of the Governour, together with the Royal Chair, amounted unto ——— 252000 Ducats.

the Silver unto	60000
To the three Captains of Horſe in Gold	129600
in Silver	36000

To the ſixty Horſemen in Gold	1036800 Ducats.
and in Silver	129600
To the hundred Foot-ſouldiers in Gold	1296000
and in Silver	162000
To the 240 Men which came with Almagro in Gold	259200
and in Silver	72000
To Almagro himſelf in Gold	43200
and in Silver	12000
The fifth deducted from the Gold	786600
and from the Silver	126900
The difference of the refined Silver above the Standard	38170

So that the ſumm total of the Ranſome of Atahualpa amounted unto 4605670 Ducats, of which ſumm 3933000 Ducats are the value of the Gold, and the 672670 Ducats are the value of the Silver, accounting therein the advantage upon the fineneſs above the Standard; both which ſumms together amount to the aforeſaid total of 4605670 Ducats. This was the value of thoſe Riches which the*S paniards* gained in Peru, but much greater was that which they found in Cozco, when they made their entrance into that City, as Gomara and Carate report, and as we ſhall declare hereafter in its due place. Blas Valera ſaith, that the Ranſome of Atahualpa amounted unto 4800000 Ducats, the which he reports on the Authority of the Indians, who had ſet down an account by their knots of every particular parcel which was brought from the ſeveral Provinces; but we ſhall rather follow the account given by our Hiſtorians herein, than that of the Indians; though Blas Valera differs from the others, and makes the ſumm greater by 194330 Ducats, than what is before mentioned. In thoſe former times ſuch great ſumms ſeemed incredible, becauſe they were not known, though now they create no great Wonder, ſince it is manifeſt, that for theſe thirty years paſt, there have been imported ten or twelve Millions every year in the River of Guadalquivir; the which my Countrey having ſent as an Offering to Spain, and all the old World, hath thereby been more profitable to Strangers, than kind and natural to her own Children.

Gomara in the 118th. Chap. of his Book ſpeaking of this Ranſome, hath theſe Words. " Franciſco Piçarro ſent the fifth part of his Spoils, together with a Re- " lation of his Succeſſes, by his Brother Hernando, unto the Emperour, and with " him returned many of the Souldiers very rich, with twenty, thirty and forty " thouſand Ducats a Man. In ſhort, they brought away almoſt all the Gold fil- " ling the Bank of Seville with Money, and the World with the fame and diſ- " courſe thereof, and with deſires of that enterpriſe. Thus far are the Words of Gomara. It is well known, that thoſe who returned were ſixty in number. The Governour ſhared to his Companion 120000 Ducats, being ſo much as appertained to him out of his proportion. To Hernando de Luque, the Schoolmaſter, nothing was divided, becauſe it was known, that he being already failed, could be no farther uſefull, ſo that Hiſtorians have no occaſion to make other mention concerning him.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Diſcourſes which the Spaniards made upon theſe Affairs.

BY the Death of theſe two Brother-Kings, (or rather Enemies) Huaſcar and Atahualpa, the Spaniards became abſolute Lords and Maſters of both their Kingdoms; there being none remaining to defend the People, or make head againſt them; for the race of the Incas, being almoſt extinct, the Indians were like Sheep without a Shepherd, having none to govern them, either in Peace or War; and beſides, the Civil and inteſtine Diſcords between the Factions of Huaſcar and Atahualpa were become irreconcileable, ſo that both Parties, being deſirous to gratifie the Spaniards, made them the Inſtruments of each other's Revenge. Moreover thoſe Captains who were of Atahualpa's party were divided amongſt themſelves; for ſome of them made head againſt the Spaniards, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, and others disbanded the Armies under their Command, with intention to ſet up an Inca of their own choice, ſuppoſing that he would be more kind and indulgent to them than a ſtrange Prince; the Perſon whom they elected was Paullu, the Son of Huayna Capac, being one of thoſe who had made his eſcape from the Cruelty of Atahualpa. The Perſon who had the principal hand in this Election, was the Major General Quizquiz, who was in Cuntiſuyu when the News came of the Impriſonment of Atahualpa, and untill that time had been an Enemy to Paullu. But urgent and violent neceſſities cauſe Men to ſtoop unto mean and low Actions, and more eſpecially Tyrants, and Men of poor and baſe Souls, who finding themſelves ſinking, regard neither Honour nor Conſcience, but onely ſuch means as tend to their own vile and miſchievous Deſigns. Quizquiz was an Officer of Atahualpa, and a ſtout and an experienced Souldier. To Paullu they gave the coloured Wreath, but he received no ſatisfaction in that Royal Signal, becauſe he knew that the lawfull Inheritance belonged to Manco Inca, and not to himſelf; which when Quizquiz obſerved, and that Paullu was cold, and not deſirous of the Government, he then ſet up for himſelf, reſolving to contend with his own Force and Proweſs; and accordingly having raiſed an Army, he marched towards Cozco, to know what was become of his King Atahualpa; upon which March we ſhall leave him, untill we come to the time and place of his Actions.

The Spaniards obſerving with what Honour and Adoration they were generally received by the Indians, and that, according to the report made them by the ſix Spaniards who went on Diſcovery, all Veneration and Service was paid to them; they often entertained familiar Diſcourſes one with the other on that Subject, making various Reflexions on the cauſes thereof, as the fancy of every Man did ſuggeſt. Some would attribute the ſucceſs of all to their own Proweſs and Valour, for that the Indians ſeeing them ſo ſtout and reſolute, believed them to be invincible, and ſo out of mere fear and terrour ſubmitted and yielded, and framing a thouſand Rodomontado's of their own Conduct and Courage, ſearched not for any cauſe beyond themſelves, nor reflected on the Prophecies of Huayna Capac, which foretold the coming of the Spaniards into their Countrey, who ſhould deſtroy their Idolatry, and their Empire; and out of this ſuperſtitious Belief yielded all up without reſiſtance. Howſoever there were ſome more conſiderate than the reſt, who being zealous for the ſervice of God, and for the propagation of the Chriſtian Faith, attributed all their Succeſſes to the miraculous Operations of God, in favour to the propagation of the Goſpel, that ſo the Faithfull, as well as Infidels, beholding them with wonderfull attention, the one might be thereby induced to receive the Faith with readineſs and love, and the others be encouraged to preach it with fervour and charity towards their Neighbours, and with due reſpect towards God, who hath ſhewed them ſuch great and miraculous works. And indeed we may aver it for a truth; that it could be no leſs than miraculous, That a Spaniard or two ſhould travell alone two or three hundred Leagues in an Enemies Countrey, and be carried through it on Mens Shoulders, and all Reſpect and Adoration paid to them, as if they had been Gods, whenas they might have thrown them over ſome Bridge, or down ſome precipice, or by other means have eaſily deſtroyed them, is a conſervation above all humane Wiſedom and Direction, and ought to be ſolely attributed to the Divine Providence, by ſuch as profeſs themſelves good Chriſtians, and Preachers of the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt. Others improving this conſideration and Argument farther, did ſome times in preſence of the Governour diſcourſe to this effect. That in regard Atahualpa had received Baptiſm, it had been more conducing to the quiet of that Kingdom, and propagation of the Catholick Faith, to have conſerved him alive, and paid him all Honour and Reſpect, requiring of him, that ſince he himſelf was become a Chriſtian, that he ſhould publiſh an Edict in favour of that Religion, commanding all his Subjects and Vaſſals within a certain time to be baptized; certainly this courſe would have been extremely prevalent for three or four moſt pungent Reaſons, every one of which ſingly might have been ſufficient to have converted the whole Nation, how much more, when they all concurred together.

As firſt, The Command of the Inca, to which in the moſt trivial matters Obedience is yielded, as to the Law of God; how much more would it be in the Caſe of Religion, delivered by thoſe whom they in their own Minds eſteemed to be Gods.

Secondly, the Natural Obedience which they always yielded to their Incas.

Thirdly, The Example which the King had given in being baptized, would eaſily have begotten a conformity in his People. And,

Fourthly, That which would have appeared moſt ſpetious and obligatory, and which comprehends the force of all together, would have been the Precept of Atahualpa, declaring, That in purſuance of the Prophecy of his Father Huayna Capac, delivered in his laſt Will and Teſtament, ſignifying the Obedience they were to yield to thoſe new Gueſts, who were to enter into their Countrey, whoſe Law and Religion was much better, and more excellent than theirs.

Had (I ſay) the Preachers taken advantage of this convincing Method of Arguments, certainly the Goſpel would have entred and ſpread without oppoſition; but God in his ſecret Judgment would not admit of theſe Methods, that ſo thoſe matters might come to paſs, which afterwards ſucceeded.

CHAP. XL.

The Effects which the Civil Discords between the two Incan Kings, who were Brothers, did produce.

THE War which was raised between the two Kings Huascar and Atahualpa, who were Brothers, was the cause of the total subversion of that Empire, and facilitated the Entrance, and the Conquest which the Spaniards made of that Countrey, which being for the most part craggy and mountainous, and full of difficult Passages, might otherwise have been easily defended. But God, who in his Mercy designed the propagation of the Gospel in those Countries, was pleased for the more easie introduction thereof, to permit those feuds between those two Brothers.

Acosta speaking summarily of this Point, in the 22d. Chapter of his 6th Book, hath these Words. " Huayna Capac was succeeded in Cozco by one of his Sons, " called Tito Cusi Gualpa, (he means Inti Cusi Gualpa) afterwards he was called " Guascar Ynga, and his Body burned by the Captains of Atahualpa, who also was " the Son of Guayna Capac, and raised Arms against his Brother in Quitu, and " came against him with a powerfull Army. At that time the Captains of " Atahualpa, namely Quizquiz, and Chilicuchima seized upon Guascar Inca in the " City of Cozco, after he was declared Sovereign Lord and King, and indeed he " was the lawfull Heir and Successour. Great was the Confusion and Noise " which this Action made through all parts, both of the Kingdom, and of the " Court. And whereas it was their Custome upon all great Emergencies of Af- " fairs, to have recourse unto Sacrifices, the People finding themselves in no ca- " pacity to relieve their King, who was in the Hands of the Captains of Atahual- " pa, and guarded by a powerfull Army, they therefore agreed, and, as they say, " by order of their Captive King, to offer a solemn Sacrifice to the Viracocha Pa- " chyachachic, (he should have said Pachacamac) who is the Creatour of the Uni- " verse, praying, that since they were not able of themselves to deliver their " King out of Prison, that he would be pleased to send some People from Hea- " ven, who might procure his Freedom. Whilst they were intent to the so- " lemn performance of this Sacrifice, News was brought, that a certain People " was come by Sea, and having landed, had seized Atahualpa, and kept him Pri- " soner. And in regard that this Affair happened just in that conjuncture of " time, when this Sacrifice was offering, and that the People were very few in " number, who had seized on Atahualpa in Caxamalca; they gave the name of " Viracochas to the Spaniards, which name continues to them unto this day, upon " a belief, that they were sent from God for rescue of their King; and indeed " the People would have been confirmed in this opinion, had the Spaniards fol- " lowed those Methods which were pursuant thereunto. And on this occasion " we ought seriously to contemplate the Wisedom of the Divine Providence, " which conducted the Spaniards into those Countries in that seasonable con- " juncture of Affairs, when the Divisions between the two Brothers were grown " up to a Civil and an Intestine War; without which advantage, which begat in " the Indians a belief, that the Spaniards were a People dropped from Heaven, it " had been impossible for such a handfull of Men to have become Conquerours of " that numerous People, the loss of whose Countrey was recompenced to them, " by the gain which Heaven was to their Souls. Thus far are the Words of Acosta, with which he concludes that Chapter, wherein with much brevity he sums up the War between the two Brothers, the Tyranny of the one, and the Right of Succession which appertained to the other, the Imprisonment of them both, and the small number of Men which took Atahualpa Prisoner, and how gratious the Divine Providence was to those poor Gentiles in their Conversion; what Name they gave to the Christians, and the Esteem which they they had of them, upon an opinion that they were come from Heaven: All which particulars we have already declared, and set forth at large. We are now to tell you the reason of that name of Viracocha, given by them to the Spaniards, which was this: So soon as they saw the Spaniards in their Countrey with that Beard and Habit, in which the Phantasme appeared to their Inca Viracocha, the which Apparition the Indians ever afterwards adored for a God, as he declared himself to be. And that when some time after they saw that the Spaniards had at their first entrance taken Atahualpa Prisoner, and in a few days afterwards had put him to death by form of Law, and in such manner as is due to Murtherers and Malefactours, and had at his Execution, by the Voice of a Crier, published the Tyrannies, Cruelties and Treason against Huascar, for which he suffered; they were then really convinced, that the Spaniards were Sons of the God Viracocha, and were descended from their Father the Sun, to punish Atahualpa for his Crimes, and to revenge upon him the Bloud of his Brother, and of all that Family. And what did moreover confirm this Belief, were the Cannon and Musquets which the Spaniards used, and which the Indians took for proper Arms and Ammunition of the Sun, giving them the name of Yllapa, which signifies Thunder, and Lightning, and Thunderbolts. And to the Name of Viracocha, they added the Title of Inca, as properly belonging to them on score of the Relation they had to the Sun their Father, from whom they descended; the which Title they gave to all the Conquerours of Peru, from the first, who entred with Francisco Piçarro, to those who came in with Almagro, and afterwards with Don Pedro de Alvarado, all whom they adored for Gods; the which Esteem and Veneration for them continued untill the Covetousness, Luxury, Cruelty and Severity, with which in a barbarous manner many of them treated the poor Indians, discovered the falsity of this vain Opinion, and opened their Eyes; giving them to understand, that such as were so different in their Morals, and in all their Actions to their ancient Incas, could not be descended from the Sun, and consequently could not merit the Title of Inca; howsoever they continued the Name of Viracocha, for the similitude they had in their Habit, and Beard to the Phantasme, or Apparition. Thus did the Indians judge of those Spaniards who were cruel, and ill natured to them, calling them Cupay, which is the Name they give to the Devil; but on the contrary, such as were gentle, kind and compassionate towards them, they not onely confirmed their former Titles which they had given them, but added thereunto such other compellations as they attributed to their Kings, as Yntipchurin, Child of the Sun, Hanc-chacuay, a Lover of the poor; and when they would higher exalt the Goodness and Vertue of those Spaniards, who treated them kindly, they called them the Sons of God, which when they would express in Spanish, for the Name of God, which is Dios, they would pronounce it Tius, because the Letter D. is not in the Indian Language. So Tiuspachurin is with them the Son of God, though in these times, by learning the Spanish Tongue, they are come to a better pronunciation. Such Honour and Veneration did these poor Indians shew at the beginning to those Spaniards who were compassionate, and good natured towards them, and the like respect do they still bear towards the Clergy, as well as to the Seculars, in whom they observe the brightness of Vertue to shine with Humility and Gentleness, without Avarice or Luxury; for the Indians are naturally of a good disposition, very meek and humble, cordial to their Benefactours, and gratefull for the least favour or good they receive. The which natural proneness to make acknowledgments for good Offices done, they derived from the ancient Customs of their Kings, whose Studies were for the publick wellfare of their People, by which they merited all those Names and Surnames of Renown, which were attributed by their People to them.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Faithfulneſs which the Indians of Peru ſhewed unto the Spaniards when taken by them in the War.

THE Indians of Peru held this Maxime or Principle. That if any yielded himſelf, or having been taken by a Spaniard in the War, he was thereby become his abſolute Slave, and eſteemed him by whom he was taken to be his Idol, and his God, and that he ought to honour and revere him for ſuch; and to obey, ſerve, and be faithfull to him unto the death, and not to deny him either for the ſake of his Countrey, Parents, Wife or Children. Upon this Principle they preferred the Wellfare of a Spaniard, who was their Maſter, before all other conſiderations whatſoever, and would ſell or betray their own Family, if their Maſter required it, and that it were neceſſary or conducing to his Service; by which means the Spaniards never wanted Spies, nor Intelligence of whatſoever paſſed amongſt the Indians, which was of great uſe to them in the Subjection and Conqueſt of that Countrey; for they believed it to be a real duty in them to be obedient unto thoſe to whom they had yielded themſelves Captives; and therefore would engage in fight on their Maſters ſide, againſt their own Countreymen and Relations, as if they were their mortal Enemies: When ſome Spaniſh Troops in their March had taken ſome Indian Captives, and that the Commanders would ſhare them amongſt the Souldiers according as every Man wanted a Servant, the Indian would refuſe to acknowledge any other for his Maſter, than him onely to whom he had yielded himſelf; and when they were told, that it was the Rule of War to divide equal ſhares to every Souldier, and that he who was already provided, was to permit his Companion to be equally accommodated: The Indian anſwered, that he would obey on condition, that when the Chriſtian to whom he was allotted had taken another Captive, that he might have the liberty to return to his Maſter to whom he had firſt ſubmitted; the like Fidelity the Women alſo profeſſed. Three Indians taken in this manner I left in the Houſe of my Father, and Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega, one of which was called Alli, which is as much as to ſay Good; he was taken in a Battel, of which there were many in Collao, after the Indians had made their general Inſurrection, in one of which this Alli fought like a very ſtout Souldier, and having engaged far with ſome few Perſons, he took no care to ſave himſelf, untill he ſaw all his Companions put to flight, and hardly purſued by the Spaniards, and having then little hopes of ſafety or refuge, he laid himſelf amongſt the dead, to which poſture he had opportunity to compoſe himſelf by the darkneſs of the night, and caſting away his Shirt, he wallowed in the bloud of the ſlain, that ſo he might ſeem to be one of them.

The Spaniards returning from the purſuit unto their Camp in ſeveral Companies, three or four of them happened to paſs that way, where this Indian lay counterfeiting the dead Man; and whilſt they vvere vievving the dead, my Lord and Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega obſerved one of them to pant, and dravv his Breath, vvhereupon he vvent near him, and touched him vvith the point of his Spear, to try if he had ſenſe, and vvere living; ſo ſoon as the Indian felt the prick he immediately ſtarted up, and cried for quarter, fearing that there vvas nothing leſs than Death for him. After vvhich he remained in the Service of my Father, vvith that Fidelity and Subjection vvhich vve have already expreſſed, being deſirous to evidence the ſame on all occaſions. He vvas aftervvards baptized, calling himſelf John, and his Wife Iſabel.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Religion which the Indians of Peru observed in the Sepulchres where they threw in the Dead.

THE Indians of Peru held this Maxime or Principle, That if any yielded himself, or having been taken by a Warr in the Warr, he was thereby become his absolute Slave, and deserved him by whom he was taken to be his Lord, and his God, and that he ought to honour and reverence him for such; and to obey, serve, and be faithfull to him unto the death, and not to deny him either for the fake of his Country, Parents, Wife or Children. Upon this Principle they preferred the Welfare of a Master, who was their Master, before all other considerations whatsoever, and would sell or betray their own Family, if their Master required it, and that it were necessary or conducing to his Service; by which means the Spaniards never wanted Spies, nor Intelligence of whatsoever passed amongst the Indians, which was of great use to them in the Subjection and Conquest of that Country; for they believed it to be a real duty in them to be obedient unto those to whom they had yielded themselves Captives; and therefore would engage in fight on their Masters side, against their own Countrymen and Relations, as if they were their mortal Enemies: When some Spanish Troops in their March had taken some Indian Captives, and that the Commanders would share them amongst the Souldiers according as every Man wanted a Servant, the Indians would refuse to acknowledge any other for his Master, than him only to whom he had yielded himself; and when they were told, that it was the Rule of War to divide equal shares to every Souldier, and that he who was already provided, was to permit his Companion to be equally accommodated: The Indians answered, that he would obey on condition, that when the Christian to whom he was allotted had taken another Captive, that he might have the liberty to return to his Master to whom he had first submitted: the like Fidelity the Women also professed. Three Indians taken in this manner I left in the House of my Father, and Lord Garcilasso de la Vega, one of which was called Alli, which is as much as to say Good; he was taken in a Battel, of which there were many in Collao, after the Indians had made their general Insurrection, in one of which this Alli fought like a very stout Souldier, and having engaged for with some few Persons, he took no care to save himself, until he saw all his Companions put to flight, and hardly purfued by the Spaniards, and having then little hopes of safety or refuge, he laid himself amongst the dead, to which posture he had opportunity to compose himself by the darkness of the night, and casting away his Shirt, he wallowed in the blood of the slain, that to be might seem to be one of them.

The Spaniards returning from the purfuit unto their Camp in several Companies, three or four of them happened to pass that way, where this Indian lay counterfeiting the dead Man; and whilst they were viewing the dead, my Lord and Master Garcilasso de la Vega observed one of them to pant, and draw his Breath, whereupon he went near him, and touched him with the point of his Spear, to try if he had feele, and were living; so soon as the Indian felt the prick he immediately started up, and cried for quarter, fearing that there was nothing less than Death for him. After which he remained in the Service of my Father, with that Fidelity and Subjection which we have already expressed, being desirous to evidence the same on all occasions. He was afterwards baptized, calling himself John, and his Wife Isabel.

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.

Don Pedro de Alvarado goes to the Conqueſt of Peru.

THE Fame of the great Atchievements in Peru, and the Riches thereof was now ſpread in all parts with ſuch Renown, that as Lopez de Gomara in the 26th Chapter of his Book reports, the Spaniards crowded in ſuch numbers to take a ſhare of the Gold, that Panama, Nicaragua, Quahutemallan, Cartagena, and other Plantations, and Iſlands were almoſt diſpeopled, and left deſolate. Amongſt the reſt Admiral Don Pedro de Alvarado, one of the moſt famous and renowned Captains of that age, being not contented with the Glory and Riches he had acquired by the Conqueſt of the Empire of Mexico, Utlatlan, and Quahutemallan, reſolved to augment his Greatneſs by his attempts upon Peru. To which end he obtained a Commiſſion from the Emperour Charles the fifth, to conquer, plant and govern all that Countrey which he ſhould gain, at ſuch a number of Leagues diſtant from the Juriſdiction and Conqueſts of Franciſco de Piçarro. For this Enterpriſe he made Levies of many ſtout Fellows, and moreover many Gentlemen of Quality from all parts of Spain offered their Services, eſpecially thoſe of Eſtremennos, becauſe Don Pedro himſelf was a Native of Badajoz.

This noble Perſon, amongſt his many other Excellencies of Nature, was endued with ſuch nimbleneſs and activity of Body, that thereby he ſaved his own Life, when the Marquiſs del Valle was forced to make a retreat from Mexico: for the Indians having broken the Bridge over which the Spaniards were to paſs: This Don Pedro, with the help of a Lance which he carried in his hand, the point of which having fixed in the Bodies of the dead, he took a running leap of twenty five Foot clear over the Bridge; at which the Indians were ſo much aſtoniſhed, and wondred, that they called him a Son of God. This Paſſage Lopez de Gomara touches in the 107th Chapter of his Book, where treating of the Conqueſt of Mexico, and of Hernando de Cortes, he hath theſe Words, which we have delivered verbatim: "When he returned to them, though ſome fought very ſtoutly, "yet he found many killed. He loſt his Gold, his Baggage, and Priſoners. In "fine, his Men were routed, and his Camp diſperſed, and nothing remained in "that poſture in which he had left it; howſoever he rallied as many as he could, "put them in the front, and he himſelf brought up the rere. And Pedro de Alvarado was ordered to rally what Forces he could, and to make head againſt the "Enemy, but they charged him ſo home, that he was not able to withſtand "them; when ſeeing his Men ſlain round about him, and that if he ſtaid, there " was no poſſibility to eſcape; he followed Cortes with the Lance in his hand, and " paſſing over the dead bodies, and ſuch as were wounded and groaning, he came " to the Bridge Cabrera, and leaped over it with his Lance, at which not onely " the Indians, but the Spaniards were aſtoniſhed, for that no other was able to " doe the like; ſome indeed there were who attempted it, but falling ſhort, they " were drowned. Thus far are the Words of Gomara.

I remember, when I was a Boy, that I have heard the Spaniards diſcourſe much of the great activity of this Gentleman; and that the ſecond time after Mexico was ſubdued, how he had ſet two Marble Pillars at each end of the Arch of the Bridge, for marks of the leap which he had taken; to which, for the truth of what I have ſaid, I refer my ſelf, in caſe they be ſtill remaining, though it is a wonder if envy and emulation of this Age hath not deſtroyed them.

The firſt time that this Don Pedro de Alvarado was at Seville, with deſign to embark for the Indies, he, with ſome other young Sparks his Companions, aſcended to the top of the Steeple of the Great Church to enjoy the Air, and take a view of that moſt pleaſant proſpect; where ſeeing a Beam thruſt out from the Tower of about ten or twelve Foot long, and had been there placed ſome few days before for a Scaffold, to mend ſome part of the Steeple. One of thoſe Gentlemen that was with him, I do not well remember his Name, but he was a Native of Cordova; knowing how much Don Pedro did boaſt, and avail himſelf of his activity, he on a ſudden laid aſide his Sword and Cloak, and without ſpeaking a word, went out of the Tower upon the Beam, meaſuring of it foot by foot, untill he came to the end of it; and then turning about, walked back again with the ſame even ſteadineſs as before.

Don Pedro obſerving this bold action, and believing that it was onely to dare him, ſcorned to be out-done; and therefore keeping on both his Sword and Cloak, threw one end of his Cloak over his left ſhoulder, and the other part holding cloſe under his right arme, and his Sword with his left; he in that poſture marched forth upon the Timber, and coming to the end thereof, gave a ſudden turn round, meaſuring it with the ſame footing back untill he came to the Tower. Certainly it was a very bold and daring action both of one and the other. Another time it happened, that this Don Pedro, with ſome other of his youthfull Companions, going to Hunt, met ſome Countrey fellows, who to out-vye each other, were jumping over a certain Well, that was very broad, ſome of which leaped over it, but ſome would not adventure. At length came Don Pedro, and he placing his feet together, juſt at the brink of the Well; Now, ſaid he, this were a good ſtanding jump, if I durſt adventure it: With that he gave a leap, and reached the other ſide onely with the fore-part of his feet, and gave again on a ſudden a jerk back to the very place where he had taken his leap forwards. Theſe and ſuch-like feats of activity are recounted of this Gentleman, and others who were employed in the Conqueſt of this new World, as if God, who had that great Work for them to doe, had endued them with abilities of body and mind proportioned to ſo great an enterprize; for if the very Journey it ſelf through thoſe unknown parts with peace and quietneſs, were a matter of labour and hardſhip; how much more difficult muſt it be to paſs thoſe Straits and craggy Mountains by force of Arms? But in reality, it was the Divine Aſſiſtence which co-operated with the Proweſs of theſe Heroes; for without ſuch a miraculous concurrence, humane power could never have attained to ſuch mighty Atchievements. Thus we have mentioned ſomething of the Activity of Alvarado; but his Acts and Monuments of his Valour are recorded in the Hiſtories which write of Mexico, Nicaragua and Peru, though not ſo fully as his great Worthineſs deſerved.

Moreover, he was ſo comely a Perſon both Walking, and on Horſe-back, that returning one time from Mexico into Spain, to clear himſelf of ſome Aſperſions which his envious Adverſaries had charged upon him; and coming, as his duty was, to kiſs the Emperour's hands, and render him an account of his Services: His Majeſty being then at Aranjuez, in one of the Walks of that Garden, and ſeeing Don Pedro with a manly gate, and handſome Air coming towards him, asked who he was? and being told that it was Alvarado; This Man, ſaid the Emperour, hath not the faſhion and meen of a perſon that can be guilty of ſuch actions as are charged upon him: And ſo acquitting him of all the calumnies with which he was ſlandered, he gave him his hand to kiſs, and received him to favour.

It

It was upon this Voyage when he returned a Married Man into New Spain, and carried with him ſeveral young Ladies for Wives, to thoſe who had conquered that Countrey, and were ſetled there in good Houſes with riches and proſperity. Alvarado being arrived at Huahutimallan, was there received with great joy of the people, and in his own Houſe, with Balls and Dances, which continued for many Days and Nights. It happened that one day, when all the Conquerours were ſate in the great Hall, to behold the Dancing; and that the Ladies were alſo looking out of the Jealouſies, or Latices, where, after the modeſt faſhion of Spain, they remained unſeen: One of them ſaid to the others, What, are theſe the Conquerours with whom we are to Marry? What, ſaid another, with theſe Old rotten fellows? Let thoſe Marry with them that will, for my part, I will have none of them; the Devil take them, for they look as if they had been come from Hell; for ſome of them are Cripples, others Lame and Maimed; ſome without Ears, others with one Eye, or half a Face, and the beſt of them hath been ſlaſhed and hacked over and over again. No, replied the other, we are not to Marry them for their good Looks, but to inherit the Eſtates they have gained; for they being old, and worn out, are to dye quickly, that we may Marry again, and chuſe what young brisk fellow we pleaſe, as if we were to change an old Kettle for a new Pot. One of theſe Old Gentlemen ſtanding near theſe Ladies, and not ſeen by them, overheard all this diſcourſe; and not enduring the ſcorn with which they treated theſe Old fellows, he replied upon them with affrontive terms, and high indignation, and told all that he had heard unto the company; ſaying, Marry with them who will for me; and I'll warrant you they will well reward your kindneſs to them. Having ſaid thus much, he returned home, and preſently ſent for the Parſon, and Married his Indian Woman, who was of Noble Birth, and on whom he had already begot two or three Children; which he made legitimate, that they might inherit his Plantations and Eſtate, rather than that Gallant, whom the Lady ſhould chuſe to enjoy the fruits of his labours, and make ſervants and ſlaves of his Children. There have been ſome few in Peru, who have followed his example, and Married Indian Women; but the moſt part have yielded to the pleaſure and counſel of the Lady. The Children of theſe Conquerours can by experience tell us the truth of this matter, and in the Alms-houſes, where they now remain, may lament the loſs of their Inheritances, acquired by their Fathers Toils and Valour, and enjoyed by Strangers and Aliens, not related either to Father or Mother. In the beginning of thoſe times, when an Indian Woman had brought a Child to a Spaniard; all the whole family of that Woman were devoted, and ſwore themſelves ſlaves and ſervants to that Spaniard, worſhipping and adoring him as their Idol, becauſe he had entered into an affinity with them; and hereby they became very uſefull to the Spaniards in their Conqueſt of the Indies. It was one of the Laws made by the Conquerours of the new World, That every one ſhould enjoy the Lands which were divided to him for two Lives, that is, for his own and his Son's life; and in caſe he had no Child, then the Spaniſh Wife was to come into the Inheritance, and barred all the natural Children, as if the Lady had contributed more towards the Conqueſt, than the Indian Mothers: by which means it came often to paſs, that the fine Ladies changed their old Husbands for young Gallants.

CHAP. II.

Of the difficulties and dangers which Don Pedro de Alvarado and his Companions ſuſtained in their Voyage.

THis brave General Don Pedro de Alvarado was accompanied with many other worthy Gentlemen of Quality, in which number was Garçilaſſo de la Vega, my Lord and Father, whom Cieça de Leon calls Captain Garçilaſſo; and in the 42d Chapter of his Book uſes theſe words: "General Don Pedro de Alvarado was "accompanied with Diego, Gomez, and Alonſo de Alvarado, which latter is now Ma- "reſchal in Peru, as alſo with Captain Garçilaſſo de la Vega, John de Saavedra, Go- "mez de Alvarado, and other Perſons of Quality, and arrived at a place near to "the Quarters of Diego de Almagro; upon which ſuch conteſts and quarrels aroſe "between the two Parties, that it was feared, that matters would have broken "out into an open defiance, &c. Thus far are the Words of Cieça; where it is obſervable, that he onely calls Garçilaſſo de la Vega Captain, and the others Gentlemen; with all whom I had a perſonal acquaintance, unleſs it were with Pedro, and Diego de Alvarado. In their paſſage by Sea from Nicaragua to Puerto Viejo, they ſuffered much for want of Water, and other Proviſions; for upon a belief or ſuppoſition, that the Voyage would not be long, and being in great haſte to depart, they omitted to take Aboard all thoſe things which were neceſſary for their Voyage. The like want both of Victuals and Water, they ſuffered after they were Landed, as will appear by the Relations of the Accountant Auguſtin de Carate, and the Prieſt Lopez de Gomara, both which agree in the ſame Narrative, onely with this difference about the value or price of the Horſes which they were forced to kill in the Journey, wherewith to give food to their Men. Wherefore I have thought fit to ſet down the Words of Gomara in the 127th Chapter of his Book; wherein he briefly touches on all the particular Labours and Difficulties which Don Pedro and his Companions endured in this Expedition; part of which are as followeth:

"The Riches of Peru being publiſhed in all parts, Pedro de Alvarado obtained a "Commiſſion from the Emperour to diſcover and plant Colonies in thoſe Coun- "tries, which were not as yet inhabited by any Spaniards: And in the firſt place "he diſpatched Garci Holguin with two Veſſels to diſcover the Countrey, and "bring intelligence of what had lately paſſed in thoſe parts. Holguin ſoon after "returned with great commendations of the Countrey, and with mighty admi- "ration of the vaſt Riches which were taken and ſeized by the Impriſonment of "Atabaliba, reporting alſo that Cozco and Quitu, a Countrey not far from Porto Vi- "ejo, were extremely rich. Upon this advice they reſolved to ſail thither; and "accordingly in the year 1535, they armed out five Ships, and embarked there- "upon four hundred Spaniards, and many Horſes. With theſe Alvarado Landed "in Puerto Viejo, and marched towards Quitu, enquiring always for the way, un- "till they came to certain great Plains, encompaſſed with very lofty Mountains; "where they had all periſhed for want of Water, had they not by chance lighted "upon a ſort of Canes, which were filled with Water; and to ſatisfie their hun- "ger, they ate the Fleſh of their Horſes, which they were forced to kill, though "they were worth above a thouſand Ducats a Horſe; though Carate ſaith, that "every Horſe was worth about four or five thouſand pieces of Eight Spaniſh Mo- "ney; and truly I think, that this was the moſt probable value, becauſe I heard "ſo much in Peru. The Volcano of Quitu (which is a burning Mountain) threw "up ſuch quantities of Aſhes by a terrible irruption which continued for many "days, that all the Earth was covered with them for above eighty Leagues round; "and when it burns with its fierceneſs, ſuch flames aſcend from it, that they may "be ſeen at a hundred Leagues diſtant, and make ſuch a noiſe, that they aſtoniſh "more than Thunder and Lightning: They were forced alſo to Fell the Woods

" to make a paſſage: They paſſed alſo ſeveral ſnowy Mountains and Deſarts, (a " thing very ſtrange ſo near the Equinoctial) in that cold Countrey ſixty of their " people were frozen to death; ſo that when they were eſcaped from the Snows, " they returned hearty thanks to God, who had delivered them from that dan- " ger; and curſed all the Gold and Silver to the pit of Hell, which had enticed " and tempted them to a condition of ſtarving both with cold and hunger. Thus far are the Words of Gomara; and then Carate proceeds, and ſays, " Thus " did they travel without hope, or comfort, or power to ſuccour one the other; " for it happened, that a Spaniard, who carried his Wife and two little Children " with him, finding them ſo tired and weary, that they could travel no farther, " nor himſelf able to carry them; he ſate down with them to take ſome repoſe, " during which time they were all frozen to death; and though the Man could " have eſcaped, yet ſuch was his compaſſion to his Wife and Children, that he " would rather periſh with them, than forſake them in that condition. With " ſuch labour and difficulty as this they paſſed the ſnowy Mountain, rejoycing " much when they had got over to the other ſide. Thus far are the Words of Carate, in the 9th Chapter of his ſecond Book. And here we may condole this unhappy fate, that the firſt Spaniſh Woman which came to Peru, ſhould thus moſt miſerably periſh.

As to the five hundred Men which theſe Authours account to have been with Alvarado, I have been informed from ſeveral that were with him, that they were no leſs than eight hundred Spaniards; perhaps they might be no more than five hundred that came from Nicaragua, and that when they were landed in Peru, other recruits might join with them; ſo that in the Plains of Rivecpampa, where Alvarado, and Diego de Almagro entered into Articles of Confederacy together, they might ariſe to the number of eight hundred: But another Hiſtorian makes a difference of three years time between theſe matters, but that is not much to our purpoſe.

As to the Canes in which they found the Water, called Ypa, they are commonly as big as a Man's leg or thigh, though the end of them is not thicker than the finger of a Man's hand: they grow in no other than in hot Countries, where they make uſe of them to Thatch their Houſes: The information they had of the Water was from the people of the Countrey, who guided them to the Canes, ſome of which contained ſix Gallons of Water, and ſome more, according to the bigneſs of them, which is proportionable to their height. Auguſtine Carate in the 10th Chapter of his ſecond Book, writing the Journal of this Don Pedro de Alvarado, gives this deſcription of the Canes: " In this Journey, ſaith he, they endured " much hunger, and greater thirſt; for ſuch was their want of Water, that had " they not met with Groves or Thickets of Canes, which yielded good and whol- " ſome Water, they had all periſhed. Theſe Canes are commonly about the big- " neſs of a Man's leg, every knot of which contained about a quart of Water, " having a natural propriety to imbibe or ſuck in the nightly Dews which fall " from the Heavens; beſides which there was no Water nor Springs in that dry " Countrey; and herewith Don Pedro refreſhed both his Men and Horſes. Thus far Auguſtine Carate gives us an account of General Don Pedro de Alvarado, where we ſhall leave him for a while, and return to the Spaniards and Indians which we left in Caſſamarca.

CHAP. III.

How the Body of Atahualpa was carried to Quitu; and of the Treaſon of Rumminavi.

SO ſoon as Don Franciſco Piçarro, and Don Diego de Almagro had buried Atahualpa, they travelled to Cozco, viſiting in their way thither, that very rich Temple, which was ſituated in the Valley of Pachacamac; from whence they carried away all the Gold and Silver which Hernando Piçarro had left behind, not having been able to take it with him. From thence they proceeded to Cozco, in which Journey, though they had many ſteep and craggy Mountains, many ſwift Torrents and deep Rivers to paſs, yet they met no very great difficulty, but that onely which we ſhall hereafter relate.

And thus leaving them on their way, let us return to the General Challcuchima, and other Captains of Atahualpa, who joyned themſelves with the Nobles of the Court, and other principal perſons, who remained in Caſſamarca. So ſoon as the Spaniards were departed from that Province on their Journey to Cozco, the Indians took up the Body of their King, and according to his Command tranſported it to Quitu, where they interred it with ſuch decency as became the Burial of a Prince, and yet with ſuch little pomp, as was agreeable to a conquered people, that had yielded to the ſubjection of a foreign and ſtranger Nation.

Rumminavi ſeemed the moſt forward of any both to receive the Body of the King, and to Embalm it, though already corrupted, and tending to putrefaction; and in the mean time he ſecretly made Levies, and prepared a way to ſet up himſelf in the Government, diſſembling all reſpect and obedience to Quilliſcacha, the Brother of Atahualpa; and that he might try in what manner his mind ſtood affected to Rule and Dominion, he perſuaded him to bind his head with a coloured Wreath, if he were deſirous to revenge the Death of his Brother. All which Rumminavi uttered with deſign to blind the underſtanding of Quilliſcacha, and cover his plots and evil intentions, untill he could bring his affairs to maturity; but to this perſuaſion Quilliſcacha refuſed to hearken, ſaying, That the Spaniards would not eaſily quit their Empire; and in caſe they would, yet there were ſo many Sons of Huayna Capac ſurviving, who were ready to lay their claim to the Government, and had a better right and title to it than himſelf; that ſome or other of them would adventure to aſſume the Government; and that the people would appear in vindication of the juſt title and cauſe of the undoubted Heir, for whoſe ſufferings by the late unhappy Wars and Miſeries they had a true ſenſe and compaſſion.

This prudent and cautious Anſwer of Quilliſcacha did not alter the ſiniſter deſigns and intentions of Rumminavi, for being both a Tyrant and Barbarous, he reſolved to proceed, and ſet up his own intereſt, telling his familiar friends in their private diſcourſes with him, that according to the Practices and Examples which he had ſeen, the right to Rule and Govern belonged to the ſtrongeſt; for that he who could wreſt the Power into his own hands, and kill his Maſter, as Atahualpa had Murthered his Brother, and as the Spaniards had Atahualpa; the ſame had title ſufficient to conſtitute himſelf Chief and Supreme Lord. Rumminavi remaining firm in this principle, and reſolute in this deſign, made great preparations to receive Atahualpa, aſſembling the people together under pretence of performing the funeral Obſequies of their late Inca; the which Solemnity, though formerly continued for the courſe of a year, was now concluded within the ſpace of fifteen days. At the end of which, Rumminavi judging not fit to let paſs ſo fair fair an opportunity whereby to compaſs his deſigns; for that fortune having put into his hands all thoſe whom he intended to kill, as namely the Sons and Brother of Atahualpa, the chief Captain Challcuchima, with many other Captains and Lords then preſent, he reſolved to execute his bloudy purpoſe. To which end he invited all the great Perſons there preſent to a Dinner, that being together they might treat of affairs, and conſider of the way and means how to ſecure and defend themſelves from the Spaniards; he alſo nominated Quilliſcacha for Vice-king, or Regent, in the Kingdom of Quitu, during the Minority of the eldeſt Son of Atahualpa, who was as yet but an Infant.

The Captains and Curacas accordingly aſſembled in the Palace of the Inca, where many things were propoſed, but nothing determined: At length Dinner was brought in, which was very ſumptuous, having been provided at the coſt and charge of Rumminavi. Dinner being ended, and the Meat taken away, the Drink was brought in, which they call Sora, and in other Tongues Vinnapu, which, as we have ſaid, is a ſort of Liquour forbidden by the Indian Kings upon pain of Death; for that on a ſudden it ſeizes the ſpirits, and intoxicates in ſuch manner, that ſuch as drink it remain (as it were) dead for ſome time, and without ſenſe. Acoſta ſaith, that it inebriates much ſooner than Wine. For though of their common liquour they make great quantities, yet this immediately intoxicates. So ſoon as Rumminavi perceived theſe Captains and Curacas beſotted, and ſtupified with this Liquour, he fell to his work, and cut all their throats; amongſt which was Challcuchima, Quilliſcacha, and all the Sons and Daughters of Atahualpa, not leaving one alive that was capable to oppoſe his deſign. And to create a greater terrour of himſelf in the minds of the people, for he pretended not to be obeyed for love, but for dread and fear, he flea'd off the Skin of Quilliſcacha, and therewith covered a Drum, the Skin of the head hanging to it, that ſo like a good Scholar and Officer of his Maſter Atahualpa, he might appear with all the Enſigns, and marks of tyranny and cruelty. Carate mentions onely, in ſhort, this barbarous Cruelty. Peter de Cieça ſaith, that Franciſco Piçarro burnt Challcuchima in Sacſahuanna, but this was not the Challcuchima whom we mean, but a Kinſman of his of that Name, but of leſs fame and renown. He alſo adds, that the General Challcuchima was preſent at the Death of Atahualpa, and that he carried his Body to Quitu, as before related, and that he was afterwards Murthered there by the hands of his own people.

CHAP. IV.

Rumminavi takes all the Select Virgins of a Convent and Buries them alive.

TWO Spaniſh Hiſtorians treating of the Cruelties of Rumminavi, ſpecifie amongſt the reſt, one of the moſt barbarous pieces of inhumanity that ever was committed: They ſay, that when Rumminavi came to Quitu, where entertaining ſome diſcourſe with the Women, he ſaid to them, Cheer up, and be merry, for the Chriſtians are now coming with whom you may ſolace your ſelves; at which ſome of the Women happening innocently to laugh, thinking no hurt, he ſpoiled their jeſt, and cut their throats, and burnt down the Cloſet or With-drawing-room of Atahualpa: Theſe are the words of one of the Writers, and the other agrees with him in the ſame ſenſe. But the truth of the ſtory is this: The Tyrant one day went to viſit the Convent of thoſe who are called the Select Virgins, with intention to chuſe out from thoſe Women who were there placed, and ſeparated for the uſe of Atahualpa, ſome of the moſt beautifull and pleaſing to his fancy; in regard that he being declared King, all the Women, Eſtate, and Riches of his Predeceſſour devolved to him with the poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. Diſcourſing one day with theſe Ladies concerning the preſent ſtate, and ſucceſſes of affairs, he deſcribed the behaviour and habit of the Spaniards, whoſe Bravery and Valour he extolled to a high degree, ſaying, That it was no ſhame to fly from their irreſiſtible fury; that they were a ſtrange ſort of people with Beards in their faces, and were mounted upon creatures called Horſes, which were ſo ſtrong and fierce, that a thouſand Indians were not able to withſtand the violence of one of them, and with the ſwiftneſs of his carriere was ſo terrible as to rout, and put them all to flight. He added farther, That the Spaniards carried Thunder and Lightning with them, by which they could kill the Indians at two or three hundred Paces diſtant from them, and that they were armed with Iron from head to foot. In fine, after he had deſcribed them with high admiration, he ſaid, that they wore a certain kind of Codpiece, like a Box wherein to incloſe their Genitals; it is to be ſuppoſed, he meant the Codpiece to the Breeches, (uſed in the days of Our Henry the Eighth) which was a faſhion neither modeſt nor uſefull. The Women hearing the latter part of the Story, burſt out heartily into a laughter, ſuppoſing that they had rather pleaſed than angred Rumminavi therewith: but he on the contrary interpreting their laughter to be an effect of unchaſt and diſhoneſt deſires, and that they would joyn and concur with the Spaniards when occaſion offered, he was tranſported with ſuch rage, that it broke forth into this furious language: Ah wicked Whores and Traytoreſſes, if onely with talk of the Spaniards you are ſo pleaſed, what would you doe and act with them, if they were preſent? But I ſhall take care to ſpoil your ſport and paſtime with them. So ſoon as the words were out of his mouth, he immediately commanded his Officers to take and carry all the Women, as well the young as the old, to a ſtream of water which runs by the City, and to execute upon them the ſame puniſhment which their Law inflicts, which is to bury them alive; according to the Sentence they were carried thither, and there interred alive under great heaps of ſtones, which were thrown upon them from certain Mountains and Rocks, which lye on both ſides the River. Thus did this barbarous Tyrant diſcover more unhumane cruelty, and relentleſs bowels, by this Murther committed on poor ſilly Women, who knew nothing but how to Knit and Weave, than by his bloudy treachery practiſed on ſtout Souldiers, and Martial Men; and what farther aggravates his crime, was, that he was there preſent to ſee the execution of his deteſtable Sentence, being more pleaſed with the objects of his cruelty, and his eyes more delighted with the ſad and diſmal ſight of ſo many periſhing Virgins, than with any other proſpect or colours which could have been preſented before his view. Thus ended theſe poor Virgins, gins, dying onely for a little feigned laughter, which transported this Tyrant beyond his senses: But this villany passed not unpunished; for after many other Outrages he had committed, during the time of his Rebellion, against the Spaniards, and after some Skirmishes with Sebastian Belalcaçar, who was sent to suppress him, as we shall hereafter relate; and after he had found by experience, that he was neither able to resist the Spaniards, nor yet by reason of his detestable cruelties to live amongst the Indians; he was forced to retire with his Family into the Mountains of Antis, where he suffered the fate of other Tyrannical Usurpers, and there most miserably perished.

CHAP. V.

Of two Skirmishes between the Indians and the Spaniards.

THE Governour Don Pedro de Piçarro, and his fellow Souldiers, which with the recruits that Almagro brought with him, made up the number of about three hundred and fifty Spaniards, marched carelesly towards Cozco, and with such security, as if they had no Enemy to encounter, and as if the whole Kingdom had been their own, travelling from one Town to another, as in their own Countrey, without fear or apprehension of any thing. Carate in the 8th Chapter of his second Book, touches on this particular, and relates a brave Exploit performed by the Indian Captains, as we shall see hereafter, though he varies something from others in their Names. The Inca Titu Atauchi, Brother of Atahualpa, seeing the King a Prisoner, and his Ransome agreed, travelled into divers parts of the Kingdom to collect all the Gold and Silver he was able, that therewith he might purchase the freedom of his Brother; and being returned as far as Cassamarca with vast riches in Gold and Silver, he received news of the Death of his Brother, and that the Spaniards were departed for Cozco, and securely travelling on their way thither in no order or posture to receive an Enemy: the which when Titu Atauchi had heard and considered, he disburthened himself of his Riches; and having gathered and joyned what forces he could in a Body, he pursued the Spaniards as far as to the Province Huayllas, and amongst the people called Tocto, where with six thousand Men he made an assault upon the Spaniards, and took eight of them Prisoners, who were as yet in their Quarters, amongst which was Sancho de Cuellar, who was the Clerk that drew up the Indictment and Sentence of Death against Atahualpa. Carate touches upon this passage, and says it was Quizquiz that did this Exploit, but he mistakes one for the other, and makes no mention of any taken. Whilst matters passed thus in Huayllas, the Spaniards had another Skirmish with the Indians, who were Commanded by Major-General Quizquiz, one of the most famous Captains belonging to Atahualpa, of whom we have already made mention: For he having at Cozco received advice that his King was taken and made a Prisoner, marched with his Squadron, consisting of eleven or twelve thousand Men towards Cassamarca, to endeavour either by fair or foul means the releasement of his Inca; but meeting with the Spaniards on his march thither, he engaged with them, and fought a stout Battel, which Historians relate in short and confusedly, but much in favour of the Spaniards. The truth of what passed is this: Quizquiz having understood by his Scouts, that the Spaniards were approaching, and that they marched carelesly, and without order, he laid an Ambuscade within the Woods and Rocks; and having ranged his Men in a half circle, he attacqued them in the Rere with such bravery, that four Spaniards were wounded, and ten or twelve Indians, their Servants, were killed. The Governour, who marched in the Van-guard, being Allarum'd at the surprize of his

Rere, detached two Captains of Horſe for the ſuccour and relief of them, ſuppoſing that the Indians upon ſight of the Horſe would immediately run, and be put to flight, as formerly they had done in Caſſamarca, where they abandoned and forſook their King. So ſoon as the Horſe came up to the Station of Quizquiz, he made a feigned retreat to certain Rocks and Mountains, where the Horſe could not paſs, nor doe any ſervice, continuing ſtill a defenſive Fight, as they retired, entertaining the Spaniards with a Skirmiſh for the ſpace of three hours, by which time their Horſes became faint and tired; of which the Indians taking advantage, ſallied forth with that whole Body, which by the Command and Conduct of Quizquiz were lodged within the Rocks and Mountains; and aſſailed the Spaniards with ſuch fury, that they killed ſeventeen of them; though a certain Hiſtorian mentions onely five or ſix, beſides ſome that were wounded, and others taken Priſoners, and the reſt eſcaped by the ſwiftneſs of their Horſes: Of the Indians ſeventy were ſlain; thoſe that were taken, were Franciſco de Chaves, who was one of the Chief Commanders; Pedro Gonçales, who was afterwards an Inhabitant of Truxillo, Alonſo de Alarcon, Hernando de Haro, Alonſo de Hojeda, who ſome years afterwards fell into ſo deep a melancholy, that he loſt his ſenſes and underſtanding, and died in Truxillo; alſo Chriſtopher de Horozco, a Native of Seville; John Diaz, a Gentleman of Portugal, beſides ſeveral others of leſs account, whoſe Names time hath aboliſhed. Alonſo de Alarcon was taken by the fall of his Horſe, with which his Leg was broke ſhort off at the Knee; and though the bone was afterwards ſet by the Indians, who took great care of him, and of the others who were wounded, yet he remained lame for ever after.

Quizquiz having gained this advantage, like an experienced Captain, would not ſtay untill the remainder of the Spaniſh Forces were come up, but retreated with his people towards Caſſamarca, to meet with Titu Atauchi, Brother of the late King, who (as he had heard) was on his march: And to cut his way as ſhort as he could, he paſſed a great River, and then burnt the Bridge, becauſe it was made of Oſiers, that ſo the Spaniards might not be able to follow in the purſuit of them.

Having met with the Inca Atauchi, they both agreed to return to Caſſamarca, there to conſider of Affairs, and to treat of thoſe things which might conduce to the common good, and welfare of the people; and ſo accordingly they proceeded.

The Indians put Cuellar to Death, and enter into Articles with the other Priſoners.

SO ſoon as the Inca Titu Atauchi, and Quizquiz, were entred into Caſſamarca with the Spaniards their Priſoners, they examined the Indians concerning the Death of their King Atahualpa; and being informed that Cuellar had been Clerk, and drawn up the Indictment, and made all the Proceſs againſt Atahualpa, and had been preſent to ſee their King executed: And being likewiſe informed that Francis de Chaves, and Hernando de Haro, and others then Priſoners, had appeared in favour of Inca Atahualpa, and that they interceded for his Life and Liberty with ſuch heat and earneſtneſs, that they adventured their own lives in his cauſe: Upon which full hearing and information of the matter, Titu Atauchi, and Quizquiz, and the other Captains, reſolved that the Clerk Cuellar for his bold attempt on the Life of their King, and for having notified the Sentence, ſhould be put to death in the ſame form and manner as their King was executed. But as to the other Spaniards, out of reſpect to Francis de Chaves, and Hernando de Haro, who had appeared in favour of their Inca, order was given for their Cure, and that they ſhould be well treated, and civilly uſed; and that being recovered of their wounds, they ſhould be diſmiſſed with freedom and preſents. According to this determination the Counſels were executed; for Cuellar being taken out from the very Priſon where Atahualpa had been lodged, and being carried to the very ſame place of Execution, with a Cryer before him, Proclamation was made as follo[w]eth: The Pachacamac commands that this Auca, which ſignifies as much as Tyrant, Traytor, &c. and all thoſe who have had a hand in the Murther of our late Inca, ſhould be put to death. Not that this form of a Cryer was according to the uſe of their Countrey, but onely in imitation and revenge of what had been done to their Inca, and accordingly Cuellar was tied and ſtrangled at the very ſame Poſt at which Atahualpa had been Executed; with which a ſhout was made, This may all thy Companions periſh. Cuellar being dead, they left his body expoſed the whole day to common view, and towards the Evening buried it, imitating in all particulars the forms uſed by the Spaniards in Execution of Atahualpa. But as to Francis de Chaves, and his other Companions, ſo ſoon as they were cured of their wounds, and were in a condition to travel, they beſtowed on them Preſents of Gold, and Silver, and Emeralds, and diſpatched them away with ſeveral Indians to carry them on their ſhoulders: But firſt they capitulated with them, as Repreſentatives for the other Spaniards, and agreed on ſeveral Articles of Peace and Friendſhip: the principal of which were theſe: "That all the Acts of War, and Hoſtility, and "Injuries hitherto committed on either ſide, ſhall ceaſe, and be pardoned, and "forgotten. That for the future a Peace ſhall be eſtabliſhed between the Spaniards and the Indians, and that they ſhall offer no hurt or damage to each other. "That the Spaniards ſhall not deprive Manco Inca of his Empire, becauſe it is his "right to Govern, being lawfull Heir. That the Indians and Spaniards in all their "Commerce and Negotiations ſhall treat amicably together, and afford help and "ſuccour each to the other. That the Spaniards ſhall ſet thoſe Indians at liberty, "whom they hold in Chains, and that for the future they ſhall put none of them "into Irons, but freely to uſe them in their ſervice. That the Laws made by the "paſt Incas, in favour, and for the benefit of their people, and which are not repugnant to the Chriſtian Law, ſhall be conſerved inviolably in their force and "virtue. That the Governour Don Franciſco de Piçarro ſhall in a convenient time "ſend theſe Capitulations into Spain to be there ratified and confirmed by his Imperial Majeſty. All which the Indians, as well as they were able, gave to underſtand unto Francis de Chaves, partly by ſigns, and partly by words, which were interpreted by the Indians, who were Servants to the Spaniards, and had been taken with them, and whom Titu Atauchi taught and inſtructed word by word, that ſo having the matter well inculcated to them, they might be better able to utter and expreſs his meaning. The Spaniards obſerving the great generoſity with which they were treated by Titu Atauchi, and his people; and that when they were Priſoners to them, and lay at their mercy, and that they might have proceeded againſt them as guilty of the Murther of their King, and Diſturbers of the common peace and quiet of their Nation; yet then on the contrary they frankly reſtored them unto their liberty with Preſents of Gold, Silver, and pretious Stones, diſpeeding them away with attendance to carry them, and with other Accommodation for their Journey: In fine, when they conſidered all this, and the reaſonable Articles and Terms which the Indians propoſed, they could not but admire, and remain confuſed at the peaceable and quiet diſpoſition of the Indians: Moreover, when they were under cuſtody, and in hourly expectation of Death, and had time, as Men, to reflect on their preſent condition, they much lamented their remiſneſs, and want of care to inſtruct the Indians in the Doctrine of the Goſpel; howſoever, reſolving for the future to make amends for that default, and being emboldned by the gentle temper of the Indians, they adventured to ask leave, that they might demand onely two things from them: To which the Indians replied, That whatſoever they ſhould require, ſhould readily be granted. Hereupon Francis de Chaves ſaid, that he did in the Name of the Governour, and all the Spaniards, require that the Incas, and all their Captains and Lords, ſhould receive the Law of the Chriſtians, and conſent, that it ſhould be freely preached in all parts of their Empire. Secondly, That whereas the Spaniards being Strangers and Aliens in that Countrey, had neither Servants nor Lands to ſerve and maintain them; that a ſubſiſtance ſhould be granted to them, as to the Natives of the Kingdom, that Indian Men and Women may be allowed to ſerve them, not as Slaves, but as hired Servants. To which anſwer was made, That as to what concerned the Law of the Chriſtians, they did not onely not reject it, but did earneſtly intreat them immediately to ſend to the place where the Governour reſided, deſiring him with all convenient ſpeed to furniſh them with ſuch Preachers and Prieſts, as might inſtruct them in thoſe Precepts and Principles which were neceſſary for them to know, promiſing for their parts to treat and uſe them kindly, and with ſuch honour and reverence, as if they were Gods; for they were well aſſured from the teſtimony of their late Inca Huayna Capac, that the Law of the Spaniards was much better than their own; and though they had no other reaſon to entertain ſuch a belief, than the bare recommendation of their Inca, yet that was ſo prevalent, as to engage them to all obedience, uſefulneſs and ſervice towards the Spaniards; the truth of which had been evidenced by their Inca Atahualpa, had he been ſuffered to live, yet he had ſealed this ſincere obedience with his bloud; and therefore they might be confident they could ask nothing but what would be granted to their ſatisfaction. The Covenants which were thus agreed, were by their Hiſtoriographers recorded on their Knots; and licence being given to the Spaniards to depart, they took their farewell, and being laden with Preſents, and accompanied with a numerous Attendance, they proceeded on their Journey in ſearch of their Governour. And as they were on their way, Franciſco de Chaves, and his Companions, being conſidering Men, fell into diſcourſe concerning the late paſſages; and reflecting thereupon, they were of opinion, that the words and actions of that people were ſo well agreeing to reaſon, as did not ſavour of the Gentiliſm and Barbarity in which they were nurtured, but were Miracles of the divine inſpiration infuſed into the Souls of that people, diſpoſing their minds to receive the Doctrine of the Goſpel with eaſe and readineſs; on which encouragement they reſolved to perſuade the Governour, and the other Spaniards, to ſend Miſſionaries to that intent and purpoſe into thoſe parts: And though they were all generally of the ſame mind in this particular, yet the Devil, who is the common enemy of Mankind, endeavoured by all his wiles and artifices to obſtruct the converſion of thoſe Indians; the which in a great meaſure he effected by the aid and aſſiſtence of his diligent Miniſters the ſeven mortal Sins, which being in thoſe times of liberty let looſe, greatly prevailed, committing all thoſe outrageous Villanies which might bring a diſrepute on the profeſſion of the Goſpel. Hence aroſe thoſe Wars, which in a ſhort time after were waged between the Indians and the Spaniards, occaſioned by perfidiouſneſs and non-performance of the Articles, for that Pride would not ſtoop, nor conſent to a reſtitution of the Kingdom to his proper and lawfull Maſter. Afterwards Anger prevailed, and raiſed War between the two Companions Piçarro and Almagro; which being maintained by Envy and Emulation, one not ſupporting the greater power of the other, continued untill both of them periſhed in a competition for Authority, for Almagro was killed by the Brother of Piçarro, and ſo was Piçarro ſlain by the Son of Almagro. Theſe Wars were followed by others between that good Governour Vaca de Caſtro, (with whom I was acquainted at Madrid in the year 1562,) and Don Diego de Almagro Junior; for Pride, which is the Mother of Diſſention, was ſo prevalent in the mind of this Youth, that having neither a Spirit to ſubmit to his Lord and Sovereign, nor Power to maintain his Dominion, he periſhed in his folly. Soon after Covetouſneſs and Tyranny raiſed a War between the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and Gonçalo Piçarro; the which in a few years after was followed by Stirs and Combuſtions between Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, and Franciſco Hernandez Giron, occaſioned by Gluttony and Luxury. All which Wars ſucceeding one after the other, for the ſpace of twenty five years, were raiſed by the malice and contrivance of the Devil, as we ſhall demonſtrate in their due place, and were great obſtructions to the propagation of the Goſpel; for by reaſon of continual diſturbances, neither the Prieſts could freely Preach, nor had the Infidels leiſure nor convenience to receive the Doctrine of Faith, being under the continual amazements of Fire and Sword, and other miſeries; in which the Indians had a greater ſhare than the Spaniards, being oppreſſed by both ſides, and compelled to ſupply both Camps with Proviſions, and carry the burthens for them on their ſhoulders with wonderfull patience and labour; of which I my ſelf have in part been an Eye-witneſs.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Entrance of the Spaniards into Cozco, and of the great Treaſure which they found there.

SO ſoon as the Inca Titu Atauchi had diſpeeded Franciſco de Chavès and his Companions with the aforeſaid Capitulations, he ſent an Expreſs Meſſenger to Inca Manco Capac, who was his Brother by the Father's ſide, with advice of the Articles agreed, and of all particulars which had paſſed; that ſo being well informed of all matters, he might be provided to act and treat with the Spaniards. The General Quizquiz ſent in like manner to adviſe him, that he ſhould by no means disband his Army, but rather increaſe it, untill ſuch time as he had wholly concluded and ſetled matters with the Spaniards, leſt being ſecure, and over confident of their kindneſs, he ſhould fall into the ſame ſnare, and run into the ſame fate which his Brother Atahualpa had already ſuffered.

With theſe Informations and Advices the Indians ſent their humble Submiſſions to Manco Inca, acknowledging him for their Supreme Lord and King; for though they had been Enemies to him whilſt he ſtood in competition with his Brother Atahualpa, yet that difference being now ended by his Death, all was reconciled; it being agreed at a Council of War, that the Empire ſhould be reſtored to that perſon unto whom the Succeſſion did by lawfull Inheritance appertain: And on this foundation they reſolved to unite their forces for Expulſion of the Spaniards, in caſe they could not live in amity with them, believing themſelves much more formidable by this concord and union, than when they were divided into ſeveral Factions and Parties.

The

The Prince Manco Inca received the Advices of his Brother, and the Addreſſes of Quizquiz, with much joy, being much pleaſed to find that thoſe who were his late Enemies, were now reconciled and joyned with him in his juſt claim and title to the Empire. And herein he was the more ſatisfied to underſtand, that the Spaniards concurred in the like intentions, having on all occaſions openly declared their inclinations to right and juſtice. Upon which preſumption the Inca adventured to apply himſelf to the Spaniards to demand Peace and Friendſhip, and in a ſimple and ſincere manner to require the Government and Dominion over his Kingdom, according to the Capitulations which his Brother Titu Atauchi had ſent to him. And here we ſhall leave him for a while in his preparations for ſuch an Addreſs, untill its due time and place, and return to our Franciſco Picarro, who being better adviſed by the late damage which his people had ſuſtained from Titu Atauchi, did now march with more caution, and leſs ſecurity than before; ſo that they met no conſiderable Encounters, unleſs a few flying Skirmiſhes near the City of Cozco, from whence the Inhabitants ſallied out to defend a Paſs; but making a feeble and poor reſiſtence, they haſtily fled to their Houſes, from whence carrying away their Wives and Children, and what Stock and Goods they could collect, they retired into the Mountains, being greatly affrighted with the reports of what had ſucceeded in Caſſamarca, for that Countrey having been ſubject to the power of Atahualpa, made ſome reſiſtence, being deſirous, if poſſible, to revenge the Death of their Prince. Gomara treating of this particular paſſage, hath theſe words: "The next day the Spaniards entred into Cozco without any oppoſition, "and preſently they fell at work, ſome to unrip the Gold and Silver from the "Walls of the Temple, others to dig up the Jewels and Veſſels of Plate, which "were buried with the Dead, others pillaged and rifled the Idols, and ſacked the "Houſes, and the Fortreſs, where ſtill great quantities of Gold and Silver were "conſerved, which had been there amaſſed and laid up by Guayna Capac. In "ſhort, there was more Gold and Silver found in this City, and in the parts a-"bout it, than what was produced at Caxamalca, by the ranſome of Atabaliba: "Howſoever, the particular ſhare belonging to every individual perſon did not "amount unto ſo much as the former Dividend, by reaſon that the number was "greater which was to partake thereof; nor was the ſecond fame ſo loud as the "firſt, which publiſhed the Triumph of Riches with the Impriſonment of a "King. A certain Spaniard entering into a Vault, found there an entire Sepul-"chre of Silver, ſo thick and maſſy, that it was worth fifty thouſand pieces of "Eight; others had the fortune to find ſuch as were of leſs value, for it was the "cuſtome of rich Men of thoſe Countries to be buried in this manner up and "down the Fields, and there to be laid in State like ſome Idol: Nor were the "Spaniards contented with this prize, but ſtill thirſting after greater Riches, were "hot in the purſuit of the Treaſures of Huayna Capac, and of others hidden by "the ancient Kings of Cozco, but neither then, nor afterwards, were any of thoſe "Treaſuries known; howſoever they tortured and vexed the poor Indians with ſe-"vere uſage and cruelties, to ſhew and diſcover to them the rich Sepulchres. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, extracted verbatim from the 124th Chapter of his Book. Carate in the 8th Chapter of his ſecond Book, ſpeaking of ſome Spaniards, who went in purſuit of an Indian Captain, ſaith as follows: "And "not being able to meet with him, they returned to Cozco, where they found a "greater prize both of Gold and Silver, than that in Caxamalca; all which the "Governour divided amongſt his people. Thus far are the Words of Carate. And now I ſuppoſe by theſe Authorities, it hath been ſufficiently proved, that the Riches which the Spaniards found in Cozco, were greater than thoſe taken in Caſſamarca; and to acquit my ſelf in the truth of what I relate, I am pleaſed to cite, or quote, the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, and to ſpecifie their Names, leſt I ſhould ſeem like the Magpye, to deck my ſelf with borrowed feathers.

But to return now to thoſe Treaſures, which, as Gomara mentions, were diſcovered by the Spaniards under-ground both in Cozco, and in the parts adjacent: It is certain, that for the ſpace of ſeven or eight years after the Spaniards had remained in quiet poſſeſſion of that Empire, ſeveral Treaſures were diſcovered both within and without the City; and particularly within the Precincts of that Palace called Amurucancha, (which upon the diviſion made, fell to the lot of Antonio Altamirano) and where it happened that a Horſe galloping round a Courtyard of that Palace, ſtrook one of his feet into a hole, which they ſuppoſed at firſt to be ſome old Sink, or drain for Water from the Houſe; but looking more narrowly, they found the hole opening to a Jar of Gold, weighing above two hundred pounds weight, for the Indians make greater, or leſs, of theſe, as their occaſions require, uſing them to boil their Drink and Liquours in. With this great Jar, they found others of Gold and Silver; and though they were not ſo large, yet they were valued at above eighty thouſand Ducats. Moreover, in the Convents of the Select Virgins; and particularly in that part which fell to the ſhare of Pedro del Barco, and afterwards came to the poſſeſſion of Hernando de Segovia, who was an Apothecary, and with whom I had an acquaintance; this Hernando altering his Houſe, and removing ſome part of the foundation, found a Treaſure of ſeventy two thouſand Ducats, with which, and with above twenty thouſand Ducats more, which he had gained by his Practice, he returned into Spain, where I ſaw him at Seville, where, in a few days after his Arrival, he died for mere grief and ſorrow that he had left Cozco, as ſeveral others have done, whom I knew in the ſame condition. Hereby it is manifeſt, that the Treaſures which the Spaniards found in that City, when they made their entrance firſt into it, were very conſiderable, as were thoſe alſo which were afterwards diſcovered. And it is probable, that the Riches had been much greater, had not the Indians, as we have ſaid in the firſt Part, hid them away, to conceal them from the ſight of the Spaniards.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Converſion of an Indian, who deſired to be informed of that which was the true Law of Mankind.

THE firſt day that the Chriſtians entred into the Imperial City of Cozco, an extraordinary matter paſſed between a Spaniard and an Indian, which was this: A certain Gentleman, who was a Native of Truxillo, called Alonſo Ruyz, roving about, and ſacking the City as the others did, chanced to enter into a Houſe, from whence the Maſter came forth courteouſly to receive him; and at firſt ſpeaking to him with a ſmiling countenance in his own Language, bid him welcome, telling him, that for many days he had expected his coming, for that the Pachacamac had by Dreams and Viſions aſſured him, that he ſhould not dye untill a ſtranger Nation ſhould come, which ſhould inſtruct him in the true Law which he was to follow. And ſince, ſaid he, I have languiſhed all my life with this deſire in my heart, I am confident that you muſt be that perſon which is deſigned to inſtruct me. The Spaniard not underſtanding at firſt the words which the Indian ſaid to him, yet he apprehended, that what he uttered was very kind, for he had learned thoſe two words in the Indian Language, You are very welcome, which the Spaniards expreſs in four; and alſo gueſſing by the chearfulneſs of the Indian's countenance, that he was deſirous of his converſation, ſo often as his leiſure would admit, nor ſo much out of a placency in his company, as for ſome ſober and religious end, he reſolved to ſtay, and take up his Lodging with the Indian, who, during the time of his aboad, entertained and treated him with as much kindneſs and accommodation, as his Cottage could afford. At length three or four days being paſt, and things a little ſettled and quieted after the Spaniards had ſacked the City, Alonſo Ruyz went out to find Philip the Interpreter; and having found him, he returned with him to his Lodging to be better informed of what he as yet imperfectly underſtood; and at firſt he propoſed ſeveral Queries concerning his Cuſtoms, and manner of living; in anſwer unto which, he gave them to underſtand, that he had been a Man of an humble and peaceable Spirit, contented with his own fortune, fortune, and never offered injury or violence to his Neighbour; That he was desirous to be informed of that which was the true Law of Mankind, for that his own Law did not answer or satisfie the many notions he had conceived in his mind of a better and a more sublime Religion. Hereupon the Spaniard endeavoured in the best manner he could to instruct him in the Principles of the Catholick Faith, which true Faith was, That he should worship God in the Trinity, and the Trinity in Unity: And because (as we have intimated before) that there wanted words in the Indian Language to express that Mystery, he advised him to keep the word Trinity, and the word Credo in his memory, for that those words would let him in unto that Faith, which the Roman Church, which is the Mother of all good Christians, doth believe and embrace. And having repeated these words often, and having to several questions made to him, answered, Yes in the Affirmative; a Priest was called, who being satisfied in what had passed, and that the Indian desired to be a Christian, he was baptized to the great satisfaction of all three, that is, of the Priest, the Person baptized, and of Alonso Ruyz, who was his Godfather; in a short time after which, the Indian ended his days with much joy and comfort, that he died a Christian. Afterwards Alonso Ruyz returned into Spain with fifty thousand pieces of Eight in his Purse, the which he had gained in Cassamarca, Cozco, and other parts; but being troubled with scruples of Conscience for having gained his Wealth unjustly, he applied himself to the Emperour with words to this purpose:

Most Sacred Majesty, I am one of those Conquerours of Peru, to whom a share or proportion of the spoils thereof have been divided to the Import of fifty thousand pieces of Eight, which I have brought with me into Spain; but being troubled in Conscience for these ill-gotten goods, I come here to make restitution thereof unto your Majesty, who is Supreme Sovereign of that Empire. If your Majesty will be so bountifull as to grant me any share thereof, I shall receive it as from the true Lord and Master, who hath power to make me a just and lawfull title thereunto; and if not, I shall remain contented, and believe my self unworthy of your Majesty's Grace and Bounty.

The Emperour accepted the Restitution as an effect of an honest and a conscientious mind; and in lieu thereof, bestowed upon him a Revenue in fee of four hundred thousand Maravedis of yearly Rent, together with the Command or Lordship of a small Village called Marta, situate near the City of Truxillo; which now a Nephew of this Alonso Ruyz doth possess and inherit; and besides the quietness of conscience which this Ruyz reaped by this restitution, he also increased and improved his Estate thereby, having obtained a greater parcel of Land than his money could have purchased, given in fee to himself and his Heirs for ever; and which at present is descended and possessed by his own kindred; whereas the Divisions made in the Indies were not to continue longer than for two Lives, which are almost all extinct at this time. And it is very remarkable, that what Estate hath been brought from the Indies, (though not arising by the Division of Lands, but by other ways) hath not continued to the third Heir; whereas this Estate of Ruiz wears like Iron, and descends intailed to the right possessour, and his Heirs for ever. And so let us return to the thread of our History.

CHAP. IX.

Don Diego de Almagro joins his Forces with Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Belalcaçar to ſuppreſs Rumminavi.

Don Franciſco de Piçarro, and D. Diego de Almagro, were buſily employed in gathering, heaping and diſpoſing of the Treaſure which they had found in Cozco, and the parts thereabouts, when the News came that Don Pedro de Alvarado was arrived in Peru with Commiſſion to Govern and Command all thoſe parts which he ſhould conquer; that he was inforced with five hundred Men, moſt of which were Gentlemen of Noble Birth, and of the flower of Spain, well mounted on Horſe-back, well Armed, and well Accoutred with all matters fit for War. This news poſſeſſed the minds of the Spaniards with an apprehenſion of jealouſie, that theſe people came to diſpoſſeſs them of the Riches and Wealth which they had gained; for ſuch is the condition of humane nature, which can never be entirely happy, or proſperous without ſome mixtures of allay. Wherefore the Governour ſent his companion Almagro with a hundred Spaniards to prevent the miſchief which might happen; and ſo to defend the Sea-coaſt, as to obſtruct their Landing, or otherwiſe to corrupt the Army by certain inſinuations and promiſes, alluring them to abandon the deſign of their own Leader, and join with them in an enterprize which was already proſperous, and brought to maturity. Almagro acted according to theſe Inſtructions, but the ſucceſs thereof we ſhall declare afterwards, being obliged firſt to recount other important matters which were tranſacted at that time; for we muſt know, that ſoon after the departure of Almagro, Franciſco de Chaves, and his Companions, arrived at Cozco, giving an account unto the Governour, and the other Spaniards of the civil and generous treatment which he had received from Titu Atauchi, and his Captains, ſpecifying the Care, the Entertainments, and the Preſents beſtowed on them, as alſo the Attendance and Accommodation which had been afforded them for their Journey; and alſo the Articles which they had entred into, in behalf of the Spaniards with the Indians; and, in fine, they related the methods of Juſtice which had been executed on Cuellar with the formalities of the Cryer and Executioner.

Great was the joy which the Governour, and the others conceived to ſee Franciſco de Chaves and his Companions, (whom they had given over for loſt) to return in ſafety; and more was their wonder, to underſtand and hear the civility and kind treatment which the Indians had uſed towards them; as alſo the Particulars of the Death of de Cuellar, being a paſſage very obſervable, that they ſhould onely vent their anger and revenge on his ſingle Perſon, and not onely ſuffer the others to eſcape, but to contribute to their departure with freedom and honour: But that at which the Spaniards moſt admired, were the Capitulations and Conditions propoſed by the Indians, which evidenced a ſincere deſire of Peace and Friendſhip with the Spaniards, and a Zeal to imbrace the Doctrine of the Holy Goſpel; in all which the Spaniards were deſirous to agree, and comply with them; but the troubles which aroſe upon the coming of Don Pedro de Alvarado gave a ſtop to thoſe intentions, ſo that there was no farther diſcourſe of peace and quiet, or propagation of the Goſpel; onely alarums and incitements to War and Cruelty were heard, which involved the Indians and Spaniards in a mutual calamity, as will appear by the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

At the ſame time almoſt intelligence was brought to the Governour of the great ſlaughters and tyranny which Rumminavi had committed in Quitu, that he was there raiſing Men againſt the Spaniards. To ſuppreſs which Inſurrection, and puniſh this Tyrant, and obviate all thoſe miſchiefs which theſe beginnings might produce, the Governour immediately diſpeeded away Captain Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar with Horſe and Foot, well provided of all things, to re-inforce Almagro; who marching with all diligence, and with more care and watchfulneſs than formerly, to prevent ſurprize, met ſome Encounters on the way, with certain Captains of Atahualpa of ſmall note, who hearing of the Impriſonment of their King, had raiſed ſome people in a confuſed manner; and being but few in number, were fled to the Mountains, to guard ſome Paſſes on the Rocks and Precipices, which were difficult to take. And though they had been informed of the Death of Atahualpa, yet they Disbanded not their people in expectation of Summons from ſome of the next of Bloud, who might require their aſſiſtence to revenge the Murther of their King: For which reaſon ſeveral ſmall Companies were ſcattered over the Countrey without Chief or Commander to Marſhal or Conduct them, which had they been united together to guard and defend thoſe difficult Paſſes, might have done the Spaniards great miſchief. With this ſort of Souldiers Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar had ſeveral ſlight Skirmiſhes, but they quickly deſerted the Fight, and gave over before much hurt was done; onely Cupay Yupanqui, which is as much as to ſay, Yupanqui the Devil fought very ſtoutly, having killed five Spaniards, and wounded fourteen, and might have cut them all to pieces, had he been ſupplied with force ſufficient. Lopez de Gomara, who was one of his Catholick Majeſty's Chaplains, writing of theſe Skirmiſhes in the 128th Chapter of his Book, calls him Captain Zopo Copagui; and Auguſtin Carate, who was the Emperour's Accountant, in the 10th Chapter of his ſecond Book, names him Capa Copagui, which comes neareſt to the true word; but to give him his true Name, we muſt call him Cumac Yupanqui, which ſignifies the handſome Yupanqui, becauſe that when this Indian was young, he was of comely features, and of a well ſhaped and proportioned body; for the word Cumac, as we have mentioned in the Poetry uſed by the Incas, ſignifies handſome or beautifull.

He was a natural Son of one of the Royal Bloud, his Mother was of the Kingdom of Quitu; he was bred up with Atahualpa; and for his skilfulneſs in Martial affairs, merited the honour to be one of his Captains. After that Atahualpa had taken his Brother Huaſcar Priſoner, and committed many cruelties; this Man was a chief inſtrument in the execution of all his bloudy practices, and invented many exquiſite torments to be inflicted on the Enemies of his Maſter, which could never enter into the head of the King, or any others to perform; following herein the cuſtome of wicked Servants, who having neither the fear of God, nor the ſhame of the World before their eyes, perpetrate all Villanies to gain the good will and favour of their Maſters; for which reaſon the Captains and Servants of Atahualpa obſerving his cruel and diabolical nature, changed his Sir-name of Cumac into that of Cupay, which ſignifies the Devil. This Indian after he had made ſome little oppoſition againſt Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, and done him what hurt he was able, retired into ſome obſcure places unknown both to Indians and Spaniards. Howſoever it is believed, that being abhorred by the Indians for his wicked practices, and living in fear of the Spaniards, not daring to cohabit with his own people, nor truſt himſelf with Strangers, he fled to the craggy and wild Mountains of the Antis, there to live and aſſociate with Tygers and Serpents, in ſuch manner as other Captains his Companions had done.

From this Enterprize Belalcaçar proceeded, and came to Quitu, there to give a ſtop to the Cruelties of Rumminavi, and to puniſh him; Rumminavi (as we have ſaid) ſallied forth to meet and skirmiſh with him; but in all Encounters, the Indians, who were few in number, and ill diſciplined, were worſted without almoſt any damage to the Spaniards. For this Captain, by reaſon of the many cruelties he had executed on his own people, having Murthered his fellow Souldiers, with the Brother and Sons of his own King, and buried the Select Virgins alive without any reaſon or juſtice, he became ſo hated and deteſted by the Indians, that none would appear on his ſide againſt the Spaniards, though he pretended to revenge the Death of their King Atahualpa. Thus not being able to make head againſt Atahualpa, he retired with melancholy and deſpair into the Mountains; the which place, according to theſe Examples, became alſo a refuge to ſome Spaniards, as we ſhall hereafter declare.

CHAP. X.

The hopes and fears of Almagro ; he is forſaken by his Interpreter ; and an Agreement is made with Alvarado.

THus honeſt Don Diego de Almagro marching in Queſt of D. Pedro de Alvarado, encountred ſome Skirmiſhes by the way with the Captains of Atahualpa; but ſo inconſiderable they were, that they were ſcarce worthy to be mentioned: And in regard he had certain intelligence that Alvarado was Landed, and was marched up into the Countrey, he proceeded ſlowly, that he might not miſs his way, or wander into parts diſtant from him, of whom he went in ſearch.

Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, who was ſent with recruits to re-inforce Almagro, having chaſed Rumminavi and his Captains from Quitu, proceeded with all diligence in Queſt of Almagro, and having joined his Forces with him, they defeated ſome Squadrons of Indians, which were ſcattered over thoſe Provinces. In which Enterpriſe they choſe rather to employ themſelves, than to attempt Alvarado, for knowing that he was a Man of courage, and his people ſtout and good Souldiers, they would willingly have declined all engagements with him, could they have come off handſomely, without ſhame or diſhonour. In theſe doubtfull terms they mained, untill Alvarado approached near their Quarters, and had taken ſeven of their Horſe which Almagro had ſent for Forrage into the Countrey; but Alvarado immediately releaſed them, ſo ſoon as he underſtood unto whom they belonged, and had been informed of all other matters and circumſtances of theſe affairs, for the deſign of Alvarado was not to trouble or diſturb the firſt Adventurers in their Conqueſts of Peru, but onely to aſſiſt and join with them in their Enterprize. This generous Action of Alvarado eaſed Almagro in a great meaſure of his fears, eſteeming it for an evidence of Peace and Friendſhip: But in regard he had ſent no Meſſage by the Horſe-men which he had freed, he remained doubtfull between hope and fear, not knowing what his intentions and meaning might be.

Whilſt Almagro remained in this thoughtfull condition, an unhappy accident increaſed his fears, which was the flight of his Interpreter Philip the Indian, who hearing that Alvarado was nearly approached, he took occaſion one night to run to him, carrying away with him a principal Cacique. When he was come to Alvarado, he informed him of the ſmall number that was with Almagro, and that the Curacas which were with him were deſirous to revolt, and take his part, and to ſerve him; the like Example he aſſured him, that the people of that Kingdom were inclinable to follow, undertaking to bring them all under his Dominion and Obedience, and in the mean time to guide him to the Camp of Almagro, where he might eaſily ſurprize, and take him without much oppoſition. Though Alvarado was well pleaſed with the report and propoſals of Philip, yet he thought not fit to follow his counſel, having a more advantageous proſpect of ſucceeding better by another method; for he was jealous of this Indian, who having been falſe, and perjured in the evidence he had given againſt Atahualpa, he could not believe that he would ever prove faithfull to him; for this Traytor had falſly ſworn, that Atahualpa deſigned to Maſſacre the Spaniards; upon which teſtimony Sentence of Death was paſſed upon him: But to be ſhort in this ſtory; an interview was agreed upon between Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Don Diego de Almagro, and accordingly they met in the Plains of Rivecpampa, which the Spaniards call Riobamba, where both Squadrons were drawn up, and remained in a poſture to engage in Battel; but when they came near to make the on-ſet, both ſides were touched with a natural ſenſe of Bloud, and proximity of Alliance, being almoſt all of the Countrey of Eſtremenos, ſo that the common Souldiers, without permiſſion or Orders of their Generals, mixed together in common diſcourſe, offering to each other Conditions and Articles of Peace and Amity, as it hath at other times happened between the Souldiers of Julius Cæſar and Pompey, and of Petreius and Afranius; for though Almagro, who was much inferiour in number, not having the fourth part of the people which Alvarado had with him, was well pleaſed with the Treaty; yet rather than condeſcend to baſe and diſhonourable terms, both he and his people were ready to dye bravely with Swords in their hands: But the Souldiers on both ſides (as we have ſaid) being inclinable to an Accommodation, a Truce was made for twenty four hours; during which time the Generals met, and with the aſſiſtence of the Lawyer Caldera, a Native of Seville; they agreed on ſeveral Articles and Conditions, as followeth: That both ſides ſhould equally ſhare in the prize already gained, and in what ſhould be gained for the future. That Alvarado ſhould march with his Forces along the Coaſt to the Southward, to make diſcovery of the Kingdoms and Provinces which lay on that ſide. That Piçarro and Almagro ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the Countries they had ſubdued, and labour to ſecure their Conqueſts. And that the Souldiers both of one part, and the other, might freely paſs, and travel from one Juriſdiction to another, either into the new Diſcoveries, or into the Countries already conquered. Theſe are the Articles which were then publiſhed to pleaſe and gratifie the Souldiers of Alvarado, who, as Cieça, Gomara and Carate report, were compoſed of many Gentlemen, that were apt to reſent the leaſt matter which might be ungratefull to them.

But the ſecret Accord not fit to be publiſhed was this: Almagro engaged to pay unto Alvarado a hundred thouſand Peſos of good Gold, (accounting four hundred and fifty Maravedis to each Peſo) a Peſo in Engliſh money makes about a Noble. In conſideration of the Souldiers Horſes, and other Accoutrements of War which he had brought with him, that having received this Money, he ſhould return to his Government of Huahutimallan; and that he ſhould ſwear, as afterwards he did, never more to return unto Peru, during the Life of the two Companions, Piçarro and Almagro: upon which agreement both parties remained with mutual ſatisfaction.

The Articles being in this manner concluded and ſigned, Almagro burnt the Curaca alive, for having treacherouſly forſaken his Colours, and had in the ſame manner dealt with Philip the Interpreter, had not Alvarado interceded in his behalf. Upon which paſſage Gomara in the 129th Chapter of his Book, diſcourſeth as follows: "Almagro (ſaith he) did not find wherewith to pay theſe hundred thou-
"ſand Peſos of Gold in compliance of his obligation to Alvarado, out of the be"nefit and gains of the late Acquiſitions, although in Caramba there was a Tem"ple plated in the in-ſide with Silver, which perhaps he would not take away,
"untill ſuch time, as either he had firſt procured the conſent of Piçarro thereunto,
"or elſe had found ſome ways to diſpoſe thereof. And ſo both of them proceeded
"together unto St. Miguel de Tangarata; but Alvarado diſmiſſed ſeveral of his "Company, ſuffering them to plant and ſettle themſelves with Belalcaçar in Qui-
"tu, conſerving to himſelf the braveſt and ſtouteſt of his Companions. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, which I repeat and alledge his Authority for what I have declared. Of all which matters and occurrences Almagro gave intelligence to Don Franciſco de Piçarro.

CHAP. XI.

Almagro and Alvarado march together unto Cozco. The Prince Manco Inca comes to treat with the Governour, who gives him a magnificent Reception.

THE Spaniards having with mutual joy ſolemnized the Peace and Amity which was concluded and agreed between both Parties, the two Governours, Almagro and Alvarado, (for to the laſt I attribute the Title of Governour, as well as to the others, becauſe that he was entred into the ſame Confederacy and League with them,) gave orders to Captain Sebaſtian de Belalçacar, to return unto Quitu, for ſecuring the Peace and Quiet of that Kingdom; for that ſome petty Commanders of the Indians roved up and down the Countrey, to cauſe Diſturbances and Inſurrections. This being diſpatched, other matters were to be provided for, and particularly it was thought fit to raiſe a Fortreſs, and furniſh it with a Garriſon to defend themſelves from the Spaniards, who upon the fame of the vaſt Riches of Peru, crouded in great numbers from Panama, and Nicaragua, to take a ſhare thereof with the preſent poſſeſſours; to oppoſe which the Garriſon was provided with Men, and Arms, and Proviſion ſufficient to defend it. As to Don Pedro de Alvarado, who, according to the Articles agreed and publiſhed, was to return unto his Ships, and ſail along the Coaſt towards the Southward, there to conquer and poſſeſs new Dominions of Kingdoms and Provinces, declared, that he had a mind to travail by Land, and make a viſit to the Governour Don Franciſco Piçarro, and to divert himſelf a while in the ſight and ſurvey of thoſe parts; the which was but a bare pretence, that he might the better colour and conceal the ſecret agreement; and upon this occaſion it was reſolved, that Almagro ſhould ſend one of his Officers, who was called Diego de Mora, (with whom I was afterwards acquainted,) to command the Fleet in his place and ſtead; and accordingly Alvarado diſpatched his Orders to Garciholguin, to deliver up the charge of the Fleet into the Hands of Diego de Mora, the Perſon commiſſionated and entruſted by both Parties, in regard, that according to the late Agreement, the Ships and Men, and all that belonged unto them, were to be employed in the publick Service, and defrayed at the common expence. Neceſſary Orders being taken herein, the two Governours proceeded on their way towards Cozco, where we ſhall leave them in their Journey for a while, and return to the Succeſſes of Piçarro, who being left at Cozco, as vve have ſaid, many particulars vvere tranſacted by him, which we ſhall mention in order, that ſo we may keep the due Method of our Hiſtory, both as to time and place.

Manco Inca, moved by the Advices which his Brother Titu Atauchi, and his Major General Quizquiz had ſent to him, (as we have before ſpecified) prepared himſelf to make a viſit to the Governour, and to demand of him the reſtitution of his Empire, and performance of thoſe Capitulations which his Brother, and the principal Nobles of his Kingdom had made, and concluded with the Spaniards; upon which point entring into divers Conſultations with his Confidents, whether it were better to go in a peaceable and friendly manner, or attended with a ſtrong and powerfull Army; in which matter the Counſels were much divided, ſometimes being of one Opinion, and ſometimes of another; though the generality followed the Advice of Quizquiz, who was of opinion, that the Inca ought to be well guarded, leſt his Fate ſhould be like to that of his Brother Atahualpa, who truſting to the good Nature and generous Diſpoſition of Strangers, fell into thoſe ſnares wherein he periſhed. But whilſt they were thus in Diſpute, and controverting the matter, the Inca ſpake to them in this manner:

Sons and Brethren of mine, We are now going to demand Juſtice of thoſe whom we eſteem for Perſons who are deſcended from our God Viracocha, and who at their firſt entrance into theſe our Countries, declared, that it was their ſole and proper Deſign to adminiſter Juſtice to all the World; ſo that I cannot imagine that they ſhould refuſe the conceſſion and grant of that which is ſo juſt and reaſonable as our Claim and Title to the Kingdom: for if theſe people are of the true Race and Off-ſpring of the Sun, as our Forefathers were, who taught us Truth for a Principle, and that our Actions are to ſquare and correſpond with our Words and Promiſes, then certainly they cannot deny what they have ſo ſolemnly engaged to perform; for if they do, why ſhould we longer eſteem them Godlike, or to have any thing of Divinity in them, who ſo palpably diſown it by their Tyranny and falſeneſs? For my part, I would rather confide in the Reaſon and Juſtice of our Cauſe, than in our Power and Arms; for if they be, as they pretend, Meſſengers from the God Pachacamac, they will fear to offend him, knowing that there is nothing more inconſiſtent with the Divine Nature than Injuſtice, and eſpecially in thoſe who being made his Miniſters for the execution thereof, do uſurp that to themſelves, which is the Right and Property of another. Let us therefore go to them, armed with the Juſtice of our Cauſe, for if they are Gods, (as we believe them to be) they will act like the true and legitimate Off-ſpring of the Sun, and like our Incas, will readily yield our Empire to us. For our Anceſtours did never deprive the Curacas of their Hereditary Rights, nor take a Forfeiture of them in the Caſe of Rebellion; much leſs ought theſe Spaniards to deveſt us of our Inheritance, and of our Empire, who did never oppoſe them, but rather yield and reſign up all upon their firſt Summons. Let us therefore go to them in a peaceable manner; for if we go armed, they will imagine we intend to make War upon them, and with that pretence deny the moſt reaſonable thing we can demand; for covetous Men, armed with Power, are glad of the leaſt excuſe, or pretence to deny that which is required of them. Inſtead of our Arms let us carry ſuch Preſents with us, as may ſerve to appeaſe the Anger of enraged Men, and pacifie the Diſpleaſure of offended Gods. Let us gather what Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones we can gather; let us take what Birds and Beaſts we can get, as alſo the beſt and moſt delitious Fruits that our Countrey yields; and with theſe let us in the beſt manner we are able preſent our ſelves before them, for though the Ancient Power, and force of our Kings is low, and failing, yet let us ſtill keep up the Honour of a truly Noble and Royal Spirit of the Incas. And if all this will not prevail with them to reſtore unto us our Empire, we may then abſolutely conclude, that the Prophecy left unto us by our Father Huayna Capac is accompliſhed; that our Monarchy is to be tranſlated to a foreign and ſtranger Nation, our political Government deſtroyed, and our Religion aboliſhed, part of which Prophecy we our ſelves have ſeen fulfilled; and if the Pachacamac hath ſo ordained theſe things, what can we doe but ſubmit and obey? Let them doe what they pleaſe, but let not us be wanting either to the Rules of Reaſon, or Juſtice.

When the Inca had uttered theſe Words with a Majeſty becoming his Quality and Condition, the Captains and Curacas burſt out into Tears, lamenting to conſider, that the time was now coming, which would be the ultimate Term and Period of their Empire. Having wept a while, and dried their Eyes, the Curacas and Officers made proviſion of ſuch things as the Inca had appointed, and prepared ſuch an Equipage as might become the Majeſty of their King, though inferiour to the Train and Magnificence of his Anceſtours. In this manner he travelled to Cozco, attended with many Curacas and Lords, together with their Relations and Dependents; for of his own Kindred there remained but few, who had eſcaped from the Cruelty and Tyranny of Atahualpa. At the News of their near approach, all the Spaniards, both Horſe and Foot, came forth to meet and receive them at a far diſtance from the City. So ſoon as the Governour was come near to the Inca, he alighted from his Horſe; as alſo the Inca did from his Chair, which was not, as formerly, made of Gold, but of Wood; for though the Counſellours of the Inca adviſed him to take his Chair of Gold, and march in that State which became the Dignity, and wear the coloured Wreath about his Head; yet he refuſed both one and the other, eſteeming it very improper for him, who was a Petitioner, and came to ask the Reſtitution of his Kingdom, to appear before them with the Enſigns of his Regality, as if he intended in deſpight of the Spaniards, by appearing with the Badge of his Regal Power, to aſſume and vindicate the Poſſeſſion and Dominion of his Empire; wherefore he judged it more proper for him to wear the Wreath of a pale yellow Colour, for that, as he ſaid, the Viracochas, meaning the Spaniards, would underſtand him thereby to be the true Heir apparent of the Kingdom. In ſhort, being come near one to the other, the Governour made his Reverence to the Inca after the Caſtilian ſtilian manner, and bid him welcome; and the Inca replied, that he was come to ſerve and adore thoſe whom they eſteemed for Gods, and as Meſſengers ſent from the ſupreme Pachacamac. Their Words were few, and their Diſcourſe ſhort, for want of good Interpreters; after which the Governour preſently retired to give place to the other Spaniards, and to his two Brothers, John and Gonçalo Piçarro. The Inca being advertiſed that theſe two were Brothers of the Apu, which is, Captain General, he embraced and ſhewed them great reſpect; for it is obſervable, that the Inca, before he came to this Interview with the Spaniards, had provided himſelf with a certain Indian, who was well acquainted with the Spaniards, and gave him notice of the ſeveral Captains, and Commanders, and Officers, and of their Degrees and Qualities: This Indian was Servant to a Spaniard, and informed a Curaca which ſtood near to the King of every Man's condition, which he accordingly whiſpered him, ſo that being advertiſed thereof, he treated every Man with ſome kind of difference, teſtifying to all in general his Love and Affection for them, which he expreſſed by the chearfulneſs of his Countenance, his Words and Geſtures. And at laſt, turning to his own People, he ſaid to the ſame purpoſe as Atahualpa had done, when he firſt ſaw Hernando Piçarro, and Hernando de Soto. Theſe Men (ſaid he) are the true Sons of our God Viracocha, for ſo they reſemble him in their Behaviour, in their Beards and Habits, and therefore do juſtly challenge all Duty and Service from us, according to the Commands enjoined us by our Father Huayna Capac, as appears by his laſt Will and Teſtament.

CHAP. XII.

The Inca demands Reſtitution of his Empire; and what Anſwer was returned to him thereupon.

THeſe Diſcourſes being ended, the Spaniards mounted on Horſeback, and the Inca into his Chair; then the Governour took the Left hand of the Inca and his Brothers, and the other Captains and Souldiers marched in the front, each Company by it ſelf; one Company was commanded to bring up the Rere, and a Guard of twenty four foot-Souldiers were ordered to attend and march by the Chair of the Inca. Thus when the Indians found themſelves to join in one Body with the Spaniards, they were highly pleaſed to be ſo honoured, and eſteemed worthy to aſſociate and to join company with thoſe whom they adored for Gods. In this order they entred into the City with great Joy and Triumph, the Inhabitants going forth to meet them, with Dances and Songs compoſed in Praiſe of the Viracochas; for the poor people were overjoyed to ſee their Inca, and to underſtand that the true and lawfull Heir, which had eſcaped from the Tyranny of Atahualpa, was now to ſucceed into the Throne of his Anceſtours. The Street through which the Inca was to paſs, was covered with a ſort of their Ruſhes and Canes, and ſome triumphal Arches erected at a certain diſtance each from the other, decked with Flowers after the Faſhion which they uſed at the Triumphs of their Kings. The Spaniards conducted the King to one of the Royal Palaces, called Caſſana, ſituate in the Market-place, fronting to the Coloſſeo, belonging to the Jeſuites, where they left him highly pleaſed, and big with expectation to be reſtored to his Empire; for meaſuring the good Intentions of the Spaniards by the kind reception which they gave him, the Inca and his Attendants were fully perſuaded that the days were now returned, in which they ſhould enjoy the ancient Peace, Quiet and Freedom, which flouriſhed in the time of their Incas. So ſoon as the King was ſettled in his Lodgings, the Officers delivered the Preſents which they had brought to the Governour and his Viracochas, who received them with ſo many Thanks and kind Words, that the Indians were infinitely pleaſed and overjoyed at the grateſull acceptance of them. This was the onely happy day, crowned with Honour and Contentment, that this poor Inca had ever known in all the courſe of his former Life; for in the time of his Brother Atahualpa, he remained under great perſecutions, flying from place to place in perpetual dread and fear; and the remainder of his Days, untill the time of his Death, admitted of little more Conſolation than the former, as we ſhall ſee hereafter in the Sequel of this Story. When the Inca had a little repoſed himſelf in his Lodgings, he ſent to Franciſco Chaves, and his Companions, letting them know, that he was deſirous to ſee, and to be acquainted with them on the good report and character he had received from his People concerning them; ſo ſoon as they were come he embraced them with all demonſtration of kindneſs, and having drank with them, according to the cuſtome of the Incas, he told them, beſides many other kind expreſſions, that their Actions ſhewed them to be the true Off-ſpring of the God Viracocha, and Brethren of the Incas, becauſe they endeavoured to deliver Atahualpa from Death, which worthy Act he would ever acknowledge and recompence, deſiring them to eſteem him for their Brother, conſidering that they were all deſcended from the ſame Race and Lineage of the Sun; and then he preſented them with Veſſels of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, which he had brought apart for this Gentleman, and his Companions, which were taken ſo kindly, that Chaves, in the name of the reſt, returned his Complement, and ſaid, that they were all Servants of his Highneſs, and would evidence ſo much when occaſion ſhould offer, and that what they had endeavoured for his Brother, was onely in compliance with their Duty, and Obligation, and that if he doubted of their Reality, they deſired him to make a trial of their good-will and ſervices for him. Then the Inca embracing them again, diſmiſſed them, highly ſatisfied with the Preſents he had made them of Jewels, and of Gold, and Silver, Turquoiſes, and Emeralds.

Two days after his Arrival, the Prince Manco Inca propoſed to the Governour that he might be reſtored to his Empire, according to the Articles agreed between the Indians and the Spaniards, and that a firm Peace and an Alliance might be made between them: That Prieſts ſhould be ſent to preach and propagate the Law of the Chriſtians unto the Indians, as the Spaniards had themſelves propoſed; and that for what concerned the Inca to perform, he was ready to give his orders, that they ſhould be well received, and treated with high Veneration and Eſteem in all the principal Provinces of the Empire; where they would find the People very docible, and willing to be inſtructed in their Faith, upon the aſſurance they had received from their Father Huayna Capac, who at the time of his death did atteſt, that the Law of the Chriſtians was better than our own: And whereas this their Father had by his laſt Will and Teſtament ordained, that his People ſhould obey and ſerve the Spaniards, they were ready to comply with his Injunctions therein, and to reſign ſo much, and what part of the Kingdom they ſhould deſire, into their Hands.

To which the Governour returned this Anſwer, That his Highneſs was welcome to his own Imperial City, and that he ſhould reſt, and take his Repoſe with quietneſs and ſecurity: That he was very well pleaſed to know his Will and Pleaſure, that ſo he might give him a proof of his readineſs to comply with his Deſires: And that as to the Capitulations which were agreed, they were ſo juſt and reaſonable, that nothing could be objected againſt the performance of them. After which ſome Diſcourſe paſt, but very ſhort, for want of an Interpreter.

The next day the Governour holding a Conſultation with his Brothers, and the reſt of the Captains, touching the demand which was made by the Inca, ſeveral opinions aroſe upon the Debate, but it being conſidered, that the poſſeſſion of the Kingdom had no other meaning than the binding of the Inca's Head with the coloured Wreath; the Governour, with his Attendants, went to the Houſe of the Inca, and without farther Preface, or long Oration, deſired him to take immediate poſſeſſion of his Empire; for had he been acquainted with the cuſtome of his Countrey, he ſhould not have remained one moment without the Enſign of his Royal Dignity upon his Head; and that as to the Diviſion of the Kingdom, they would treat more fully hereafter, when matters were a little better ſettled in quietneſs, for that at preſent the Indians had made Inſurrections in divers places, which were not yet appeaſed; but as to the Services which the Indians were to perform towards the Spaniards, and the modification of the Peace, which was to be maintained, he remitted all to the Diſpoſition of the Inca, to order and deſign that which ſhould be moſt agreeable to his own Good-will and Pleaſure, which the Spaniards would embrace with a chearfull readineſs; but as to the Preachers which were intended to inſtruct his People in the Divine Law, they had ſo few Prieſts amongſt them, that as yet they could not ſpare any, but that when a new ſupply came, which they did ſhortly expect, they ſhould be immediately diſpeeded upon this Errant; for that the chief Deſign of the Chriſtians was to retract the Indians from the Errours of their ways, and to ſhew unto them the folly of their Superſtition and Idolatry. With theſe Aſſurances the Indians were greatly ſatisfied, and the Inca delayed not immediately to bind his Head with the coloured Wreath; which Ceremony was attended with great Joy and Triumph, though for want of thoſe of the Bloud Royal, and of many Curacas or Barons, who were cut off by the Cruelty of Atahualpa, the ſolemnity was nothing ſo ſplendid and magnificent as in the times of the ancient Incas, when the great numbers of Nobility added Glory to the Court; yet the young Gallants rejoiced to ſee that Feſtival, how mean ſoever, at which the old Men grieved, who remembred the times of the Great Huayna Capac, and had ſeen the ſplendour of his Court.

CHAP. XIII.

How the two Governours marched in purſuit of Major General Quizquiz.

IN our former Diſcourſe, we left Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Don Diego de Almagro, with their brisk Souldiery on their march towards Cozco, where the Governour Don Franciſco de Piçarro kept his Court; and as they were on their way, News was brought them, that the Major General Quizquiz had gathered great Forces, and was encamped in the Province of Cannaris, having with him much Gold, and Silver, and other pretious Commodities, with great Flocks and Herds of Cattel. The Fame hereof increaſed in the telling, as is uſual, wherefore the Governours reſolved to march that way to defeat that Army, and deſtroy the Tyrant, having underſtood from the Indians, that there was no other Army beſides that in all the Empire. Though Quizquiz was ſtrong in his numbers, yet he was not willing, or very ready to engage with the Spaniards; for in regard that both he, and the Inca Titu Atauchi, had ſent the Articles and Capitulations to the Governour, which they had concluded and agreed with Franciſco de Chaves and his Companions, (as we have before mentioned,) they remained in expectation to hear of a general Peace between the Indians and the Spaniards, and little dreamed of any Forces which were marching to deſtroy them. This ſecurity and confidence was much increaſed by the perſuaſion of the Inca Titu Atauchi, on whoſe Words uttered at the hour of his Death they much relied; for we muſt know, that this poor Inca died a few days after he had diſmiſſed Chaves and his Companions; his end being haſtned by the melancholy, he conceived for the ſad fate of his Brother Atahualpa, and by the news of the bloudy Tragedy, acted by that Traytor Rumminavi in Quitu on his Kindred, Brothers, Captains, and on the innocent ſelect Virgins. All which Maſſacres and Villanies committed by a Vaſſal on the Bloud Royal, and on the Life of his own Inca, he eſteemed to be forerunners of the entire ſubverſion of the Empire, and of the Majeſty of his Family, and being overwhelmed with the ſenſe thereof, he called for Quizquiz, and his other Captains, and told them plainly, that they ſhould endeavour to make a Peace with the Viracochas, and ſhould ſerve and adore them, according as the Inca Huayna Capac had by his laſt Will and Teſtament ordered and commanded them; who being the Oracle of that time, his Ordinances and Rules were eſteemed indiſpenſible, therefore they ſhould endeavour to pleaſe the Viracochas, who were the Offſpring deſcended from their Father the Sun, and of the ſame Lineage with the Incas; cas; all which he farther enforced and confirmed by virtue of the Command and Charge committed unto him by his Father Huayna Capac.

With such Arguments as these, and in hopes and expectations that the Capitulations would be maintained, Quizquiz remained very secure in the matters of War; and though he received Intelligence that the Governours were marching towards him, yet he apprehended no hurt, nor received an Allarm, onely he detached about an hundred Souldiers, under a Centurion or Captain, (which is the smallest number that the Indians have in a Company,) this Centurion the Historians Gomara and Carate call Sotaurco, which signifies six Mountains, for C,Octa signifies six, and Oreo a Mountain, for he was born in a Valley between six lofty Mountains, (such as are common in that Countrey,) and they say, that his Father and Mother were in his company, which must be upon some extraordinary occasion, for Women never go to the War with their Husbands; perhaps it might be to keep up the story of his Birth and of his Life, for the Indians by such like Names, and by such Sayings, or by Cyphers, or Hieroglyphicks, and by their Verses and Poetry have conserved the Traditions of their History; and have therein comprehended the success of all their Matters in a compendious manner, as for example; the Embassies sent to their Incas, and their Answer thereunto; the Speeches made in Peace and War; what such a King or Governour commanded, with the punishments inflicted; and in short, whatsoever was transacted in the publick Affairs. All which the Historians, or Notaries, taught unto their Children by Tradition, instructing them in Cyphers, and short Versicles, and in such short Words as the Name of this Captain, and in such other Brief Sayings as we have already declared; by help of which, and of their Knots, an Indian would read or recount the passages of his Time, as well, or faster than a Spaniard could reade Books writ with Letters, as Acosta testifies in the 8th Chapter of his 6th Book; not that these Knots furnished him with Words, but onely called things to his Memory, which having studied day and night, he became versed in every particular, so as to be able to render an account of his Office. All which though we have formerly declared at large, yet having so pertinent an Instance as this Name of Captain C,Octaorco, we have thought it not impertinent to repeat the same, that we may verifie what we have formerly reported, and to help the Memory of the Reader. This Captain, as we have said, was sent by Quizquiz for a scout to discover the March and Force of the Spaniards, and to know their Intentions towards him; but the silly Wretch was not so cautious as he ought to have been, but suffered himself to be surprised, and taken by the Spaniards, who carried him to Alvarado, and by him the Spaniards were informed of the place where Quizquiz was quartered, and of the numbers and force he had with him, so they marched with all expedition towards him, and being near, they watched all night to beat up his Quarters early in the morning. This Exploit was committed to a party of Horse, which travelling over rocky Hills and Ways, for the space of a Day's Journey, most of the Horse cast their Shoes, so that they were forced to shoe them by candle-light, as the Writers of this matter do generally agree. All the next day they continued their Journey with great haste and expedition, lest Quizquiz should receive intelligence of their March, by return of some of those they met, and so they proceeded untill the next day in the Evening, by which time they were come within sight of the Camp of Quizquiz, who upon their appearance immediately fled, with all his Women and Attendants. This is affirmed by Carate, and Gomara reports almost the same thing; the which is a sufficient proof, that Quizquiz never intended to make War on the Spaniards, or was provided for it; for if he had, certainly he would have been better guarded, than by a company of Women, and domestick Attendants; nor were his Souldiers so inexpert, or unskilfull in War, as not to have appeared with Arms at the Camp, or Rendezvous upon the Summons of their Captain, which might have been speedily effected by passing the Word from one to the other. But this amusement and stupid security of Quizquiz may well be attributed to the Providence of Heaven, which had designed the Spaniards to be Preachers of the Gospel. Moreover Quizquiz depended on the Capitulations which the Indians had made with Francisco Chaves, of which those Spaniards who marched against him were not informed, for Don Diego de Almagro was departed from Cozco with his Forces, in search of Alvarado, before Francisco de Chaves had brought the News thereof. So the Spaniards being ignorant of the Goodwill and Intentions of Quizquiz, went with Design to destroy him, which had been avoided, had there been a true and right understanding of matters between them; but the Devil, who always delights in Discord and Mischiefs, had by his Artifice contrived to prevent the true Information, that so matters proceeding to Bloud and Tyranny, the Indians might be possessed with a sinister and prejudicial esteem of the Spaniards, and of the Christian Doctrine they professed to propagate.

to

CHAP. XIV.

Three Battels between the Indians and the Spaniards; and of the Number of the Slain.

Quizquiz observing the haste which the Spaniards made towards him, did imagine that their Design was to engage him to fight, and therefore repenting too late of his Security and Neglect, and being mad, and ashamed for his Folly and stupidity, he retreated as well as he could, unto the top of a craggy and rugged Mountain, which was unpassable, and inaccessible for Horses, where he secured his Women and useless People; and in the mean time, to amuse and employ the Spaniards, he sent a certain Captain, whom the Spaniards call Guaypalcon, though his proper Name was Huaypallca, the signification of which I do not well understand, because it is a word of the Language of Quitu; but this Person, as we said, was sent with Commission to raise what Forces he was able to oppose the Spaniards, and having gathered some numbers together, he durst not assault Alvarado, fearing the great Body of his Horse, which drew themselves up on such Ground, where they might be most serviceable, and not fight upon a disadvantage. Howsoever he found an opportunity to engage Almagro, who, to encompass Quisquiz between him and Alvarado, was mounted with his Horse to such a craggy and asperous part of a mountain, that he was in danger of being entirely lost and defeated, as Carate confirms by these Words: "Huaypalcon, says he, with his Souldiers, went to engage Almagro, who, with his "Horse, was got up to the ridge of a Mountain, the ascent unto which was so "steep, that they mounted by turnings and windings, and had wearied and tired "all their Horses; and besides, the Indians threw down from the top mighty "great Stones, called Galgas, which tumbling five or six furlongs down, carried "thirty or forty more before them, and these drove innumerable others, before "they came to the bottome. Thus far are the Words of Carate, the which are confirmed in like manner by Gomara, as we shall see hereafter.

Almagro was greatly incommoded by the fall of these Rocks which killed both his Men and Horse, and he himself also was in great danger of his Life, to avoid which, he was forced to take another way less rugged, that so he might be enabled the better to come at Huaypallca, who fearing to fall between the two Commanders, retreated to the safeguard of a steep and craggy Mountain, by help of which he valiantly defended himself untill night; for in such inaccessible places as those, neither the Horse nor Foot could be of Service; and the Indians had a great advantage of the Viracochas, or Spaniards, who were laden with Armour and offensive Weapons. The night being come, Huaypallca, by help of the darknes retreated with his Souldiers into more fast and secure places. The Day following the Spaniards fell in with the Rere-guard of Quizquiz, who not dreaming of War or fighting, marched with their Army divided into two Bands, at least fifteen Leagues distant one from the other; as is reported by Carate in the 12th Chapter of his 2d Book, and in the same Chapter he hath these Words following. "Don "Diego, and D. Pedro rallied all their Forces together, and the Indians, by the ob- "scurity of the night, escaped, and went to join themselves with Quizquiz, and "the 3000 Indians, who taking their way by the Left-hand, cut off the Heads of

" fourteen Spaniards, whom they had encountred at a diſtance from the Main Bo" dy, and ſo marching forward they overtook the Rere-guard of Quizquiz; then
" the Indians fortified themſelves at the Paſs of a River, where they faced the Spa- " niards for a whole day, and ſuffered none of them to paſs, whilſt others of " them paſſed over above; then the Spaniards intended to make an Attempt up" on the Indians, who had taken the ſide of a very high mountain; but it had like " to have proved fatal to them, by reaſon that the Spaniards in that craggy and " rugged ground, could not make a Retreat when they pleaſed; ſo that many of " them were wounded, as namely, Captain Alonſo de Alvarado, who was run " through the thigh, as was likewiſe a Lieutenant, and all that night the Indians " kept ſtrict Watch. But ſo ſoon as it was day, they quitted the paſs on the " River, and fortified themſelves in the Mountains, where the Spaniards left them
" in quiet, becauſe Almagro did not judge it convenient to continue his Quarters in " that place. Thus far are the Words of Carate, with whom Gomara agrees, and in the 130th Chapter of his Book hath theſe Words: " Quizquiz flying, and " running away, had not gone many Leagues before the Spaniards fell upon his " rere; which when the Indians perceived, they defended the Banks of a River to " keep the Spaniards from paſſing. Their numbers were ſo great, that whilſt ſome
" maintained the paſſage of the River, others above got over, and put themſelves
" into a poſture of fight, intending to encompaſs the Spaniards on all ſides, and to " kill and take them as they pleaſed; then they poſſeſſed themſelves of a little " Hill, which was very rocky, to ſecure themſelves from the Spaniſh Horſe, from " which with ſome advantage and freſh courage they renewed the Fight, and kil" led ſome of the Horſe, which could not eaſily turn or move in that rugged
" place, and wounded ſeveral Spaniards, of which Alonſo de Alvarado de Burga was " run through the thigh, and Don Diego de Almagro himſelf narrowly eſcaped. Thus far are the Words of Gomara. The Spaniards which were killed in this Fight, and died afterwards of their wounds, received in the three late Skirmiſhes, were fifty three in all, reckoning the fourteen which Carate mentions, and eighteen were cured of their wounds: The Horſes killed were thirty four, one of which was that of Almagro, which was overthrown by the rowling down of a Galga or Rock, which ſtruck him a-thwart his hinder leg, and broke it, with which Man and Horſe came to the ground; and had the ſtone taken them full, both of them had been beaten to pieces. Of the Indians not above ſixty were killed, for the Rocks were their protection, on which the Spaniards and their Horſe fought with great diſadvantage; for which reaſon Almagro withdrew his Forces, and would not farther engage in thoſe places, being troubled at the loſs he had received in thoſe two days Engagements; which Gomara in the 130th Chapter of his Book mentions in ſhort, and deſcribes the unhappy Encounter which our Men had with the Rereguard of Quizquiz, &c. Blas Valera reckoning up the moſt Memorable Battels, and which had been the moſt fatal to the Spaniards of any in Peru, he mentions eight, beſides ſeveral other Skirmiſhes of leſſer moment; and numbers this in the firſt place, calling it the Battel of Quitu, becauſe it was fought on the frontiers of that Countrey; and ſays, that the Spaniards had then been moſt certainly defeated and deſtroyed, had not the Divine Providence, which deſigned by their means to propagate the Goſpel in thoſe parts, appeared for them: And alſo the Spaniards, who were then preſent in thoſe Engagements confirm the ſame; and I have heard many of them declare, that they often gave themſelves over for loſt in their Fights with the Indians; and that when things ſeemed to be deſperate, and according to humane reaſon, without all hopes, and poſſibility of eſcape, then preſently, and on a ſudden, their fortune would turn, and by ſome unexpected accident from Heaven they became victorious. And diſcourſing on theſe matters, and of the great dangers and hazards they had ſuſtained, they would often ſay, that if the Indians, who came with no intention to fight, and without any order being divided into four Squadrons, were able to doe them ſo much hurt, and put them into ſo much diſorder; what would they have done, had they been aware, and had come with deſign to engage under the Command and Diſcipline of their Commander Quiz- quiz, who was accounted a famous, and a renowned Captain, as Gomara reports, when he relates the Story of him, and of the manner whereby he was put to Death by his own Souldiers.

After all which Don Diego de Almagro ſent to gather the ſpoils, which the Hiſtorians mention to have been a thouſand head of Cattel, and about a thouſand

Indian Men and Women for ſervice, which were forced or preſſed to attend the Camp; and which finding themſelves free, and at liberty, ran away, and fled to the Spaniards. As to the fine Linen and Cloth, little appeared, for the Indians, rather than be troubled with too great baggage, burnt it; and likewiſe made away with the Gold and Silver, and concealed it in ſuch manner, as it never after came to light; of all which Almagro gave intelligence to the Governour, and of the ſucceſs of the two Battels, and diſpatched his Advices by Indians whom he ſent with his Letters: And alſo that Don Pedro de Alvarado was on his Journey towards Cozco to make him a viſit, that ſo he might accordingly provide for his reception.

CHAP. XV.

The Governour departs from Cozco to meet Alvarado; he ſees him and pays him the Money according to agreement.

THE Governour Piçarro having received intelligence of the loſs of the Men and Horſe, which were killed by the Souldiers of Quizquiz, was very much troubled, eſteeming it of ill conſequence for the Spaniards to be baffled, or the reputation which they had gained, to ſuffer and be impaired in the opinion of the Indians; but there being no remedy for what was paſt, but onely patience, he encouraged his Souldiers, and adviſed them to proceed more warily for the future. And in regard he was adviſed that Alvarado was marching towards Cozco, he was deſirous to prevent him, and ſave him the trouble of a long Journey; and therefore to cut matters ſhort, he provided to make him the payment for which Almagro had agreed, and with that to perſuade him to return; for though he deſired to ſee him, yet it might be inconvenient, and cauſe ſome diſorders to have three Governours, as in reality there would be within that Juriſdiction. For theſe Governours, when they were poor, might poſſibly agree in co-ordinate rule each with other; but being rich and powerfull, and in a condition of Sovereignty, which admits of no equal, and perhaps of no Second, they could not long continue Peace, and a Brotherly Alliance; the which diſcord cauſed by Ambition, was the Original of all the misfortunes and fatal calamities which befell them, as will appear in the ſequel of this Hiſtory. On this conſideration the Governour, that he might haſten the diſpatch and return of Alvarado, reſolved to go and meet him as far as the Valley of Pachacamac; ſo that he might neither travel at too far a diſtance from the Sea-coaſt, and might excuſe him from a Journey of two hundred and forty Leagues, as the going would be from Pachacamac to Cozco, and the return back again to that place; and beſides, he was not willing that he ſhould ſee the Imperial City, and the Grandeur and Riches thereof, leſt the temptations of that Wealth ſhould cauſe alteration, and a breach of the Articles agreed; and therefore he was impatient untill he ſaw them again ratified and confirmed. As to the Equipage for his Journey, he took the opinion and ſenſe of his Brothers, and other Officers of his Army; recommending in the mean time the Perſon of the Inca unto their care, and all other matters which were neceſſary to conſerve their Peace and League with the Indians. And in order thereunto he diſcourſed with the Inca, and told him, that it was convenient for him to abſent himſelf for ſome days, whilſt he could make a Journey to the Valley of Pachacamac, for performance of ſome agreements made with the Spaniards, who were lately come into thoſe Countries; on confirmation of which, the Articles made between the Indians and Spaniards did much depend, which ſhould be faithfully complied with at at his return; and therefore he desired his licence to make that Journey for a few days, leaving in the mean time his Brothers, and other Spaniards, in the Service of his Highness, who, he supposed, would be acceptable to him, in regard he esteemed them for his Kindred, and to be of the same Lineage and Off-spring from the Sun. To which the Inca made answer, that he wished him a prosperous Journey; and as to his two Brothers, and the other Viracochas, he would take them into his care, and treat them with such respect and kind usage, as that he should have cause to render him thanks for the same at his return. And having said this, he immediately dispatched a Message to the Commanders of the several Places and Countries through which the Governour was to pass, that they should appoint their Subjects and Vassals to attend his coming, and wait on him in the same manner, as on his own Person; and moreover, that they should provide a Guard of two hundred Men to attend and conduct the Governour, and to change them every three days, so that they might be more fresh and active in his Service.

The Governour having understood what the Inca had appointed in reference unto him, took his leave and farewell of him, making choice of thirty Horse to attend him on this Journey; and being come to Sausta, he received intelligence that Don Diego, and D. Pedro de Alvarado were to pass by the way of Pachacamac, to visit that great Temple in those parts: Wherefore he hastened his Journey, that he might meet them in that pleasant Valley, and there receive and treat Alvarado, and demonstrate that honour to him which was due to a famous Captain of his Quality and Renown, and accordingly preparations were made for his reception and treatment. Twenty days after the Governour had been at Pachacamac, Don Pedro de Alvarado arrived there, being received by him with all the caresses and demonstrations of respect and kindness that could be expressed; for he gave positive command to his People and Officers, to own and acknowledge Alvarado for their Chief and Governour, and to give him that title solely; and as to himself and Almagro, to distinguish them by no other titles of Honour, than their own proper Names; and accordingly, during all the time that Alvarado remained at Pachacamac, Piçarro refused to take cognisance of any cause, matter, or thing, whatsoever, but referred all to the judgment of Alvarado, whom he commanded his people to observe and obey; seeming extremely rejoyced with the sight and presence of so many Illustrious Cavaliers, who were come in the train and company of Alvarado, and whom he honoured and complemented with all the demonstrations of respect and civility that could be expressed. After some days had passed with ceremony and complement, and with the satisfaction of mutual contentment, Piçarro paid to Alvarado the hundred thousand Pesos of Gold, as was agreed, with an additional Aid of twenty thousand more to pay the charges of his Journey thither, besides many Emeralds and Torquoises of considerable value, and several Vessels of Gold for his use and service. And indeed the succour and reputation which Alvarado brought to this enterprise might well deserve such a reward for the Horse, Men and Arms which he brought with him, so terrified and affrighted the Souldiers of Atahualpa, that they entirely yielded and resigned their whole Empire into the hands of the Spaniards: In consideration of which, the Governour honestly and justly, without farther dispute or scruple, paid the Money, as was agreed, with the other advantages as aforesaid; though others were of opinion (as Gomara and Carate report) that Piçarro had done better if he had not paid the Money, but rather had taken Alvarado and sent him Prisoner to Spain, for having by force of Arms invaded his Territory, in regard that such a compact which was made with Almagro by force of Arms, was not obligatory; or at least if the Money was to have been paid, yet that he should pay him no more than fifty thousand Pesos of Gold, (which made one hundred thousand pieces of Eight) because that the Ships and Arms were not more worth, two of the Ships belonging to Piçarro himself; and as to the Men, Horses and Arms, they belonged not to Alvarado, but were the Goods and Estates of other Men. Howsoever, Piçarro being a Man of honour, and one who more regarded his word and reputation, than the evasions which some would suggest to him, whereby to cause him to violate and break his Faith and Word: He paid Alvarado in that noble and generous manner as we have expressed, with regard to that honour and respect which one Gentleman ought in all dealings to perform towards another. And though the agreement was made by his Partner, yet he esteemed it obligatory to himself, preferring his Paroll of Honour before any interest whatsoever. And though some did object object, that Almagro made a blind bargain, and did not well consider of the value of the Ships, or perhaps was inforced to that Engagement; yet Piçarro returned a full answer thereunto, That a Gentleman ought well to consider of his promise before he gave it, and not to pretend afterwards that he was surprized, being by the rules of a Souldier, and of a Gentleman, engaged to a performance of his words. And on the contrary Alvarado might have alledged, that in case they esteemed themselves agrieved, they needed onely to restore things to their former state, in which they were before the agreement, and leave him then to make his best advantage. And as to the price of the Ships, which they supposed might be over-charged, were the advantage duly considered, which they brought by the succours and recruits of Men, Horse, Arms and Guns; the reputation of which brought a terrour on all that Empire, and reduced it to subjection, nothing could have been esteemed too great to have procured that assistence, much less when it was obtained at so small a rate, as the bare fraight did amount unto. In fine, Piçarro, who was noble and sincere in his dealings, replied to those who gave him contrary advice, that no consideration of benefit or profit could balance or stand in competition with his Faith and Honour; and so with this constancy and resolution he rejected the low and degenerate counsels of mean-spirited Men, and applied himself to receive and treat Alvarado with all the esteem, kindness and magnificence that he was able.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the unfortunate Death of Don Pedro de Alvarado.

ADmiral Don Pedro de Alvarado being greatly satisfied with the kind and obliging treatment which Don Francisco de Piçarro had made him, they took their leave and farewell each of other with all the kind expressions and complements imaginable, offering mutual succours and assistences as the affairs and emergencies in which they were now engaged, should respectively require. So Alvarado returned to his Government of Huahutimallan, where he reposed not long, or enjoyed the riches and prosperity which he had acquired; but being exalted with his triumphs and his good fortune, which had ever attended him from his Youth, he proceeded to higher Actions and Atchievements, being restless, and desirous of vain-glory, untill he perished therein, as we shall find hereafter. And though the success hereof doth not properly appertain to this History; yet considering the unhappy and lamentable end of this famous Captain, who had performed so many brave Exploits in divers Countries, which the Renowned John de Grijalva had discovered, and in the Conquest of the Empire of Mexico in company with Hernando Cortes; and lastly, in the Province of Guatimala, or Huahutimallan, which he conquered by his own Arms, and in other parts of New Spain: Besides all which, we may add the Conquests which he made in Peru, for without his aid and assistence that Empire could never have been secured. Howsoever, he died, as Gomara in the 210th Chapter of his History of the Indies reports, besides many other particulars worthy to be mentioned, which I have extracted verbatim, as followeth:

" Pedro de Alvarado remaining quiet, and peaceably settled in his Government " of Huahutimallan and Chiapa, the latter of which he exchanged with Francisco " Montejo for his Dominion of the Honduras, obtained licence of the Emperour to " discover and plant a Colony in Quitu, which was one of the Provinces of Peru, " and a Countrey which was rich, and not as yet possessed by the Spaniards. On " this Adventure, in the year 1535, he armed and set forth five Ships, upon " which and upon two others which he fraighted in Nicaragua, he embarked five " hundred Spaniards, and many Horses; the which being landed at Puerto Viejo,

" he

" he marched to Quitu, having in that Journey endured much cold and hunger; " the news whereof affected the minds of Piçarro and Almagro with jealouſie and " fear. At length he ſold the Ships, Guns, &c. for two hundred thouſand pieces " of Eight; which having received, he returned rich and triumphant unto Hua- " timallan. After which he built ten or twelve Ships, one Gally, and other Pin- " naces which were light, and rowed well with the Ore, with deſign to make " a Voyage to the Eſpeeeria, and a farther diſcovery towards the Cape of Vallenas, " called by ſome California. In the year 1538, Friar Marcos de Niça, and other " Franciſcan Friars travelled by Land through the Countrey of Culhuacan, at leaſt " three hundred Leagues to the Weſtward, and much farther than the Spaniards " of Xalixco had as yet diſcovered, and returned with high commendations of " the Countries, and of the Riches and good Air of Sibola, and other Cities. " Upon the relation of theſe Friars, they reſolved once to ſend an Army by Sea " to thoſe parts under the Command of Don Antonio de Mendoça, Vice-king of New " Spain, and Don Fernando Cortes Marquis de Valle, who was Captain-General of " New Spain, and firſt Diſcoverer of the Coaſt along the South-Sea; but not a- " greeing upon Articles, they quarrelled, and ſo Cortes returned into Spain, and " Alvarado was ſent in his place with the Ships before mentioned; for which the " Money, as aforeſaid, was paid him. Alvarado ſailed, as I conceive, with his " Fleet to the Port of Navidad, and thence travelled by Land to Mexico, where " he agreed with the Vice-king upon an adventure to Sibola, without any regard " to the gratitude he owed to Cortes, who was the Authour of all his fortune. " In his return from Mexico, he paſſed through Xalixco, to ſubdue and reduce the " people of that Kingdom, who had made an Inſurrection, and were in defiance " againſt the Spaniards. At length he came to Eçatlan, where Diego de Lopez was " making War againſt the Rebels, and joyning his Forces with him, they ſtormed " the Indians, who had fortified themſelves on the corner of a Rock with ſuch " reſolution, that having killed thirty of them, they put the reſt unto flight; and " having climbed up into a high and narrow Rock, many of their Horſes came " tumbling down the Precipice: And whereas one of them came ſliding down " juſt upon the Horſe of Alvarado, he, to avoid him, alighted, intending to give " him way, and ſave himſelf; but the Horſe in his fall ſtriking on the edge of a " Rock, turned his fall juſt on Alvarado, and carried him headlong with him " down to the bottom; the which misfortune happened on Midſummer-day, in " the year 1541, and in a few days after died of the bruiſes he had received at " Eçatlan, which is a place about three hundred Leagues diſtant from Huatimallan; " he conſerved his Senſes, and the judgment of a Chriſtian, untill the laſt; for " being asked where his chief pain was, he anſwered, in his Soul: As to other " matters, he was a Man of a free and chearfull temper. Thus far are the Words of Gomara; and at the end of the ſame Chapter he adds, " That he left no Eſtate, " nor did there remain any Memory or Relicks of him, unleſs what is before re- " cited, and a Daughter which he had by an Indian Woman, which was after- " wards Married to Don Franciſco de la Cueva; and ſo he concludes that Chapter. This Relation is the very ſame which is commonly current in Peru, with all the circumſtances thereof; onely they differ in this, that one ſays it was a Horſe that tumbled upon him; and the other, that it was a Rock, which was thrown down by the fall of a Horſe; 'tis probable that it might be the one as well as the o- ther, and that the Horſe and Stones might come all rowling down together. Beſides, I was acquainted with his Daughter, and with one of his Sons, who was a Mongrel or Meſtizo (as we call them) born of an Indian Woman, named Don Diego de Alvarado, a Son worthy, and not degenerating from a Father of ſuch great renown, for he reſembled his Father in all his Vertues; was a true pattern of him in all circumſtances, nor did he differ from him in the very misfortune of his Death; for having with other Spaniards made his eſcape from the Battel of Chelqui Inca, he was afterwards killed by the Indians in the purſuit, as we ſhall here- after relate in its due place.

Thus ended the Life of this worthy Cavalier Don Pedro de Alvarado, he was Knight of the Habit of St. Jago, and one of the moſt dexterous with his Lance of any that paſſed into the New World. His unhappy Death was greatly lamented at Cozco by all thoſe who had been his followers in that Empire; many Maſſes were ſaid for his Soul at that time, and for ſeveral years afterwards; I my ſelf have been preſent at ſome, which were ſaid for him, when I was there. Whenſoever any any occaſion was offered to make mention of him, I have heard ſeveral Gentlemen remember him with great praiſe of his Goodneſs and Vertue; and ſome of them ſpecified and recounted the kindneſſes and good offices he had ſhewn to them in particular: And whereas he was very familiarly acquainted, and converſant in my Father's houſe; I have been an Ear-witneſs of divers paſſages relating to his good Nature, and to the generoſity of his great Soul: One of which was this; That in their Voyage to Peru his people ſuffered much for want of freſh Water; ſo that when they came to Tumpiz, they became very ſickly, and many of them were ſo weakned by the Calenture Fever, by reaſon of the Thirſt they had endured, that they were not able to leave the Ship and Land on the ſhore. Wherefore Alvarado himſelf landed from the Ship, and provided them with Water; and though he had ſuffered as much by Thirſt as any of them, yet he would not taſte a drop of Water untill he was aſſured that the Sick had drank, and all the Ships-company had been provided. Many other generous Acts of this nature were related of this worthy Gentleman; though Gomara in his Writings gives a different character of him, which he muſt have received from ſome of thoſe (as there were many) who were envious and emulous of his Vertues and Fortune: And though it was impoſſible to ſuppreſs the fame of his Exploits and Adventures, which were notorious to all the World, yet at leaſt they endeavoured to eclipſe and diſparage the glory of them. Of which this Authour being ſenſible, did in part excuſe and clear himſelf of the falſity of thoſe reports which were given; and ſo concludes the 192d Chapter of his Book with theſe words: He that doth well, and is not praiſed, lives amongſt bad Neighbours, &c. And this he ſaid, becauſe he knew that in all eſtates of Men, there are ſome who are envious and ſlanderers, and unworthy the ſociety of good Men, being inclined to ſpeak a lye, rather than to utter truth in commendations of another. And now we ſhall return to the Affairs of Peru, and to the Tranſactions therein ſince the departure of Don Pedro de Alvarado from thence.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Foundation of the City de los Reyes, and of the City of Truxillo.

SO ſoon as the Governour had diſmiſſed Don Pedro de Alvarado, he immediately gave notice thereof to his Partner Don Diego de Almagro, then at Cozco, and therewith ſent a great number of thoſe Gentlemen which came with Alvarado, to be entertained in the Service of the Prince Manco Inca, and his Brothers, John and Gonçalo Piçarro, deſiring them to be ſerviceable to the Inca, and kind to the Indians; for in regard the Inca ſurrendred himſelf voluntarily, and of his own accord, he would not have him loſe that confidence and affection which he had conceived of the Spaniards; in the mean time the Governour remained in the Valley of Pachacamac, with deſign to build a City near the Sea-coaſt for the better advantage of Trade and Commerce: And having conſidered upon this matter with his friends, he diſpatched ſeveral perſons experienced in Maritime affairs, to diſcover on both ſides where was the moſt convenient place for a Port or Harbour. At length being informed, that four Leagues to the North of Pachacamac, there was a very ſafe Port right againſt the Valley of Rimac; which when the Governour had viewed and ſurveyed, he tranſplanted the people which had begun to ſettle a Colony in the Valley of Sauſſa, which is thirty Leagues from Rimac within the Land, unto that convenient place where he founded the City of los Reyes in the year 1534.

But as to the preciſe year, Authours differ very much; for ſome make it ſooner, and others later; and ſome will have it in the year 1530, leaving out the 4. But not to inſiſt on theſe ſeveral opinions, let us compare the times with the great and notable Actions which ſucceeded; for it is moſt certain, and therein all Authours agree, that it was in the year 1525, when Piçarro, Almagro, and the School-maſter Hernando de Luca, did firſt enter into Articles of their Triumvirate. Three years afterwards were ſpent in the diſcovery, before they arrived the firſt time at Tumpiz. Two years farther paſſed before they could finiſh their Voyage into Spain to procure their Commiſſion to make a Conqueſt, and before their return back to Panama with Ammunition and Proviſions for ſuch an undertaking. In the year 1531, they invaded the Iſland Puna, and alſo Tumpiz; and in December of the ſame year they took Atahualpa Priſoner; and in March following, being the year 1532, he was put to Death, in October following they entred into Cozco, where the Governour reſided untill April 1533, when news came of the Arrival of Alvarado; and in September he departed from Cozco to meet him, and pay him the Money according to agreement. And about the beginning of the year 1534, being Twelfth-day, or the Day of the Kings, he laid the Foundation of that City, and ſo called it la ciudad de los Reyes, or the City of the Kings: In remembrance of which he made the Arms of the City to be Three Crowns, with a Star ſhining over them; the Form or Model of it was very beautifull, for the Market-place was very wide and large, unleſs perhaps it was too wide for the City, the Streets alſo were wide and ſtreight; ſo that from every corner of them croſs-ways, the Fields may be ſeen on all ſides. On the North-ſide there is a River, from which ſeveral Chanels are cut, to water the Lands round about, and to ſupply every Houſe in the City with water. This Town, at a diſtance, makes no good ſhew, nor appears well, becauſe the Houſes are not covered with Tile, but thatched with a ſort of Straw which that Countrey yields; for in regard it never Rains in that Climate, nor for many Leagues diſtant on either ſide along the Coaſt, the coverings of the Houſes are all made of a ſort of Straw, or Ruſhes, which grow in that Countrey; on which laying a kind of Mortar, or Earth, mixed with Straw, two or three fingers thick, it makes a good defence againſt the Heats of the Sun: But as to the Buildings themſelves, both within and without, they are good and commodious, and they daily improve their Art in Architecture. This Town is about two ſmall Leagues diſtant from the Sea; but as the report is, the parts neareſt to the Sea are beſt inhabited. The Climate is hot and moiſt, and much of the ſame temperament with that of Andaluzia; the difference of which is onely, that the Days there are not ſo long, nor the Nights ſo ſhort in July and Auguſt, as they are here; ſo that the Sun ariſing there more late, and ſetting more early, hath not time to heat and warm the Earth, as in thoſe Regions where the Days are longer; ſo that though the ſituation be nearer the Sun, yet the Nights being long, the Earth hath more time to become cool, and to be refreſhed: But in regard the Heats are conſtant, and admit of ſmall remiſſions, the Inhabitants being habituated or accuſtomed thereunto, do invent and contrive preventions and remedies againſt the Heats, both in the coolneſs of their Houſes, Garments and Bedding, which they ſo cover and fence, that the Flies and Gnats (with which that Countrey is much infeſted) can have no paſſage to hinder or diſturb their repoſe, either by day or night; for in theſe low Grounds and Marſhes, the Gnats are extremely buſie and troubleſome, as well by day as by night; thoſe which are buſie at night, make a buzzing, and are of the ſame colour with ſuch as we have here, onely that they are much greater, and ſting ſo terribly, that the Spaniards ſay, that they will bite through a pair of Cordovan Boots; perhaps indeed they may paſs a knit Stockin, with a Linen one under it, but not if it were of Cloth or Kerſy; and indeed in ſome Countries they are much more keen and hungry than they are in others: The Gnats which are troubleſome by day, are little, and not much unlike thoſe which are here bred in Shops, and generated from Wine; onely they are of a yellowiſh colour, and ſo thirſty of bloud, (that as I have heard credibly reported) many of them have been ſeen to burſt at the ſame time that they have been ſucking: To try this experiment, I have ſuffered ſome of them to ſuck of my bloud, as much as they would; and when they were full, they would drop off, and rowl, but were not able to go or fly: The ſtings of theſe Gnats are in ſome degree poiſonous, eſpecially to ſome ſorts of fleſh, in which they will make little wounds, though not dangerous, or of great moment.

By

By reaſon that the City of los Reyes is of a hot and moiſt Air, Fleſh will immediately corrupt in it; and therefore when it is newly killed and bought, it muſt be eaten the ſame day, which are all qualities different to the Climate of Cozco, that being hot, and this cold, or temperate. The Cities and other Colonies of Spaniards, which are ſituate along the Coaſt of Peru, are all of the ſame temperament with the Town of los Reyes, being under the ſame degree. All the other Cities within the Land from Quitu, as far as Chuquiſaca, which runs for the ſpace of ſeven hundred Leagues North and South, are of a pleaſant Climate, not being cold as Cozco, nor hot like Rimac, but of an equal and moderate temperature; excepting onely the ſituation of Potoſi, where the Mines of Silver are, is extremely cold, and the Air penetrating. The Indians call it Puna, which is to ſay, a Climate, not habitable by reaſon of coldneſs; howſoever the love and thirſt of Silver hath invited ſuch numbers of Spaniards and Indians to that place, that at preſent it is the moſt populous, and the beſt ſerved with Proviſions of any Countrey in all Peru. Acoſta in the 6th Chapter of his 4th Book, mentioning the Greatneſs of that Colony, ſays, that the Town, that is, the place inhabited is two Leagues, (which are ſix miles) in compaſs.

Thus much ſhall be ſufficient to have ſpoken in general of all the Cities and Plantations of Peru, ſo as that we need not treat farther of any one in particular: But to return to the City of los Reyes; we ſay, that the Governour Franciſco Piçarro having founded this City, and divided the Lands, Fields, and Inheritances together with the Indians amongſt his Spaniards, he deſcended to the Valley of Chimo, about eighty Leagues Northward from los Reyes, along the Sea-coaſt, and there built another City, which to this day is called Truxillo, and was ſo named in remembrance of his own Countrey: At which place alſo he made a diviſion of Lands to the firſt Conquerours, to whom he marked out the ſeveral Provinces, Lands and Poſſeſſions, which belonged to every perſon in reward of the labours and hazards which every perſon had ſuſtained. The like he performed in the City and Countrey of los Reyes, where he with great applauſe and ſatisfaction aſſigned to every Man his ſhare and due proportion; ſo that it appeared as if the Land began to be at peace, and all things to diſpoſe themſelves towards quietneſs and enjoyment: And having thus juſtly ſhared to the firſt Conquerours their dues, it was not to be doubted, but that he would deal with others, who were to follow with the like equality. And being thus well employed, as this famous Cavalier ever was in all the courſe of his life, we ſhall now leave him for a while to treat of other matters, which at the ſame time paſſed amongſt the Indians.

CHAP. XVIII.

How the General Quizquiz was ſlain by his own Souldiers.

THat we may omit nothing material of all thoſe matters which occurred at that time in Peru, it is neceſſary for us to give an account of what ſucceſs befell the General Quizquiz, the Captain Huaypallca, and their Forces; who being animated and encouraged by the advantages they had gained over Don Pedro de Alvarado and Almagro in three ſeveral Skirmiſhes, began to preſume themſelves able to drive the Spaniards out of their Empire; and eſpecially Huaypallca was the more confident, becauſe in the abſence of Quizquiz he had been the Chief Commander in thoſe late Battels, which ſo vainly puffed him up in his own imagination, that he became preſumptuous, and ſecure in his ſtrength and fortune. Hereupon theſe two Commanders marched towards Quitu, with deſign to make new Levies of Men, and Proviſions for a War againſt the Spaniards; but they had not made many days march before they were diſappointed of their hopes and expectations; for the Curacas, as well as the common Indians, being affrighted and forewarned by the late treachery of Rumminavi, and jealous leſt they ſhould act over the like practices that the others had done, refuſed either to follow them to the War, or obey their Commands, which were for bringing in of Proviſions; for amongſt all the Captains of their Army, there was none of the Bloud-Royal that appeared, nor any perſon with a Title to the Kingdom of Quitu, either derived from Atahualpa, or Manco Inca, who being the onely Lawfull and Univerſal Heir of all that Empire, might countenance the deſign. With theſe difficulties, and in ſtraits of Proviſions, Quizquiz was labouring when his Purveyors fell into the hands of Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, by the Advices which his friends the Indians had given; for they being generally deſirous of a Peace, were troubled at all acts and motions which tended to a War; and in regard that there was no Army afoot againſt the Spaniards, but this onely, they were deſirous to ſee it defeated; ſo that upon this advice Belalcaçar ſurprized the Foragers, and eaſily deſtroyed them, and took many of them Priſoners; ſuch as eſcaped, carried the news of their defeat, and that the Viracochas were very numerous and ſtrong; for having but the day before found ſo many of them in a body together, they were undeceived in the reports they had, that the Spaniards, or greateſt part of them, were departed out of the Countrey with Alvarado and Almagro. Upon this advice Quizquiz aſſembled all his Captains to conſider what would be moſt expedient in this caſe, propoſing it neceſſary to make a retreat for the preſent, in order to gather Proviſions, which were greatly wanting, and then on a ſudden to aſſault the Viracochas, and proſecute them untill they had entirely deſtroyed and extirpated them out of their Countrey; but the Captains amongſt whom Huaypallca, (who ever ſince the late ſucceſſes, was acknowledged the Chief) were of a different opinion, eſteeming it their beſt courſe to render and ſubmit themſelves unto the Spaniards, to deſire Peace and Friendſhip with them; whom to ſubdue, it was a madneſs to imagine, ſince experience had ſhewn them to be Invincible; and that it was impoſſible to get Proviſions from the Indians, who had withdrawn themſelves from their obedience; and in that ſtarving condition, how difficult would it be for them to make War upon a victorious Army; and which it were more eaſie to overcome with fair words, and kind treatment, than to reſiſt a people come from Heaven, which upon ſubmiſſion would readily entertain Friendſhip and Peace with them. And in regard the Prophecy foretold by the Inca Huayna Capac (namely, that a ſtranger Nation ſhould be Lords of that Nation) was now fulfilled, it was in vain to tempt the fortune of War longer. But Quizquiz being a ſtout Man, and a Souldier, declared againſt this manner of ſubmiſſion, upbraiding his Souldiers with cowardiſe and puſillanimity of ſpirit; and with

with haughty and proud Language told them plainly, that he had no need of their Counsel in this case, nor in any other whatsoever; and therefore he required them as their General to obey and follow him, if they hoped for Success and Victory in this Enterprise. But the Captains, who from the time that they had been worsted in several Skirmishes, which they had had with Alvarado, and Almagro, began to lose much of the Respect and Honour which once they conceived for Quizquiz, because they believed he had not behaved himself with that Courage which he professed in divers Engagements against the Spaniards; so that now, quitting all Respect towards him, they told him plainly, That since he was so averse to all Peace and Friendship with the Viracochas, and so resolute to maintain the War, and confident of Victory, that he should make no Delays, but immediately engage in Fight with the Spaniards, which would be much better than cowardly to retire, and rather honourably to dye like brave Souldiers, than to perish in the Mountains and Deserts with hunger, like miserable People: And this they declared to be their ultimate Resolution in the Case.

Quizquiz was not a little nettled to find his Captains replying so briskly upon him, the which confirmed him in the belief of what he had for some days suspected, that there was some Mutiny contriving against him in the Army; and therefore he told them, That he plainly perceived that they passed or transferred the respect they had for him unto Captain Huaypallca, the which he could not endure, and thereof admonished them to amend speedily, before he proceeded to punish this their Offence. And in the mean time he gave them to understand, That he took notice of the liberty they used in their insolent Discourse, which savoured of Rebellion and Disobedience towards their Commander; into which he would make a strict Enquiry, and Examination, and punish both the Mutiniers, and the chief Leader of them. Huaypallca thinking himself reflected upon by this Discourse, began to huff, and be very angry; and being elated, and his Spirits raised by his late Successes, and being sensible of the great Esteem which the Captains had for him, he made an Attempt, which none believed he had Courage to doe, and wrested the Javelin which Quizquiz held in his Hand, and forced it from him; the which Weapon was the Ensign of his Command, like those Truncheons which our Generals carry in their Hands, and is called by the Indians Chuquiapu; with this Lance, or Javelin, Huaypallca ran him through the Breast, and being in like manner seconded by the other Commanders, every one of which had a blow at him with his Weapon, he was soon dispatched. Thus Quizquiz ended his Days, being the last and the most famous Souldier of all the Captains and Servants of Atahualpa; his Fate was like that of his other Companions, for the Justice of Heaven allways provides punishments agreeable to Mens Offences, and raises up one Tyrant to punish and afflict another. Hereupon Huaypallca, and the other Captains disbanded their Army, and every one in a disguise shifted for himself, retiring into places where they thought they might live most hidden and obscure; howsoever they lived in perpetual fear and apprehension of being betrayed by their own People.

CHAP. XIX.

Don Diego de Almagro makes himself Governour without the King's Commission; and what Agreement was made between him and Marquis Piçarro.

DIscord having now produced one of its effects amongst the Indians, which was the Death of Quizquiz, did endeavour to avail in like manner amongst the Spaniards, had not Peace and Friendship, which are an opposite party thereunto, countermined its Works: For it is to be noted, that some Months after the News came to Peru of the Arrival of Hernando Piçarro in Spain, and of the kind reception which the Treasure he carried had made for him, and of the Honour and Respect which was shewed him in his Negotiations with His Majesty, who was pleased to bestow the Title of Marquis on his Brother, of which Augustin Carate gives an Account in the 5th Chapter of his 3d Book, in this manner:

" Amongst other things for which the Governour Don Francisco Piçarro petitioned His Hajesty, one was, That in reward of his great Services, performed in the Conquest of Peru, he would be pleased to grant to him and his Heirs, the perpetual Vassalage of twenty thousand Indians in the Province of Atabillios, together with the Rents, Tribute and Jurisdiction belonging thereunto, and with the Title of Marquis. In Answer hereunto His Majesty readily bestowed on him the Title of Marquis of that Province; but as to the Command over the Indians, he would first inform himself of the nature and quality of the Countrey, and of what Damage or Prejudice such a Concession might prove; and that then he would shew him all the Grace and Favour which was convenient: From which time the Patent of his Marquisate taking date, we shall for the future style him with the Honour of that Title. Thus far are the Words of Carate, who also affirms; that besides this Honour, his Government was enlarged for many Leagues, but yet doth not tell us how far.

Hernando Piçarro obtained for himself a Knighthood, with the Habit of St. Jago, with other favours; and for Almagro he acquired the Title of Mareschal of Peru, with the extent of Government, reaching an hundred Leagues North and South, distinct from the Jurisdiction of Marquis Piçarro; the which second Government was called New Toledo, as the other was New Castile. The Advices hereof being wrote from Spain, Almagro received them at Cozco, where he resided with Prince Manco Inca, and with John and Gonçalo Piçarro, Brothers of the Marquis, and being, as is the nature of all ambitious Men, impatient for Government and Command, he never staid for Commission from His Majesty, nor Confirmation of the News, but immediately from that time took on him the Title of Governour. And whereas (it was reported) that the Jurisdiction of the Marquis Piçarro was to extend 200 Leagues in length from the Equinoctial Southward, whether the same be measured along the Coast, or within Land, or by the degrees of latitude, it would fall out, that the City of Cozco would not be comprehended within his Lot, but would belong to Almagro; on confidence of which, without other Considerations, he laid aside the Deputation he had received from Almagro, and in virtue of his own Right assumed to himself the Government of that City, and shared the Vassalage of the Indians amongst his own Creatures by Authority from himself. All which he acted by the Advice and Counsel of several ſeveral Spaniards, who being deſirous of Novelty, and Diſſention, moved and incited him thereunto. On the other ſide John and Gonçala Piçarro, and other Gentlemen, which came in with Alvarado, made head, and oppoſed him; of which were Graviel de Rojas, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, Antonio Altimirano, Alonſo de Alvarado, and the greateſt part of that Regiment, and the Diſſentions aroſe ſo high amongſt them, and to that Rage, that many of them were often killed and wounded in the Scuffles. Of which intelligence being brought to the Marquiſs then at Truxillo, he immediately departed thence, being carried from one ſtage to another on the Shoulders of Indians, for the ſpace of two hundred Leagues, which is the diſtance of that place from Cozco. In this Journey the Marquiſs travelled alone, and truſted himſelf to the Faithfulneſs of the Indians, on Confidence and Security of Manco Inca, who remained as a Pawn in the Hands of his Brothers, whom we call Prince, and not King, becauſe he was never permitted to Reign, though the Indians did ſtrive, and endeavour by all means poſſible, to oblige the Spaniards, in hopes that by ſuch Compliances, they might be induced to reſtore the Empire unto their Inca. The Marquiſs being arrived, the Diſcontents quickly vaniſhed; for theſe two great Men having ſworn Friendſhip, and ancient Brotherhood together, were immediately reconciled, and brought to a better underſtanding, by removal of evil Counſellours, and of ſuch as deſigned to make a Benefit by their Differences.

And now Almagro was become ſenſible of his too haſty Declaration, and that he had been too forward in carving out a Juriſdiction to himſelf, upon a bare Information, before he had been authorized to claim his Right thereunto by His Majeſty's Commiſſion; on which acknowledgment the Marquiſs pardoned him, and both of them became as perfect Friends as if there had never paſſed any Difference between them: And for better Security and Conſervation of this Confederacy, they renewed their Vows at the Holy Sacrament never more to violate their Faith each to the other, and by mutual conſent agreed between themſelves and their parties reſpectively, That Almagro ſhould undertake the Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Chili, which abounded with Gold, and appertained to the Incas; upon which conditions they agreed to join together in their Petition to His Majeſty, to grant unto him that Dominion; and in caſe that could not be obtained, that then they would make an equal Diviſion of Peru between themſelves.

On theſe Terms both Parties remained well ſatisfied, though ſome malitious perſons ſuggeſted, that Almagro, who had been ſo good a Companion, and ſo neceſſary an Inſtrument in this Conqueſt, had been unjuſtly treated, and thrown out of all Right in the Diviſion of Peru, and that the Piçarros, under the pretence of an hundred Leagues, had engroſſed and appropriated the whole Dominion thereof unto themſelves. And whereas upon the Fame and Noiſe which the Riches of that Empire had made in the World, great numbers of Spaniards had flocked from all places, and that the parts already conquered did ſcarce yield a Tract of Land, ſufficient to ſatisfie the Merits and Expectations of the firſt Conquerours; it was therefore judged neceſſary to enlarge the extent of the Poſſeſſions by new Conqueſts; and that as Almagro was to ſubdue the Kingdom of Chili, ſo alſo Captain Alonſo de Alvarado was deſigned for the Province of the Chachapuyas; which, though under the Command of the Inca, yet truſting to the Security of the Mountains, where Horſe can doe little Service, and to their own Skilfulneſs, and Valour in War, refuſed to yield any Obedience to the Spaniards. Captain Garcilaſſo de la Vega was deſigned for the Province which the Spaniards, by Irony, or contraries, call the Province of Good Fortune. Captain John Porcel was ſent into the Countrey called by the Spaniards Bracamoros, and by the Indians Pacamuru. And farther, it was ordered, That Recruits ſhould be ſent to Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, for his Aſſiſtance in the Conqueſt of Quitu; by which means Proviſions would not onely be made to ſatisfie the Deſires and Expectations of all Perſons, but the Minds of the Adventurers employed, and amuſed in new Acquiſitions and Enterpriſes, which remaining in Idleneſs and Sloth, would be inclinable to Mutinies and Sedition.

Theſe

Theſe Articles being concluded and agreed between Almagro and the Marquiſs Piçarro, the foregoing Deſigns were publiſhed, ſo that the Captains prepared themſelves for their reſpective Enterpriſes, and accordingly raiſed and enrolled their Men. Alonſo de Alvarado liſted three hundred Men for his Conqueſt, Garcilaſſo de la Vega two hundred and fifty for his; and he that was intended for the Pacamurus, was provided with a like number; and all three entred into their reſpective Diviſions, where they ſuſtained great Labours, and Hardſhips, by reaſon of the high Mountains and Interruption of Rivers, as we ſhall hereafter ſhew in their due places. The Recruits ſent to Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar conſiſted of one hundred and fifty Men. But Almagro made up a Force five hundred and fifty, amongſt which ſeveral of them had already Lands ſet out to them, and commands over Indians, yet in hopes of better Fortune in Chili, of whoſe Riches there was great talk, they left their Poſſeſſions and Eſtates about Cozco. For in thoſe beginnings every poor Spaniard in the condition of a common Souldier, thought all Peru but a mean Share and Reward of his Labours. Almagro lent thirty Thouſand Peſos of Gold to his Souldiers, to buy Horſes, and Arms, and other neceſſaries; ſo that they were all very well provided.

John de Saavedra, a Native of Seville, (with whom I was well acquainted) was ſent in the Van, or Forlorn Hope, with one hundred and fifty Men, to diſcover the Countrey, which they found to be very quiet, and in a peaceable poſture, by reaſon that their Inca, Prince Manco, remained in the Hands of the Spaniards, and that the Indians were in very great hopes of his Reſtauration to the Empire.

Almagro left Captain Ruy Diaz, and John de Herrada, his intimate Friend, to reſide as Agents for him in the City of Cozco, to raiſe Men, and to ſend him Recruits, and ſupply him with what was neceſſary for the War againſt the Kingdom of Chili, it being reported to be a Countrey mountainous, and the People Warlike.

CHAP. XX.

Almagro enters Chili with the great detriment of his Army; but is well received by the People of the Inca.

MAtters being designed, as before related, Almagro departed from Cozco about the beginning of the Year 1535, carrying in his company with him Paullu the Brother of Manco Inca, of whom we have formerly made mention; as also the High Priest, which was as yet maintained in Honour, called Villac Omu by the Indians, but by the Spaniards Villa Oma. He was also accompanied with many Indian Nobles, and many of the common sort, who carried Arms and Baggage to the number of 15000 Men; all which were sent by the Command of Manco Inca, who imagined, that such Services as these would oblige the Spaniards, and ni common Gratitude engage them to surrender his Kingdom to him. On this expectation he enjoined his Brother, and the High Priest to attend the Viracochas, whereby the Indians were much more ready to honour and doe them Service. But in the Relation of this passage, Historians mistake in not rightly timing matters, saying, That the Inca gave Instructions to his Brother to kill Almagro in the Charcas, or in some other convenient place. But this was afterwards certified, when the Inca perceived that the Spaniards never intended to restore him to his Kingdom, as we shall relate in its due place. But as to the present Affair, Saavedra, who led the Van before, came to the Charcas, which is about two hundred Leagues distant from Cozco, without the least misfortune, or unhappy accident by the way, worthy the notice; for the Indians received them with all amicable and kind Treatment in every place where they came. It was his fortune to meet in the Charcas with Gabriel de Rojas, sent thither by Marquis Piçarro, with a Force of about seventy Men, the which Saavedra would have taken without just reason, for since the Vice of Discord could not find entrance into the peaceable Minds of the Indians, it would make its way into the Humour of the Spaniards, to put all into Flame and Combustion; but Gabriel de Rojas having information hereof, took another way to the City of los Reyes, and so wisely avoided the Plot intended against him; but the most part of his Souldiers joined with Almagro in his Enterprise against Chili. In like manner Almagro came to the Charcas, without any Accident which befell him on the way worthy the notice: And now to proceed in his March, he caused every thing that was necessary to be provided, and because the Journey was a much nearer cut over Mountains, than by the Sea-Coast, he resolved to take that way, and though Paullu, and Villac Umu informed him, that the way over the famous Mountain of the Cordillera was not passable, by reason of the Snows, but at a certain season of the Year, yet he would give no credence to their Words, but told them, that the Countrey of Peru was to yield, and be obedient to the Discoverers and Conquerours of it, and that the very Elements, the Region, and Climates, and Heaven it self was to become propitious, and favourable to their Designs, as it had hitherto been.

With this Resolution Almagro departed from the Charcas, and proceeded on his Journey by way of the Mountains; for being jealous, that Paullu did not faithfully advise him, he slighted the Counsel which he had given him; but they had not passed many days Journey through the Mountains, before they began to repent of the Way they had taken, by reason of the many Difficulties sustained therein. The first that lead the Way, being not able to pass by reason of the Depths of Snow, were forced to throw it aside with their Hands and Arms, which was the cause that they made short Days Journies. At length their Provisions began to fail, by reason that they were in the Way three times longer than they expected; but their greateſt inconvenience was the Extremity of Cold; for, according to the Deſcription of Coſmographers, the Top of that ſnowy Mountain reaches as high as the middle Region of the Air; the which being extremely cold, and the ground covered with Snow, and the Seaſon of the Year being about the time of our Midſummer, when the Days are at the ſhorteſt it froze ſo exceſſively, that Spaniards, Negroes, and Indians, and many Horſes were frozen to Death. The poor Indians ſuffered moſt, being ill provided with warm Garments, ſo that ten thouſand of the fifteen thouſand Indians dyed with the Cold; nor did the Spaniards eſcape, who were better clothed, for of them alſo one hundred and fifty dyed; and ſo cruel and ſevere was the Froſt, that their Fingers and Toes were ſo benumbed, that they were inſenſible of the freezing thereof, untill they rotted off from their Hands and Feet. I was acquainted with one of theſe perſons, called Jeronimo Caſtilla, born at Camora, of as good a Family as any is in that City. Many of them loſt their baggage, not by violence of an Enemy, becauſe there was none in thoſe parts to oppoſe them, but were forced to relinquiſh and leave them, the Indians being dead who carried their Burthens.

In fine, after a tedious Journey the Spaniards paſſed the Mountain, haraſſed and tired with their Travels and Labour, and being come to the other ſide, inſtead of Enemies they fell into the Hands of the Indians, who were their Friends, and who received them as kindly, and treated them as well as if they had been their Countrey-Men, and of their own Bloud; for they being Inhabitants of Copayapu, and Subjects of the Inca, did, in reſpect to Paullu Inca, and the High Prieſt, Feaſt and entertain the Spaniards with all the plenty and variety of Curioſities which their Countrey could afford. And moſt happy was it for the Spaniards, for had the Indians proved Enemies, and not Friends, and taken them unprovided, and at that advantage they might all have periſhed, and not one eſcaped.

During the time that the Viracochas refreſhed themſelves, after their late Sufferings and Labours, which were greater than can be expreſſed. Paullu Inca, and his Kinſman Villac Umu, entertained Diſcourſe with the Captains and Curacas of the Empire, and gave them to underſtand all that paſſed in Peru, relating to the Story of Huaſcar Inca, and Atahualpa; and how the Spaniards put him to Death in Revenge of the Murther he had committed on his King, and all his Family, that at preſent the Prince Manco Inca, the lawfull Heir, was in their Hands and Cuſtody, and treated by them with all imaginable Reſpect and Honour, and with Promiſes of being reſtored unto his Empire, and to the Height and Grandeur of Majeſty; in expectation of which, all Indians were obliged to aſſiſt and ſerve them, the better to engage them unto a performance of their Promiſe to the Inca: And farther, they informed them, that theſe were Men deſcended from their Father the Sun, and for that Reaſon they called them Incas, and owned them for Kindred and Relations, with the Name of their God Viracocha. And in regard their General was Brother and Aſſociate with him, that reſided at Cozco, the Services and Kindneſſes which were ſhewed to one, would be accepted by the other; and that the greateſt Preſents, and beſt Treatment, that could be given them, would be much Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, for they loved thoſe things very much; and ſince their Countrey yielded nothing beſides Gold, they would doe well to gather as much of it, as they could, and preſent it to the Spaniards, who would not onely kindly accept it, but the Prince Manco Inca would likewiſe eſteem himſelf very well ſerved by thoſe Gifts.

Upon this Information the Indians of Copayapu were infinitely rejoiced with the Hopes to ſee their Inca reſtored to his Empire, ſo that the ſame day they amaſſed together above the value of two hundred thouſand Ducats, in Veſſels of Gold, the which having been deſigned for the accuſtomary Preſents which were due to their Incas, were reſerved untill that time; for ſo ſoon as News came to Chili of the Wars between Huaſcar and Atahualpa, the Incas, who were the Captains, and ruled that Kingdom, deſiſted from their Services, and from making Preſents to the Inca, untill ſuch time as the Controverſie about the Government was decided.

Paullu

Paullu having amaſſed the Gold, carried it to Almagro, and preſented it to him in the Name of his Brother Manco Inca, and of all the Kingdom of Chili; which much rejoiced and encouraged Almagro, and his Souldiers to ſee, that a ſmall People, in ſo ſhort a time was able to provide ſuch a quantity of Gold, which was a clear evidence of the Riches of that Countrey. When Almagro ſaw the Gold, he ſmiled, and heartily thanked Paullu, telling him, that ſuch Gifts as theſe were ſo acceptable to him, as would oblige him for the future, as they did at preſent, to make him ſuch gratefull returns as would be much to his advantage.

Paullu perceiving that theſe Preſents extorted kind Words and Promiſes from Almagro, all which he believed, endeavoured more and more to oblige him with Preſents of that nature, and accordingly ſent to the Villages, and inhabited Vallies, which were thereunto adjoining, to bring in all the Gold they had conſerved for the Incas, for that he had occaſion thereof, to make Preſents unto the Viracochas, who were Brothers to the Inca. Upon the Orders the Indians, in a few days, brought in three hundred thouſand Ducats of Gold over and above the former quantity, and laid them before Almagro; which when he ſaw, he hugged himſelf with the thoughts of that rich Countrey, which was faln to his Lot, the which eſteeming now for his own, in gratitude to his happy Fortune, he became munificent in a high degree, both to acquire Honour and Fame, of which he was very ambitious, and to gain the Good-will and Affection of his Souldiers and Companions; which that he might procure, he, in preſence of them all, took out the Obligations and Bonds which every one of them, both before and on occaſion of this Enterpriſe, had given him, which amounted unto above an hundred thouſand Ducats, the which he tore and cancelled one after the other; telling thoſe who were bound to him in thoſe Papers, That he remitted, and made Preſents to them of their Debts, wiſhing that the Summs had been greater, that he might have had occaſion to have obliged them farther; and to thoſe who were not indebted to him, he gave Money to defray their Charges, and make ſuch Proviſions as were then neceſſary; with which Liberality all the Souldiers were greatly ſatisfied and pleaſed.

Lopez de Gomara, in the 142d Chapter of his Book, ſays, That this act of Liberality was a piece of Magnificence, rather of a Prince than of a Souldier, yet when he dyed, there was not any who would cover him with a rag of Cloth at the place where he was beheaded, &c.

CHAP. XXI.

New Pretenſions obſtruct the Conqueſt of Chili. Almagro deſigns to return unto Peru; and the Reaſons why.

Almagro having repoſed a while, and refreſhed himſelf, his Men, and his Horſes, after the Hardſhip ſuſtained in the late Conqueſts, he then conſulted of the Way and Method how to ſubdue the other Vallies and Provinces of the Kingdom of Chili, which were not ſubject to the Dominion of the Inca; for thoſe that were, upon appearance of Paullu, Brother of their King, needed no other force to render them obedient; wherefore Almagro communicated unto Paullu his Intentions, who conſidering that ſuch Conqueſts would be Enlargements of his Brother's Empire, readily aſſented, and in order to that Deſign drew out from the Garriſons, and places of Defence, all the Force that were in them, and iſſued out his Commands for making Proviſions, and bringing them to the Camp; which having done, he accompanied Almagro to the Conqueſt of the Provinces of Purumauca, Antulli, Pincu, Cauqui, and the Parts adjacent, as far as to the Province of Araucu. In this Enterpriſe they had many Skirmiſhes with the Natives, who behaved themſelves valiantly, and like Souldiers, being in a ſignal manner dexterous in their Bows and Arrows, with which they would ſhoot with admirable aim; but the particulars thereof we ſhall not relate, nor yet the Battels, onely in general, that they were very bloudy, and ſtoutly fought, becauſe we muſt haſten to our Hiſtory of Peru. In ſhort therefore, though the Enemies made good reſiſtence, yet the Spaniards gained upon them with happy Succeſs, by the Aſſiſtence and Good-will of Paullu, and his Indians. But theſe happy and proſperous proceedings were ſoon obſtructed by Diſcord, which always blowed the Flames of Feuds and Diſſention between theſe two famous Brothers, which were never quenched, untill both of them were conſumed, as will appear in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

Thus Almagro proceeding in a proſperous courſe of Victory, though at the expence of Spaniſh and Indian Bloud; at the end of five Months, from the time that he entred Chili, Recruits of an hundred Men were brought to him, under the Command and Conduct of Ruis Dias, and John de Herrada, who (as we have ſaid) were appointed to remain in Cozco, to make Levies of Men, and ſend him Succours. Their paſſage was over the ſame Mountains, and by the ſame way that Almagro had traverſed before; and though it happened at a better ſeaſon of the Year, that is, in the month of November, which is Summer in that Climate, when the Snows were not ſo deep, nor the Colds ſo intenſe, yet many Indians, and ſome Spaniards were frozen to Death; and thoſe that eſcaped had periſhed with Hunger, had they not been ſuſtained by the Fleſh of thoſe Horſes which were found dead in the way, where having been frozen ever ſince the time that Almagro paſſed that way, the fleſh thereof was as freſh and good, after five Months, as if they had been killed that very day.

The Difficulties of this Journey being overcome, (which were greater than we are able to expreſs,) they were received by their General with all imaginable Joy and Contentment; and better was their wellcome, when it was known that Herrada brought with him His Majeſty's Commiſſion, which inveſted Almagro in the Government and Juriſdiction of an hundred Leagues of Land, exempt and diſtinct from the Territories of Marquiſs Piçarro. This Commiſſion was brought by Hernando Piçarro, when he laſt returned from Spain unto Peru, the which he ſent from los Reyes to Herrada by the Poſt, knowing that he was then upon his departure for Chili. This particular is related by Gomara in the 135th Chapter of his Book, the which Words we have extracted verbatim in this manner.

Almagro

" Almagro being employed in his Wars in Chili, John de Herrada came to him " with a Commiſſion for his Government, which was brought from Spain by " Hernando Piçarro, which, though it coſt him his Life, yet he more rejoiced and " triumphed than with all the Gold and Silver he had gained, for he was more " ambitious of Honour than covetous of Riches. Hereupon he entred into con- " ſultation of the courſe he was to ſteer, whether to remain in Chili, or return to " Cozco; after ſome debate thereupon, the latter was reſolved, namely, to return " unto Cozco, to take poſſeſſion thereof, ſince the Government of that place fell " to his Fortune. It had been better for him if he had followed the Advice and " Requeſt of thoſe who perſuaded him to remain in Chili, or in the Charcas, " which is a very rich and fruitfull Countrey, and from thence to have ſent and " known the Will and Pleaſure of Franciſco Piçarro, and his Aſſiſtants at Cozco, be- " fore he attempted a matter, which proved a breach of their Aſſociation. The " Perſons who perſuaded him to return, were chiefly Gomez and Diego de Alvarado, " and Rodrigo Orgonnos, his familiar and intimate Friend. In fine, Almagro reſolved to " return to Cozco, and aſſume the Government thereof by force, in caſe the Pi- " çarros ſhould not eaſily render and reſign the ſame. Thus far are the Words of Gomara.
